17. All the Greeks took Sosthenes (R.V. omits "Greeks")—"the successor of Crispus, and probably S. Paul's chief accuser—and beat him—it seems, because he had occasioned them so much trouble to no purpose. Before the judgment seat. One can hardly think in the sight of Gallio, though at no great distance from him. And it seems to have had a happy effect. For Sosthenes himself was afterwards a Christian (1 Cor. 1. 1)"—WESLEY.

At least, there was a Sosthenes a brother, about four years afterwards, with S. Paul at Ephesus, who was not unknown to the Church at Corinth. S. Luke mentions the incident as the fulfilment of the promise in ver. 10; so little happened to the apostle that the accusers themselves were beaten.

Vers. 18–22. PAUL GOES BY WAY OF EPHESUS AND CÆSAREA TO JERUSALEM, AND THENCE TO ANTIOCH.—18. Paul continued many days—"after the year and six months, to confirm the brethren. Aquila having shaven his head—as was the custom in a vow. (Ch. 21. 24; Num. 6. 18.) At Cenchrea—a seaport town, at a small distance from Corinth"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Having shorn." "Some suppose this refers to Aquila, as being the person last mentioned, but the ordinary interpretation is more natural"—W. W. "S. Paul, though the Apostle of the Gentiles, did not cease to regard the ceremonies of the Jews in things which did not militate against Christian liberty. For some reason, either during sickness or in the midst of his conflict at Corinth, he had taken a vow upon himself of the nature of the Nazarite vow. (Num. 6.) This could only be brought to a fitting close by a journey to Jerusalem to offer up the hair, which was part of the vow to leave uncut. At Jerusalem, when the ceremony was completed, the head was shaven (ch. 21. 24); but it seems to have been allowed to persons at a distance to cut the hair short and to bring that with them to the Temple, and offer it up when the rest was shaven. This appears to be what S. Paul did at Cenchrea, before starting on the voyage to Syria"—C. B. Cenchrea was the eastern harbour of

Corinth whence S. Paul would sail. (Rom. 16. 1.)

19. To Ephesus—the capital of Ionia, and by far the busiest and most populous city in Proconsular Asia. Up to this time he had not been permitted by the Holy Spirit to preach in this province.

21. I must by all means keep the feast at Jerusalem. "This was not from any apprehension that he was obliged in conscience to keep the Jewish feasts; but to take the opportunity of meeting a great number of his countrymen to whom he might preach Christ, or whom he might further instruct, or free from the prejudices they had imbibed against him"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits the clause and reads, "Taking his leave of them, and saying, I will return again." "So he did (ch. 19. 1)"—WESLEY.

22. And landing at Cæsarea he went up—"immediately to Jerusalem—and saluted the Church—eminently so-called, being the mother-Church of Christian believers; and having kept the feast there, he went down from thence to Antioch"—WESLEY.

"Thus S. Paul concluded his second missionary journey. He had revisited some of the churches founded during his first mission with S. Barnabas, and he had gone through Phrygia and Galatia, breaking new ground, and sowing seed which had grown rapidly; but his chief labours and successes had been in Europe. He was led by the Spirit to select those scenes of labour where success would be of the greatest advantage to the future extension of the Church. Nothing in Church history is more interesting or more instructive than the simple narrative of the adventures of the apostle and his companions at Philippi, at Thessalonica and Berea, at Athens and at Corinth. The journey occupied about three years, A.D. 51–54"—G.

Vers. 23–28. PAUL SETS FORTH ON A THIRD JOURNEY—APOLLOS COMES TO EPHESUS.—23. He went over the country of Galatia and Phrygia. "It is supposed, spending about four years therein, including the time he stayed at Ephesus"—WESLEY.

In order—taking no doubt the same direction as on the second journey, and going from city to city and from church to church strengthening (R.V. "stablishing") all the disciples. One may see something of what S. Paul meant by the "care of all the churches." (Gal. 1. 2; 4. 14; ch. 14. 22; 15. 32, 41.)

24. An eloquent man (R.V. "a learned man")—mighty in the Scriptures—"of the Old Testament. Every talent may be of use in the kingdom of God, if joined with knowledge of the Scriptures and fervour of spirit"—WESLEY.

Alexandria was a place abounding with Jews, and was the chief seat of Jewish culture. (1 Cor. 1. 12; 3. 5, 6; 4. 6; Titus 3. 13.)

25. This man had been instructed (R.V.)—"though not perfectly—in the way of the Lord—in the doctrine of Christ. Knowing only the baptism of John—only what John taught those whom he baptized, namely, to repent and believe in a Messiah shortly to appear"—WESLEY.

Being fervent in spirit, he spake and taught carefully the things concerning Jesus (R.V.). "'He spake'—privately—'and taught'—publicly. Probably he returned to Alexandria soon after he had been baptized by John; and so had no opportunity of being fully acquainted with the doctrines of the gospel, as delivered by Christ and His apostles"—WESLEY.

"This Alexandrian Jew might publish with the utmost accuracy all that John had proclaimed about the kingdom of heaven, and enforce it from his own studies of the Scriptures; he might declare how John had pointed to Jesus, and might even relate much of the words and works of Christ, and show that Christ's life was a testimony that redemption was near"—C. B.

26. Aquila and Priscilla. The R.V., following the best MSS., reverses the order of the names, putting the wife before the husband, as in ver. 18. She must have been a person of considerable ability and influence, judging from the manner in which she is repeatedly spoken of. Explained to him the way of God more perfectly. "He who knows Christ is able to instruct even those that are mighty in the Scriptures"—WESLEY. (Rom. 12. 11; ch. 19. 3.)

27. Who greatly helped through grace (so margin in R.V.). "It is through grace only that any gift of anyone is profitable to another. Them which had believed. Apollos did not plant, but water. This was the peculiar gift which he had received. And he was better able to convince the Jews than to convert the heathens"—WESLEY.

28. Mightily convinced the Jews (R.V. "Powerfully confuted"). The word, however, refers to the character of his reasoning rather than to its effect. And that publicly—"in the synagogue. This was an important element in the help which Apollos gave. He was a learned Jew, able to set forth to whole Jewish congregations how their Scriptures were receiving their fulfilment"—C. B. (1 Cor. 3. 16; ch. 9. 22; 17. 3; ver. 5.) "It is instructive that a man so important and influential in the apostolic Church as Apollos should have been indebted to a plain married couple, as Aquila and Priscilla, for his thorough introduction into positive Christian truth. They took notice of him and of his promising gifts, but they also recognised what was defective in him; they initiated him, certainly more highly gifted and more learned than themselves, more thoroughly into the Christian truth; they assisted his coming to Corinth, and so set the right man in the right place. Two persons, without ecclesiastical position, and especially a woman of real piety and of solid Christian knowledge, have done what, according to our ideas, is the business of theological institutions and ecclesiastical boards—a proof of the universal priesthood of the apostolic times"—L.

CHAPTER XIX.

Vers. 1–12. PAUL AT EPHESUS—GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY.—1. Having passed through—"Galatia and Phrygia, which were termed the upper parts of Asia Minor"—WESLEY.

R.V. "The upper country." Certain disciples—"who had been formerly baptized by John the Baptist, and since imperfectly instructed in Christianity"—WESLEY.

2. Have ye received the Holy Ghost?—"the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit as well as His sanctifying graces. We have not so much as heard—whether there be any such gifts"—WESLEY. (1 Cor. 1. 12; 3. 5, 6; ch. 8. 16; 1 Sam. 3. 17.)

R.V. "Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed? . . . Nay, we did not so much as hear whether the Holy Ghost was given." "These were converts to the Christian faith, believing that Jesus is the Christ; but S. Paul inquires whether they have received the Holy Ghost, whose comforting and sanctifying operations on the minds of men were revealed after the doctrine of Jesus being the Christ was made known. He asks whether they have been acquainted with this revelation, and received this blessing. And this was not all. Extraordinary gifts of the Spirit had been conferred upon the apostles and other disciples after Christ's ascension, and had been communicated on certain occasions since; and he inquires whether they had received these. Observe, reader, though we have now no reason to expect extraordinary gifts, yet there are graces of the Spirit given to all true believers; and it concerns us all to inquire whether we have received these"—B.

3. Into what were ye baptized?—"into what dispensation? To the sealing of what doctrine? Into John's baptism—we were baptized by John, and believe what he taught"—WESLEY. (Ch. 18. 25.)

4. John baptized—"that is, the whole baptism and preaching of John pointed at Christ. After this John is mentioned no more in the New Testament. Here he gives way to Christ altogether"—WESLEY. (Matt. 3. 11; John 1. 15, 27, 30; ch. 1. 5; 11. 16; 13. 24, 25.)

5. And hearing this they were baptized—"by some other. Paul only laid his hands upon them. They were baptized twice, but not with the same baptism. John did not administer that baptism which Christ afterwards commanded—that is, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost"—WESLEY. (Ch. 8. 16.)

6. They spake with tongues and prophesied—"a pentecostal outpouring, for as in Jerusalem the same gift produced an effect among Jews gathered from every quarter, so was the Spirit given that like results might follow in this great centre of Gentile activity"—C. B. It will be understood that the gift of prophecy generally implied chiefly, if not exclusively, the power of preaching the word with unction and with success. (Ch. 6. 6; 8. 17; 2. 4; 10. 46.)

9. The way—"the Christian way of worshipping God. He departed—leaving them their synagogue to themselves. Discoursing daily—not on the Sabbath only—in the school of one Tyrannus—which we do not find was any otherwise consecrated than by preaching the gospel there"—WESLEY.

R.V "The school of Tyrannus." The teacher was evidently a well-known person; he was probably a Greek sophist or rhetorician, the school being his lecture-hall, but the number of instances in which we meet with Jews bearing Gentile names makes it impossible to decide with certainty. (Ch. 17. 2; 18. 4; 1. 3; 28. 23; 2 Tim. 1. 15; 2 Pet. 2. 2; Jude 10; ch. 9. 2; 22. 4; 24. 14; ver. 23.)

10. All who desired it among the inhabitants of the proconsular Asia now heard the word. "S. Paul had been forbidden to preach it in Asia before (ch. 16. 6); but now the time was come"—WESLEY.

Both Jews and Greeks. "The fame of the apostle's doctrine and miracles brought multitudes to Ephesus from distant parts; and these, being converted, preached the gospel in their own cities, and founded those churches which, the apostle tells the Colossians (Col. 2. 1), had not seen his face in the flesh"—B. (Ch. 20. 31.)

11. Special miracles—"wrought in a very uncommon manner"—WESLEY. (Mark 16. 20; ch. 14. 3.)

12. Handkerchiefs or aprons. "These persons acted on the popular belief that virtue proceeded from the bodies of our Lord and His apostles, without any act of will. The words of Scripture can hardly be made to countenance this belief, though they recognise it. (Mark 5. 30; Luke 8. 44; ch. 5. 15.) But if these men employed means which were unnecessary and superstitious to display their faith, because of the reality of this faith God did not suffer it to lose its reward"—C. B. (2 Kings 4. 29.) Evil spirits—"who also occasioned many of those diseases which yet might appear to be purely natural"—WESLEY.

Vers. 13–22. OVERTHROW OF THE EXORCISTS—PLANS FOR FURTHER PROGRESS.—13. Exorcists. "Several of the Jews about this time pretended to a power of casting out devils, particularly by certain arts or charms, supposed to be derived from Solomon. Undertook to name—vain undertaking! Satan laughs at all those who attempt to expel him either out of the bodies or the souls of men but by divine faith. All the light of reason is nothing to the craft and strength of that subtle spirit. His craft cannot be known but by the Spirit of God; nor can his strength be conquered but by the power of faith"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Strolling Jews, exorcists." "Observe that these men, by adopting the method of S. Paul, confessed the failure of their own efforts hitherto"—G. (Matt. 12. 27; Mark 9. 38; Luke 9. 49.)

14. Seven sons . . . chief of the priests (R.V. "A chief priest"). "There was no high priest, properly so called, of the name of Sceva. He may have been one of the heads of the twenty-four courses"—W. W.

15. Jesus I know, and Paul I know (R.V. margin, "Jesus I recognise"). "He acknowledged the power of Jesus, and he knew Paul as commissioned with that power"—W. W.

16. Overcame them (R.V. "Mastered both of them"). Two only were actually employed in attempting to eject the evil spirit. The distinction between the spirit and the man as separate persons, though the former had entire control of the latter, is carefully marked in these two verses. The supernatural strength recalls the demoniac of Gadara. (Mark 5. 4.)

17. This was known (R.V. "became known"). And the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified—"so that even the malice of the devil wrought for the furtherance of the gospel"—WESLEY. (Luke 1. 65; 7. 16; ch. 2. 43; 5. 5, 11.)

18. Many came, confessing—of their own accord—and openly declaring their deeds. "The efficacy of God's word, penetrating the inmost recesses of their soul, wrought that free and open confession to which perhaps even torments would not have compelled them"—WESLEY.

"A teacher can certainly neither demand nor enforce similar confessions of former abominations; but when they occur voluntarily, from the constraint of conscience and the impulse of the Spirit, they ought to be prudently encouraged, that souls may be brought to true repentance"—L. "It will be observed that the confession spoken of was (1) voluntary, (2) public"—G. (Matt. 3. 6.)

19. Curious arts—"magical arts, to which that soft appellation was given by those who practised them. Ephesus was peculiarly famous for these. And as these practices were of so much reputation there, it is no wonder the books which taught them should bear a great price. Bringing their books together—as it were by common consent. Burned them—which was far better than selling them, even though the money had been given to the poor. Fifty thousand pieces of silver—if these pieces of silver be taken for Jewish shekels, the sum will amount to six thousand two hundred and fifty pounds"—WESLEY.

If they were Attic drachmæ, the amount would be about two thousand pounds. It will be remembered that Ephesus was a Greek city, and also that even in Palestine the Jewish coinage was not in common use for purposes of trade. In the sacrifice we must think not only of the cost of the books, but also of the prospect of gain by the use of them.

20. So powerfully did the word of God grow—"in extent—and prevail—in power and efficacy"—WESLEY.

The word translated mightily is a military term, and is applied to the capture of a city by storming it. (Ch. 6. 7; 12. 24.)

21. After these things were ended. "S. Paul sought not to rest, but pressed on as if he had yet done nothing. He is already possessed of Ephesus and Asia. He purposes for Macedonia and Achaia. He has his eye upon Jerusalem; then upon Rome; afterwards on Spain. (Rom. 15. 24.) No Cæsar, no Alexander the Great, no other hero comes up to the magnanimity of this little Benjamite. Faith, and love to God and man, had enlarged his heart, even as the sand of the sea"—WESLEY.

He purposed passing through Macedonia and Achaia, visiting the churches which he had founded; and thence to go to Jerusalem, taking with him contributions from those churches for the poor Christians there. (1 Cor. 16. 1–3; Rom. 15. 25; Gal. 2. 1; ch. 20. 22; 18. 21; 23. 11; Rom. 15. 24–28.)

22. So he sent into Macedonia—no doubt that the contributions of the churches might be in readiness. He did not consider this care for the financial necessities of the Church beneath the dignity of an apostle. Stayed in Asia—where Ephesus was his headquarters.

Vers. 23–41. TUMULT CAUSED BY THE SILVERSMITHS—THEIR CRAFT IN DANGER.—23. About that way. The "way" was by this time one of the common titles given to Christian doctrine and worship. (2 Cor. 1. 8.)

24. Silver shrines—"silver models of that famous temple which were brought not only by the citizens but by strangers from all parts"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Silver shrines of Diana." The artificers—"the other silversmiths"—WESLEY.

Brought no little business (R.V.). (Ch. 16. 16, 19.)

25. The workmen—"employed by him and them"—WESLEY.

26. Almost throughout all Asia—the proconsular province (see ver. 10). Saying that they are not gods which are made with hands. "This manifestly shows that a contrary opinion did then generally prevail, namely, that there was a real divinity in their sacred images, though some of the later heathens spoke of them just as the Romanists do now"—WESLEY.

27. There is danger, not only that this our craft (trade) should come into disgrace, but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised. "No wonder a discourse should make so deep an impression, which was edged both by interest and superstition. 'The great goddess' was one of the standing titles of Diana. Her majesty destroyed—miserable majesty, which was capable of being thus destroyed! Whom all Asia and the world—that is, the Roman empire—worshippeth—although under a great variety of titles and characters. But the multitude of those that err does not turn error into truth"—WESLEY.

"The Diana or Artemis worshipped at Ephesus was totally distinct from the Greek or Roman goddess. It is supposed to have been a personification of the fruitful and nurturing powers of Nature, and so the image in the temple represented her with many breasts. The temple was one of the wonders of the ancient world. No expense had been spared upon its building, and the munificence of worshippers maintained it in full splendour"—C. B.

28. Great is Diana of the Ephesians—"an expressive image of many outbreaks of fanaticism, when under the appearance of zeal for the sanctuary nothing else than selfish motives are concealed"—L.

29. They rushed with one accord—"Demetrius and his company—into the theatre—where criminals were wont to be thrown to the wild beasts—dragging with them Gaius and Aristarchus—when they could not find S. Paul. Probably they hoped to oblige them to fight with the wild beasts, as some think S. Paul had done before"—WESLEY.

"The theatre in a Greek city was often used for public business as well as for spectacles. It was a very large public building, open to the sky, and generally semicircular in the interior. The ruins of the theatre of Ephesus still remain, and give evidence that it was a building capable of holding 25,000 or 30,000 people"—C. B. (Rom. 16. 23; 1 Cor. 1. 14; ch. 20. 4; 27. 2; Col. 4. 10; Philem. 24.)

30. Paul would have gone in to the people—"being above all fear, to plead the cause of his companions, and prove they are not gods which are made with hands"—WESLEY.

31. Certain of the principal officers of Asia—"the Asian priests who presided over the public games, which they were then celebrating in honour of Diana"—WESLEY.

"These officers, called Asiarchs, were persons of wealth, annually appointed to preside over the public worship, and to exhibit games in honour of the gods, at their own expense. In the province of Asia there were ten selected by the cities, and approved by the proconsul. As the priests of Diana took no prominent part against the apostle, while the Asiarchs, officers connected with the old religion, were his friends, it may be inferred (1) that the intelligent part of the community had no zeal in behalf of the old religion; (2) that S. Paul had not so much sought to attack the established system (ver. 37) as to set up another which should quietly displace it"—W. W.

32. The greater part did not know for what they were come together—"which is commonly the case in such assemblies"—WESLEY.

33. And they thrust forward—'namely, the artificers and workmen—Alexander—probably some well-known Christian whom they saw in the crowd. The Jews pushing him on—to expose him to the more danger. And Alexander waving with his hand—in token of desiring silence—would have made a defence—for himself and his brethren"—WESLEY.

This incident is by many otherwise understood. "Alexander, who is perhaps the same mentioned, 2 Tim. 4. 14, was put forward by the Jews as of the same craft, a coppersmith, to disclaim any approbation on their part of S. Paul's proceedings. His appearance was misunderstood, and only served to increase the uproar, for it would appear that the Jews were not more popular at Ephesus than at Rome, Philippi, or Corinth"—W. W.

34. But when they knew that he was a Jew—"and consequently an enemy to their worship of images"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Perceived that he was a Jew." "The stamp of his nationality was on his face, and no doubt on his dress also"—C. B. Great is Diana of the Ephesians. "This cry was thought a sufficient confutation of S. Paul's doctrine, 'that they are no gods which are made with hands'; thus the most sacred truths are often run down with nothing but noise and clamour"—B.

35. The town-clerk had appeased the people (R.V. "had quieted the multitude"). "'The register'—probably the chief governor of the public games"—WESLEY.

"A magistrate of great authority, in a very high and public position"—C. H. Worshipper of the great goddess (R.V. "Temple-keeper of the great Diana"). The image which fell down from Jupiter. "They believed that very image of Diana, which stood in her temple, fell down from Jupiter in heaven. Perhaps he designed to insinuate as if, falling down from Jupiter, it was not made with hands, and so was not that sort of idol which S. Paul had said were no gods"—WESLEY.

"Many images, having no historical record, were said to have fallen from the sky; the Trojan Palladium, the most ancient Minerva of the Athenian Acropolis, and many others"—G.

37. Neither robbers of churches (R.V. "of temples"). The temple at Ephesus had a great treasure-chamber. Blasphemers of your goddess (R.V. "our goddess"). "They simply declared the one God, and the vanity of idols in general"—WESLEY.

"The method of exposing to the heathen what is irrational and foolish in their religion in an offensive and irritating manner has not the precedent of the great apostle for it. His procedure was positive, not negative; the testimony of the true God and of His Christ, the publication of the gospel, is the power of God which illuminates, edifies, and saves"—L.

38. The law is open (R.V. "The courts are open"). There are proconsuls — "one in every province. There was one at Ephesus"—WESLEY.

"Proconsuls are an imperial institution. In every province like ours there exists such a supreme magistrate, and so there is no fear about obtaining redress for real injuries"—C. B.

39. In a lawful assembly (R.V. "In the regular assembly"). "The ordinary city court, as distinguished from the assize of the proconsul"—C. B. "In such a regular assembly as has authority to judge of religious and political affairs"—WESLEY.

40. To be accused concerning this day's riot (or rather, as R.V. margin, "To be accused of riot concerning this day, there being no cause for it; and as touching it we shall not be able to give account of this concourse"). "He wisely calls it by an inoffensive name"—WESLEY.

He hints, however, that others might call it a riot, which might lead to a curtailment of the privileges of the city. With this last and strongest argument he had no difficulty in dismissing the assembly.

CHAPTER XX.

Vers. 1-16. PAUL'S VISIT TO THE CHURCHES IN EUROPE, AND HIS RETURN AS FAR AS MILETUS.—1. After the tumult was ceased. "So Demetrius gained nothing; S. Paul remained there till all was quiet"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Paul having sent for the disciples and exhorted them." Departed . . . Macedonia—in fulfilment of the purpose mentioned in ch. 19. 11. (1 Cor. 16. 5; 1 Tim. 1. 3.)

2. Gone through those parts—"visiting the churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea"—C. B. He came into Greece—"that part of it which lay between Macedonia and Achaia"—WESLEY.

In these two verses S. Luke sums up the history of many months. To understand, even imperfectly, the nature of the business he had to do in Greece, it will be necessary to study the First Epistle to the Corinthians, which was written from Ephesus, and the Second, which was written from Philippi. The condition of that church had caused him much anxiety, and he evidently feared that his visit to them might not be entirely peaceful and pleasant.

3. When the Jews laid wait for him ("On his way to the ship"—WESLEY; R.V. "A plot was laid against him")—he purposed (R.V. "determined"). It is probable that he purposed at first to sail direct from Cenchrea to some port of Syria; but being informed of "the lying in wait of the Jews," he suddenly changed his plans. The Jews would find it the easier to find agents for their murderous designs, as it was known that S. Paul carried a considerable sum of money with him, the contribution from Macedonia and Achaia for the poor at Jerusalem. (Ch. 9. 23; 23. 12; 25. 3; 2 Cor. 11. 26.)

4. To Asia. "There some of them left him; but Trophimus went with him to Jerusalem (ch. 21. 29), and Aristarchus even to Rome (ch. 27. 2)"—WESLEY. (Ch. 19. 29; 27. 2; Col. 4. 10; ch. 19. 29; 16. 1; Eph. 6. 21; Col. 4. 6; 2 Tim. 4. 12; Titus 3. 12; ch. 21. 29; 2 Tim. 4. 20.)

5. But these had gone before, and were waiting for us at Troas (R.V.).

6. We set sail. "S. Luke was now with S. Paul again, as we learn from his manner of expressing himself"—WESLEY.

S. Paul had apparently left him at Philippi at his first visit, six years before. To Troas in five days. "The voyage from Troas to Neapolis, the port of Philippi, had been made before in two days (ch. 16. 11); but then they had a 'straight course,' and therefore a fair wind"—W. W. (Ex. 12. 14, 15; 23. 15; ch. 16. 8; 2 Cor. 2. 12; 2 Tim. 4. 13.)

7. To break bread—"that is, to celebrate the Lord's Supper. Continued his discourse—through uncommon fervour of spirit"—WESLEY. (1 Cor. 16. 2; Rev. 1. 10; ch. 2. 42, 46; 1 Cor. 10. 16; 11. 20.)

8. There were many lamps in the room where they were assembled—"to prevent any possible scandal"—WESLEY. (Ch. 1. 13.)

9. In the window (so R.V.). "Doubtless kept open to prevent heat both from the lamps and the number of people"—WESLEY.

Fallen into a deep sleep (R.V. "Borne down with deep sleep"). Was long preaching (R.V. "Discoursed yet longer"). Third loft (R.V. "story").

10. Paul fell on him. "It is observable, our Lord never used this gesture, but Elijah and Elisha did, as well as S. Paul. His life is in him. He is alive again"—WESLEY. (1 Kings 17. 21; 2 Kings 4. 34.)

11. Gone up, and had broken the bread (R.V.) and talked a long while. "The verb implies the talking of persons one with another, the talk of friendly intercourse, as distinguished from the previous discourse on more solemn subjects"—C. B. So departed—"without taking any rest at all"—WESLEY.

12. They brought the young man alive (R.V. "the lad"). "But, alas! how many of those who have allowed themselves to sleep under sermons, or, as it were, to dream awake, have slept the sleep of eternal death, and fallen to rise no more"—WESLEY.

13. And we (R.V. "But we, going before")—"before S. Paul's departure from the congregation—set sail for Assos—being himself to go on foot (R.V. 'by land')—that he might enjoy the company of his Christian brethren a little longer; although he had passed the night without sleep, and Assos was of difficult and dangerous access by land"—WESLEY.

He would cut off the angle of a promontory, which the ship must double. The distance is about twenty miles, and, as the R.V. intimates, there may have been means of travelling.

14. Mitylene—"was a city and port of the isle of Lesbos, about seven miles distant from the Asiatic coast"—WESLEY.

"The voyage was a coasting voyage, the nights being each spent in some harbour"—C. B.

15. R.V. omits "And tarried at Trogyllium."

16. For Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus (R.V. "past Ephesus")—which lay on the other side of the bay—that he might not have to spend time in Asia (R.V.). "In the midst of a large Christian congregation, like that in Ephesus, causes of delay would have arisen, which in this hurried journey he was anxious to avoid"—C. B. He hasted to be at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost—"because then was the greatest concourse of people"—WESLEY.

"Besides, the feast of Pentecost had been rendered famous among the Christians, by the extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit at that time"—B. (Ch. 18. 21; 19. 21; 21. 4, 12; 24. 17; 2. 1; 1 Cor. 16. 8.)

Vers. 17–38. PAUL'S FAREWELL ADDRESS TO THE EPHESIAN ELDERS.—17. And from Miletus — on the coast of Caria, twenty or thirty miles south of Ephesus. Sending to Ephesus, he called the elders of the Church (R.V. "called to him"). "These are called bishops in the twenty-eighth verse, rendered 'overseers' in our translation (A.V.). Perhaps elders and bishops were then the same, or no otherwise different than are the rector of a parish and his curates"—WESLEY.

"It is well established that the titles 'presbyter' and 'bishop' were in the early days of the Church synonymous"—C. B.

18. Ye know. "Happy is he who can thus appeal to the consciences of his hearers"—WESLEY.

Ye yourselves know, from the first day that I set foot in Asia, after what manner I was with you all the time (R.V.). (Ch. 18. 19; 19. 1, 10.)

19. Serving—"see the picture of a faithful servant!—the Lord—whose the Church is—with all humility, and with tears, and trials. These are the concomitants of it. The service itself is described more particularly in the following verse. This humility he recommends to the Ephesians themselves (Eph. 4. 2). His tears are mentioned again (ver. 31); as also, 2 Cor. 2. 4; Phil. 3. 18. These passages, laid together, supply us with the genuine character of S. Paul. Holy tears, from those who seldom weep on account of natural occurrences, are no mean specimen of the efficacy, and proof of the truth, of Christianity. Yet joy is well consistent therewith (ver. 24). The same person may be 'sorrowful, yet always rejoicing'"—WESLEY.

With trials that befel me by the plots of the Jews (R.V.). (Ver. 3.)

20. Kept back nothing (R.V. "Shrank not from declaring"). "I have preached—publicly. And taught—from house to house; else he had not been pure from their blood; for even an apostle could not discharge his duty by public preaching only. How much less can an ordinary pastor"—WESLEY. (Ver. 27.)

21. Repentance towards God—"the very first motion of the soul towards God is a kind of repentance"—WESLEY.

"The repentance (which they ought to have) towards God, etc."—C. H. This is the summary of the apostolic ministry; he that fully preaches repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ keeps back nothing that is profitable. (Ch. 18. 5; Mark 1. 15; Luke 24. 47; ch. 2. 38.)

22. Bound by the Spirit—"strongly impelled by Him"—WESLEY.

The verb implies that he felt there was no freeing himself from the impulse to go; by such a figure he clearly expresses his own feelings on the subject. (Ch. 19. 21.)

23. Save that—"only this I know in general—the Holy Ghost witnesseth—by other persons. Such was God's good pleasure, to reveal these things to him, not immediately, but by the ministry of others"—WESLEY. (Ch. 21. 4, 11; 1 Thess. 3. 3.)

24. None of these things move me (R.V. "But I hold not my life of any account, as dear unto myself"). "It adds great force to this and all the other passages of Scripture, in which the apostles express their contempt of the world, that they were not uttered by persons like Seneca and Antoninus, who talked elegantly of despising the world, in the full affluence of all its enjoyments; but by men who daily underwent the greatest calamities, and exposed their lives in proof of their assertions"—WESLEY.

Finish my course (R.V. omits "with joy"). The metaphor of the race-course was very familiar to S. Paul. Indeed, there are very many turns of thought and of expression, throughout the whole speech, which remind us of similar passages in the Epistles. The ministry which I received of the Lord Jesus. The apostle was jealous, with a godly jealousy, of his call to apostolic office and work by Christ Himself. (Ch. 21. 13; Rom. 8. 35; 2 Cor. 4. 16; 2 Tim. 4. 7; ch. 1. 17; 2 Cor. 4. 1; Gal. 1. 1; Titus 1. 3.)

25. Ye shall see my face no more. "He wisely inserts this, that what follows might make the deeper impression"—WESLEY.

"The 'all' includes not only the Ephesian presbyters, but also the brethren from Macedonia. The expectation expressed by S. Paul must be regarded as a human inference from the danger which he knew to be before him. If (as many think) he was liberated after his first imprisonment in Rome, he did see some of his present audience again"—C. H. (Ver. 38; Rom. 15. 23.)

26. I take you to record (R.V. "I testify unto you"). (Ch. 18. 6; 2 Cor. 7. 2.)

27. For I have not shunned. "Otherwise, if any had perished, their blood would have been on his head"—WESLEY. (Ezek. 33. 8; ver. 20; Luke 7. 30; John 15. 15; Eph. 1. 11.)

28. Take heed therefore. "I now devolve my care upon you; first to yourselves; then to the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers—for no man or number of men upon earth can constitute an overseer, bishop, or any other Christian minister. To do this is the peculiar work of the Holy Ghost. To feed the Church of God—that is, the believing, loving, holy children of God. Which He hath purchased—how precious is it, then, in His sight!—with His own blood—for it is the blood of the only-begotten Son of God"—WESLEY. (1 John 1. 7.)

R.V. "Made you bishops," margin "overseers." "'Which He purchased.' The verb implies the making of what is bought, peculiarly one's own; it is not the usual word for 'buying'"—C. B. (1 Tim. 4. 16; 1 Pet. 5. 2; 1 Cor. 12. 28; Eph. 1. 7, 14; Col. 1. 14; Heb. 9. 12; 1 Pet. 1. 19; Rev. 5. 9; Heb. 9. 14.)

29. Grievous wolves — "from without, namely, false apostles. They had not yet broke in on the Church at Ephesus"—WESLEY.

"He seems to mean those Judaising teachers who had before this time done much mischief at Corinth and elsewhere, but had not yet got any footing at Ephesus"—B. Not sparing the flock—as wolves, reckless how the flock was scattered or destroyed. (Matt. 7. 15; 2 Pet. 2. 1.)

30. Yea, from among yourselves men will arise. "Such were the Nicolaitanes, of whom Christ complains. (Rev. 2. 6.) To draw away disciples—from the purity of the gospel, and the unity of the body"—WESLEY. (1 Tim. 1. 20; 1 John 2. 19.)

31. Therefore watch, and remember (R.V. "Wherefore watch ye, remembering"). "The watchfulness which the apostle enjoins is enforced by his example"—C. B. I ceased not to warn every one, night and day. "This was watching indeed! Who copies after this example?"—WESLEY.

With tears. (See 2 Cor. 2. 4, and Phil. 3. 18.) "From which we may learn some of the occasions of his tears"—W. W. (Ch. 19. 10.)

32. The word of His grace. "It is the grand channel of it, to believers as well as unbelievers. Who is able to build you up—to confirm and increase your faith, love, holiness. God can thus build us up, without any instrument. But He does build us up by them. Oh beware of dreaming that you have less need of human teachers after you know Christ than before! And to give you an inheritance—of eternal glory—among all them that are sanctified—and so made meet for it. A large number of these S. Paul doubtless knew, and remembered before God"—WESLEY.

"'Which is able to build you up.' This must refer to God, and not to the intervening explanatory clause concerning 'the word of God's grace.' It is God who can build up His people, and give them their heavenly inheritance"—C. B. (Heb. 13. 9; ch. 9. 31; 26. 18; Eph. 1. 18; Col. 1. 12; 3. 24; Heb. 9. 15; 1 Pet. 1. 4.)

33. I have coveted. "Here the apostle begins the other branch of his farewell discourse, like old Samuel (1 Sam. 12. 3) taking his leave of the children of Israel"—WESLEY. (1 Cor. 9. 12; 2 Cor. 7. 2; 11. 9; 12. 17.)

34. These hands—"callous, as you see, with labour. Who is he that envies such a bishop or archbishop as this?"—WESLEY.

Them that were with me. "Aquila and Priscilla were with him at Ephesus, as they had been at Corinth. And when we read of Timothy's many infirmities we may conjecture that there were those among the companions of S. Paul who were less able to work with the hands than he was"—C. B. (Ch. 18. 3; 1 Cor. 4. 12; 1 Thess. 2. 9; 2 Thess. 3. 8.)

35. I have showed you all things (R.V. "In all things I gave you an example"). "'I have showed you'—bishops, by my example. 'All things'—and this among the rest. That thus labouring—so far as the labours of your office allow you time—ye ought to help the weak—those who are disabled by sickness, or any bodily infirmity, from maintaining themselves by their own labour. And to remember—effectually, so as to follow it—the word which He Himself said—without doubt His disciples remembered many of His words which are not recorded—It is happier to give—to imitate God, and have Him, as it were, indebted to us"—WESLEY.

Ye ought. "It is your duty. Benevolence is to be systematic, not sentimental. Its principle is obedience to the Master, and imitation of Him"—W. W. More blessed. This is the only word of the Lord Jesus to be found in the New Testament, beyond what is recorded in the Gospels. It recalls the first days of His ministry, the Beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount. (Rom. 15. 1; 1 Cor. 9. 12; 2 Cor. 11. 9, 12; 12. 23; Eph. 4. 28; 1 Thess. 4. 11; 5. 14; 2 Thess. 3. 8.)

36. He kneeled down and prayed. "Kneeling marks the special solemnity of the prayer. It has often been remarked that the historian who gives the speech with unusual fulness does not venture to record the prayer"—C. B.

With them all—all joining in the prayer. (Ch. 7. 60; 21. 5.)

37. They all wept. "Of old, men, yea the best and bravest of men, were easily melted into tears; a thousand instances of which might be produced from profane as well as sacred writers. But now, notwithstanding the effeminacy which almost universally prevails, we leave those tears to women and children"—WESLEY.

Kissed him. The tense of the verb means, "kissed him repeatedly or in succession." (Gen. 45. 14; 46. 29.)

38. Sorrowing most for that word which he spake, that they should see his face no more. "What sorrow shall be in the great day when God shall speak that word to all who are found on the left hand, that they shall see His face no more!"—WESLEY.

"See his face" (R.V. "Behold his face"). They accompanied him (R.V. "brought him on his way"). The harbour was some little distance from the town. (Ver. 25.)

CHAPTER XXI.

Vers. 1–14. PAUL SAILS FROM MILETUS, LANDS AT TYRE, AND GOES ON TO CÆSAREA.—1. And when we were torn away from them—"not without doing violence both to ourselves and to them"—WESLEY.

Coos (R.V. "Cos"), a small island on the coast. Rhodes—a much larger and more important island. Patara—a seaport town on the coast of Lycia. Here the coasting voyage ended, and S. Paul's company had to find another and probably a larger vessel.

2. Finding a ship (R.V. "Having found a ship crossing . . . set sail").

3. We landed at Tyre—"that there should be Christians there was foretold (Ps. 87. 4). What we read in that psalm of the Philistines and Ethiopians also may be compared with ch. 8. 40; 27. 4"—WESLEY.

4. And finding disciples, we tarried there seven days—"in order to spend a Sabbath with them. Who told Paul by the Spirit—that afflictions awaited him at Jerusalem. This was properly what they said by the Spirit. They themselves advised him not to go up. The disciples seemed to understand their prophetic impulse to be an intimation from the Spirit, that S. Paul, if he were so minded, might avoid the danger, by not going to Jerusalem"—WESLEY.

And having found the disciples (R.V.)—the members of the church at Tyre, not simply some Christians who were by chance at Tyre. We read of brethren from Phenicia (ch. 15. 3). Not go up to Jerusalem (R.V. "Not set foot in"). (Ver. 12; ch. 20. 23.)

5. We departed and went our way—"S. Paul deliberately judging that the sufferings he might meet with would tend to the furtherance of the gospel"—B. With wives and children—another intimation of the existence of a settled Christian community in Tyre. (Ch. 20. 36.)

7. Having finished our voyage—"from Macedonia (ch. 20. 6). We came to Ptolemais—a celebrated city on the sea-coast, anciently called Accos. It is now, like many other once noble cities, only a heap of ruins"—WESLEY.

It has been restored, and is again one of the principal towns on the coast; it is known in modern history as St. Jean d'Acre, or more simply Acre. Saluted the brethren. There was therefore a Christian society here also.

8. We came to Cæsarea—"so called from a stately temple which Herod the Great dedicated there to Augustus Cæsar. It was the place where the Roman governor of Judea generally resided and kept his court. The evangelist, who was one of the seven—deacons. An evangelist is a preacher of the gospel to those who had never heard it, as S. Philip had done to the Samaritans, to the Ethiopian eunuch, and to all the towns from Azotus to Cæsarea. (Ch. 8. 5, 26, 40.) It is not unlikely he spent the following years preaching in Tyre and Sidon, and the other heathen cities, in the neighbourhood of Galilee, his house being at Cæsarea, a convenient situation for that purpose. We abode with him. We lodged at his house during our stay at Cæsarea"—WESLEY. (Eph. 4. 11; 2 Tim 4. 5; ch. 6. 5; 8. 26, 40.)

9. Four daughters . . . prophesy — an example of the fulfilment of the prophecy of Joel, in reference to the new dispensation. Doubtless these women were evangelists also. The extraordinary gifts of the Spirit were frequently communicated to women as well as to men. (Joel 2. 28; ch. 2. 17.)

10. A certain prophet came. "The nearer the event was, the more express were the predictions which prepared S. Paul for it"—WESLEY.

Probably the same who foretold the famine (ch. 11. 8); in both cases he warns of approaching trials.

11. Binding his own feet and hands—"in the manner that malefactors were wont to be bound when apprehended. So shall the Jews bind the man whose girdle this is. S. Paul's bonds were first particularly foretold at Cæsarea, to which he afterwards came in bonds (ch. 23. 33)"—WESLEY.

"Symbolic actions of this kind were usual among the ancient prophets. The prophecy was fulfilled, but not literally; S. Paul was imprisoned or bound by the Romans at the instigation of the Jews. It is unfair to insist upon every verbal expression in brief narrative or prophecy"—W. W. (Ver. 33; ch. 20. 23.)

12. Both we—"his fellow-travellers—and they of that place, besought him not to go up to Jerusalem. S. Paul knew that this prediction had the force of a command. They did not know this"—WESLEY.

"It must have cost S. Paul much to withstand the solicitations of the brethren at Cæsarea; but the trial was far greater when his intimate friends and fellow-travellers united their entreaties. He could not but be aware that he was taking them into danger"—W. W.

13. Breaking my heart—"for the apostles themselves were not void of human affections. I am ready not only to be bound, but to die—and to him that is ready for it the burden is light"—WESLEY.

R.V. "What do ye, weeping and breaking my heart?" "I am ready." I is emphatic. (Ch. 20. 24.)

14. And when he would not be persuaded. "This was not obstinacy, but true Christian resolution. We should never be persuaded, either to do evil, or to omit doing any good which is in our power. Saying, The will of the Lord be done—which they were satisfied S. Paul knew"—WESLEY.

"Their prayer, and our Lord's in Luke 22. 42, give authority for this use of the petition in the Lord's Prayer"—W. W. (Matt. 6. 10; 26. 42; Luke 11. 2.)

Vers. 15–40. PAUL GOES TO JERUSALEM, IS WELCOMED BY THE CHURCH, ASSAULTED BY THE MOB, RESCUED BY THE ROMAN SOLDIERS.—15. We took up our carriages—"or baggage, which probably went by sea before. What they took with them now in particular was the alms they were carrying to Jerusalem"—WESLEY. (Ch. 24. 17.)

16. Mnason, a Cyprian, an old disciple. "He was a native of Cyprus, but an inhabitant of Jerusalem, and probably one of the first converts there"—WESLEY.

R.V. "An early disciple." Jerusalem was certain to be full of people at the feast, and by the arrangement made in Cæsarea, S. Paul's party were saved much trouble.

17. The brethren received us gladly. "It is not a public reception which is spoken of, for however welcome S. Paul might be to individuals, the heads of the Church were manifestly apprehensive of trouble which might arise from his presence in Jerusalem"—C. B. (Ch. 15. 4.)

18. Paul went in with us—"that it might appear, we are all of one mind—to James—commonly called the Lord's brother; the only apostle then presiding over the churches in Judea"—WESLEY. (Ch. 15. 13; Gal. 1. 19; 2. 9.)

19. Saluted them. This implies that the present was his formal reception by the recognised authorities of the Church. Declared particularly (R.V. "Rehearsed one by one"). (Ch. 15. 4, 12; Rom. 15. 18, 19; ch. 1. 17; 20. 24.)

20. Thou seest, brother — their anxiety makes itself apparent at once — how many thousands (literally, "myriads"). Of course the word is used indefinitely. They are all zealous for the Law. "For the whole Mosaic Dispensation. How astonishing is this! Did none of the apostles, beside S. Paul, know that this dispensation was now abolished? And if they did both know and testify this, how came their hearers not to believe them?"—WESLEY. (Ch. 22. 3; Rom. 10. 2; Gal. 1. 14.)

21. They have been informed concerning thee, that thou teachest the Jews not to circumcise their children, nor to walk after the customs—"of the Mosaic Law. And so undoubtedly he did. And so he wrote to all the churches in Galatia, among whom were many Jews. Yea, and S. James himself had long before assented to S. Peter, affirming before all the apostles and all the brethren (ch. 15. 10), that this very Law was 'a yoke which,' said he, 'neither our fathers nor we were able to bear.' Amazing, that they did not know this! or that, if they did, they did not openly testify it, at all hazards, to every Jewish convert in Jerusalem"—WESLEY.

"It was a misunderstanding or a slander, when S. Paul was accused of teaching the Jews of the Dispersion apostasy from Moses. His doctrine was the gospel of grace in Christ Jesus, of salvation in Christ only, and not of the righteousness of the Law. But it was not his business to attack the Law and the Mosaic religion in themselves. He only opposed the tendency which recognised no other form of the Christian Church than the Jewish. He combated the doctrine that the observance of the Law was necessary for salvation"—L. "From anything that appears in the course of this book, this information was incorrect; we do not find S. Paul preaching thus to the Jews. In his epistles, some of which were written before this time, he showed that circumcision and uncircumcision were equally unavailable for the salvation of the soul; and that by the deeds of the Law no man could be justified; but he had not yet said to any Jew, 'Forsake Moses, and do not circumcise your children.' Their ceremonies were useless, but not destructive; they were only dangerous when they depended on them for salvation"—C.

22. What is it therefore? "What is to be done? The multitude must needs come together. They will certainly gather together in a tumultuous manner, unless they be some way pacified"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits "The multitude must come together." "The rest of the speech gives no hint of a crowd to be gathered, but recommends a policy by which the Jewish Christians might learn gradually in their own visits to the Temple that the apostle against whom they had heard such reports was there himself, taking part in the observance of the Mosaic customs"—C. B.

23. Therefore—"to obviate their prejudice against thee—do this that we say to thee. Doubtless they meant this advice well; but could S. Paul follow it in godly sincerity? Was not the yielding so far to the judgment of others too great a deference to be paid to any mere man?"—WESLEY.

Four men—"converts to the gospel—which have a vow upon them—'of Nazariteship'"—B.

24. Be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads—offering the sacrifices which the Law has appointed (Num. 6. 13); it was not uncommon among the Jews for the rich to assist those Nazarites who were poor. And all will know—that thou thyself walkest orderly, keeping the Law. "Ought he not, without any reverence to man, where the truth of God was so deeply concerned, to have answered plainly, I do not keep the Mosaic Law; neither need any of you. Yea, S. Peter doth not keep the Law. And God Himself expressly commanded him not to keep it; ordering him to 'go in to men uncircumcised, and to eat with them' (ch. 11. 3), which the Law utterly forbids"—WESLEY.

"Perhaps this advice meant no more than, Show them by such means as are now in thy power, that thou art not an enemy to Moses; that thou dost still consider the Law to be holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good"—C. (Ch. 18. 18.)

25. As touching the Gentiles. "The elders, while urging on S. Paul the course they describe in consideration of Jewish prejudices, are careful to distinguish from this, and to confirm the liberty of the Gentiles"—C. B. (Ch. 25. 20, 29.)

26. Then Paul took the men—"yielding his own judgment to their advice, which seemed to flow not out of spiritual but carnal wisdom; seeming to be what he really was not; making as if he believed the Law still in force. Declaring—giving notice to the priests in waiting, that he designed to accomplish the days of purification, till all the sacrifices should be offered, as the Mosaic Law required. (Num. 6. 13)"—WESLEY.

"These brethren of the Church of Jerusalem, to whom S. Paul joined himself, were Christians, and therefore were not clinging to legal observances as of merit towards salvation, but as ordinances of Divine origin, which education had made them careful to observe. The same spirit had actuated the apostle when, on occasion probably of some deliverance, he took a similar vow on himself. (Ch. 18. 18.) The observance of the Ceremonial Law was not needful for the Gentiles; therefore the apostle opposed those who would have enforced it. That Law was abolished for the Jew also in Christ, but it had a Divine warrant for those who had been trained in it from their youth up; therefore all that the apostle here desired was that their true value only should be set upon externals"—C. B. (Num. 24. 18; 6. 13.)

27. And when the seven days were about to be accomplished—"when, after giving notice to the priests, they were entering upon the accomplishment of those days; it was toward the beginning of them that S. Paul was seized. The Jews that were from Asia—some of those Jews who came from Asia to the feast"—WESLEY.

R.V. "When the seven days were almost completed." (Ch. 24. 18; 26. 21.)

28, 29. Against the people—"the Jewish nation—and the Law—of Moses—and this place—the Temple. Yea, and hath even brought Greeks into the Temple—they might come into the outer court. But they imagined S. Paul had brought them into the inner temple, and had thereby polluted it"—WESLEY.

"How great a change since Saul of Tarsus joined with those who charged S. Stephen with speaking blasphemous words against this holy place and the Law. Now a like multitude brings similar charges against him"—C. B. (Ch. 24. 5, 6.) Trophimus an Ephesian. "They had seen one Greek with him in the city; and they said that he had brought Greeks into the Temple. This is exactly what happens in times of excitement"—W. W. (Ch. 20. 4.)

30. Drew him out of the Temple (R.V. "Dragged him"). And immediately the gates were shut—"both to prevent any further violation of the Temple, and to prevent S. Paul's taking sanctuary at the horns of the altar"—WESLEY. (Ch. 26. 21.)

31. And as they went about to kill him (R.V. "were seeking to kill him"). "The object was to beat him to death in the crowd, and thus avoid a charge of murder against any individual"—C. B. "It was a rule among the Jews, that any uncircumcised person who came into the inner temple might be stoned without further process. And they seemed to think S. Paul, who brought such in thither, deserved no better treatment. Word came to the tribune. A cohort or detachment of soldiers belonging to the Roman legion, which lodged in the adjacent castle of Antonia, were stationed on feast days near the Temple, to prevent disorders. It is evident Lysias himself was not present when the tumult began. Probably he was the oldest Roman tribune (or colonel) then at Jerusalem; and as such he was the commanding-officer of the legion quartered at the castle"—WESLEY.

32. Ran down unto them (R.V. "upon them"). The tower was on the height above the Temple. (Ch. 23. 27; 24. 7.)

33. Then the tribune—"having made his way through the multitude—came near and took him. And how many great ends of Providence were answered by this imprisonment! This was not only a means of preserving his life, after he had suffered severely for worldly prudence, but gave him an opportunity of preaching the gospel safely, in spite of all tumult (ch. 22. 22); yea, and that in those places, to which otherwise he could have had no access (ver. 40). And commanded him to be bound with two chains—taking it for granted, he was some notorious offender. And thus the prophecy of Agabus was fulfilled, though by the hands of a Roman"—WESLEY.

Took him (R.V. "Laid hold on him"). Demanded (R.V. "Inquired"). "The chief captain did not come to relieve S. Paul, but to find out what was the matter, and seeing the apostle in the hands of a mob, himself arrested him, that he might not be killed without a hearing"—C. B. (Ver. 11; ch. 20. 23.)

35. When he came upon the stairs. "The castle Antonia was situate on a rock fifty cubits high, at that corner of the outward temple where the western and northern porticoes joined, to each of which there were stairs descending from it"—WESLEY.

The stairs were not covered in, for S. Paul was able to address the multitude from them.

36. Away with him. So in the case of our Lord. (Luke 23. 18; John 19. 15; ch. 22. 22.)

37. As Paul was about to be brought into the castle. "The wisdom of God taught him to make use of that very time and place"—WESLEY.

Canst thou speak Greek? (R.V. "Dost thou know Greek?"). Greek was the universal language of educated men. The chief captain believed S. Paul to be the Egyptian who had recently caused so much trouble, and he appears to have heard that impostor could not even speak Greek.

38. Art thou not that Egyptian—"who came into Judea when Felix had been some years governor there? Calling himself a prophet, he drew much people after him; and, having brought them through the wilderness, led them to Mount Olivet, promising that the walls of the city should fall down before them. But, Felix marching out of Jerusalem against him, his followers quickly dispersed; many of whom were taken or slain; but he himself made his escape"—WESLEY.

Art not thou then the Egyptian, . . . the four thousand men of the Assassins (R.V.). The Assassins, or Sicarii, were a band of plunderers who infested Jerusalem and its neighbourhood. The name is derived from the small dagger which they wore. (Ch. 5. 36.)

40. In the Hebrew tongue—"in that dialect of it which was then commonly spoken at Jerusalem"—WESLEY.

"The apostle, while yet in danger of his life, and after he has been unmercifully treated by the Jews, displays so much composure, moral courage, and love to his people, as to address them without the slightest feeling of bitterness. His heart is humbled; he had formerly been as those Jews now are, and only the grace of Him, who on the cross prayed for his murderers, had changed him"—L.

CHAPTER XXII.

Vers. 1–21. PAUL'S DEFENCE BEFORE THE MULTITUDE.—1. Hear ye now my defence—"which they could not hear before for the tumult"—WESLEY. (Ch. 7. 2.)

2. The Hebrew tongue. "The beckoning with the hand (ch. 21. 40) had procured silence enough for the apostle's first words to be heard, and now they caught the sound of their own dialect"—C. B.

3. I am verily. "This defence answers all that is objected (ch. 21. 28). As there, so here also, mention is made of the person of S. Paul (ver. 3); of the people and the Law (vers. 3, 5, 12); of the Temple (ver. 17); of teaching all men (vers. 15–17, 21); and of the truth of his doctrine (ver. 6). But he speaks closely and nervously, in few words, because the time was short. But brought up at the feet of Gamaliel. The scholars usually sat on low seats, or upon mats on the floor, at the feet of their masters, whose seats were raised to a considerable height. Accurately instructed. The learned education which S. Paul had received was once, no doubt, the matter of his boasting and confidence. Unsanctified learning made his bonds strong, and furnished him with numerous arguments against the gospel. Yet when the grace of God had changed his heart, and turned his accomplishments into another channel, he was the fitter instrument to serve God's wise and merciful purposes, in the defence and propagation of Christianity"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, and learned in all that concerned his own people. He makes frequent allusions to Jewish customs, laws, and festivals, and reckons his time by the Jewish calendar"—C. B. (Ch. 21. 39; 2 Cor. 11. 22; Phil. 3. 5; Deut. 32. 3; 2 Kings 4. 38; Luke 10. 39; ch. 5. 34; 26. 5; 21. 20; Gal. 1. 14; Rom. 10. 2.)

4. And I persecuted this way—"with the same zeal that you do now—binding both men and women. How much better was his condition now he was bound himself"—WESLEY. (Ch. 8. 3; 26. 9–11; Phil. 3. 6; 1 Tim. 1. 13.)

5. The high priest is my witness—"is able to testify. The brethren—Jews; so this title was not peculiar to the Christians"—WESLEY.

It was twenty years since S. Paul's conversion, but it was not improbable that some members of the Sanhedrim that granted him his commission were still alive. To bring them which were there bound unto Jerusalem (R.V. "To bring them also which were there unto Jerusalem in bonds"). (Luke 22. 66; ch. 4. 5; 9. 2; 26. 10, 12.)

6. About noon—"all was done in the face of the sun—a great light shone. By whatever method God reveals Himself to us, we shall have everlasting cause to recollect it with pleasure. Especially when He has gone in any remarkable manner out of His common way, for this gracious purpose. If so, we should often dwell on the particular circumstances, and be ready, on every proper occasion, to recount those wonders of power and love, for the encouragement and instruction of others"—WESLEY. (Ch. 9. 3; 26. 12, 13.)

9. They did not hear the voice — "distinctly, but only a confused noise"—WESLEY.

"His companions saw and heard enough to confirm the reality of the vision; but were not permitted to see the person and to hear the words of our Lord"—W. W. (Ch. 9. 7; Dan. 10. 7.)

12. A devout man according to the Law—"a truly religious person, and though a believer in Christ, yet a strict observer of the Law of Moses"—WESLEY.

The character given to Ananias was well calculated to conciliate S. Paul's hearers. In ch. 9. 10 he is simply called a certain disciple. (Ch. 9. 17; 10. 22; 1 Tim. 3. 17.)

14. The God of our fathers. "Ananias speaks as one Jew to another, both relying on the promises made to the fathers. See that Just One (R.V. 'See the Righteous One'), and hear a voice from His mouth. Jesus is called 'the Holy One and the Just' (ch. 3. 14), and 'the Just one' (ch. 7. 52), in both which places the R.V. reads 'Righteous,' thus connecting all the passages with 1 John 2. 1, 'We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous'"—C. B. (Ch. 3. 13; 5. 30; 9. 15; 26. 16; 1 Cor. 9. 1; 15. 18; 3. 14; 7. 52; 1 Cor. 11. 23; Gal. 1. 12.)

16. Be baptized, and wash away thy sins. "Baptism, administered to real penitents, is both a means and a seal of pardon. Nor did God ordinarily in the primitive Church bestow this on any, unless through this means"—WESLEY.

"Take now the profession of Christ's faith most solemnly upon thee, by being baptized in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Let this washing of thy body represent to thee the washing away of thy sins; and know that this washing away of sins can be received only by invoking the name of the Lord"—C. (Ch. 2. 38; Heb. 10. 22; ch. 9. 14; Rom. 10. 13.)

17. When I was returned to Jerusalem—"from Damascus—and was praying in the Temple—whereby he shows that he still paid the Temple its due honour, as the house of prayer. I was in a trance—perhaps he might continue standing all the while, so that any who were near him would hardly discern it"—WESLEY.

We learn from Gal. 1. 18 that three years had elapsed between the conversion of Saul and this visit to Jerusalem. It must have been the same visit which is recorded in ch. 9. 26, etc. (2 Cor. 12. 2.)

18. "And I saw Him, Jesus, saying to me, Depart quickly out of Jerusalem—because of the snares laid for thee; and in order to preach where they will hear"—WESLEY.

They will not receive thy testimony (R.V. "receive of thee testimony"). "The apostle, as appears from the next verse, considered that he would be a messenger specially likely to persuade and convince his countrymen of the truths of the Christian faith. The Lord, in the vision, points out that this will not be so"—C. B. (Ver. 14; Matt. 10. 14.)

19. And I said. "It is not easy for a servant of Christ, who is himself deeply impressed with Divine truths, to imagine to what a degree men are capable of hardening their hearts against them. He is often ready to think with S. Paul, it is impossible for any to resist such evidence. But experience makes him wiser, and shows that wilful unbelief is proof against all truth and reason"—WESLEY.

Lord, they know (R.V. "they themselves know")—"that is, Lord, my former zeal against those who believed in Thee is so well known to them all, that they must be convinced that it is upon certain and irresistible grounds that I now am become a preacher of the faith I formerly destroyed"—B. (Ver. 14; ch. 8. 3; Matt. 10. 17.)

20. When the blood of Thy martyr Stephen was shed (R.V. "Stephen, Thy witness") I also was standing by. "A real convert still retains the remembrance of his former sins. He confesses them, and is humbled for them, all the days of his life"—WESLEY. (Ch. 7. 58.)

21. But He said to me—overruling my plea by the renewal of His charge—Depart—reason no further on this subject, but go thy way immediately according to My direction. Accordingly we find, from Gal. 1. 18, that he was only fifteen days in Jerusalem at that visit. For I will send thee far hence (R.V. "send thee forth far hence unto the Gentiles"). He had kept back the word, which he knew would rouse their anger, as long as ever he could; now he is interrupted at once, and his end would have been the same as S. Stephen's, had he not been under the protection of the Roman officer. The salient point of the enmity against him was not the preaching of Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah, but the admission of the Gentiles to equal privilege with the Jews themselves.

Vers. 22-30. PAUL ESCAPES SCOURGING BY ASSERTING HIS PRIVILEGE AS A CITIZEN OF ROME, AND IS BROUGHT BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM. — 22. And they heard him to this word—"till he began to speak of his mission to the Gentiles; and this, too, in such a manner as implied that the Jews were in danger of being cast off"—WESLEY.

"No sooner did he mention this, than the multitude, especially such of them as had come from Asia, became perfectly enraged" — B. (Ch. 26. 36; 25. 24.)

23. They rent their garments—"in token of indignation and horror at this pretended blasphemy"—WESLEY.

R.V. "They threw off their garments." "Perhaps, as in the case of S. Stephen, that they might be ready to stone him"—B. And cast dust into the air—"through vehemence of rage, which they knew not how to vent"—WESLEY.

24. The chief captain commanded—"probably he understood nothing of what S. Paul had been saying, and would conclude, from the outbreak of popular rage, that there was some serious charge against him, which he would most easily ascertain by subjecting the prisoner to torture till he should confess"—C. B. "In modern history, the euphemism for torture was 'to put to the question'"—W. W.

25. And as they—"the soldiers ordered by the tribune—were binding him with thongs. A freeman of Rome might be bound with a chain, and beaten with a staff; but he might not be bound with thongs, neither scourged, nor beaten with rods"—WESLEY.

R.V. "When they had tied him up with the thongs." Paul said to the centurion—"the captain who stood by to see the orders of the tribune executed"—WESLEY.

A man that is a Roman. It was an offence, punishable with the severest penalties, for a man to claim to be a Roman citizen, if he were not. (Ch. 16. 37.)

26. Consider what thou art about to do; for this man is a Roman. "Yea, there was a stronger reason to consider; for this man was a servant of God"—WESLEY.

The R.V., following the oldest MSS., omits one word, and makes the centurion's question more blunt and military, "What art thou about to do?" There were various laws for the protection of Roman citizens; it was forbidden under heavy penalty, by the Lex Poreia, to scourge them.

28. With a great sum obtained I this citizenship (R.V.). "I" is emphatic. "I know not how you became so; for my part, I had to pay well for my citizenship." "He insinuates that it was not likely S. Paul could have commanded such a sum. Dio Cassius informs us that, in the reign of Claudius, the freedom of the city, and even the great offices of the State, were commonly sold by Messalina. But I was free born. The apostle meets the implied doubt of the chief captain. The original implies superiority to a man whose citizenship was only by purchase"—W. W. "Free born—not barely as being born at Tarsus; for this was not a Roman colony. But probably either his father or some of his ancestors had been made free of Rome for some military service. We learn hence, that we are under no obligations, as Christians, to give up our civil privileges (which we are to receive and prize as the gift of God) to every insolent invader. In a thousand circumstances, gratitude to God, and duty to men, will oblige us to insist upon them; and engage us to strive to transmit them improved, rather than impaired, to posterity"—WESLEY.

Tarsus was a place of considerable importance; it was renowned under the early Roman emperors as a place of education; it had also been constituted by Augustus a free city, having its own laws and magistrates. To this S. Paul referred when he said to the chief captain that he was a citizen of no mean city. That he had also a right to call himself a citizen of Rome was quite another matter.

29. Then straightway they departed. Very graphic; as if on hearing this, without waiting for orders, the soldiers made off as from a danger.

30. He loosed him ("from his bands" is omitted in R.V.). "The meaning of this is, that he placed him before the Council, not as a prisoner of his; he set him at liberty as far as he was concerned; and he gave him up to be judged by the Council as a court of inquiry; taking his own position, evidently where he could observe the proceedings, and rescue his fellow-citizen from any illegal violence"—W. W.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Vers. 1-11. A TUMULT IN THE SANHEDRIM—PAUL AGAIN RESCUED BY THE SOLDIERS.—1. And Paul, earnestly beholding the Council—"professing a clear conscience by his very countenance; and likewise waiting to see whether any of them was minded to ask him any question—said, I have lived in all good conscience before God till this day. He speaks chiefly of the time since he became a Christian; for none questioned him concerning what had been before. And yet even in his unconverted state, although he was in error, yet he had acted from conscience. Before God—whatever men may think or say of me"—WESLEY.

"I have lived." "The word signifies the discharge of the duties of a citizen. He means that he had always acted conscientiously as a member of the commonwealth of Israel, both natural and spiritual"—W. W. (Ch. 24. 16; 1 Cor. 4. 4; 2 Cor. 1. 12; 4. 2; 2 Tim. 1. 3; Heb. 13. 18.)

2. Smite him on the mouth—"perhaps on the tacit pretext that he had no right to speak yet. This punishment is accounted the greatest disgrace, and is generally inflicted in the East with the high-heeled slipper"—W. W. (1 Kings 22. 24; Jer. 20. 2; John 18. 22.)

3. Then said Paul—"being carried away by a sudden and prophetic impulse—God is about to smite thee, thou whited wall—fair without; full of dirt and rubbish within. And he might well be so termed, not only as he committed this outrage, while gravely sitting on the tribunal of justice; but also as, at the same time that he stood high in the esteem of the citizens, he cruelly defrauded the priests of their legal subsistence; so that some of them even perished for want. And God did remarkably smite him; for, about five years after this, his house being reduced to ashes, in a tumult begun by his own son, he was besieged in the royal palace, where, having hid himself in an old aqueduct, he was dragged out, and miserably slain"—WESLEY.

"Considering the provocation received, and the expression used by the apostle, we may suppose that he spoke under a feeling of resentment. More edification may be derived from observing how speedily and gracefully he recovers his equanimity, than from attempting to argue that he was altogether exempt from human weakness"—W. W. (Lev. 19. 25; Deut. 25. 1, 2; John 7. 51.)

5. I was not aware, brethren, that it was the high priest. "He seems to mean, I did not advert to it in the prophetic transport of my mind. But he does not add, that his not adverting to it proceeded from the power of the Spirit coming upon him, as knowing they were not able to bear it. This answer admirably shows the situation of mind he was then in, partly with regard to the bystanders, whom he thus softens, adding also the title of 'brethren,' and justifying their reproof by the prohibition of Moses; partly with regard to himself, who, after that singular transport subsided, was again under the direction of the general command"—WESLEY.

"Several explanations have been given of this statement. Some think that S. Paul, from defect of sight, with which he is supposed to have been afflicted, could not distinguish that the speaker was the high priest; others, that the high priest was not in his official position as president of the court; or that, owing to the troublous times, and S. Paul's recent arrival in Jerusalem, he was not aware who was high priest; or that he was speaking in irony, and meant to imply that the action of the judge was of such a character that no one would have supposed him to be high priest; or that he meant by 'I wist not,' that for the moment he was not thinking of what he was saying. It is most consonant with S. Paul's character to believe that either his own physical deficiency, or some lack of the usual formalities or insignia, made him unable to distinguish that he who had given the order was really the high priest"—C. B. Note that this statement, though it has caused much discussion since, was not questioned at the time. (Ch. 24. 17; Ex. 22. 28; 2 Pet. 2. 10; Jude 8.)

6. I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee (R.V. "the son of Pharisees"); for the hope of the resurrection of the dead am I called in question. "So he was in effect, although not formally or explicitly"—WESLEY.

"The whole teaching of the Christian Church rested upon the truth of the resurrection; and therefore with much wisdom, and without any thought of deception, he cries, 'I am a Pharisee, and for teaching the doctrine of the resurrection, which they hold, I am now called in question'"—C. B. (Ch. 26. 5; Phil. 3. 5; ch. 24. 15, 21; 26. 6; 28. 20.)

8. The Sadducees. "As we meet them in the New Testament, they are mainly members of the priestly order, and appear to have accepted only the written Law, as distinct from tradition. At the same time they denied the existence of any spiritual beings except God Himself. In political matters they were on the side of Rome, and are therefore found uniting at times with the Herodians"—C. B. The Pharisees confess both—"both the resurrection and the existence of angels and separate spirits"—WESLEY. (Matt. 22. 23; Mark 12. 18; Luke 20. 27.)

9. The scribes of the Pharisees' side (R.V. "Some of the scribes of the Pharisees' part"). "Every sect contains both learned and unlearned. The former used to be the mouth of the party. If a spirit—S. Paul in his speech from the stairs had affirmed that Jesus, whom they knew to have been dead, was alive; and that He had spoken to him from heaven, and again in a vision. So they add nothing; only they construe it in their own way, putting an angel, or 'spirit,' for Jesus"—WESLEY.

The latter part of the verse in R.V. reads, "And what if a spirit hath spoken to him, or an angel?"—words calculated to exasperate the Sadducees. (Ch. 25. 25; 26, 31; 22. 7, 17, 18; 5. 39.)

10. Pulled in pieces of them. "The Pharisees had constituted themselves his protectors, and so the possession of his person had become the object of a struggle between them and their opponents"—C. B. "What must the heathen have thought, when he saw this assembly of chief priests, scribes, and rulers of Israel, forgetful of their sacred character, and carried away by such unbridled rage in a religious contest, as the Roman senators and magistrates would have been ashamed of, in their most eager competition for authority"—B.

11. And the night following, the Lord Jesus. "What S. Paul had before purposed in spirit (ch. 19. 21), God now in due time confirms. Another declaration to the same effect is made by an angel of God (ch. 27. 23); and from the twenty-third chapter the sum of this book turns on the testimony of S. Paul to the Romans. How would the defenders of S. Peter's supremacy triumph, could they find but half as much ascribed to him! Be of good courage, Paul. As he laboured under singular distresses and persecutions, so he was favoured with extraordinary assurances of the Divine assistance. Thou must testify. Particular promises are usually given when all things appear desperate. At Rome also. Danger is nothing in the eyes of God; all hindrances further His work. A promise of what is afar off implies all that necessarily lies between. S. Paul shall testify at Rome; therefore he shall come to Rome, therefore he shall escape the Jews, the sea, the viper"—WESLEY.

This encouragement was given in the time of depression and loneliness. So at Corinth, "Be not afraid, but speak, for I am with thee" (ch. 18. 9), and in the height of the tempest at sea, "Fear not; thou must stand before Cæsar" (ch. 27. 24). It was probably now for the first time that he was made aware that he was not to die at Jerusalem, as he probably expected (ch. 21. 13), but that he had to go to Rome.

Vers. 12-35. ON THE DISCOVERY OF A PLOT TO MURDER HIM, PAUL IS SENT TO CÆSAREA WITH A STRONG ESCORT.—12. Some of the Jews bound themselves. "Such execrable vows were not uncommon among the Jews; and if they were prevented from accomplishing what they had vowed, it was an easy matter to obtain absolution from their rabbis"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits "Some of." When it was day. "While S. Paul was receiving comfort from the Lord, the Jews were plotting to secure his destruction. Their plans were ready by the next day"—C. B. "How much trouble do people take to hinder the kingdom of God! How much good might have been effected, if they made the same sacrifices for its promotion"—L. (Vers. 21, 30; ch. 25. 3.)

14. The chief priests and elders—"who were of the sect of the Sadducees, and S. Paul's greatest enemies"—B. That we will eat nothing (R.V. "To taste nothing"). "The high priest, who, according to his office, should bear holiness upon his forehead, and light and justice on his breast, is turned into a ringleader of sworn assassins. This is the fruit of false religious zeal, in an evil and unregenerate heart"—L.

15. Now therefore ye—"which they never scrupled at at all, as not doubting but they were 'doing God service'"—WESLEY.

Or ever he come near. They were prepared to attack the escort which would bring S. Paul down from the castle, and, with the probable loss of other lives, to take him from the midst of them, and to kill him. Thus the chief priests and elders would not appear at all concerned in the murder.

16. Paul's sister's son. "We have no other mention of the family of S. Paul in the history. It is not probable that the sister and her son were settled inhabitants of Jerusalem, or we should have heard of them in connection with some of his visits"—C. B. And if he had been a well-known resident, his relationship to S. Paul would probably have been known also; in which case he would not have heard of the conspiracy.

17. And Paul. "Though he had an express promise of it from Christ, was not to neglect any proper means of safety"—WESLEY.

This principle is of very wide application, in reference to things temporal and spiritual. S. Paul was in the hands of Roman officers who cared more for the safety of a Roman citizen than for the whole Jewish Council; hence he had no difficulty in securing the good offices of one of the centurions.

18. Paul the prisoner—a name which he was often afterwards to apply to himself. (See Eph. 3. 1; 4. 1; Philem. 1. 9, etc.)

19. And the tribune taking him by the hand—"in a mild, condescending way. Lysias seems to have conducted this whole affair with great integrity, humanity, and prudence"—WESLEY.

Went with him aside privately and asked him (R.V. "Going aside, asked him privately").

20. As though they would enquire (R.V. "As though thou wouldst enquire").

23. Two hundred soldiers to go to Cæsarea—"the residence of the Roman governor, and the seat of the civil and military power. The two hundred soldiers mentioned were regular infantry; the two hundred spearmen were probably light armed troops. The strength of the escort and the secret manner in which it departed, show Lysias's sense of the desperate character of a band of Jewish fanatics, which is entirely in accordance with what we read of them in Josephus and others"—W. W.

24. Provide beasts—"if a change should be necessary—to set Paul on. "So we read of his riding once; but not by choice"—WESLEY.

Felix the governor—"Antonius Felix made procurator of Judea and Samaria, together with Cumanus, A.D. 48. Upon the banishment of Cumanus in 51, he was sole procurator"—W. W.

26. Claudius Lysias. Claudius was the Roman name, probably assumed when he bought his citizenship. Lysias was his Greek name. Most excellent. This epithet is applied to Felix by Lysias and by the orator Tertullus, and by S. Paul to Porcius Festus. It was the appropriate address to a magistrate. S. Luke, in the introduction of his Gospel, uses the same term in reference to Theophilus.

27. Then came I with an army (R.V. "When I came upon them with the soldiers"). Having learned that he was a Roman—"true; but not before he rescued him. Here he uses art"—WESLEY.

"Lysias not only conceals the binding of S. Paul, and the command to scourge him, but represents the rescue as the effect of his own zeal in vindicating the safety and honour of a Roman citizen. This is just what we might expect from a clever worldling, who had more regard for the favour of his superiors than for the truth"—W. W.

29. Accused of questions of their Law—whether he had profaned the Temple (ch. 24. 6), and whether he held orthodox views on the resurrection (ch. 23. 6-9). Lysias would look on all this much as Gallio did. But Jerusalem was a very different place from Corinth.

30. That the Jews laid wait (R.V. "That there would be a plot against the man").

31. The soldiers brought him by night to Antipatris—"but not the same night they set out; for Antipatris was about thirty-eight of our miles north-west of Jerusalem. Herod the Great rebuilt it, and gave it this name, in honour of his father Antipater. Cæsarea was near seventy miles from Jerusalem, about thirty from Antipatris"—WESLEY.

"Starting by night, they must have halted at Nicopolis, and reached Antipatris in the course of the day. This forced march shows the extent of Lysias's fears"—W. W.

32. They left the horsemen to go with him. Now that they were so far from Jerusalem, and in no fear of a surprise, seventy horsemen were guard enough for the remainder of the way. But it may give us some idea of the dangerous state of the country when we consider that the chief captain thought it needful to send with this one prisoner a guard of four hundred and seventy soldiers.

33. And they, when they came (R.V.), viz. the horsemen. The promise of heavenly protection in ver. 11 was very speedily fulfilled. However remorseless the enmity against the apostle, however numerous the conspirators, however well contrived their plots, yet the almighty protection of the Redeemer conducts His servant in safety.

34. And when he had read it (R.V). What province? The first question which a Roman governor would ask, in order to avoid trespassing on another jurisdiction. (Luke 23. 6, 7.)

35. I will hear thee (R.V. "I will hear thy cause"). The word means the complete and thorough hearing of a case. Probably Felix had given a similar promise on previous occasions. When thine accusers are also come—assuming that they would appear, since they had been bidden to do so by the chief captain, as he had explained in his letter. Of course, Lysias had not said a word of this to the Jews when his letter was written, but intended to do so when S. Paul was safely on his road to Cæsarea. Herod's judgment hall (R.V. "Herod's palace"). "This was a palace and a court, built by Herod the Great. Probably some tower belonging to it might be used as a kind of state prison"—WESLEY. (Mark 27. 27.)

CHAPTER XXIV.

Vers. 1-9. PAUL'S ACCUSERS ARRIVE—ORATION OF TERTULLUS.—1. Ananias—"who would spare no trouble on this occasion—with several of the elders—members of the Sanhedrim"—WESLEY.

A certain orator (R.V. "And with an orator, one Tertullus"). (Ch. 23. 2, 30, 35; 25. 2.)

2. Tertullus began—"a speech how different from S. Paul's, which is true, modest, solid, and without paint. Felix was a man of the most infamous character, and a plague to all the provinces over which he presided"—WESLEY.

He was a freedman of the Emperor Claudius, and his brother Pallas was Nero's favourite. Tacitus says that Felix exercised the power of a prince with the spirit of a slave. Tertullus was apparently a Roman, and was chosen and employed because of his acquaintance with Roman law, and his ability to put the case in such a way as to make it seem that S. Paul was dangerous to the Roman power. Of course, he speaks in the name of his clients.

3. With all thankfulness. "In this oration almost every word is false,—the encomium on the government of Felix, the accusation of S. Paul, and the declaration of a lawful intention in what they had done and attempted"—B.

4. But that I may not trouble thee any further—"by trespassing either on thy patience or modesty. The eloquence of Tertullus was as bad as his cause: a lame introduction, a lame transition, and a lame conclusion! Did not God confound the orator's language?"—WESLEY.

5. A pestilent fellow—"or rather, a 'pestilence' or 'plague,' as the word signifies, a man infecting others with pernicious principles, and spreading mischief wherever he goes"—B. A mover of sedition (R.V. "insurrection"). In coming to particular charges the orator puts that foremost which would most touch the Roman power. Among all the Jews throughout the world. It will be remembered that S. Paul had been assailed at a time when Jerusalem was full of strangers come to the feast. From these visitors particulars had doubtless been gathered about the apostle's troubles at Philippi, Corinth, Ephesus, and elsewhere, which had repeatedly brought him under the notice of the tribunals. "The world" at this time meant the Roman empire. The sect of the Nazarenes—a term of reproach—followers of Him of Nazareth. Ringleader (lit. "front-rank man"). (Luke 23. 2; ch. 6. 13; 16. 20; 17. 6; 21. 28; 1 Pet. 4. 12, 15.)

6. Gone about to profane the Temple (R.V. "who moreover assayed"). The reference is to Trophimus the Ephesian, whom S. Paul was falsely represented to have brought into the Temple. Whom we took. Here R.V., following nearly all the oldest MSS., omits part of ver. 6, the whole of ver. 7, and part of ver. 8, and reads, "On whom also we laid hold; from whom thou wilt be able, by examining him thyself, to take knowledge." (Ch. 21. 28.)

9. The Jews also assented (R.V. "joined in the charge, affirming"). "Thus after a fawning preface, Tertullus prefers charges against S. Paul for which there was not the shadow of foundation, except that he was a leading person among the Nazarenes or Christians. For that he had moved the Jews to sedition against the Government, or that he went about to profane the Temple, was utterly false"—B.

Vers. 10-27. PAUL REPLIES TO THE ACCUSATION—FELIX DEFERS JUDGMENT.—10. "Knowing for several years thou hast been a judge over this nation—and so not unacquainted with our religious rites and customs, and consequently more capable of understanding and deciding a cause of this nature. There was no flattery in this; it was a plain fact. He governed Judea six or seven years. I answer for myself—and it may be observed his answer exactly corresponds with the three articles of Tertullus's charge: sedition, heresy, and profanation of the Temple. As to the first, he suggests that he had not been long enough at Jerusalem to form a party and attempt an insurrection, for it was but twelve days since he came up thither, five of which he had been at Cæsarea (ver. 1), one or two were spent in his journey thither, and most of the rest he had been confined at Jerusalem; and he challenges them, in fact, to produce any evidence of such practices (vers. 11–13). As to the second, he confesses himself to be a Christian, but maintains this to be a religion perfectly agreeable to the Law and the Prophets, and therefore deserving a fair reception (vers. 14–16). And as for profaning the Temple, he observes that he behaved there in a most peaceful and regular manner, so that his innocence had been manifest even before the Sanhedrim, where the authors of the tumult did not dare to appear against him"—WESLEY.

The governor had beckoned. The original is still more graphic, "The governor having nodded to him."

11. Because that thou mayest understand (R.V. "Seeing that thou canst take knowledge"). "The apostle means that it was easy to find evidence about all that had happened in such a short space of time"—C. B. Yet but twelve days (R.V. "Not more than twelve days"). The time may be accounted for thus: the day of S. Paul's arrival, the interview with S. James on the second day, five days may be given to the separate life in the Temple during the vow, then the hearing before the Council, next day the conspiracy, the tenth day S. Paul reached Cæsarea, and on the thirteenth day (which leaves five days, as Jews would reckon, from the conspiracy to the hearing in Cæsarea) S. Paul is before Felix. (Ver. 27; ch. 21. 26.)

12. They neither found me. Charged with sedition against the Government, and with an attempt to pollute the Temple, he denies both charges, and shows that no attempt has been made to adduce the slightest evidence of either. (Ch. 25. 8; 28. 17.)

14. After the way which they call heresy. "This appellation S. Paul corrects. Not that it was then an odious word, but it was not honourable enough. A party or sect (so that word signifies) is formed by men; this way was prescribed by God. The apostle had now said what was sufficient for his defence; but, having a fair occasion, he makes an ingenious confession of his faith in this verse, his hope in the next, and his love in the seventeenth. So worship I the God of my fathers. This was a very proper plea before a Roman magistrate, as it proved that he was under the protection of the Roman laws, since the Jews were so. Whereas, had he introduced the worship of new gods, he would have forfeited that protection. Believing all things which are written—concerning the Messiah"—WESLEY.

"After the way which they call a sect, so serve I the God of our fathers" (R.V.). The apostle refers to the accusation, and repeats the word of Tertullus. He acknowledges that he has joined what they call a sect, but declares that by so doing he has not in any sense forsaken "the God of his fathers," literally the ancestral God, but still believes in all the ancient faith of his nation. This was a fair plea before a Roman governor. (Amos 8. 14; ch. 9. 2; 2 Tim. 1. 3.)

15. And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow (R.V. "look for"). Both parties of the Sanhedrim probably were present. The apostle appeals to his accusers as holding the doctrine of the resurrection, knowing that it was held by the great majority of the nation whom they professed to represent. Both of the just and unjust. "In a public court this was particularly proper to be observed"—WESLEY.

And, considering the character of the judge, it was a word fitly spoken. Probably it was the influence which accompanied and followed that word which prepared the procurator for a serious conversation on the judgment to come. (Ch. 23. 6; 26. 6, 7; 28. 20; Dan. 12. 2; John 5. 28, 29.)

16. For this cause—"with a view to this"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Herein"—"on this account, because I cherish this hope"—W. W. I also exercise myself—"as well as they"—WESLEY.

"Comp. 2 Cor. 5. 9, where the same conclusion is drawn from the same premises"—C. H. "'I exercise myself'—I make it my constant business, and govern myself by this intention; I discipline myself, and live by rule (those that did so were called ascetics, from the word here used), abstain from many a thing which my inclination leads me to, and abound in all the exercises of religion that are most spiritual, with this in my eye, that I may keep peace with my conscience. I am as careful not to offend my conscience, as I am not to offend a friend I daily converse with; nay, as I am not to offend a magistrate to whom I am accountable; for conscience is God's deputy in my soul"—M. H. (Ch. 23. 1.)

17. I came to bring alms to my nation. "This is the only mention in the Acts of this collection, of which we read repeatedly in the Epistles. The allusion to it here is a striking undesigned coincidence"—C. H. And offerings—by assisting certain Nazarites to perform their vow according to the Law. (Ch. 11. 29, 30; 20. 16; Rom. 15. 25; 2 Cor. 8. 4; Gal. 2. 10.)

18. Whereupon (R.V. "Amidst which they found me"). "So that it was very unreasonable (1) to accuse him as an enemy of their nation, when, after long absence, he came to bring alms to it, money which he had collected among his friends for the relief of the poor at Jerusalem; and (2) to accuse him of having profaned the Temple, when he brought offerings to the Temple, and was found purifying himself therein according to the Law, and that in a very quiet and orderly manner"—B. (Ch. 21. 26, 27; 26. 21.)

19. Who ought to have been (R.V. "But there were certain Jews from Asia—who ought," etc.). "And they who found me were not these men, but certain Jews from Asia, etc."—W. W. "But the world never commits greater blunders, even against its own laws, than when it is persecuting the children of God"—WESLEY. (Ch. 23. 30; 25. 16.)

20. Or else let these same here say. The Greeks from Asia, who were the only witnesses against him in reference to what took place in the Temple, had failed to appear, and S. Paul knew that Felix would not be likely to condemn him on that point in the absence of their testimony. And he was willing to invite the testimony of the members of the Sanhedrim themselves as to his conduct before them.

21. Unless they think me blamable for this one word—"which, nevertheless, was the real truth"—WESLEY.

Touching the resurrection. "If my affirming this be a fault for which I must suffer, I acknowledge it, and there needs no other proof. But as that was one of the articles of the national faith he could not be blamed, either for maintaining it, or for asserting that God had given proof of it in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead"—B. (Ch. 23. 6; 28. 20.)

22. And when Felix—"having a better knowledge of Christianity than he could learn from the high priest, the elders, and their orator, and knowing it not to be so mischievous a thing as they represented: it is easy to imagine that, having his residence at Cæsarea, where Cornelius and his friends were converted, where Philip the Evangelist lived, and where there were many disciples, he had become in a measure acquainted with the way of Christianity"—B. "After I have been more accurately informed—which he afterwards was. And he doubtless (as well as Festus and Agrippa) transmitted a full account of these things to Rome"—WESLEY.

R.V. "But Felix, having more exact knowledge concerning the Way, deferred them, saying, When Lysias the chief captain shall come down, I will determine your matter." It will be noted that the translation which Mr. Wesley adopted, following Beza, Grotius, and others, differs considerably from the common translation, which is also sanctioned by the accurate scholarship of the R.V. Felix did not adjourn the case in order to obtain more accurate information; he put them off, because he knew too much about it to decide in their favour. The reference to Lysias was adverse to the Jews, who had spoken of him as treating them roughly, in his interference to save S. Paul. (Ver. 7.)

23. Commanded a centurion (R.V. "the centurion")—"probably the centurion who brought S. Paul to Cæsarea, the other having been left at Antipatris"—W. W. That he should be kept in charge, and should have indulgence (R.V.). "Though Felix did not find any crime proved against S. Paul, yet he did not acquit him, because he was afraid of displeasing the Jews. Being, however, fully convinced of his innocence, he ordered that he should not be confined too closely"—B. "There were three kinds of imprisonment under the Roman law: Public custody was confinement in the common gaol, of which we have an example in the case of S. Paul and Silas at Philippi. Free custody was the committal of an accused person to the charge of a magistrate or senator, who was responsible for his appearance. This species of detention was only employed in the case of men of high rank. The third kind was military custody, in which the prisoner was given in charge to a soldier, who was responsible with his own life for his safe keeping. This was further secured by chaining the prisoner's right hand to the soldier's left. The soldiers, of course, relieved each other in this duty. Their prisoner was usually kept in the barracks, but sometimes allowed to reside in a private house under their charge. It was under the latter species of custody that S. Paul was now placed by Felix"—C. H. To let him have liberty—"to be only a prisoner at large. Hereby the gospel was spread more and more, not to the satisfaction of the Jews; but they could not hinder it"—WESLEY.

It will be remembered that S. Paul had friends in Cæsarea (ch. 21. 8–16), and that he would be able to communicate through them with the outer world, so that the two years of imprisonment may not have been uselessly spent. (Ch. 27. 3; 28. 16.)

24. "And after Paul had been kept some days in this gentle confinement at Cæsarea, Felix, who had been absent for a short time, coming thither again, with Drusilla his wife—the daughter of Herod Agrippa, one of the finest women of that age. Felix persuaded her to forsake her husband, Azizus, king of Emesa, and to be married to himself, though a heathen. She was afterwards, with a son she had by Felix, consumed in an eruption on Mount Vesuvius"—WESLEY.

Three children of that King Herod, whose miserable end is recorded in ch. 12. 23, appear in the closing chapters of the Acts,—Drusilla, Bernice, and King Agrippa. Both the daughters are credited with considerable personal beauty, which is all that Mr. Wesley means by calling Drusilla one of the finest women of her age. "The summons to S. Paul doubtless occurred at the wish of Drusilla, who, as a Jewess of the Herodian family, had heard much of Christianity, and might be curious to see and hear one of the chief leaders of the Church. This is manifestly implied, as on this occasion S. Paul was not heard specially upon the accusations brought against him"—L. Concerning the faith in Christ—"that is, the doctrine of Christ"—WESLEY.

25. And as he reasoned. "Felix perhaps expected some philosophical dissertation on the subject of the resurrection, and the life after death. His own conduct, which Tacitus describes as mean and cruel and profligate, would make the subjects on which S. Paul addressed him peculiarly disturbing"—C. B. "Of justice, temperance, and the judgment to come. This was the only effectual way of preaching Christ to an unjust, lewd judge. Felix being terrified. How happily might this conviction have ended, had he been careful to pursue the views which were then opening upon his mind! But, like thousands, he deferred the consideration of these things to a more convenient season—a season which, alas! never came. For though he heard again, he was terrified no more. In the meantime, we do not find Drusilla, though a Jewess, was thus alarmed. She had been used to hear of a future judgment; perhaps, too, she trusted to the being a daughter of Abraham, or to the expiation of the Law, and so was proof against the convictions which seized on her husband, though a heathen. Let this teach us to guard against all such false dependences as tend to elude those convictions that might otherwise be produced in us by the faithful preaching of the word of God. Let us stop our ears against those messengers of Satan, who appear as angels of light, who would teach us to reconcile the hope of salvation with a corrupt heart or an unholy life. Go thy way for this time. Oh, how will every damned soul one day lament his having neglected such a time as this!"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul preaches of righteousness to the venal judge, of chastity to the adulterous pair, and of a judgment to come to the unrighteous judge, on whom the imperial judgment of Rome was impending. However, he did not speak directly of the sins of the governor, but discoursed on the solemn matters in general. The express application was unnecessary; the Holy Ghost applied them to the heart of Felix"—L.

26. He hoped also—"an evil hope. So when he heard, his eye was not single; no marvel then that he profited nothing by all S. Paul's discourses. That money would be given—by the Christians for the liberty of so able a minister; and, waiting for this, unhappy Felix fell short of the treasure of the gospel"—WESLEY.

That he might loose him—omitted in R.V., though implied in the narrative. Communed with him. The words convey the idea of friendly or familiar intercourse, with the object of giving an opportunity for arranging the terms of release. (Ex. 23. 8.)

27. But after two years—"after S. Paul had been two years a prisoner. Felix, desiring to gratify the Jews, left Paul bound. Thus men of the world, to gratify one another, stretch forth their hands to the things of God! Yet the wisdom of Felix did not profit him, did not satisfy the Jews at all. Their accusations followed him to Rome, and had utterly ruined him but for the interest which his brother Pallas had with Nero"—WESLEY.

Bound (R.V. "In bonds"). "This seems to indicate that before his departure Felix withdrew the indulgence which had been previously granted to S. Paul, and left him in bonds, so as to give to his successor the impression, which the Jews desired, that he was deserving of punishment"—C. B. (Ex. 23. 2; ch. 12. 3; 25. 9, 14.)

CHAPTER XXV.

Vers. 1–12. PAUL ACCUSED BEFORE THE NEW GOVERNOR—APPEALS TO CÆSAR. 1. Festus . . . after three days. "When a Roman governor came to his province, his first step would be to make himself acquainted with the habits and prevalent feelings of the people he had come to rule. The Jews were the most remarkable people in the whole extent of the Roman provinces, and no city was to any other people what Jerusalem was to the Jews. We are not surprised, therefore, to learn that three days after his arrival at the political metropolis, Festus went up to Jerusalem"—C. H.

2. Then the high priest and chief of the Jews appeared against Paul. "In so long a time their rage was nothing cooled. So much louder a call had S. Paul to the Gentiles"—WESLEY. (Ch. 24. 1; ver. 15.)

3. Desired favour against him. They seem to have made interest with Festus to pronounce judgment at once against S. Paul (vers. 15, 16, 24). Failing in this, they then requested that he should be tried at Jerusalem, thinking that a new governor would not think it necessary to send so strong an escort as Lysias provided. (Ch. 23. 12, 15.)

4. But Festus answered. "So Festus's care to preserve the imperial privileges was the means of preserving S. Paul's life. By what invisible springs does God govern the world! with what silence, and yet with what wisdom and energy"—WESLEY.

That Paul was kept in charge (R.V.)—that he had been placed by his predecessor in a certain state of custody, and that it would be inconvenient to remove him, especially as he was himself returning to Cæsarea almost immediately.

5. Let those of you who are able—"who are best able to undertake the journey and manage the cause. If there be any wickedness in him. So he does not pass sentence before he hears the cause"—WESLEY.

R.V. for "who are able" has "which are of power." He asks for men of influence and character. Any wickedness (R.V. "Anything amiss").

6. Not more than ten days (R.V. "Not more than eight or ten days"). "A short space for a new governor to stay at such a city as Jerusalem. He could not, with any convenience, have heard and decided the cause of S. Paul within that time"—WESLEY.

He went down to Cæsarea—several of the Jews attending him in accordance with his invitation.

7. The Jews . . . stood round about. No mention is made of a hired advocate on this occasion; indeed, there had hardly been time to instruct one. Besides, Festus had intimated that he wished to hear what those "who were of power" among them had to say on the case. Bringing many accusations. "When many accusations are heaped together, frequently not one of them is true"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Bringing against him many and grievous charges." "Since they last saw him they had gathered up every rumour they could collect, and these they brought forward, even though they could not support them by evidence"—C. B. (Mark 15. 3; Luke 23. 2, 10; ch. 24. 5, 13.)

8. While he answered. "To a general charge, a general answer was sufficient"—WESLEY.

"In this instance S. Luke gives only a general account, both of the accusations and of S. Paul's defence. But from the words in this verse, the charges appear to have been threefold:—(1) That he had broken the Jewish Law; (2) That he had defiled the Temple; (3) That he had dealt in treasonable practices—to all of which he no doubt answered particularly"—C. (Ch. 6. 13; 24. 12; 28. 17.)

9. Art thou willing to go up to Jerusalem? "Festus could have ordered this without asking S. Paul; but God secretly overruled the whole, that he might have an occasion of appealing to Rome"—WESLEY.

Willing to do the Jews a pleasure (R.V. "Desiring to gain favour with the Jews"). He gives a different reason to Agrippa for his proposition (ver. 20). "What Festus proposed was equivalent to acquitting the apostle of any charge under Roman law. He is therefore appealed to in reference to the other accusations. The offences against the Law of the Jews and against the Temple must be dealt with by the Sanhedrim. Would S. Paul accept an acquittal by one count, and submit to a trial before his own people on the rest? And Festus would be present to see that right was done"—C. B. "He must have remembered how Jesus said, 'I send ye forth as sheep among wolves, be ye therefore wise as serpents'"—G. (Ch. 24. 27; ver. 20.)

10. I am standing at Cæsar's judgment seat—"for all the courts of the Roman governors were held in the name of the emperor, and by commission from him"—WESLEY.

He reminds the governor that he had been in custody of the Roman authority for two years, and he refuses to be handed over to another tribunal, where his judges would be those who now accused him, and who, two years ago, had been privy to a plot to murder him.

11. For if I be an offender, I refuse not to die. He declares that he does not ask for mercy; if the Roman law pronounce him guilty, he is prepared to pay the penalty of his fault. On the other hand, if the accusation is groundless, he claims as a right the protection of the law.

No man can give me up (so R.V.). "He expresses it modestly. The meaning is, Thou canst not"—WESLEY.

The full idea is expressed by the margin of R.V., "No man can grant me by favour." S. Paul saw distinctly the motive which actuated Festus; he was trying to do this as a favour to the Jews.

I appeal unto Cæsar—"which any Roman citizen might do, before sentence was passed"—WESLEY.

It was evident that Festus was wavering, and that the apostle was in very serious danger. The appeal to Cæsar relieved Festus of responsibility, and removed S. Paul out of the reach of his enemies. (Ver. 25; ch. 18. 14; 23. 29; 26. 31, 32; 28. 19.)

12. When he had conferred with the Council. "It was customary for a considerable number of persons of distinction to attend the Roman governors. These constituted a kind of council, with which they frequently advised"—WESLEY.

"There were a few cases in which the right of appeal was disallowed; a bandit, or a pirate, for example, taken in the fact might be condemned and executed by the proconsul, notwithstanding his appeal to the emperor. We read, accordingly, that Festus took counsel with his assessors, concerning the admissibility of S. Paul's appeal. But no doubt could be entertained on this head; and he immediately pronounced the decision of the Court, 'Thou hast appealed unto Cæsar: unto Cæsar thou shalt go' (R.V.)"—C. H. 'The falsehood and deceit of his accusers, and the manifest weakness of the judge, left the imprisoned apostle no other choice but this appeal to the emperor. The moment in which the procurator formally declared that the appeal was allowed, is a decisive turning-point in the life of the apostle. Henceforth the signal is 'to Rome.' To this he had looked forward for years; it had been the subject of special revelation from the Lord; and it was now in near prospect. What men meant for evil, God intended for good"—L.

Vers. 13–27. VISIT OF AGRIPPA AND BERNICE TO FESTUS—THEY AGREE TO HEAR PAUL SPEAK. —13. Agrippa—"the son of Herod Agrippa (ch. 12. 1). And Bernice—his sister, with whom he lived in a scandalous familiarity. This was the person whom Titus Vespasian so passionately loved, that he would have made her empress, had not the clamours of the Romans prevented it"—WESLEY.

Bernice was the elder of the two sisters, Drusilla being the younger. Her career may illustrate the morality of the age, and the need of Christianity to purify it. She was first married to her uncle, Herod, king of Chalcis, and after his death she lived under circumstances of great suspicion with her own brother Agrippa, with whom she visited Festus. She was a second time married, to Polemon, king of Cilicia, but soon left him, and returned to her brother. She afterwards became the mistress of Vespasian, and of his son Titus. This was the woman whom Titus, described in history as the best of the Roman emperors, desired to make his wife. The visit referred to in the text was a visit of compliment, paid by the vassal king to the representative of Rome.

14. Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king. In the course of conversation, Festus mentioned this as a matter which caused him a little embarrassment, and in which the peculiar knowledge of his visitor might assist him. (Ch. 24. 27.)

15. Desiring judgment against him—"as upon a previous conviction, which they falsely pretended"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Asking for sentence." (Vers. 2, 3.)

16. It is not the custom of the Romans. "How excellent a rule, to condemn no one unheard! A rule which, as it is common to all nations (courts of inquisition only excepted), so it ought to direct our proceedings in all affairs, not only in public, but private life"—WESLEY.

To deliver any man to die (R.V. "To give up any man," omitting "to die"). "The word is the same as in ver. 11, and implies the granting of a favour. The Jews thought their influence ought to be sufficient to secure the condemnation of this prisoner, whatever might be the merits of the case"—C. B.

18. Such things as I supposed—"from their passion and vehemence"—WESLEY.

19. Questions of their own superstition (R.V. "religion"). The word is cognate with that used by S. Paul to the Athenians (ch. 17. 22). It must be remembered that Agrippa and Bernice were themselves Jews, and Festus would not use a word that would give offence.

19. But had certain questions—"how coldly does he mention the things of the last importance! And about one Jesus—thus does Festus speak of Him to whom every knee shall bow! Whom Paul affirmed to be alive. And was this a doubtful question? But why, O Festus, didst thou doubt concerning it? Only because thou didst not search into the evidence of it. Otherwise, that evidence might have opened to thee, till it had grown up into full conviction; and thy illustrious prisoner have led thee into the glorious liberty of the children of God"—WESLEY.

The name of Jesus does not occur in S. Luke's report of the proceedings, either before Felix or before Festus. It is evident, however, that S. Paul had not only stated the doctrine of the resurrection in general terms, but had asserted the fact of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, with all that such a fact implied. At all events, Festus, brief as his acquaintance with the apostle had been, was able to put his finger on the one great question which was in dispute between him and his accusers, as it is between the Christian and the unbeliever still. (Ch. 18. 15; 23. 29.)

20. And because I doubted—(R.V. "And I, being perplexed how to inquire concerning these things")—I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem—"I proposed that the case should be referred to the Jewish ecclesiastical courts, as best able to take cognisance of an affair of this nature"—B.

21. To be reserved to the hearing of Augustus . . . Cæsar. The family name of the first emperors was Cæsar, and it was assumed by later emperors, though not connected with the family. The name "Augustus" was originally conferred by the senate on Octavius, and was assumed by the later emperors as a title rather than a name. Hence the R.V. reads, "the decision of the emperor." The emperor at this time was Nero.

22. Then Agrippa said, I would also hear the man myself (R.V. "could wish," or "was wishing"). "This request Agrippa made, because he was well acquainted with the religious tenets and expectations of the Jews, and because many wonderful things had been reported to him concerning Jesus and His disciples; and he had heard of S. Paul, and knew of what vast concern the question was that Felix made so light of, namely, whether Jesus was alive or not. He would not, on any account, have gone to a synagogue, or religious meeting, to hear S. Paul preach, no more than Herod to hear Jesus; but they were both glad to have these persons brought before them, if only to gratify their curiosity"—B. To-morrow thou shalt hear him. "There was a gracious providence in this, for the encouragement of S. Paul, who had seemed buried alive in his imprisonment, and deprived of almost all opportunity of doing good. He has now an opportunity of preaching Christ to a great congregation, and that of great ones"—B. (Ch. 9. 15.)

23. Agrippa and Bernice, with great pomp. The children follow in the steps of their father, who sat upon his throne, in Cæsarea, in royal apparel, to listen to the flatteries of the Tyrian deputation. (Ch. 12. 21.) With the tribunes and the principal men of the city—"the chief officers, both military and civil"—WESLEY.

"This was the most dignified and influential audience S. Paul had yet addressed, and the prediction in ch. 9. 15 was fulfilled, though afterwards yet more remarkably at Rome"—W. W. "S. Paul's bonds in so good a cause were more glorious than their chains of gold, and his guards than their equipage. Who would be fond of worldly pomp that here sees so bad a woman loaded with it, and so good a man loaded with the reverse of it"—B. It must not be supposed that Bernice and Drusilla were regarded as exceptionally bad women; there were worse in the imperial family itself. The truth is, that the entire fabric of society was ruinously corrupt. The only hope of the world was in the truth represented by that one chained prisoner.

26. Unto my lord. Octavius and Tiberius rejected the title of Dominus, Lord. The earlier emperors desired to maintain republican forms while wielding practically absolute power. The instance in the text shows how inevitably the system broke down.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Vers. 1-23. PAUL SPEAKS BEFORE AGRIPPA AND FESTUS.—1. Agrippa said. He spoke, as being the person nominally of highest rank, as well as the guest of Festus. And Paul stretching forth his hand—"chained as it was; a decent expression of his own earnestness, and proper to engage the attention of his hearers. Answered for himself. Not only refuting the accusation of the Jews, but enlarging upon the faith of the gospel"—WESLEY.

S. Luke frequently introduces the speeches of the apostles with a description of the attitude or action of the speaker. (See ch. 1. 15; 10. 34; 12. 17; 13. 9.)

2. King Agrippa. "There is a peculiar force in thus addressing a person by name. Agrippa felt this"—WESLEY.

I think myself happy. This was not a court of justice, but a preliminary inquiry only. S. Paul knew, as well as Agrippa or Festus, that nothing could now prevent his being sent to Rome, to take his trial there. But at Rome itself much would depend upon the manner in which the case against him was presented; and he hoped, from Agrippa's acquaintance with Jewish customs and habits of thought, that he would assist Festus to place the matter intelligibly and impartially before the imperial court.

3. Who art accurately acquainted—"which Festus was not—with the customs—in practical matters—and questions—in speculative. This word Festus had used in the absence of S. Paul (ch. 25. 19); who, by the Divine leading, repeats and explains it. Agrippa had had peculiar advantages for an accurate knowledge of the Jewish customs and questions, from his education under his father Herod, and his long abode at Jerusalem. Nothing can be imagined more suitable or more graceful than this whole discourse of S. Paul before Agrippa; in which the seriousness of the Christian, the boldness of the apostle, and the politeness of the gentleman and the scholar, appear in a most beautiful contrast, or rather a most happy union"—WESLEY.

"Agrippa was probably well acquainted with these matters, as his father was zealous in defending the Law, and strict in observing it. Moreover, this Agrippa had obtained from Claudius the control of the Temple, and the sacred treasure, and the power of appointing the high priests"—W. W.

4. From my youth, which was from the beginning—"that is, which was from the beginning of my youth"—WESLEY.

"He was not born among the Jews at Jerusalem, but he was bred among them. And though he had of late years been conversant with the Gentiles, which had given great offence to the Jews, yet at his setting out in the world he had been intimately acquainted with the Jewish nation, and entirely devoted to their interests. His education was neither foreign nor obscure; i was among his own people at Jerusalem, where religion and learning flourished"—B.

5. If they would testify—"which they would not; for they well knew what weight his former life would add to his present testimony"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Having knowledge of me from the first, if they be willing to testify." "The sentence appears to intimate that there were some, even among his accusers, who could give evidence about his earlier years, if they were so minded"—C. B. (Ch. 22. 3; 23. 6; 24. 15, 22; Phil. 3. 5.)

6. And now. "This and the two following verses are a kind of parenthesis, and show that what the Pharisees rightly taught concerning the resurrection, S. Paul likewise asserted at this day. The ninth verse is connected with the fifth. For Pharisaism impelled him to persecute. I stand in judgment for the hope of the promise—of the resurrection. So it was in effect; for unless Christ had risen there could have been no resurrection of the dead. And it was chiefly for testifying the resurrection of Christ, that the Jews still persecuted him"—WESLEY.

The hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers. "S. Paul intends to say, All pious Israelites hope for the Messiah promised by God, and he himself also believes in the fulfilment of this promise by the appearance and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth"—L. (Ch. 23. 6; Gen. 3. 15; 22. 18; 26. 4; 49. 10; Deut. 18. 15; 2 Sam. 7. 12; Ps. 132. 11; Isa. 4. 2; 7. 14; 9. 6; 40. 10; Jer. 23. 5; 33. 14-16; Ezek. 34. 23; 37. 24; Dan. 9. 24; Micah 7. 20; ch. 13. 32; Rom. 15. 8; Titus 2. 13.)

7. Our twelve tribes. "For a great part of the ten tribes also had, at various times, returned from the east to their own country"—WESLEY. (Jas. 1. 1; 1 Pet. 1. 1.)

Worshipping continually night and day—"that is, this is what they aim at, in all their public and private worship"—WESLEY.

Twelve tribes. "The Jews regarded themselves as representing the whole race, and not merely the two tribes of the kingdom of Judah. Tribal names continued to be preserved, and with the people of Judah there doubtless came back many members of the previous captivity of Israel. Thus we read that Anna the prophetess was of the tribe of Aser (Luke 2. 36), and S. Paul himself was of the tribe of Benjamin"—C. B. Instantly serving (R.V. "Earnestly serving"). The word refers especially to worship. Accused by the Jews. He puts it to Agrippa that it was utterly unreasonable for Jews to accuse him on such grounds. (Jas. 1. 1.)

8. Is it judged by you an incredible thing? "It was by Festus (ch. 25. 19), to whom S. Paul answers, as if he had heard him discourse"—WESLEY.

"This was specially addressed to the Jews, represented by Agrippa, as well as by the crowd in 'the place of hearing.' Their own Scriptures furnished them with cases where the dead had been raised, as, for example, by Elisha"—C. H. If God doth raise the dead (R.V.). "'Doth raise' is significant; not past, referring to the resurrection of Christ; nor future, referring to the general resurrection; but present, indicating that it refers not to a single fact, but to a permanent attribute or power of God"—L.

9. I thought—"when I was a Pharisee"—that I ought to do many things—"which he now enumerates"—WESLEY.

"With this S. Paul takes up again the narrative of his own life, dropped for an instant at the word Pharisee (ver. 5). The name of Jesus of Nazareth—"or 'Jesus the Nazarene,' whom under that title I impiously derided, esteeming His claim to be the Messiah at once false and contemptible"—B. (John 16. 2; 1 Tim 1. 13.)

10. I shut up many of the saints—"men not only innocent, but good, just, holy"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul here calls Christians 'the saints,' which he avoided doing in his speech before the people at Jerusalem; but here, before an unbiassed audience, he designedly so expresses himself, in order to bear witness for Christ and His Church"—L. "This speech throughout should be compared with that in ch. 22, with the view of observing S. Paul's judicious adaptation of his statements to his audience. The Jews in the Temple would not have tolerated his calling the Christians, saints"—C. H. Gave my voice (R.V. "my vote")—"that is, I joined with those who condemned them. Perhaps the chief priests did also give him power to vote on the occasion"—WESLEY.

"There are strong grounds for believing that, if he was not a member of the Sanhedrim at the time of S. Stephen's death, he was elected into that powerful senate soon after"—C. H. (Ch. 8. 3; Gal. 1. 13; ch. 9. 14, 21; 22. 5.)

11. I compelled them—"that is, some of them—to blaspheme. This is the most dreadful of all! Repent, ye enemies of the gospel. If Spira, who was compelled, suffered so terribly, what will become of those who compel, like Saul, but do not repent like him?"—WESLEY.

R.V. "I strove to make them blaspheme." Mr. Wesley has for once missed the precise meaning of the Greek tense. He very frequently has anticipated the best emendations of the R.V. Strange cities (R.V. "Foreign cities"). (Ch. 22. 19.)

12. With the authority and commission of the chief priests (R.V.). They were the presidents of the twenty-four classes, into which the priests were divided, and were ex officio members of the Sanhedrim. In ch. 22. 5, accordingly, he says he received his commission from the high priest and the Sanhedrim. (Ch. 9. 3.)

13. O king. "Most seasonably, in the height of his narrative, does he thus fix the king's attention. Above the brightness of the sun—and no marvel. For what is the brightness of this created sun to the Sun of Righteousness, 'the brightness of the Father's glory'?"—WESLEY.

"There would be no question about the supernatural character of a light which overpowered the midday glare of an Eastern sun"—C. B.

14. In the Hebrew tongue—"S. Paul was not now speaking in Hebrew. When he was, he did not add, 'in the Hebrew tongue' (ch. 22. 7). Christ used this tongue both on earth and in heaven"—WESLEY.

It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks (R.V. "the goad"). This is the only place where the oldest MSS. give these words. (See note on ch. 9. 5.) "The words would imply that God had been guiding Saul towards the true light for some time before, and that this zeal for persecution was a resistance of the Divine urging"—C. B. And to us the lesson is, that we must never lose heart or hope, even in the case of those who appear increasingly hardened against the truth, for it may well be that the very violence of their resistance indicates how strong is the influence they resist.

16. To make thee a minister and a witness (R.V. "To appoint thee"). S. Paul proceeds to relate all that the Lord revealed to him, both at the moment of his conversion, and subsequently, by the voice of Ananias, and by the vision at Jerusalem. (Ch. 22. 15.)

17. Delivering thee from the people—"the Jews—and the Gentiles, to whom—both Jews and Gentiles—I now send thee. S. Paul gives them to know that the liberty he enjoys even in bonds was promised to him, as well as his preaching to the Gentiles. 'I' denotes the authority of the sender. 'Now' the time when his mission was dated. For his apostleship as well as his conversion commenced at this moment"—WESLEY.

C. H. translates "choosing thee" instead of "delivering thee." S. Paul may be said to be chosen not only from among Jews, but among Gentiles, as being a native of Cilicia, and a citizen of Rome. But R.V. retains the old translation. "Now" is omitted in R.V. "I send." The word is peculiar, implying the commission to be an apostle, which S. Paul always claimed to have received from Christ Himself.

18. To open—"He opens them who sends Paul; and He does it by Paul who is sent—their eyes—both of the Jews and Gentiles. That they may turn—through the power of the Almighty—from the spiritual darkness wherein they are involved, to the light of Divine knowledge and holiness, and from the power of Satan, who now holds them in sin, guilt, and misery, to the love and happy service of God, that they may receive through faith (he seems to place the same blessings in a fuller light) pardon, holiness, and glory"—WESLEY.

"The object of his mission is to open their eyes—that is, to open and awaken the mind to the truth, and this in order to their conversion. The change is denoted by a twofold contrast—by that between darkness and light, and by that between the ruling power of Satan and the liberating fellowship of God. Finally, the ultimate design of God in their conversion consists in the forgiveness of sins, and the bestowal of an inheritance, that is, a share in the glory among the sanctified. Both forgiveness and holiness, however, can only be obtained by faith in Jesus"—L. The reader will not overlook the allusion to the passage of Isaiah read by our Lord in the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4. 18). (Isa. 35. 5; 42. 7; Luke 1. 79; John 8. 12; 2 Cor. 4. 4; Eph. 1. 18; 1 Thess. 5. 5; 2 Cor. 6. 14; Eph. 4. 18; 5. 8; Col. 1. 13; 1 Pet. 2. 9, 25; Luke 1. 77; Eph. 1. 11; Col. 1. 12.)

19. From that time—"having received power to obey—I was not disobedient—I did obey; I used that power (Gal. 1. 16), so that even this grace whereby S. Paul was influenced was not irresistible"—WESLEY.

The thought goes back to the "kicking against the pricks," the opposition of previous times. That was now at an end.

20. I declared—"from that hour to this, both to Jew and Gentile—that they should repent. This repentance, we may observe, is previous both to inward and outward holiness"—WESLEY.

"Without repentance, even Christ avails us nothing"—L. First to them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem. "Where we have given the greatest offence, there we must seek first of all to remove it"—L. (Ch. 9. 20; 22. 29; 11. 26; 13.; 14. 19–28; Matt. 3. 8.)

21. For these things. "The apostle now applies all that he has said"—WESLEY.

The Jews caught me (R.V. "seized me"). The word implies violence. (Ch. 21. 30, 31.)

22. Having obtained help from God. "When all other help failed God sent the Romans from the castle, and so fulfilled the promise He had made (ver. 17)"—WESLEY.

I continue (R.V. "stand unto this day"). "The apostle has in mind the many attempts to cast him down, made both by Jews and Gentiles. The word for 'help' means the succour of an ally; he has been rescued in many ways, and he does not forget human agency, but this, whatever it was, was all sent of God"—C. B. To small and great. "He was now before two who would be named great, and he knew that God had declared he should testify 'before kings' (ch. 9. 15)"—C. B. The prophets and Moses. He is careful to maintain that he has not introduced a new doctrine. (Luke 24. 27, 44; ch. 24. 14; 28. 23; Rom. 3. 21; John 5. 46.)

23. How that the Christ must suffer, and how that He first by the resurrection of the dead should proclaim light both to the people and to the Gentiles (R.V.). "Christ was spoken of in like terms by the aged Simeon. A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel"—C. B. "These are the three chief points in the writings of the prophets; Christ's sufferings and resurrection, and the publication of them among all nations. And it was precisely these three points that the Jews were most against; they were offended at the first, denied the second, and grudged the third"—L. (Luke 24. 26, 46; 1 Cor. 15. 20; Col. 1. 18; Rev. 1. 5; Luke 2. 32.)

Vers. 24–32. PAUL INTERRUPTED BY FESTUS, APPEALS TO AGRIPPA—THE KING'S OPINION OF THE CASE.—24. Festus said, Paul, thou art beside thyself—"to talk of men's rising from the dead; and of a Jew enlightening not only his own nation but the polite and learned Greeks and Romans! Nay, Festus, it is thou that art beside thyself; thou strikest quite wide of the mark. And no wonder: he saw that nature did not act in S. Paul; but the grace that acted in him he did not see. And therefore he took all this ardour which animated the apostle for a mere start of learned frenzy"—WESLEY.

"The extraordinary nature of the disclosures, the narrative of the conversion, the vision of Jesus (the dead man, ch. 25. 19), the mention of the resurrection, would produce this effect on the mind of Festus, who, like many Romans of education, was probably a philosophical sceptic in reference to spiritual existences and a future state. The eloquent and fluent Greek of S. Paul, together with his manifestly deep acquaintance with the literature of his country, will account for the procurator's opinion of his much learning"—W. W. (2 Kings 9. 11; John 10. 10; 1 Cor. 1. 23; 2. 13, 14; 4. 10.)

25. I am not mad, most excellent Festus—"the style properly belonging to a Roman pro-prætor. How inexpressibly beautiful is this reply! how strong! yet how decent and respectful! Madmen seldom call men by their names, and titles of honour. Thus also S. Paul refutes the charge. But utter the words of truth—confirmed in the next verse—and soberiety—the very reverse of madness. And both these remain, even when the men of God act with the utmost vehemence"—WESLEY.

With perfect calmness and due respect, but with all firmness, the apostle disclaims the reproach, and declares that his speech was (objectively) truth, and (subjectively) soberness.

26. For the king knoweth of these things. "S. Paul, having refuted Festus, pursues his purpose, returning naturally, and as it were step by step, from Festus to Agrippa. To whom I speak with freedom. This freedom was probably one circumstance which Festus accounted madness"—WESLEY.

This thing was not done in a corner. "Of the truth of this we may be sure from the excitement caused both in the religious and the political world by the work of Jesus during His life, by the efforts put forth to stop His teaching, which culminated in a trial in which both Jewish and Roman magistrates were consulted, and by the exclamation of the Pharisees, 'The world is gone after Him' (John 12. 19), and the declaration, 'These that have turned the world upside down' (ch. 17. 6)"—C. B.

27. King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? "He that believes these, believes Paul—yea, and Christ. The apostle now comes close to his heart. What did Agrippa feel when he heard this? I know that thou believest. Here S. Paul lays so fast hold on the king, that he can scarce make any resistance"—WESLEY.

"The apostle answers his own question, for he is sure that Agrippa would not have given a different answer, seeing how anxious all his family were, in spite of their relations with Rome, to be accepted by the Jewish nation"—C. B. He implies that a belief in the prophets ought consistently to be followed by a belief in Jesus and the resurrection; the rhetoric and the logic of S. Paul are equally admirable; he fixes Agrippa either to a denial of his belief in his own religion, or to a refutation of the argument from that religion just addressed to him.

28. Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian. "See here, Festus altogether a heathen, S. Paul altogether a Christian, Agrippa halting between both. Poor Agrippa! but almost persuaded! So near the mark, and yet fall short!—another step, and thou art within the veil! Reader, stop not with Agrippa, but go on with S. Paul"—WESLEY.

R.V. "With but little persuasion thou wouldst fain make me a Christian." "The phrase here cannot mean 'almost,' as it is in A.V. It might mean either 'in few words' (Eph. 3. 3), or 'in a small measure,' or 'in a small time.' We might render the passage thus, 'Thou thinkest to make me a Christian with little persuasion.' The verb is in the present tense, and the title 'Christian' was one of contempt (1 Pet. 4. 16)"—C. H. "The king despised the attempt which had been made to convince him, and mocked at the language of S. Paul in so readily taking it for granted that the king was in accord with him"—C. B.

29. I would to God. "Agrippa had spoken of being a Christian as a thing wholly in his own power. S. Paul gently corrects this mistake; intimating, it is the gift and the work of God. That all that hear me. It was modesty in S. Paul not to apply directly to them all; yet he looks upon them and observes them. Were such as I am—Christians indeed; full of 'righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.' He speaks from a full sense of his own happiness, and an overflowing love to all"—WESLEY.

R.V. "I would to God that whether with little or with much." "The king spoke ironically and in contempt; S. Paul took his words as though they had been spoken in earnest, and made this noble answer, which expresses, as no other words ever expressed them, that union of enthusiastic zeal with genuine courtesy, which is the true characteristic of 'a Christian'"—C. H. Except these bonds. "The apostle was probably chained to the soldier who guarded him. There is great pathos in this, for if he could conscientiously wish all men present to be such as he was, possessed of his privileges and character, why should such an one be in bonds?"—W. W. (1 Cor. 7. 7.)

30. The king rose up—"an unspeakably precious moment to Agrippa; whether he duly improved it or no, we shall see in that day"—WESLEY.

"In the last Romano-Jewish war Agrippa took part with the Romans, and after the fall of Jerusalem, which took place A.D. 70, he retired with Bernice to Rome, where he died thirty years afterwards. The appearance of S. Paul before him offers several characteristic traits. He is known to have been intimate with Festus; the pomp with which the king came into the audience-chamber was in accordance with his general bearing; and the cold irony with which he met the impassioned words of the apostle suits the temper of one who was contented to take part in the destruction of his nation"—Smith's Dict. They that sat with them — the chief captains and principal men of Cæsarea (ch. 25. 23). The authorities withdrew to consult on what they had heard, and to advise Festus as to the character of the communication he should send to Rome.

31. This man doeth nothing worthy of death, or of bonds. "They speak of his whole life, not of one action only. And could ye learn nothing more than this from that discourse? A favourable judgment of such a preacher is not all that God requires"—WESLEY.

"This appearance of S. Paul before Agrippa took place previous to the first persecution under Nero, and there was at this time no law against the Christians"—W. W. (Ch. 23. 9, 29; 25. 25.)

32. This man. "Agrippa gives his opinion, both as the highest in rank, and as the one who was equally familiar with Jewish and Roman law. There is a tone of contempt in the expression 'this man.' (See ch. 16. 35; 23. 27.) If he had not appealed unto Cæsar. The appeal had taken the matter out of the hands of Festus. Only the imperial court could now decide either his punishment or his release. But the declaration of Agrippa would undoubtedly be of some service to the apostle, in securing him greater comfort on his journey, if not in suggesting such a report of the case as would not be likely to imperil his life"—C. B. "The speech of S. Paul before Agrippa is distinguished by a peculiar joyfulness and confidence, by a lofty tone and a courage certain of victory. In form a defence, this speech is aggressive in the noblest sense, whereas that in ch. 22 is peculiarly defensive. In both speeches the apostle apprehends Christianity in its unity with the old covenant; in both, his peculiar conversion to Christ, and the appearance of Jesus on the way to Damascus, the cause of that conversion, form the centre point of the discussion. Only, in his speech to the Jews, he lays stress on the communication of the legally pious Ananias at Damascus; in his speech before Agrippa he passes him over in silence, and relates as a revelation of Christ what the Lord spoke to him through Ananias. This was the last public testimony which the apostle delivered in Palestine; and this was the most splendid worldly assembly which he ever had before him, embracing the king over part of Canaan, the governor under the Roman emperor, and a large number of military and civil officers, the principal people of Cæsarea"—L.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Vers. 1–44. PAUL SAILS FOR ROME, AND IS SHIPWRECKED.—1. As soon as it was determined to sail—"as being a shorter and less expensive passage to Rome"—WESLEY.

"The resolution which was now adopted referred not to the purpose, but to the manner and time, of the journey to Italy, namely, that it should be made by sea, and immediately. It was now late in the harvest, A.D. 60"—L. "About August"—C. H. "The text, 'That we should sail,' re-introduces S. Luke. The last passage where the first person is used is ch. 21. 18. We may presume, therefore, that he had been the companion of S. Paul at Cæsarea; and he may have profited by the advantages of that situation, such as proximity to Jerusalem, and access to those whom he calls 'eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word,'—and occupied himself in writing the Gospel which bears his name"—W. W. (Ch. 25. 12–25.)

2. "Adramyttium was a seaport of Mysia. Aristarchus and S. Luke went with S. Paul by choice, not being ashamed of his bonds"—WESLEY.

R.V. "And embarking into a ship of Adramyttium, which was about to sail unto the places on the coast of Asia." "The ship was homeward bound, and was yet to visit several seaports along the coast of proconsular Asia. The object was to change into another ship at one of these seaports, and to get an opportunity of sailing to Italy"—L. "Aristarchus"—mentioned (ch. 19. 29) as one of those whom the mob in Ephesus seized in their fury against S. Paul. He went, it seems, with the apostle into Europe; at least, he accompanied him on his return (ch. 20. 4). After the present notice, we learn only, from Col. 4. 10 and Philem. 24, that he remained with the apostle during his first Roman imprisonment.

3. Sidon—the well-known seaport on the coast of Phenicia. Julius treating Paul courteously — "perhaps he had heard him make his defence"—WESLEY.

His friends to refresh himself. The apostle no doubt knew that Christian brethren were to be found at Sidon. He had passed through with S. Barnabas on their return from their first victorious journey among the Gentiles (ch. 15. 3). (Ch. 24. 23; 28. 16.)

4. We sailed under Cyprus—"leaving it on the left hand"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Under the lee of Cyprus." "How strangely must S. Paul, at the close of his missionary course, have contemplated this island, in which he had gathered the first-fruits of his harvest"—L.

5. Myra, a city of Lycia—a flourishing port, distant twenty stadia from the sea, on a navigable river.

6. A ship of Alexandria. "Egypt was at that time the granary of Italy. Corn was usually shipped thence in vessels of great size. The same westerly winds which hindered S. Paul's progress from Cæsarea to Myra had probably caused the Alexandrian ship to stand to the north"—C. H.

7. "Cnidus was a cape and city of Caria"—WESLEY.

Sailed slowly many days. Kept back by the same head winds, they only made 130 miles in "many days." Under Crete (R.V. "Under the lee of Crete"), now Candia.

8. Hardly passing it (R.V. "With difficulty coasting along it"). The Fair Havens still retain the name; but the city of Lasea is now utterly lost, together with many more of the hundred cities, for which Crete was once so renowned"—WESLEY.

"The Fair Havens." "This place, though mentioned nowhere else in literature, is known by the same name still. It is four or five miles east of Capa Matala. The ruins of Lasea were discovered in 1856, a few miles eastward"—C. B.

9. When much time was spent—"waiting for a change of wind, and debating what course should next be taken"—C. B. The fast—"or day of atonement, was kept on the tenth of Tisrî, that is, the twenty-fifth of September (Lev. 23. 27, 29). This was to them an ill time of sailing; not only because winter was approaching, but also because of the sudden storms which are still common in the Mediterranean, at that time of year. Paul exhorted them—not to leave Crete. Even in external things, faith exerts itself with the greatest presence of mind and readiness of advice"—WESLEY.

"The Greeks and Romans were ignorant of the use of the compass; the instruments with which they took observations must have been rude compared with modern quadrants and sextants; and we have no reason to believe that their vessels were provided with nautical charts; and thus, when neither sun nor stars appeared, and the sky gave indications of danger, they hesitated to try the open sea"—C. H.

10. Saying to them—"to the centurion and other officers"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul had much experience in sailing on the Mediterranean, and had seen much more of peril by sea than we should gather from the Acts. Some time before this voyage to Rome, he wrote to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 11. 25), 'Thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day have I been in the deep.' The word I perceive implies personal observation only; he does not now speak as having received any supernatural communication. This is clear also from the end of the verse, where he speaks of hurt to the lives of those on board, which did not come to pass"—C. B.

11. The centurion regarded the master—"and indeed it is a general rule, believe an artificer in his own art. Yet when there is the greatest need, a real Christian will often advise even better than he"—WESLEY.

The centurion. "Hence it appears that Julius could have controlled the ship authorities if he had pleased. Probably the ship had been pressed into the service of the State, and the owner wished to finish the business as soon as possible"—W. W.

12. And because the haven—the Fair Havens—was not commodious to winter in. And this they would most likely have to do, wherever they stopped. Phenice (R.V. "Phœnix"). Which is a haven of Crete—"having a double opening, one to the south-west, the other to the north-west"—WESLEY.

R.V. "Looking north-east and south-east"; Greek—"Down the south-west wind, and down the north-west wind." "Of course a north-west wind blows towards the south-east. The haven of Lutro answers these conditions, being open to the east"—C. B.

14. There rose against it—"the south wind—a tempestuous wind, called in those parts Euroclydon. This was a kind of hurricane, not carrying them any one way, but tossing them backward and forward. These furious winds are now called Levanters, and blow in all directions from the north-east to the south-east"—WESLEY.

R.V. "There beat down from it"—that is, down from Crete—"a tempestuous wind, called Euraquilo." This reading is supported by the oldest MSS. The word Euraquilo is a hybrid, half Greek and half Latin, and means a north-easter. The form Euroclydon gives it a look of being all Greek.

16. We were hardly able to get masters of the boat—"to prevent its being staved"—WESLEY.

"The boats were in general taken in tow, and in stormy weather would be in danger of being washed away. As soon as they gained the shelter of the little island, Clauda or Cauda, they set about hauling it on board, which they did not accomplish without much difficulty"—C. B.

17. Used helps—"strong cables, which were drawn several times round the hull, to help in keeping the timbers from parting. It is only in modern times, and especially since the use of iron in shipbuilding, that the process has been abandoned"—C. B. Fall into the quicksands (R.V. "Should be cast upon the Syrtis")—a large and dangerous quicksand on the African coast. Strake sail (R.V. "Lowered the gear").

18. They lightened the ship—"casting the heavy goods into the sea"—WESLEY.

R.V. "They began to throw the freight overboard." The ship was probably carrying corn, and if so the load would be a heavy one, and its removal a great relief to the labouring vessel.

19. We cast out the tackling of the ship—"cutting away even those masts that were not absolutely necessary"—WESLEY.

"The word is closely akin to that translated 'gear' (ver. 17, R.V.). It seems to mean all that could be removed from the deck and hull"—C. B. (Jonah 1. 5.)

20. Neither sun nor stars appeared for many days—"which they could the less spare before the compass was found out"—WESLEY.

In a modern ship, however dark the weather might be, there would be always a light in the binnacle, and the ship's course would be known. In an ancient vessel under such circumstances they had no means of knowing in what direction they were being carried.

21. After long abstinence (R.V. "When they had been long without food"). "Partly the impossibility of cooking food properly, and partly the constant exertion, and the mental distress, prevented them from coming to meals"—L. This loss—"which is before your eyes"—WESLEY.

22. No loss of any man's life. "He now speaks in the confidence of a revelation. In ver. 10 he had reasoned from the probabilities of the case"—C. B.

23. The angel of God (R.V. "An angel of the God")—whose I am, and whom I serve. "How short a compendium of religion! yet how full! comprehending both faith, hope, and love"—WESLEY.

S. Paul is addressing heathens, some of whom had perhaps been calling in their trouble on their idols. Compare the language of Jonah among the heathen sailors in a storm. (Jonah 1. 9.) (Ch. 23. 11; Dan. 6. 16; Rom. 1. 9; 2 Tim. 1. 3.)

24. God hath given. "S. Paul had prayed for them; and God gave him their lives, perhaps their souls also. And the centurion, subserving the providence of God, gave to S. Paul the lives of the prisoners. How wonderfully does His providence reign in the most contingent things! And rather will many bad men be preserved with a few good (so it frequently happens), than one good man perish with many bad. So it was in this ship; so it is in the world. Thee. At such a time as this there was not the same danger, which might otherwise have been, of S. Paul's seeming to speak out of vanity what he really spoke out of necessity. All the souls—not only all the prisoners, as Julius afterwards did (ver. 43). Ask for souls; they shall be given thee; yea, more than thou hopest for. That sail with thee—so that S. Paul, in the sight of God, was the master and pilot of the ship"—WESLEY.

25. I believe God. "He implies, I would have you do so too. In the midst of danger, few things could be more inspiriting than such an address. And by this time all in the ship must have learned that in S. Paul they had no common prisoner"—C. B. (Luke 1. 45; Rom. 4. 20, 21; 2 Tim. 1. 12.)

26. A certain island—not on any part of the continent of Europe or of Africa; so much appears to have been made known to him by the angel. (Ch. 28. 1.)

27. The fourteenth night—"since they left Crete (vers. 18, 19). In the Adriatic Sea—so the ancients called all that part of the Mediterranean which lay south of Italy"—WESLEY.

The shipmen deemed (R.V. "surmised"). The roar of breakers is a peculiar sound, which can be detected by a practised ear, even amid the howling of the wind and all the other noises of the storm.

28. They sounded . . . twenty fathoms . . . fifteen fathoms. Modern seamen use the lead as carefully as their predecessors. The rapid decrease in the depth of the water showed them that they would soon be ashore.

29. Fearing lest (R.V. "lest haply we should be cast ashore on rocky ground"). Out of the stern. If they had anchored by the bow, there was good ground for apprehending that the vessel would have swung round and gone on the rocks. Wished (or prayed) for the day. "A remark that hardly would have been made except by one who was present, and retained a vivid recollection of the length of that night, and the terrors of that darkness"—W. W.

30. The sailors were attempting to flee out of the ship—"supposing the boat would go more safely over the shallows"—WESLEY.

"The sailors doubtless considered the ship to be in such a woeful plight, that they feared it would not last the night. They also feared that the coast might be of such a nature, that the ship might not be able to be run ashore without being dashed to pieces. Therefore they endeavoured to escape in the boat, leaving the ship and its company to their fate"—L.

31. Unless these mariners abide in the ship. "Without them ye know not how to manage her. Ye cannot be saved. He does not say we; that they would not have regarded. The soldiers were not careful for the lives of the prisoners; nor was S. Paul careful for his own. We may learn hence, to use the most proper means for security and success, even while we depend on Divine providence, and wait for the accomplishment of God's own promise. He never designed any promise should encourage rational creatures to act in an irrational manner; or to remain inactive when He has given them natural capacities of doing something, at least, for their own benefit. To expect the accomplishment of any promise, without exerting these, is at best vain and dangerous presumption, if all pretence of relying upon it be not profane hypocrisy"—WESLEY.

The centurion and soldiers were now willing to obey every admonition of S. Paul; and they were strong enough to take the matter into their own hands.

33. While the day was coming on. S. Paul urges them now to take a proper meal, that when the time for work arrives they may be in a condition to undertake it. Note the character of the man, inured to perils, and fortified by habitual faith in God—"serene amidst alarms." Ye continue fasting, having taken nothing—"no regular meal; through a deep sense of their extreme danger. Let us not wonder then if men, who have a deep sense of the extreme danger of everlasting death, for a time forget even to eat their bread, or to attend their worldly affairs. Much less let us censure that as madness, which may be the beginning of true wisdom"—WESLEY.

34. Take some meat (R.V. "food"). This is for your preservation—"that ye may be the better able to swim to shore"—WESLEY.

There shall not a hair fall. The phrase was proverbial for complete deliverance. (1 Kings 1. 52; Matt. 10. 30; Luke 12. 7; 21. 18.)

35. He gave thanks to God in the presence of them all. This was our Lord's constant practice, and had now become general among Christians. (Rom. 14. 6; 1 Cor. 10. 30, 31; 1

Tim. 4. 3, 4.) By this the apostle made open profession of his belief and trust in God, as the Giver of all good things as well as the Disposer of all events. (1 Sam. 9. 13; Matt. 15. 36; Mark 8. 6; John 6. 11.)

36. Then were they all encouraged—"by his example, as well as words"—WESLEY.

They also partook of food, and made themselves ready for the labour which awaited them.

37. Two hundred threescore and sixteen souls. "The occasion of the numbering was probably the near expectation of coming ashore; it was needful to have all told, for the captain in respect of the crew, and for the centurion, that of all his prisoners and soldiers none might be allowed to escape or be missing. The mention of the number at this point of the history is one of the many very natural features of the narrative"—C. B. (Ch. 2. 41; 7. 14; Rom. 13. 1; 1 Pet. 3. 20.)

38. Casting out the wheat. "So firmly did they now depend on what S. Paul had said"—WESLEY.

Having refreshed themselves they cast out as much of the remaining cargo (wheat from Egypt) as they could, to enable them by the lighter draught of water to run into any small harbour, or at least to come closer to the dry land. This work would occupy some time; and when it was accomplished the day had dawned, and the land was visible.

39. They did not know the land—"which they saw near them; having a level shore"—WESLEY.

R.V. "They perceived a certain bay with a beach, and took counsel whether they could drive the ship upon it."

40. Taken up the anchors (R.V. "Casting off the anchors they left them in the sea"). Loosed the rudder bands. "Their ships had frequently two rudders, one on each side. These were fastened while they let the ship drive; but were now loosened, when they had need of them to steer her into the creek"—WESLEY.

Hoised the mainsail (R.V. "Hoisting up the foresail"). The mainsail was probably gone; in any case, with the wind dead on shore, the foresail was the best for their purpose.

41. A place where two seas met—"probably by reason of a sand-bank running parallel with the shore"—WESLEY.

"This is one of the features in the narrative by which the locality can almost certainly be identified. The little island of Salmonetta forms, with the coast near S. Paul's Bay, exactly such a position as is here described. From the sea, at a little distance, it appears as though the land were continuous, and the current between the island and the mainland is only discovered on a nearer approach. This current by its deposits has raised a mud bank, and into this bank, just where the current meets the sea waves, was the ship driven, the force of the water preventing the vessel from reaching the beach just beyond. So, though they got much nearer the shore than at first, yet after all they had to swim for their lives"—C. B. "So they suffered shipwreck almost in the harbour, teaching us never to be secure"—B. (2 Cor. 11. 25.)

42. The counsel—"cruel, unjust, ungrateful"—WESLEY.

But not unnatural, considering that under the Roman law they were answerable with their own lives for prisoners entrusted to them. And it may be doubted how far the private soldiers would know their obligations to S. Paul.

43. The centurion willing (R.V. "desiring to save"). He could not fail to feel a degree of admiration for his prisoner, after all that he had seen of him, whether in the audience-chamber of Agrippa and Festus, or on the deck of the storm-tossed merchantman, the same fearless, godly, ready-witted man. Kept them—the verb is more forcible (R.V. "stayed them"). "He was in full command of his men, and had not lost his own presence of mind in the confusion"—C. B.

44. They escaped all safe to land—"and some of them doubtless received the apostle as a teacher sent from God. These would find their deliverance from the fury of the sea but an earnest of an infinitely greater deliverance; and are, long ere this, lodged with him in a more peaceful harbour than Malta, or than earth could afford"—WESLEY.

"A learned Englishman, Smith of Jordanhill, in his work entitled The Voyage and Shipwreck of S. Paul, has thrown much light upon this chapter. In particular, he has shown in the clearest manner, that the author of the narrative could not be himself a sailor, as his language on nautical matters is not that of a professional man; and also, still more certainly, both from the narrative of the proceedings in the ship itself, and from the geographical details interwoven with it, that he must have been an eye-witness, inasmuch as a man who was not professionally acquainted with nautical affairs could not possibly have composed a description of such a voyage, so consistent in all its parts, unless he described it from his own experience and actual observation"—L.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Vers. 1-16. PROCEEDINGS AT MALTA, AND JOURNEY TO ROME.—1. Melita—"or Malta, is about twelve miles broad, twenty long, and sixty distant from Sicily to the south. It yields abundance of honey (whence its name was taken), with much cotton; and is very fruitful, though it has only three feet depth of earth above the solid rock. The Emperor Charles the Fifth gave it, in 1530, to the knights of Rhodes, driven out of Rhodes by the Turks. They are a thousand in number, of whom five hundred always reside on the island"—WESLEY.

In the year 1798 the French, under Bonaparte, took the island; and in 1800 it was captured by the English, under whose dominion it still remains. (Ch. 27. 26.)

2. The barbarous people. "So called in reference to their language, because they spoke neither Greek nor Latin. The expression did not in any degree imply moral barbarism, or even want of culture"—L. "'And the barbarians'—so the Romans and Greeks termed all nations but their own. But surely the generosity shown by these uncultivated inhabitants of Malta was far more valuable than all the varnish which the politest education could give, where it taught not humanity and compassion"—WESLEY.

Received us every one—took us under their care. At first their hospitality was shown by kind treatment on the beach, and by lighting a fire. Afterwards, as the stay was of three months' duration, the sailors and prisoners would find quarters in the dwellings of the natives. S. Paul, the centurion, and some others, were received for a time at least into the house of the chief magistrate. (Rom. 1. 14; 1 Cor. 14. 11; Col. 3. 11.)

3. A viper out of the heat. "The creature had been benumbed by the cold. There are no vipers now in Malta; it is well known that in proportion as woods are cleared, and the cultivation of the soil is increased, poisonous reptiles disappear. And there is perhaps nowhere a surface of equal extent which is so completely cultivated, and in so artificial a state, as Malta in the present day"—L.

4. And when the barbarians saw . . . they said—"seeing also his chains—Doubtless this man is a murderer. Such rarely go unpunished even in this life. Whom vengeance hath not suffered to live—they look upon him as a dead man already. It is with pleasure we trace among these barbarians the force of conscience, and the belief of a particular Providence, which some people of more learning have stupidly thought it philosophy to despise. But they erred in imagining that calamities must always be interpreted as judgments. Let us guard against this, lest like them we condemn not only the innocent, but 'the excellent of the earth'"—WESLEY.

5. Having shaken off the venomous animal, he suffered no harm. "The words of an eminent modern historian are, 'No venomous kind of serpent now breeds in Malta, neither hurts if it be brought thither from another place. Children are seen there handling and playing even with scorpions: I have seen one eating them.' If this be so, it seems to be fixed by the wisdom of God, as an eternal memorial of what He once wrought there"—WESLEY. (Mark 16. 18; Luke 10. 19.)

6. They changed their minds, and said he was a god. "Such is the stability of human reason! A little before he was a murderer; and, presently, he is a god. Just as the people of Lystra—one hour sacrificing, and the next stoning. Nay, but there is a medium. He is neither a murderer nor a god, but a man of God. But natural men never run into greater mistakes than in judging of the children of God"—WESLEY.

"The multitude know no moderation; it either exalts one to heaven, or thrusts him down to hell. Here the apostle went very impressively through honour and dishonour. At one moment he was a murderer, in the next he is called a god. But it is remarkable that the passage does not suggest the slightest emotion which the one or the other produced on S. Paul. Thus it must be with us, through the grace of God. We must not be easily affected, either by the world's smiles or frowns"—L. (Ch. 14. 11.)

7. The chief man of the island—"in wealth, if not in power also." Three days—"the first three days of our stay in the island"—WESLEY.

The word translated chief indicates office and authority. Two inscriptions have been discovered in Malta, one in Greek, and the other in Latin, which contained the same title, a title which is not known to have been used anywhere excepting in Malta. Thus an additional corroboration is given to S. Luke's narrative.

8. A fever and a bloody flux (R.V. "dysentery"). "The expressions are technical, and are such as a physician, as S. Luke is reported to have been, would be likely to use"—C. B. "The miracle might be said to be an ordinary one; yet the apostle proceeds to a formal act of prayer before performing it. The reason for this may be found in the prevalent opinion as to his divinity, which he wished to counteract"—W. W.

9. Others also (R.V. "The rest also"). "During the three months of their stay, all who were in sickness, and who heard of what had been done for the father of the chief magistrate, came to be cured"—C. B. (Jas. 5. 14, 15; Mark 6. 5; 7. 32; 16. 18; Luke 4. 40; ch. 19. 11, 12; 1 Cor. 12. 9, 28.)

10. Honoured us with many honours. "The word includes presents as well as demonstrations of respect. S. Paul neither preached nor worked miracles for hire, yet it would seem that he accepted the offerings of the people of Malta, as he did those of the Philippians"—W. W.

They laded us (R.V. "They put on board such things as we needed"). They had lost everything in the shipwreck.

11. And after three months—"which time S. Paul doubtless improved, as a true labourer in the Lord's vineyard"—B. Whose sign was. "It was the custom of the ancients to have images on the head of their ships, from which they took their names. Castor and Pollux—two heathen gods who were thought favourable to mariners"—WESLEY.

R.V. "The Twin Brothers." The Greek is

Dioscuri, the name given to Jupiter's twin sons, born of Leda, who were translated to heaven and became the constellation Gemini.

13. Fetched a compass (R.V. "Made a circuit"). "Either following the bend of the coast, or, more probably, tacking on account of the wind"—W. W.

14. Puteoli, where we found brethren—"that is, there was a Christian church established at Puteoli, and so far well known, that the apostle on his arrival at once heard of its existence. Of course, in such a place as Puteoli the Jews were likely to congregate for the sake of trade; and from their body the earliest converts to Christianity must have been made. But that, without any previously recorded visit of an apostle, there should already be in Puteoli a numerous band of Christians, is evidence of the zeal with which the new faith was being propagated. For it was now only about twenty-eight years since the death of Jesus"—C. B. "Though it is probable there were but few brethren at Puteoli, yet S. Paul found them out; either they heard of him, or he inquired them out; but as it were by instinct, they got together. Brethren in Christ should find out one another, and keep up communion with each other, as those of the same country do in a foreign land"—M. H. Tarry seven days. "It seems strange that they were permitted to remain so long there, at the request of their Christian friends. But as the whole ship's company landed here, it is probable it was convenient for the centurion to wait till he could arrange, or receive orders, for his passage to Rome"—W. W.

15. The brethren—"that is, the Christians—came out thence to meet us. It is remarkable that there is no certain account by whom Christianity was planted at Rome. Probably some inhabitants of that city were at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (ch. 2. 10), and being then converted themselves carried the gospel thither at their return. Appii Forum was a town fifty-one miles from Rome; The Three Taverns about thirty. He took courage. He saw Christ was at Rome also, and now forgot all the troubles of his journey"—WESLEY.

"The gratitude and encouragement which S. Paul manifested in speech and look, so as to be noted by his companion and biographer, he frequently expressed as arising from the same cause, the fidelity and Christian charity of believers. (Rom. 1. 8; Eph. 1. 15, 16; Phil. 1. 3, 5; Col. 1. 3, 4; 1 Thess. 3. 6–10.) On this occasion he doubtless met many of those who are mentioned in Rom. 16, written three years before"—W. W. "How would the hearts of the apostle and his companions beat, in anxious expectation, when the heathen imperial city, with its cupolas and battlements, lay before their eyes! But also, how would the heart of Cæsar, in his palace, have beat if he could have imagined that at this hour, in the form of a Jewish prisoner, a power entered the gates, before which the Roman empire and the heathen world was to sink into dust!"—L.

16. With the soldier—"to whom he was chained, as the Roman custom was"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul entered Rome by the Appian Way, through the Porta Capena, from which the Prætorian camp lay not far distant on the east. He was permitted to dwell by himself, not only apart from other prisoners, but in a private dwelling, doubtless in the immediate neighbourhood of the Prætorium. This favour he probably owed to the information sent with him by Festus, as well as to the personal influence of the centurion Julius"—L. (Ch. 24. 25; 27. 3.)

Vers. 17–31. PAUL IN ROME—INTERVIEW WITH LEADING JEWS—REMAINS A PRISONER.—17. And after three days—"given to rest and prayer—Paul called the chief of the Jews together. He always sought the Jews first; but, being now bound, he could not so conveniently go round to them. Though I have done nothing. Seeing him chained they might have suspected he had, therefore he first obviates this suspicion"—WESLEY.

"The decree of Claudius, by which the Jews were banished from Rome (ch. 18. 2), was evidently no longer enforced. S. Paul had reason to suppose that they might be offended, and prejudiced against him, when they heard that he had appealed from the courts in Judea to Cæsar; and he judged it would be proper for him to make an apology to them for so doing; and in order to prepare their minds for receiving the gospel, to suffer nothing to be wanting to assure them of the affectionate regard that he had for them"—B. (Ch. 24. 12, 13; 25. 8; 21. 33.)

18. Who would have let me go (R.V. "desired to set me at liberty"). Alluding evidently to Agrippa's remark (ch. 26. 32), and the statement of Festus (ch. 25. 25). (Ch. 22. 24; 24. 10; 25. 8; 26. 31.)

19. When the Jews opposed it. "He speaks tenderly of them, not mentioning their repeated attempts to murder him. Not that I had anything to accuse my nation of—not that I had any design to accuse others, but merely to defend myself"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul showed that his enemies were guilty of this very appeal to the foreign power, of which he had been suspected. He had committed no offence, yet his enemies had delivered him, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, into the hands of the Romans. So evidently unfounded was the accusation, that even the Roman governor had been ready to release him, but his Jewish enemies had opposed his liberation. They strove to keep a child of Israel in Roman chains. So that he was compelled, as his only hope of safety, to appeal unto Cæsar. He brought no accusation against his countrymen at the tribunal of the stranger; that was the deed of his antagonists"—C. H. (Ch. 25. 11.)

20. For the hope of Israel—"what Israel hopes for, namely, the Messiah and the resurrection"—WESLEY.

In Jesus, S. Paul believed that the expected Saviour had appeared, and for preaching this he had been attacked and made a prisoner. He held the same faith as all the Jews, only going farther than they, in that he believed the ancient promise was now fulfilled. We can see from the reply of the Jews that they understood his position exactly. (Ch. 26. 6, 7, 29; Eph. 3. 1; 4. 1; 6. 30; 2 Tim. 1. 16; 2. 9; Philem. 10, 13.)

21. We have neither received letters concerning thee. "There must have been a peculiar providence in this. Nor hath any of the brethren—the Jews—related—professedly, in a set discourse—or spoke—occasionally, in conversation—any evil of thee. How must the bridle then have been in their mouth!"—WESLEY.

"Before S. Paul's appeal, the heads of the Sanhedrim had no reason to write to the Jews in Rome about him, because this turn of events was completely unexpected by them; and after the appeal there was not sufficient time to inform the Roman Jews before the personal arrival of S. Paul, as his departure probably took place soon after his appeal. They do not say that they had heard nothing whatever of S. Paul; they had heard of Christianity, and of the disputes to which it gave rise; and assuredly must have heard of the preachers of the gospel, and of S. Paul in particular. What they affirm is only that they had heard nothing evil, nothing morally bad, of him"—L. Evidently they were not anxious to move in the matter of S. Paul's trial; they may have feared that anything which called the attention of the imperial government to the Jews might lead to a renewal of the edict of Claudius.

22. This sect we know is everywhere spoken against. "This is no proof at all of a bad cause, but a very probable mark of a good one"—WESLEY.

They knew Christianity as a new sect (ch. 24. 14), and they knew how violently their countrymen had opposed it; but they profess to have an open mind, and to desire such information as shall enable them to judge for themselves. (Luke 2. 34; ch. 24. 5, 14; 1 Pet. 2. 12; 4. 14.)

23. To whom he expounded, testifying the kingdom of God, and persuading them concerning Jesus. "These were his two grand topics—(1) that the kingdom of the Messiah was of a spiritual, not temporal, nature; (2) that Jesus of Nazareth was the very Person foretold as the Lord of that kingdom. On this head he had as much need to persuade as to convince, their will making as strong a resistance as their understanding"—WESLEY.

"In the early years of Nero, which were distinguished for a mild and lenient government of the empire, the Jews in Rome seem to have enjoyed complete toleration, and to have been a numerous, wealthy, and influential community"—C. H. "Their willingness to meet S. Paul gave him a great opportunity, which he endeavoured to use to the best advantage. He continued his discourse from morning till evening—probably eight or ten hours"—B. (Luke 24. 27; ch. 17. 3; 19. 8; 21. 6, 22.)

24. And some believed the things that were spoken — "with the heart as well as understanding"—WESLEY.

"The result was a division among the auditors, 'not peace, but a sword,' the division which has resulted ever since, when the truth of God has encountered, side by side, earnest conviction with worldly indifference, honest investigation with bigoted prejudice, trustful faith with the pride of scepticism"—C. H.

25. They agreed not among themselves. "No doubt the Sadducees and the Pharisees had their representatives here, as well as among the population of Jerusalem"—C. B. Well spake the Holy Ghost to your fathers — "which is equally applicable to you"—WESLEY.

One word. "After so many words, one more, but that a most weighty word"—L.

26. Hearing ye shall hear — that is, ye shall most surely hear—and shall not understand. "The words manifestly denote a judicial blindness, consequent upon a wilful and obstinate resistance of the truth. First they would not, afterwards they could not, believe"—WESLEY.

"We may observe here, that this passage of Isaiah is quoted oftener in the New Testament than any other taken from the Old, namely, no fewer than six times; and yet in such a variety of expression as proves that the apostles did not confine themselves exactly, either to the words of the original Hebrew or of the Greek version"—B. "This hardening of the heart is not only a natural consequence of long-continued rejection of Divine grace, but also a Divine judgment which befalls those who hold the truth in unrighteousness. We must preach this doctrine, but be on our guard that we do not speak harshly respecting God, or repel thereby darkened minds"—L. (Isa. 6. 9; Jer. 5. 21; Ezek. 12. 2; Matt. 13. 14, 15; Mark 4. 12; Luke 8. 10; John 12. 40; Rom. 11. 8.)

28. The salvation (R.V. "this salvation") of God is sent to the Gentiles — "namely, from this time. Before this no apostle had been at Rome. S. Paul was the first"—WESLEY.

They will hear it (R.V. "They will also hear"). "The apostle does not wish to convey a taunt to the Jews, that they come behind the Gentiles"—C. B. (Matt. 21. 41, 43; ch. 13. 46, 47; 18. 6; 22. 21; 26. 17, 18; Rom. 11. 11.)

29. Omitted in R.V.

30. And Paul continued two whole years. "After which this book was written, long before S. Paul's death, and was undoubtedly published, with his approbation, by S. Luke, who continued with him to the last. (2 Tim. 4. 11.) And received all that came to him—whether they were Jews or Gentiles. These two years completed twenty-five years after our Saviour's passion. Such progress had the gospel made by that time in the parts of the world which lay west of Jerusalem, by the ministry of S. Paul among the Gentiles. How far eastward the other apostles had carried it at the same time, history does not inform us"—WESLEY.

"Of these two years we have no history, except such as we can gather from the four epistles (Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon), which were written during this time. We know that from first to last the chain galled both his body and his mind (Eph. 3. 1; 4. 1; Phil. 1. 13, 16; Col. 4. 18; Philem. 1, 9, 10), and that his case was at times an object of much anxiety (Phil. 2. 23, 24). We also learn from the same letter that, beside S. Luke and Aristarchus (ch. 27. 27), he had also the fellowship, for some time at least, of Tychicus, who was the bearer of his letter to Ephesus, and of Timothy, whom he joins with himself in the greetings to the churches of Philippi and Colosse, and also in that to Philemon. Epaphroditus came with the Philippian contributions to his relief. (Phil. 4. 18.) Onesimus found out S. Paul when, in flight from his master, he made his way to Rome. (Col. 4. 9; Philem. 10.) Mark, the nephew of Barnabas, and Jesus, called Justus, were with him for a while. Last of all, Demas was there, soon to be mentioned as having forsaken the good way through love of this present world. (Col. 4. 14; 2 Tim. 4. 10.) More than this, and the few words in this verse, we do not know of this first imprisonment"—C. B. In his own hired house (R.V. "dwelling"). "The means for such hiring were provided by the liberality of the Philippians and others. With one hand always chained to a soldier he could no longer minister even to his own necessities"—C. B.

31. No man forbidding him. "Such was the victory of the word of God. Whilst S. Paul was preaching at Rome, the gospel shone with its highest lustre. Here, therefore, the Acts of the Apostles end; and end with great advantage. Otherwise S. Luke could easily have continued his narrative to the apostle's death"—WESLEY.

INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF S. PAUL'S EPISTLES.

HIS LIFE.

THE exact date of S. Paul's birth cannot be determined. It probably took place, however, about the same time as the birth of our Lord. His father was a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin, a Pharisee, and at the same time a Roman citizen. He resided at Tarsus, then one of the three great academies of the world. The name Paul was probably bestowed upon the future apostle in infancy, for use in the Gentile world; while his circumcision name was Saul, after the first king (himself a Benjamite). It will be remembered that the latter name is used in the New Testament, whenever its owner stands before us as the champion of Judaism, and that, as soon as he is transformed into the Apostle of the Gentiles, his Gentile name takes its place. When about thirteen years of age, he was sent to Jerusalem to study under Gamaliel, the greatest Pharisee of the time. Young Saul proved himself an apt pupil, soon making some acquaintance with Greek poetry and philosophy, as well as mastering the rabbinical learning of the day. And with his lessons he imbibed the particularism and bigotry of the Pharisaic sect to such an extent that when, years afterwards, the Christian faith began to spread in Jerusalem, "beyond measure he persecuted the Church of God, and made havoc of it." He was elected a member of the great Sanhedrim, and when S. Stephen was stoned and killed, "Saul was consenting unto his death." This part of his life is described by his own pen in Gal. 1. 13–14; Phil. 3. 4–6.

It was while journeying to Damascus (about A.D. 36) for the express purpose of exterminating Christianity that he was led to embrace it. The risen Lord appeared to him, and broke his heart with the tender reproach, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" (See the account in Acts, ch. 9.) His conversion was conscious, thorough, permanent. Saul the Pharisee had become Paul the Christian. He received the sacrament of baptism, and then withdrew, that prolonged meditation and frequent intercourse with God might fit him for his life-work, to the fastnesses of Sinai. And where God had delivered the precepts of the Law to Moses, He revealed the inmost meaning of the gospel to Paul. Returning to Damascus, he at once plunged into his work. But very naturally the indignation of the Jews stirred up persecution against him, and he was compelled to escape from the city, "being let down in a basket by the wall." Making his way to Jerusalem, his friend Barnabas introduced him to Peter and James, but after a fortnight he was again compelled to flee, rather than fall a prey to assassins. Having revisited Tarsus, he laboured for at least three years as a missionary in Cilicia. Then, with Barnabas, he helped to build up a strong Church of Gentile believers in Antioch, where "the disciples were first called Christians." From Antioch, after a flying visit to Jerusalem with alms for the poor saints there, the two friends set out on their first great missionary tour, partially described by S. Luke in Acts (chaps. 13, 14). Some time after their return to Antioch, there came down from Jerusalem certain Pharisaic Christians, insisting that Gentile converts should submit to circumcision. To S. Paul the granting of such a demand meant disloyalty to the spirit of the gospel, and he therefore proceeded to Jerusalem with Titus and Barnabas, and obtained a settlement of the question. (See the notes on Gal. chaps. 1, 2, in this Commentary for a fuller account and explanation.) S. Paul's victory on this occasion was not, however, an unmixed happiness to him, as it brought down upon his head the hatred of a strong party in the Church, which never wholly abated. Even when he lay a prisoner at Rome, these persecutors strove to "raise up affliction for him in his bonds."

About A.D. 52 the apostle started on his second missionary tour. A difference of opinion with Barnabas led each of the two friends to choose an independent course. Hence S. Paul's travelling companion on this occasion was Silas (or Silvanus). For an account of this journey, see Acts, chaps. 16–18. It is memorable for S. Paul's meeting with Timothy, and more especially for the first planting of Christianity in Europe. Another fact of great importance is, that while on this tour (during his stay in Corinth) S. Paul wrote the Epistles to the Thessalonians.

The third missionary tour was undertaken about A.D. 55. (See Acts, chaps. 18, 19, 20.) Passing through Galatia and Phrygia, he reached Ephesus, and laboured there about three years with power and great success. Shortly before this period expired, sad news from Corinth drew from him the First Epistle to the Corinthians. From Ephesus, also, he wrote his great letter to the Galatians. Shortly afterwards, when in Macedonia, he wrote the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, and at Corinth composed the most comprehensive of all his writings, the Epistle to the Romans. After various labours and adventures he reached Jerusalem in A.D. 59, where he narrowly escaped death in the Temple (Acts 21, etc.). Conveyed as a prisoner to Cæsarea, Felix at once heard his case, but, hoping to receive a bribe, left the apostle in prison for two years, without coming to a decision. (Some scholars date the letters to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon from this Cæsarean captivity, but others from the subsequent Roman captivity.) Felix being succeeded by the far worthier Festus, S. Paul was heard again.

But justice was still withheld. The prisoner, therefore, appealed to the emperor, and in the autumn of A.D. 61 was taken on board ship for Rome. The ship was wrecked, and the rescued crew wintered at Malta. Reaching Rome in the spring of 62, S. Paul, in the hired lodging he was allowed to occupy, spent two whole years in ceaseless efforts to spread the truth. With his unfailing and joyous faith he would have it that his captivity was providentially ordained. "My affairs," he told the Philippians, "have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel." With tongue and pen he laboured bravely and believingly on to extend Christ's empire. No one but S. Paul could have written the light-hearted Epistle to the Philippians, with the chain confining him at the very moment of greatest opportunity. What the sequel to his imprisonment and trial may have been we do not know. S. Luke never wrote his projected continuation of the Acts, or if he did it has not been preserved. But it is fairly safe to conclude that his appeal was favourably received, and that he was liberated. There is a tradition, with some show of plausibility, that he worked in Spain; and another tradition, quite without support, that he also visited England. Probably the true account of these after-years is, that he revisited his first plantings, performing such labours of organisation as are implied in First Timothy and Titus, written during this period. In 66 he was again a captive at Rome,—this time in a dungeon,—whence he wrote Second Timothy, the last of his immortal Epistles. About 67, Nero being emperor, he won the martyr's crown "without the gate" at Rome.

HIS WORK.

The story of S. Paul's life is also the story of his work. Both before and after his conversion he threw himself heart and soul into the performance of what he believed to be his duty.

Always excepting the God-Man, no one has so influenced the course of history as S. Paul. His conversion, sound and thorough, from a persecutor of Christ to a disciple, did more than any other one thing to authenticate Christianity, and to compel the attention of the Jews to its claims. Under God, his adamantine firmness in the great controversy respecting circumcision, saved the gospel from being blighted by Jewish particularism, and secured to it the qualities essential to a universal religion. His missionary labours, persevered in through long years of hardship and persecution, form the most fascinating, the most momentous, and the most successful campaign in all history. To S. Paul Europe owes Christ. But for his faith and zeal and breadth of view, Christianity would probably have remained for centuries just one more Oriental religion. And, like John Wesley, who resembled him in many particulars, he was not only a great missionary, but a great administrator and organiser. He was a pastor as well as a preacher. But S. Paul's most signal service to the Church was his work as a thinker. He was the first to apprehend and expound the inmost significance of the teaching of Christ. The Epistles he wrote are monuments of his greatness, far more precious and enduring than even the Churches which he founded. With the exception of the Gospels no writings have so profoundly influenced human thought and conduct. And this influence has been continually increasing. Almost all the revivals of Church life since apostolic times have coincided with the republication of the most characteristic doctrines of S. Paul. The Protestant Reformation and the Evangelical Revival are striking cases in point. But the Epistles properly belong to the next section.

HIS WRITINGS: AND HOW TO READ THEM.

Whoever would understand and profit by the writings of S. Paul must bear in mind the circumstances of their origin. Although, as for instance in Romans, they abound in elaborate arguments, or, as in Ephesians, they present us with the deepest meanings of divine truth, they are all truly and properly letters. None of them are mere treatises. S. Paul never wrote a compendium of Christian theology. But the exigencies of Church life and of doctrinal controversy drew from him Epistles in which all the Christian doctrines are set forth in turn; and of these Epistles all orthodox compendiums will be mainly the systematic exposition. Necessity was laid upon S. Paul to write letters as well as to preach sermons, and in reading them we are reading the greatest thoughts of the greatest thinker who has ever lived.

In studying these wonderful letters it will be best to use a Bible printed in paragraphs. The division into short verses makes it often difficult to follow the course of the argument. The paragraphing of the Revised Version is in almost all cases correctly executed and exceedingly helpful. And, although it may seem a small point, let the type be as large as the student can afford. Many Christians persist in using editions of the Scriptures with almost microscopical letters, and are then distressed because they have not enjoyed the exercise; often going on to believe they must be in a low state of grace or they would enjoy their Bibles more. A paragraph Bible, with large clear type having been secured, the reader of S. Paul's Epistles should study them in the following order:—

First Group, ...	1 and 2 Thessalonians.
Second Group, ...	1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Romans.
Third Group, ...	Colossians, Ephesians, Philemon, Philippians.
Fourth Group, ...	1 Timothy, Titus, 2 Timothy.

According to some scholars, the order of the letters in the second and third groups is somewhat different from the above, but the student who wishes to trace the development of S. Paul's philosophy, theology, ethics, and Church polity cannot do better than take them in the order given. God was continually teaching S. Paul more and more of His truth, and the Epistle to the Ephesians, for example, is consequently much richer and fuller than those to the Thessalonians. The order of the Authorised and most other Versions is unfortunate.

The next point to be borne in mind is the necessity of understanding the circumstances of each Epistle's birth. As soon as we know when, where, to whom, and why S. Paul wrote it, we shall be in a position to enjoy and explain chapters which would else be barren and obscure. As furnishing the historical background and connection we most strongly recommend an admirable and inexpensive little Manual by Rev. G. G. Findlay, B.A.—The Epistles of Paul the Apostle (2s. 6d., C. H. Kelly). This should be always at hand.

One other hint. Except for a striking verse here and there, the reader who "dips" will get very little from S. Paul. His writings must be prayerfully, patiently, honestly worked at, before they will yield their secrets up. It will not do to run through stray chapters here and there. Each letter must be perseveringly studied as a whole, beginning at the very beginning and searching on to the very end. It cannot be denied that there will be much to discourage. S. Paul's style is difficult—sometimes very difficult. It is often a speaking rather than a writing style, and hence he occasionally begins a sentence and forgets to finish it. Sometimes before one thought has done expressing itself another pushes it unceremoniously aside. Our brother Paul has indeed written many things hard to be understood. But an unfailing resoluteness to know the truth, and above all the aid of the illuminating Spirit, will unveil the holy mystery of the ages, enshrined in these precious writings, to all who are pure in heart.

HIS DOCTRINE.

The limits assigned to this Introduction forbid any detailed account of S. Paul's teaching. But such an account, if given, could only supplement and not replace the patient study urged in the last section. Here it must suffice to say that S. Paul's doctrine is broadly at one with the theology of Protestantism in general, and that it is in very striking accord with the theology of Methodism in particular. The vindication of the latter assertion is found in the fact that both the Pauline and the Methodist teaching are pre-eminently experimental. To S. Paul, as to Methodism, Christianity was not a round of priestly rites, or a scholastic set of propositions, but a conscious spiritual life, a wonderful personal experience. And the doctrine is just a clear statement of the contents of that experience, with all the causes, results, and implications. S. Paul's doctrines of repentance, faith, sanctification, the witness of the Spirit, were drawn from his own experience of these things. Before his conversion he had "gone about to establish his own righteousness," relying on this, and on his descent from Abraham, for salvation; at his conversion he had seen the crucified and risen Son of God; after his conversion he tasted all the privileges of Christian life and service; and, guided by the Holy Spirit, he wrought out all these experiences into his characteristic doctrines of justification by faith, salvation for the Gentiles, the power of the resurrection, the person of Christ, the design of the Law, and all those other great doctrines we associate with his name. This relation of his theology to his experience will, if borne constantly in mind, vastly help the reader. It will also explain the conspicuous failure to reconcile their teachings with the Epistles, on the one hand, of those who would reduce Christianity to a barren sacerdotalism, and on the other hand of those who would regard it as nothing more than a system of moral precepts. To S. Paul, as to his Master, "the kingdom of God is within" us.

To those who wish to acquaint themselves more fully with S. Paul's doctrine, we warmly commend the careful and lucid Commentaries of Dr. J. A. Beet.

[It is hoped that the readers of this volume will use it as a stepping-stone to larger and more elaborate works. In addition to the writings of Professors Findlay and Beet, already referred to, we therefore recommend The Life of S. Paul, by Rev. James Stalker (1s. 6d., T. & T. Clark); The Life and Epistles of S. Paul, by Conybeare & Howson (3s. 6d., Longmans), and the volumes on S. Paul's Epistles in the Cambridge Bible (2s., 2s. 6d., and 3s. 6d. per vol., University Press). The expenditure for these scholarly yet readable works may be, as the study of them must be, spread over several years, and it will then be very little felt even by the slenderest purse.]

THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

"MANY of the writings of the New Testament are written in the form of Epistles. Such are not only those of Paul, James, Peter, Jude, but also both the treatises of Luke, and all the writings of John. Nay, we have seven Epistles herein which the Lord Jesus Himself sent by the hand of John to the seven churches; yea, the whole Revelation is no other than an Epistle from Him.

"S. Paul writes in a very different manner to those churches which he had planted himself, and to those who had not seen his face in the flesh. In his letters to the former, a loving or sharp familiarity appears, as their behaviour was more or less suitable to the gospel. To the latter, he proposes the pure, unmixed gospel, in a more general and abstract manner.

"As to the time wherein he wrote his Epistles, it is probable he wrote about the year of Christ, according to the common reckoning.[1]

"That S. Paul wrote this Epistle from Corinth we may learn from his commending to the Romans, Phebe, a servant of the church of Cenchrea (ch. 16. 1), a port of Corinth; and from his mentioning the salutations of Caius and Erastus (ch. 16. 23), who were both Corinthians.

[1] The following dates are probably more correct than those given by Mr. Wesley:—53, Thessalonians; 58, 59, Corinthians, Galatians, Romans; 62–64, Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians, Philippians; 66, Timothy and Titus.

Those to whom he wrote seem to have been chiefly foreigners, both Jews and Gentiles, whom business drew from other provinces; as appears, both by his writing in Greek, and by his salutations of several former acquaintance.

"His chief design herein is to show—1. That neither the Gentiles by the law of nature, nor the Jews by the Law of Moses, could obtain justification before God; and that therefore it was necessary for both to seek it from the free mercy of God, by faith. 2. That God has an absolute right to show mercy on what terms He pleases, and to withhold it from those who will not accept it on His own terms.

"The apostle labours throughout to fix in those to whom he writes a deep sense of the excellency of the gospel, and to engage them to act suitably to it. For this purpose, after a general salutation (ch. 1. 1–7), and profession of his affection for them (vers. 8–15), he declares he shall not be ashamed openly to maintain the gospel at Rome, seeing it is the powerful instrument of salvation, both to Jews and Gentiles, by means of faith (vers. 16, 17). And, in order to demonstrate this, he shows:—

"1. That the world greatly needed such a dispensation, the Gentiles being in a most abandoned state (vers. 18–32), and the Jews, though condemning others, being themselves no better (ch. 2. 1–29), as, notwithstanding some cavils, which he obviates (ch. 3. 1–8), their own Scriptures testify (vers. 9–19). So that all were under a necessity of seeking justification by this method (vers. 20–31).

"2. That Abraham and David themselves sought justification by faith and not by works (ch. 4. 1–25).

"3. That all who believe are brought into so happy a state, as turns the greatest afflictions into matter of joy (ch. 5. 1–11).

"4. That the evils brought on mankind by Adam are abundantly recompensed to all that believe in Christ (vers. 12–21).

"5. That, far from dissolving the obligations to practical holiness, the gospel increases them by peculiar obligations (ch. 6. 1–23).

"In order to convince them of these things the more deeply, and to remove their fondness for the Mosaic Law, now they were married to Christ by faith in Him (ch. 7. 1–6), he shows how unable the motives of the Law were to produce that holiness which believers obtain by a living faith in the gospel (ch. 7. 7–25; 8. 1, 2), and then gives a more particular view of those things which rendered the gospel effectual to this great end (vers. 3–39).

"That even the Gentiles, if they believed, should have a share in these blessings, and that the Jews, if they believed not, should be excluded from them, being a point of great importance, the apostle bestows the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters in settling it. He begins the ninth chapter by expressing his tender love and high esteem for the Jewish nation (vers. 1–5), and then shows:—

"1. That God's rejecting great part of the seed of Abraham, yea, and of Isaac too, was undeniable fact (vers. 6–13).

"2. That God had not chosen them to such peculiar privileges for any kind of goodness either in them or their fathers (vers. 14–24).

"3. That His accepting the Gentiles, and rejecting many of the Jews, had been foretold both by Hosea and Isaiah (vers. 25–33).

"4. That God had offered salvation to Jews and Gentiles on the same terms, though the Jews had rejected it (ch. 10. 1–21).

"5. That though the rejection of Israel for their obstinacy was general, yet it was not total; there being still a remnant among them who did embrace the gospel (ch. 11. 1–10).

"6. That the rejection of the rest was not final, but in the end all Israel should be saved (vers. 11–31).

"7. That, meantime, even their obstinacy and rejection served to display the unsearchable wisdom and love of God (vers. 32–36).

"The rest of the Epistle contains practical instructions and exhortations. He particularly urges—1. An entire consecration of themselves to God, and a care to glorify Him by a faithful improvement of their several talents (ch. 12. 1–11). 2. Devotion, patience, hospitality, mutual sympathy, humility, peace, and meekness (vers. 12–21). 3. Obedience to magistrates, justice in all its branches, love the fulfilling of the Law, and universal holiness (ch. 13. 1–14). 4. Mutual candour between those who differed in judgment, touching the observance of the Mosaic Law (ch. 14. 1–23; 15. 1–17); in enforcing which he is led to mention the extent of his own labours, and his purpose of visiting the Romans; in the meantime recommending himself to their prayers (vers. 18–33). And, after many salutations (ch. 16. 1–16), and a caution against those who caused divisions, he concludes with a suitable blessing and doxology (vers. 17–27)." [Read also the "Introduction to S. Paul's Epistles" in this volume.]

CHAPTER I.

SECTION I.—Vers. 1–7. GREETING.—1. Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ. "To this introduction the conclusion answers, ch. 15. 15, etc. Called to be an apostle—and made an apostle by that calling. While God calls, He makes what He calls. As the Judaising teachers disputed his claim to the apostolical office, it is with great propriety that he asserts it in the very entrance of an Epistle wherein their principles are entirely overthrown. And various other proper and important thoughts are suggested in this short introduction; particularly the prophecies concerning the gospel, the descent of Jesus from David, the great doctrines of His Godhead and resurrection, the sending the gospel to the Gentiles, the privileges of Christians, and the obedience and holiness to which they were obliged in virtue of their profession. Separated—by God, not only from the bulk of other men, from other Jews, from other disciples, but even from other Christian teachers, to be a peculiar instrument of God in spreading the gospel"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul, a commissioned messenger of the predicted and now exalted Messiah, greets the saints at Rome. S. Paul, a servant—strictly a bond-servant (so Phil. 1. 1; Tit. 1. 1; Jas. 1. 1; 2 Pet. 1. 1)—of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 7. 22; Eph. 6. 6, etc.). To S. Paul, the Divine Son, as truly as the Father, is his absolute Master and Possessor. Called—at his conversion. (Comp. 1 Cor. 1. 1.) For the terms of the call, see Acts 26. 17, 18. This call is distinct from the call to be a Christian, on which see vers. 6, 7; 8. 28; 1 Cor. 1. 24. An apostle — lit. an 'envoy.' S. Paul often insisted on the fact and rights of his apostleship. (1 Cor. 9. 1, 2; 2 Cor. 12. 12; Gal. 1. 1.) The gospel of God—the messages of good sent from God and revealing Him. (So ch. 15. 16; 2 Cor. 11. 7; 1 Thess. 2. 2, etc.)"—C. B. "The first seven verses of this chapter are but one complete period, representing, to the mind of the devout reader, some august mystery and edifying moral of our holy religion. A servant—the absolute property of his Master, and bound to Him for life"—COKE. "Writing as a stranger to the Christians at Rome, S. Paul begins by telling them his name, his position in the Church, the work for which he was placed in that position, and how this work brings him into contact with them"—BEET.

2. Which He promised before — "of old time, frequently, solemnly. And the promise and accomplishment confirm each other"—WESLEY.

"See on Acts 2. 6; Tit. 1. 2—This verse refers to the relation of the gospel to the Old Testament Scriptures; it is intended thereby to declare that the former was not a thing entirely disconnected with the previous history of the world, but the blossoms which had grown out of the roots of the Old Testament (Acts 26. 22)"—OLSHAUSEN. "The promise of the great Deliverer, running through the Old Testament, is one of the most wonderful of the phenomena of history"—MOULE.

3. Who was of the seed of David according to the flesh—"that is, with regard to His human nature. Both the natures of our Saviour are here mentioned; but the human is mentioned first, because the Divine was not manifested in its full evidence till after His resurrection"—WESLEY.

"Of the seed of David. The New Testament begins with this assertion (Matt. 1. 1), and almost closes with it (Rev. 22. 16). In 2 Tim. 2. 8, S. Paul, at the close of his ministry, again recites it as a foundation truth"—MOULE.

4. "But powerfully declared to be the Son of God, according to the Spirit of holiness—that is, according to His Divine nature. By the resurrection from the dead—for this is both the fountain and the object of our faith; and the preaching of the apostles was the consequence of Christ's resurrection"—WESLEY.

"Christ was both at the same time the Son of God from eternity, the Son of David in time. His resurrection showed Him to be none other than the Son—with power—lit. 'in power.' (Comp. 1 Cor. 16. 43.) Power attended and characterised His resurrection, both as cause and effect. It was miracle and triumph"—MOULE. "By the resurrection from the dead. The particular act in which the Sonship of Christ was most conspicuously ratified and confirmed was His resurrection from the dead. It was ratified by His resurrection, as a manifestation of transcendent and Divine power. (Comp. Acts 2. 28; 17. 31; ch. 4. 34.) 'By the resurrection of the dead'—by that resurrection of which Christ was the first-fruits"—ELLICOTT. "The verse implies that Christ claimed on earth to be, in a sense peculiar to Himself, the Son of God, i.e. He claimed a relation to God shared by none else. For, although the surpassing grandeur of His resurrection suggested the surpassing greatness of Him who was raised from the dead, yet even this great miracle was but a silent witness, and could do no more than confirm the testimony of Jesus concerning Himself"—BEET.

5. By whom we have received—I and the other apostles—grace and apostleship—the favour to be an apostle, and qualifications for it—for obedience to the faith in all nations—"that is, that all nations may embrace the faith of Christ. For His name—for His sake; out of regard to Him"—WESLEY.

(Ch. 12. 3; 15. 15; 1 Cor. 15. 10; Gal. 1. 15; 2. 9; Eph. 3. 8; Acts 9. 15.)

"Grace and apostleship — qualifications and commission; grace for the endurance of labours, apostleship for authority in preaching"—ORIGEN. "Apostleship includes all those privileges which S. Paul possessed as an apostle; grace is all those privileges that he possessed as a Christian. The light in which he valued most the gifts that had been bestowed upon him, was inasmuch as they enabled him to preach the gospel to the Gentiles"—ELLICOTT.

6. Among whom—"the nations brought to the obedience of faith—are ye also—but S. Paul gives them no pre-eminence above others"—WESLEY.

Called to be Jesus Christ's (R.V.). Christians are holy on account of Christ, who lives in them. He who would experience "all things are yours—and ye are Christ's" (1 Cor. 3. 21-23) must be all Christ's—"your whole spirit and soul and body—preserved entire, without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess. 5. 23). "The gospel is God's voice calling men to Christ; and is as solemn as the voice from the burning bush, or on the road to Damascus. Those who have obeyed the call are Christ's called ones. Just as, by the voice of Christ, God made S. Paul an apostle, and gave him a right to call himself such; so by the gospel, God gave these men to Christ, and gave them a right to call themselves His"—BEET.

7. To all that are in Rome—"most of these were heathens by birth (ver. 13), though with Jews mixed among them. They were scattered up and down in that large city, and not yet reduced into the form of a church. Only some had begun to meet in the house of Aquila and Priscilla. Beloved of God. And from His free love, not from any merit of yours, called by His word and His Spirit to believe in Him, and now through faith holy as He is holy. Grace—the peculiar favour of God—and peace—all manner of blessings, temporal, spiritual, and eternal. This is both a Christian salutation and an apostolic benediction—from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the usual way wherein the apostles speak, 'God the Father,' 'God our Father.' Nor do they often, in speaking of Him, use the word Lord, as it implies the proper name of God, Jehovah. In the Old Testament, indeed, the holy men generally said, 'The Lord our God'; for they were then, as it were, servants; whereas now they are sons: and sons so well know their father, that they need not frequently mention his proper name. It is one and the same peace, and one and the same grace, which is from God and from Jesus Christ. Our trust and prayer fix on God, as He is the Father of Christ; and on Christ, as He presents us to the Father"—WESLEY.

Called to be saints. (Ch. 9. 24; 1 Cor. 9. 2; 1 Thess. 4. 7.) Grace to you. (1 Cor. 1. 3; 2 Cor. 1. 2; Gal. 1. 3.) "Called to be saints—lit. 'Called saints'—i.e. practically 'converted, so as to be saints.' Holiness is the unmistakable characteristic of the true Church. The glory of God is His holiness. It is the task of the Church to exhibit in human life and character this holiness of God's. Those whom God calls into His Church, He calls to be above all else, holy, and every individual member of the Church should be alive to the necessity of holy living"—M. DODS. From God our Father—the original source of all our blessings, who is now become our Father, having adopted us into His family, and regenerated us by His grace. "And the Lord Jesus Christ—the one Mediator between God and man, through whose sacrifice and intercession we receive all the blessings of providence and grace"—BENSON. "Grace—the love of God manifested in the form of pardon towards sinful man. Peace—the feeling of profound calm or inward quiet which is communicated to the heart by the possession of reconciliation. It may seem that the title, 'well-beloved of God,' given above, included these gifts; but the Christian possesses nothing which does not require to be ever received anew, and daily increased by new acts of faith and prayer"—GODET.

SECTION II.—Vers. 8–17. GOOD REPORT OF THE ROMAN CHURCH. S. PAUL DESIRES TO VISIT THEM, AND PREACH TO THEM.—8. I thank. "In the very entrance of this one Epistle are the traces of all spiritual affections, but of thankfulness above all, with the expression of which almost all S. Paul's Epistles begin. He here particularly thanks God, that what otherwise himself should have done, was done at Rome already. My God. This very word expresses faith, hope, love, and consequently all true religion. Through Jesus Christ. The gifts of God all pass through Christ to us; and all our petitions and thanksgivings pass through Christ to God. That your faith is spoken of (R.V. 'That your faith is proclaimed'). In this kind of congratulations S. Paul describes either the whole of Christianity, as Col. 1. 3, etc., or some part of it, as 1 Cor. 1. 5. Accordingly here he mentions the faith of the Romans, suitably to his design (vers. 12, 17). Through the whole world. This joyful news spreading everywhere, that there were Christians also in the imperial city. And the goodness and wisdom of God established faith in the chief cities; in Jerusalem and Rome particularly, that from thence it might be diffused to all nations"—WESLEY.

"Through Jesus Christ. Christ is, as it were, the medium through whom God has been brought into close relation to man. Hence all intercourse between God and man is represented as passing through Him. He is not only the Divine Logos, by whom God is revealed to man, but He is also the Head of humanity, by whom the tribute of thanks and praise is offered to God"—ELLICOTT. "That your faith is proclaimed. Religion itself is a practical thing; and its natural effects, when received, are its true test. In Rome, it had been for some years working its own mighty moral changes, and had raised up a church there, whose faith in those primitive times had obtained no approving celebrity, if it had not saved its professors from sin; if it had not been 'faith working by love.' He could therefore refer to the effects produced as forcibly as to the argument in favour of the gospel; and had not only to exhibit the theory, but its triumphs of salvation and its fruits of holiness"—WATSON. "Throughout the whole world. There were multitudes of strangers continually visiting Rome, who, on their return home, reported what they had seen. The faith of these Romans in the Lord Jesus Christ would be specially the subject of conversation in the churches everywhere. It was a matter of great joy that the religion of Christ was professed in the imperial city"—BENSON.

9. God, whom I serve—"as an apostle—in my spirit—not only with my body, but with my inmost soul—in the gospel—by preaching it"—WESLEY.

How unceasingly (R.V.). "With my spirit—not only with my body, but with the greatest integrity and ardour of my soul"—COKE. "For God is my Witness. A solemn appeal to the heart-searching God, that he had loved them, and constantly prayed for them. Making mention of you always in my prayers. He can sooner be forgetful of himself than unmindful of them"—BURKITT. Always—in all my solemn addresses to God.

10. If by any means now at length

"This accumulation of particles declares the strength of his desire"—WESLEY.

"A prosperous journey. Little thought S. Paul that, when bound at Jerusalem, and posted from one prison to another, God was now sending him to Rome ; yet He sent him, and very safe, with a great convoy. God goes often another way to work for our good than we could imagine"—TRAPP.

11. That I may impart to you—"face to face, by laying on of hands, prayer, preaching the gospel, private conversation—some spiritual gift. With such gifts the Corinthians, who had enjoyed the presence of S. Paul, abounded (1 Cor. 1. 7 ; 12. 1 ; 14. 1). So did the Galatians likewise (Gal. 3. 5) ; and, indeed, all those churches which had had the presence of any of the apostles had peculiar advantages in this kind, from the laying on of their hands. (Acts 19. 6 ; 8. 17, etc. ; 2 Tim. 1. 6.) But as yet the Romans were greatly inferior to them in this respect ; for which reason the apostle, in the twelfth chapter also, says little, if anything, of their spiritual gifts. He therefore desires to impart some, that they might be established ; for by these was the testimony of Christ confirmed among them. That S. Peter had no more been at Rome than S. Paul, at the time when this Epistle was wrote, appears from the general tenor thereof, and from this place in particular ; for, otherwise, what S. Paul wishes to impart to the Romans would have been imparted already by S. Peter"—WESLEY.

"That I may impart. All the inward gifts of God are wrought in man's spirit by the Spirit of God. Nevertheless, S. Paul hopes to be a medium through which such gifts will be imparted to his readers at Rome" — BEET. "That I may impart—such gifts as would naturally flow to one Christian (or to many collectively) from the personal presence, and warm sympathy of another ; in S. Paul's case, heightened in proportion to the wealth and elevation of his own spiritual consciousness and life. His head and his heart alike are full to overflowing, and he longs to impart some of these riches to the Romans. Inasmuch as he regards all his own religious advancement and experience as the result of the Spirit working within him, he calls the fruits of that advancement and experience 'spiritual gifts.' May be established—may grow and be confirmed and strengthened in the faith. S. Paul would contribute to the advancement and consolidation of the Church"—ELLICOTT.

12. That is, I long to be comforted by the mutual faith both of you and me. "He not only associates the Romans with, but even prefers them before himself. How different is this style of the apostle from that of the modern court of Rome !"—WESLEY.

Each of us by the other's faith, both yours and mine (R. V.). This was not an ingenious religious compliment. To the sincere Christian teacher nothing is more real than the reflex aid he receives among Christian learners. It was rather an illustration of MEYER'S description of the writer: "Amidst the circumstances of his apostolic work he developed a force and play of spirit, a keenness, depth, clearness, and cogency of thought, a purity and firmness of purpose, an intensity of feeling, a holy audacity of effort, a wisdom of deportment, a precision and delicacy of practical skill, a strength and liberty of faith, a fire and mastery of eloquence, a heroism in danger, a love, and self-forgetfulness and patience and humility, and altogether a sublime power and richness of endowment, which have secured for this chosen implement[1] of Christ the reverence and wonder of all time."

13. Brethren. "A frequent, holy, simple, sweet, and yet grand appellation. The apostles but rarely address persons by their names—as 'O ye Corinthians,' 'O Timotheus.' S. Paul generally uses this appellation, 'Brethren' ; sometimes in exhortation, 'My beloved,' or, 'My beloved brethren' ; S. James, 'Brethren,' 'My brethren,' 'My beloved brethren' ; S. Peter and Jude always, 'Beloved' ; S. John frequently, 'Beloved' ; once, 'Brethren' ; oftener than once, 'My little children.' Though I have been hindered hitherto — either by business (see ch. 15. 22) ; or persecution (1 Thess. 2. 2) ; or the Spirit (Acts 16. 7). That I might have some fruit—of my ministerial labours. Even as I have already had from the many churches I have planted and watered among the other Gentiles"—WESLEY.

Now I would not have you ignorant—a characteristic phrase. (See ch. 11. 25 ; 1 Cor. 10. 1 ; 12. 1 ; 2 Cor. 1. 8 ; 1 Thess. 4. 13.) "In writing these words, S. Paul doubtless sought only to express his feelings towards these far-off brethren. But he could not have written words more calculated to increase the attention which his former words called forth"—BEET. "Oftentimes I purposed to come unto you. Some at Rome might say, If S. Paul had such a longing desire to see us as he expresses, why did he not come before this and preach here, as he has done at Corinth and Ephesus, and elsewhere ? He tells them that it was not for want of will and inclination, but for want of opportunity"—BURKITT. "Within limits, evidently S. Paul's plans were no more inspired than those of modern missionaries ; his most deliberate intentions were liable to corrections by his Master. The correction came often in the form, not of silent providence, but of miraculous intimation. (See Acts 16. 6, 7, and comp. 2 Cor. 1. 15–17)"—C. B. "But was let hitherto, i.e. "was hindered." GROTIUS suggests that this "hindrance" lay in the necessity of those places where Christ was still unknown, and which therefore needed an apostolic visit more urgently than did Rome.

[1] The word used by Luther in Acts 9. 15, where our version uses vessel.

14. To the Greeks and the barbarians. "He includes the Romans under the Greeks; so that this division comprises all nations. Both to the wise and the unwise—for there were 'unwise' even among the Greeks, and 'wise' even among the barbarians. I am a debtor, to all—I am bound by my Divine mission to preach the gospel to them"—WESLEY.

"The wise and the unwise. (Comp. 1 Cor. 1. 20, 26–28.) The gospel was at first most readily received by the poor and unlearned, but it did not therefore follow that culture and education were by any means excluded. S. Paul himself was a conspicuous instance to the contrary. And so, in the next century, the Church which began with such leaders as Ignatius and Polycarp, could number among its members before the century was out, Tertullian, and Origen—the most learned man of his time"—ELLICOTT.

15. So much as in me—"according to my ability and opportunity—I am ready—and desirous—to preach the gospel . . . at Rome. Though it be the capital of the world, a place of so much politeness and grandeur, and a place where it might be peculiarly dangerous to oppose those popular superstitions to which the empire is supposed to owe its greatness and felicity, yet I am willing to come and publish this Divine message, though it be at the risk of my reputation, my liberty, or life"—BENSON.

16. For I am not ashamed of the gospel. "To the world, indeed, it is folly and weakness (1 Cor. 1. 18); therefore, in the judgment of the world, he ought to be ashamed of it; especially at Rome, the head and theatre of the world. But S. Paul is not ashamed, knowing it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth—the great and gloriously powerful means of saving all who accept salvation in God's own way. As S. Paul comprises the sum of the gospel in this Epistle, so he does the sum of the Epistle in this and the following verse. Both to the Jew and to the Gentile. There is a noble frankness, as well as a comprehensive sense, in these words, by which he, on the one hand, shows the Jews their absolute need of the gospel; and, on the other, tells the politest and greatest nation in the world both that their salvation depended on receiving it, and that the first offers of it were in every place to be made to the despised Jews"—WESLEY.

"The gospel of Christ. It has encountered great and powerful foes, the malice of the Jews, the rage of heathen priests, the scorn and contempt of philosophers, the storm of popular fury. Ask of the Corinthians its moral powers in converting men from the grossest immoralities (1 Cor. 6. 11). The gospel has lost none of its ancient powers. It hallows the heart, and constrains us to love our enemies; yea, to be ready to die for the name of Jesus"—SUTCLIFFE. "For I am not ashamed of the gospel—not ashamed of a scheme so beneficent and so grand. The gospel he preaches is that mighty agency which God Himself has set in motion, and the object of which is the salvation of all who put their faith in it, to whatever nation or race they may belong. He has perhaps in his mind the reception he had met with in other highly civilised cities. (Comp. Acts 17. 32.) He had himself once found a 'stumbling-block' in the humiliation of the cross; now, so far from being ashamed of it, it is just that of which he is most proud. The preaching of the cross is the cardinal point of the whole gospel"—ELLICOTT. "Not ashamed. S. Paul, as a Jew, believed on Christ Jesus; and believing he had life through His name, through Him he enjoyed an abundance of grace; so that, being filled with that happiness which an indwelling Christ produces, he could cheerfully say, I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. And why? Because he felt it to be the power of God to the salvation of his believing soul"—CLARKE.

17. The righteousness of God. "This expression sometimes means God's eternal, essential righteousness, which includes both justice and mercy, and is eminently shown in condemning sin and yet justifying the sinner. Sometimes it means that righteousness by which a man, through the gift of God, is made and is righteous; and that, both by receiving Christ through faith, and by a conformity to the essential righteousness of God. S. Paul, when treating of justification, means hereby the righteousness of faith; therefore called 'the righteousness of God,' because God found out and prepared, reveals and gives, approves and crowns it. In this verse the expression means, the whole benefit of God, through Christ, for the salvation of a sinner. Is revealed. Mention is here made, and ver. 18, of a twofold revelation—of wrath and righteousness; the former, little known to nature, is revealed by the law; the latter, wholly unknown to nature, by the gospel. That goes before, and prepares the way, this follows. Each, the apostle says, 'is revealed' at the present time, in opposition to the times of ignorance. From faith to faith—by a gradual series of still clearer and clearer promises. As it is written. S. Paul had just laid down three propositions—1. Righteousness is by faith (ver. 17); 2. Salvation is by righteousness (ver. 16); 3. Both to the Jews and to the Gentiles (ver. 16). Now all these are confirmed by that single sentence, The just shall live by faith (R.V. 'The righteous shall live by faith'),—which was primarily spoken of those who preserved their lives, when the Chaldeans besieged Jerusalem, by believing the declarations of God, and acting according to them. Here it means, He shall obtain the favour of God, and continue therein by believing"—WESLEY.

The righteousness of God—"a phrase occurring elsewhere seven times in this Epistle (ch. 3. 5, 21, 22, 25, 26; 10. 3, twice), once in the Gospels (Matt. 6. 33), once in 2 Cor. (5. 21), once in S. James (1. 20), and once in 2 Pet. (1. 1). Ch. 3. 26 appears to supply the key to this meaning; the 'righteousness of God' is something which is reached or received 'through faith in Christ,' and it is declared in such a way as to show Him 'just, yet justifying.' On the whole it is most consistent with most passages to explain it of the 'righteousness imputed by God' to the believer"—MOULE. "The righteousness of God—God's method of saving sinners"—CLARKE. "The righteousness of God. 'Of God' here means 'which proceeds from God.' And 'the righteousness' which thus 'proceeds from God' is that condition of righteousness in man into which he enters by his participation in the messianic kingdom. The whole object of the coming of the Messiah was to make men 'righteous' before God. This was done more especially by the death of Christ upon the cross, which, as we learn from ch. 3. 24-26, had the effect of making God 'propitious' towards men. The benefit of this act is secured to all who make good their claims to be considered members of the messianic kingdom by a loyal adhesion to the Messiah. Such persons are treated as if they were 'righteous,' though the righteousness that is thus attributed to them is not any actual merit of their own, but an ideal condition in which they are placed by God. This is the well-known doctrine of justification by faith." "This verse explains the statement in ver. 16 that the good news is a power of God to save all that believe. Man was perishing, and his perdition was the just punishment of his own sin. A righteous judge cannot rescue a criminal from a righteous sentence. But in the gospel God proclaims, through the death of Christ (ch. 3. 24), a new law, 'He that believes shall be saved,' and thus bestows his own favour on all that believe. The believer is now, by the gift of God, righteous. And the righteous judge breaks off the fetters, and sets the prisoner free. Where the word is believed, the arm of the Lord is stretched out to save. (Isa. 51. 1)"—BEET. A (not the) righteousness of God (R.V.). This seemingly trivial verbal change greatly clears the sense. The A.V. rendering seems to assert that a certain Divine attribute (the righteousness of God) is revealed in the gospel. But the indefinite article of the R.V. calls attention to the gospel as a particular manifestation of that righteousness, and thus foreshadows the chief topic of the Epistle, viz. Justification by Faith. (See ch. 3. 26.)

SECTION III.—Vers. 18-23. THE SINFULNESS OF THE HUMAN RACE; DIVINE ANGER.—18. For. "There is no other way of obtaining life and salvation. Having laid down his proposition, the apostle now enters upon the proof of it. His first argument is, The Law condemns all men, as being under sin. None, therefore, is justified by the works of the Law. This is treated of to ch. 3. 20. And hence he infers, Therefore justification is by faith. The wrath of God is revealed—not only by frequent and signal interpositions of Divine providence, but likewise in the sacred oracles, and by us, His messengers. From heaven. This speaks the majesty of Him whose wrath is revealed, His all-seeing eye, and the extent of His wrath: whatever is under heaven is under the effects of His wrath, believers in Christ excepted. Against all ungodliness and unrighteousness. These two are treated of (ver. 23, etc.). Of men. He is speaking here of the Gentiles, and chiefly the wisest of them. Who detain the truth—for it struggles against their wickedness—in unrighteousness. The word here includes ungodliness also"—WESLEY.

"For the wrath of God, etc. The 'for' marks the connection as follows: 'The gospel is the secret of salvation, of justification before the eternal Judge; and as such it is a thing of supreme importance; for the Judge has proclaimed the doom of human sin. The question is not of mere theory, but of life or death.' The wrath of God—an expression frequent in the New Testament. All attempts to explain it away involve violence to the sense of Scripture: it would be as legitimate, in point of language, to explain away the Divine love"—MOULE. "By the wrath of God we are not to understand any uneasy passion in the Divine Being; but the displeasures of His righteousness, which is expressed by the punishments inflicted on the ungodly, those who retain not God in their knowledge; and the unrighteous, those whose lives are profligate"—CLARKE. "All ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Ungodliness compriseth all sins against God; unrighteousness comprehends all sins against our neighbour. God will punish these sins upon the persons of the sinners. Hold the truth in unrighteousness—that is, their natural convictions were kept down under the dominions and power of their corruptions. Lust in their wills and affections was too strong for the light in their understandings; they entertained the light of truth in their minds, but did not suffer it to have its proper effect and influence upon their hearts and lives; thus making that a prisoner which would have made them free"—BURKITT.

19. For what is to be known of God—"those great principles which are indispensably necessary to be known—is manifest in them; for God hath showed it to them by the light which enlightens every man that cometh into the world"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul means: 'What can be known of God without the help of an extraordinary revelation is clearly manifested within them.' A light was given in their conscience and understanding, and this light bore on the existence and character of the Divine Being. This present fact is manifested, is afterwards traced to its cause; 'for God "manifested" it to them.' This state of knowledge was due to a Divine act of revelation. God is not known like an ordinary object; when He is known, it is He who gives Himself to be known. The knowledge which beings have of Him is a free act on His part"—GODET. "Because is stronger, and of more limited meaning than for. As its form implies, it gives a cause, or reason, of what has been said. The reason why God is angry with these ungodly and unrighteous men is that they know better"—BEET.

20. For those things of Him which are invisible, are seen—"by the eye of the mind—being understood. They are seen by them, and them only, who use their understanding"—WESLEY.

Being perceived through the things that are made (R.V.). For the invisible things of Him—"His spiritual nature and infinite perfections, called His 'invisible things,' partly in opposition to the heathen deities, who, being all corporeal, their being and properties were things invisible; and partly because they cannot be seen, except in their effects, by men's bodily eyes"—BENSON. "From the creation of the world are clearly seen. It seems not to signify the means by which they came to the knowledge of God, for these are afterwards expressed, but rather to import that from the beginning of the world the heathen had the means of knowing the true God from the works of creation"—Dr. WHITBY.

21. Because, knowing God—"for the wiser heathens did know that there was one supreme God; yet from low and base considerations they conformed to the idolatry of the vulgar. They did not glorify Him as God, neither were thankful (R.V. 'neither gave thanks')—they neither thanked Him for His benefits, nor glorified Him for His Divine perfections. But became vain—like the idols they worshipped—in their reasonings—various, uncertain, foolish. What a terrible instance have we of this in the writings of Lucretius! What vain reasonings, and how dark a heart, amidst so pompous professions of wisdom!"—WESLEY.

"Their sin, therefore, in worshipping idols, and in concealing the true God from the vulgar, did not proceed so much from ignorance as from corruption of heart. Neither were thankful. Thankfulness to God for His mercies is here represented as a part of religion, and no principle can be nobler, or have a greater or more extensive influence"—BENSON. "To know God is a phrase capable of many degrees of meaning, from the rational certainty of a supreme personal Maker and Lord up to that holy intimacy of divinely-given communion with the Father and the Son, to which the words of John 17. 3 refer. In this passage all that is necessary to understand is the certainty (however learnt) of the existence of a personal omnipotent Creator"—C. B.

22. Professing themselves to be wise. Relying upon their own wisdom, they wandered farther and farther from true wisdom, falling into the contradiction of supposing that the eternal and immutable essence of God could be represented by the perishable figures of man, or bird, or quadruped, or insect. They became fools—they were made fools. It is not merely that they expose their real folly, but that folly is itself judicially inflicted by God as a punishment for the first step of declension from Him"—ELLICOTT.

23. "And changed—with the utmost folly. Here are three degrees of ungodliness and of punishment: the first is described (vers. 21–24); the second (vers. 25–27); the third, in the 28th and following verses. The punishment in each case is expressed by God gave them up. If a man will not worship God as God, he is so left to himself that he throws away his very manhood. Reptiles—or creeping things, and various kinds of serpents"—WESLEY.

"Deity, and its prerogatives, were so degraded as to be (in the idolater's act) transferred to idols"—C. B. "And changed. Proof of their folly, and of the darkening of their heart. They put aside God, whom they acknowledged to be immortal, and whose character is so worthy of their highest admiration, and put in His place, not merely a dying man but a lifeless image of a dying man. The contrast of imperishable and perishable presents their folly in the clearest light"—BEET.

SECTION IV.—Vers. 24–32. CONDITION OF THE HEATHEN WORLD.—24. Wherefore. "One punishment of sin is from the very nature of it, as ver. 27; another, as here, is from vindictive justice. Uncleanness. Ungodliness and uncleanness are frequently joined (1 Thess. 4. 5); as are the knowledge of God and purity. God gave them up—by withdrawing His restraining grace"—WESLEY.

Gave them up in the lusts of their hearts unto uncleanness (R.V.). "God gave them up—as He did the antediluvians (Gen. 6. 3); the consequence of which was that their lust excited them to commit every sort of uncleanness. A contempt of religion is the source of all wickedness"—BENSON. "Idolatry and uncleanness often go together. Solomon's uncleanness led him to idolatry, and his idolatry increased his uncleanness. Dishonour their own bodies. Every pollution of sin, both natural and unnatural, is to be abhorred, as 'dishonouring the body.' Our bodies are to be members of Christ's. Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness—left these sinners to themselves to act without restraint, according to the inclinations of their lusts and corruptions. 'Lord, keep Thy servants from sinning against the light of nature, against the light of Scripture, lest we be judicially darkened, and given up to hardness of heart, and the vilest of affections'"—BURKITT.

25. Who changed the truth—"the true worship of God—into a lie—false, abominable idolatries—and worshipped—inwardly—and served—outwardly"—WESLEY.

"Who changed the truth of God—those true conceptions which they had of Him by nature—into a lie. False opinions of Him, and the worship of idols. And they represented His true essence, His incorruptible and immortal nature, by images of men and brute creatures, which are fitly called a 'lie,' as being most false representations of the Deity"—BENSON. R.V. "For a lie." They bartered truth for error.

26. Therefore God gave them up to vile affections—"to which the heathen Romans were then abandoned to the last degree; and none more than the emperors themselves"—WESLEY.

"Their system of idolatry necessarily produced all kinds of impurity"—CLARKE. God also gave them up. (So Ps. 81. 11, 12; Acts 7. 42.) They became more and more debased. The sanctity of the body was utterly disregarded. They were left "without God," to live in vile desires. Men yet live who illustrate that awful condition of the ever-increasing power and corruption of indulgence in sin—"earthly, sensual, devilish."

27. Receiving the just recompence of their error—"their idolatry being punished with that unnatural lust, which was as horrible a dishonour to the body as their idolatry was to God"—WESLEY.

"A law broods over human existence, a law which is at the same time a Divine act: such as thou makest thy God, such wilt thou make thyself. The whole is here calculated to show that there is here a just recompence on the part of God. 'Well-merited recompence' (lit. 'the recompence which was meet'). One feels, as it were, the indignant breathing of God's holy wrath. Justice could not let it be otherwise. The clause in themselves brings out the depth of this blight; they bear it in themselves—it is visible to the eyes of all"—GODET.

28. God gave them up to an undiscerning mind. "Treated of (ver. 32)—to do things not expedient—even the vilest abominations, treated of (vers. 29–31)"—WESLEY.

And even as they refused to have God in their knowledge (R.V.). "As they would have nothing to do with Him, so He would have nothing to do with them"—ELLICOTT. "Here we see the hand of a just and avenging God; they abused their powers, and God deprived them of the right use of these powers"—CLARKE.

29. Filled with all injustice. "This stands in the first place; unmercifulness, in the last. Fornication—includes here every species of uncleanness. Maliciousness. The Greek word properly implies a temper which delights in hurting another, even without any advantage to itself"—WESLEY.

"Nothing is a sorer punishment than for the sinner to be given up to his own heart's lusts. When God withdraws His restraints, there are no abominations into which man may not rush headlong. When we think of the iniquities here recorded, and see them in the practice and temper of others, we should reflect, for our own humiliation, that our hearts are by nature the same, alike corrupt"—COKE.

30. Whisperers—"such as secretly defame others. Haters of God—that is, rebels against Him, deniers of His providence, or accusers of His justice in their adversities; yea, having an inward heart enmity to His justice and holiness. Inventors of evil things—of new pleasures, new ways of gain, new arts of hurting, particularly in war"—WESLEY.

"Backbiters—rather 'evil-speakers,' without the special notion of speaking in the absence of the person attacked. Proud. They who are continually exalting themselves and depressing others; magnifying themselves at the expense of their neighbours, and wishing men to receive their sayings as oracles"—CLARKE. Disobedient to parents—"a symptom of deep moral and social disorder. Parental authority stands in the Decalogue among the great foundations of virtue and duty, and our Lord Himself is significantly said (Luke 2. 51) to have been 'subject' to Joseph and Mary"—MOULE.

31. Covenant-breakers. "It is well known, the Romans, as a nation, from the very beginning of their commonwealth, never made any scruple of vacating altogether the most solemn engagement, if they did not like it, though made by their supreme magistrate, in the name of the whole people. They only gave up the general who had made it, and then supposed themselves to be at full liberty. Without natural affection. The custom of exposing their own new-born children to perish by cold, hunger, or wild beasts, which so generally prevailed in the heathen world, particularly among the Greeks and Romans, was an amazing instance of this; as also that of killing aged and helpless parents"—WESLEY.

"Implacable—that will not hear of a truce, much less of a peace"—TRAPP. Covenant-breakers—"persons who could be bound by no oath, because, properly speaking, they had no God to witness or avenge their misconduct. As every covenant or agreement is made as in the presence of God, so he that opposes the being and doctrine of God is incapable of being bound by any covenant, he can give no pledge for his conduct"—CLARKE.

32. Not only do the same, but have pleasure (R.V. "but also consent with them") in those that practise them. "This is the highest degree of wickedness. A man may be hurried by his passions to do the thing he hates; but he that has pleasure in those that do evil, loves wickedness for wickedness' sake. And hereby he encourages them in sin, and heaps the guilt of others upon his own head"—WESLEY.

Knowing—"with full knowledge of the sentence of eternal death which is in store for them. They show that it is no mere momentary yielding to the force of temptation or of passion, but a radical perversion of conscience and reason, by the fact that they not only practise such things themselves, but in cold blood commend and applaud those who practise them"—ELLICOTT. "Have pleasure in those that practise them. There is little difference whether thou commit sin or consent to it"—TRAPP. "Are pleased with—last and darkest count in this catalogue of sin. Many commit sin, carried away by selfishness or passion, who readily condemn it in others. But to take pleasure in the sin of one's neighbour shows a love of sin, not for some further gain, but for its own sake"—BEET.

CHAPTER II.

SECTION V.—Vers. 1-29. THE JUDGMENT OF GOD ADMITS OF NO EXCEPTIONS.—1. Therefore. "The apostle now makes a transition from the Gentiles to the Jews, till, at ver. 6, he comprises both. Thou art inexcusable (R.V. 'art without excuse')—seeing knowledge without practice only increases guilt. O man. Having spoken of the Gentile in the third person, he addresses the Jew in the second person. But he calls him by a common appellation, as not acknowledging him to be a Jew. (See vers. 17, 28.) Whosoever thou art that judgest—censurest, condemnest. For in that thou judgest the other—the heathen—thou condemnest thyself; for thou doest the same things—in effect; in many instances"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul does not say that all men commit the unnatural sins so prominent in Section IV., for the section concludes with a long list of other sins. But he distinctly asserts that all are guilty of actual wickedness, that all do what they know God has forbidden, and might justly be punished with death"—BEET. "They who themselves commit the sins which they condemn and censure in others are totally inexcusable, and pronounce their own condemnation"—BURKITT.

2. For we know—"without thy teaching—that the judgment of God—not thine, who exceptest thyself from its sentence—is according to truth—is just, making no exception (vers. 5, 6, 11); and reaches the heart as well as the life (ver. 16)"—WESLEY.

"But we are sure—though men may judge partially and perversely, yet God will judge uprightly—that the judgment of God—the sentence that He will pronounce upon persons, whether Jews or Gentiles—is according to truth—according to the true state of every man's case, or according to the true character of persons, and the true quality of the actions and dispositions (vers. 5-11). Against them who commit such things—however they may behave towards their fellow-creatures"—BENSON.

3. That thou shalt escape—"rather than the Gentile"—WESLEY.

"That thou shalt escape. Emphatic. 'Are you, because you are a Jew, to be the only exception to this rule?' God makes no exceptions. 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die' (Ezek. 18. 20). This is preaching to the conscience, to the quick. Our exhortations should be as forked arrows, to stick in men's hearts, and not wound only, as other arrows"—TRAPP.

4. Or despisest thou. "Dost thou go further still—from hoping to escape His wrath, to the abuse of His love? The riches—the abundance—of His goodness, forbearance, and longsuffering—seeing thou both hast sinned, dost sin, and wilt sin. All these are afterwards comprised in the single word 'goodness.' Leadeth thee—that is, is designed of God to lead or encourage thee to it"—WESLEY.

"Or despisest thou. Another question which brings out the secret ground of this fallacious hope. God is merciful; He is especially kind to Israel. He has shown this by long-continued forbearance of long-continued sin. Therefore, though the man lives in sin, he expects to escape punishment. S. Paul declares that such a hope is contempt of God's kindness, arising from ignorance of its purpose. God's kindness—the gentleness of His treatment of men. 'Riches of His kindness' (ch. 9. 23). S. Paul frequently heaps word on word, because he feels how poor the best words are to express the great things of God. God's forbearance is shown in His holding back for a time displeasure against sin"—BEET. "Longsuffering is a mode of mercy, and the reason of its exercise is only to be found in a merciful intention"—WATSON.

5. Treasurest up wrath. "Although thou thinkest thou art treasuring up all good things—oh what a treasure may a man lay up either way, in this short day of life! To thyself—not to him whom thou judgest—in the day of wrath, and revelation, and righteous judgment of God—just opposite to 'the goodness and forbearance and longsuffering' of God. When God shall be revealed, then shall also be 'revealed' the secrets of men's hearts (ver. 16). Forbearance and revelation respect God, and are opposed to each other; longsuffering and righteous judgment respect the sinner; goodness and wrath are words of a more general import"—WESLEY.

"The one condition upon which the goodness of God will come into operation being directly contravened by the impenitence of the man who should be penitent, the load of wrath which has been accumulating against him remains unmoved. It is only waiting for the day of judgment to discharge itself upon him. Treasurest. The guilt of man is accumulated little by little. The punishment will be discharged upon him all at once, in one overwhelming tide. Against the day of wrath—strictly, 'in the day of wrath,' i.e. wrath to be outpoured upon the day of wrath. 'The great and terrible day of the Lord,' is a conception running through all the prophetic writings. (Comp. also in the New Testament, Luke 17. 30; Acts 2. 20; 1 Cor. 1. 8; 5. 5; 2 Cor. 1. 14; 1 Thess. 5. 2-4; 2 Thess. 2. 2; 2 Pet. 3. 10-12; Rev. 6. 17; 16. 14)"—ELLICOTT.

6. Who will render. "S. Paul is undoubtedly speaking of the judgment of the world which God will cause to be held by Christ. The subjects who are judged are Jews and Gentiles, consequently all men"—MEYER.

7. To them that seek for glory—"for pure love does not exclude faith, hope, desire (1 Cor. 15. 58)"—WESLEY.

"Patient continuance in well doing—lit. 'by patience (persistence) in good works.' Individuals are under the Divine government, and are contemplated separately in the Divine plan. As every man is redeemed by the death of Christ, offers of mercy are made to him, rules of conduct are assigned to him. If obedient, he has the Divine favour; yet in this world he may be afflicted. If he is disobedient he is under the curse; yet in this world he may be prosperous. But individuals have another life. There is a day of judgment appointed, and a state of endless retribution, and there all become equal. Every man is treated according to his own personal conduct (ver. 17)"—WATSON.

8. But to them that are contentious (R.V. "Factious")—"like thee, O Jew, who thus fightest against God. The character of a false Jew is disobedience, stubbornness, impatience. Indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish—alluding to Ps. 78. 49, 'He cast upon them,' the Egyptians, 'the fierceness of His anger, wrath, and indignation, and trouble'; and finally intimating, that the Jews would in the day of vengeance be more severely punished than even the Egyptians were when God made their plagues so wonderful"—WESLEY.

"The 'faction' or 'strife' is that of the sinful soul against the humbling terms of the Divine peace and love. And do not obey—implying the resistance of the will; the element of disobedience, in unbelief towards God. For a suggestive example, see Heb. 4. 6, compared with the history there referred to. But obey unrighteousness—yielding the will to the impulse of sin; 'having pleasures in unrighteousness' (2 Thess. 2. 12). 'Unrighteousness' here, as often, means sin in its largest sense. All wrong, civil, social, moral, personal, overt, secret, violates the eternal rights, even when it least seems to touch temporal and human interests"—MOULE.

9. Of the Jew first. "Here we have the first express mention of the Jews in this chapter. And it is introduced with great propriety. Their having been trained up in the true religion, and having had Christ and His apostles first sent to them, will place them in the foremost rank of the criminals that obey not the truth"—WESLEY.

"The Jew first, as possessing greater privileges, and having abused greater mercies; and also on the Gentile who, though he had not the same advantages, had what God saw was sufficient for his state, and having sinned against them, shall have punishment proportioned to his demerits"—CLARKE. "Tribulation and anguish—describes the moral and eternal state of the man on whom the indignation and wrath of the Judge falls (ver. 8). Tribulation is the punishment itself (corresponding to wrath); anguish is the wringing of the heart which punishment produces; it corresponds to the Judge's 'indignation.' Every soul of man—expresses the equality and universality of the treatment dealt out"—GODET. Every soul of man. "Not simply 'upon every man.' The 'soul' is that which is affected by the 'tribulation and anguish'"—MEYER.

10. But glory—"just opposite to 'wrath,' from the Divine approbation—honour—opposite to 'indignation,' by the Divine appointment; and peace now and for ever—opposed to tribulation and anguish"—WESLEY.

"Here again the apostle indicates the result finally reached, whether evil or good, without expressly mentioning the means by which it may be produced; on the one hand, the rejection of the gospel (ver. 9), as the supreme sin, at once the effect and cause of evil-doing; on the other, its acceptance (ver. 10), as effect and cause of the determination to follow goodness, and of its practice. But what is the foundation of such a judgment? One of God's perfections which the Jew could not deny without setting himself in contradiction to the whole Old Testament, the impartiality of God, whose judgment descends on evil wherever it is found, with or without law (vers. 11, 12)"—GODET.

11. For there is no respect of persons with God. "He will reward every one according to his works. But this is well consistent with His distributing advantages and opportunities of improvement, according to His own good pleasure"—WESLEY.

"Confirms the statement in vers. 9, 10, that God will reward and punish both Jew and Greek, by asserting a great principle which underlies the Old Testament declaration of ver. 6. Respect of persons—lit. 'reception of faces'; to look at a man's face and exterior, instead of at his heart and life. (Comp. Jas. 2. 1-3; Luke 20. 21; Gal. 2. 6; Eph. 6. 9; Col. 3. 25.) God looks not at a man's circumstances, but at his conduct and heart. This principle commends itself to the moral sense of every man"—BEET. "God does not save men with respect to their external privileges, or their barren knowledge and profession of the truth, but according as their state and dispositions really are"—M. HENRY.

12. For as many as have sinned—"he speaks as of the time past, for all time will be past at the day of judgment—without the Law—without having any written Law—shall also perish without the Law—without regard had to any outward law; being condemned by the law written in their hearts. The word 'also' shows the agreement of the manner of sinning with the manner of suffering. 'Perish'—he could not so properly say, 'Shall be judged without the Law"—WESLEY.

"And as many as. The similar form of the two parts of the verse sets forth the similar fate of the two classes of sinners. In Law (ch. 3. 19). The principles of right and wrong authoritatively set forth in the Law was the moral element in which they lived, thought, and sinned. And these principles will also be the standard with which their conduct will be compared, and thus the instrument by means of which they will be judged. Judgment will come to them through the Law, which was the moral element of their life. Thus the two classes of mankind will be treated by God without respect of persons"—BEET. "The truth, plainly implied and necessarily supposed, that as some sinners perish, having the written word, and all external means of salvation; so others perish, having not the written word or law of God, and the outward and ordinary means of salvation. That all men shall not be proceeded against in the day of judgment after one and the same manner; but every man according to the demerit of his sin, and according to the capacity and relation in which he stood in this life. The Gentiles which had only the law of nature, shall not be judged by the Law of Moses. The Jews which have both the law of nature and the Law of Moses, shall be judged by both. And consequently Christians, which have the law of nature unwritten, the Mosaical Law written, and the evangelical law, both written and preached, shall be under greater guilt, and receive greater condemnation; the greater the light we have quenched, the greater the darkness inflicted (Heb. 2. 3)"—BURKITT.

13. For not the hearers of the Law are, even now, just before God, but the doers of the Law shall be justified—"finally acquitted and rewarded, a most sure and important truth, which respects the Gentiles also, though principally the Jews. S. Paul speaks of the former (ver. 14, etc.); of the latter (ver. 17, etc.). Here is therefore no parenthesis; for the sixteenth verse also depends on the fifteenth, not on the twelfth"—WESLEY.

Hearers of the Law—"Why 'hearers' rather than possessors or readers? To describe the position of the Jews who heard the Law in the synagogue every Sabbath, and who for the most part knew it only in this way (Luke 4. 16; Acts 13. 15; 15. 21)"—GODET. "But the doers of the Law—whether natural or revealed, i.e. they who walk according to the light of the dispensation they are under, who steadily and universally, in the tenor of their lives, act agreeably to its precepts; they, and they only—shall be justified (acquitted and rewarded)—in the day of final account; whether their knowledge of it was more or less express"—Dr. WHITBY.

14. For when the Gentiles—"that is, any of them. S. Paul, having refuted the perverse judgment of the Jews concerning the heathens, proceeds to show the just judgment of God against them. He now speaks directly of the heathens, in order to convince the heathens. Yet the concession he makes to these serves more strongly to convince the Jews. Do by nature—that is, without an outward rule; though this also, strictly speaking, is by preventing grace—the things contained in the Law—the ten commandments being only the substance of the law of nature. These, not having the written Law, are a law unto themselves—that is, what the Law is to the Jews, they are, by the grace of God, to themselves—namely, a rule of life"—WESLEY.

A law unto themselves. "Since they (the Gentiles) having no rule of conduct external to themselves, and yet follow sometimes the path marked out in the Old Testament, S. Paul infers that there is something within them, a part of themselves, which to them is what the books of Moses are to the Jews. Whenever Gentiles perform the things of the Law, however seldom and however imperfectly, they give by their conduct a proof that they have a law within. Whereas if they never obeyed this inner law, they would not give us this proof of its existence"—BEET. "It does not follow that the Gentiles, who have not had a Divine revelation, shall either perish, because they had it not; or their unrighteous conduct pass unpunished, because not having this revelation might be considered an excuse for their sins"—CLARKE. "What the Law was to the Jews, the Gentiles are by the light and grace of God to themselves, namely, a rule of life"—BENSON.

15. Who show—"to themselves, to other men, and, in a sense, to God Himself—the work of the Law—the substance, though not the letter, of it—written on their hearts—by the same Hand which wrote the commandments on the tables of stone. Their conscience—there is none of all its faculties which the soul has less in its power than this—bearing witness. In a trial there are the plaintiff, the defendant, and the witnesses. Conscience and sin itself are witnesses against the heathens. Their thoughts sometimes excuse, sometimes condemn, them. Among themselves—alternately, like plaintiff and defendant. Accusing or even defending them. The very manner of speaking shows that they have far more room to accuse than to defend"—WESLEY.

"In their hearts. This is the force of the apostle's argument. He is proving that the Gentiles have a rule of action. And where is that rule? 'It is written in their hearts,' inscribed upon their mental faculties; a sense of moral good and evil is common to all mankind, and a secret power offered by Divine grace to embrace the one and to avoid the other"—COKE. "The Law written in their hearts. If they are injured in character, or defrauded in property, they are all learned in the Law, and philosophers in the moral code. If they steal, if they commit fornication, how cautious are they of concealment! If death approach, how dreadful are their fears! All these are dictates of conscience, emanations of the Law written in their hearts. (See Gen. 42. 21; John 8. 9)"—SUTCLIFFE. "Their conscience also bearing witness—for or against them, or testifying how far they have complied with their light or law. There is not one of all the faculties which the soul has less in its power than this. And their thoughts—or their reasonings or reflections upon their own conduct—the meanwhile, according as they do well or ill, accusing, condemning them, when they have acted contrary to their light, or else excusing, approving, and justifying them, when they have conformed to it"—BENSON.

16. In the day—"that is, who show this in the day. Everything will then be shown to be what it really is. In that day will appear the Law written in their hearts, as it often does in the present life. When God shall judge the secrets of men. On secret circumstances depends the real quality of actions, frequently unknown to the actors themselves (ver. 29). Men generally form their judgments, even of themselves, merely from what is apparent. According to my gospel—according to the tenor of that gospel which is committed to my care. Hence it appears that the gospel also is a law"—WESLEY.

"The secrets of men—not, we conceive, their secret bad actions, but, agreeably to the preceding discourse, their moral state and circumstances under different degrees of light, which are secrets now to us, or of which we are by no means competent judges. We cannot judge what capacities, opportunities, and advantages every man, in every age and country, enjoys, nor what use he makes of them; these are things only known to God"—COKE. "On secret circumstances depends the real quality of actions, frequently unknown to the actors themselves (ver. 29). Men generally form their judgments, even of themselves, merely from what is apparent"—BENSON.

17. "But if thou art called a Jew (R.V. 'But if thou bearest the name of a Jew'). This highest point of Jewish glorying, after a further description of it interposed (vers. 17–20), and refuted (vers. 21–24), is itself refuted (ver. 25, etc.). The description consists of twice five articles; of which the former five (vers. 17, 18) shows what he boasts of in himself; the other five (vers. 19, 20), what he glories in with respect to others. The first particular of the former five answers to the first of the latter; the second to the second, and so on. And restest in the Law—dependest on it, though it can only condemn thee—and gloriest in God—as thy God; and that, too, to the exclusion of others"—WESLEY.

S. Paul has expressed in vers. 13–16 the rule of judgment, that not the hearers, but the doers of the Law shall in the judgment be justified. He wishes now vividly to bring home the fact, that the conduct of the Jews, with all their conceit as to the possession and knowledge of the Law, is in sharp contradiction to that standard of judgment.

18. "Knowest His will—hast been favoured with a revelation of His own will, immediately from Himself — being instructed — being 'catechised' from your infancy, in the knowledge of Divine things"—CLARKE.

19. Blind, in darkness, ignorant, babes. "These were the titles which the Jews generally gave the Gentiles"—WESLEY.

"The Jewish doctors, in contempt of the Gentiles, were wont to speak of them as blind, in darkness, ignorant, babes, and boasted of themselves as guides, to whose direction the Gentiles, in matters of religion, ought implicitly to submit. This boasting of the Jews the apostle introduced here, to show that their sins were greatly aggravated by the revelation of which they boasted"—BENSON.

20. Having the form of knowledge and truth—"that is, the most accurate knowledge of the truth"—WESLEY.

"An instructor of the foolish. Ye believe the Gentiles to be babes and fools when compared with yourselves; that ye alone possess the only true knowledge; that ye are the only favourites of Heaven; and that all nations must look up to you as possessing the only form of knowledge, the system of eternal truth, derived from the Law. If, therefore, ye act not as becomes those who have such eminent advantages, it must be to your endless disgrace and infamy"—CLARKE.

21–23. Thou dost not teach thyself. "He does not teach himself who does not practise what he teaches. Dost thou steal, commit adultery, commit sacrilege—sin grievously against thy neighbour, thyself, God. S. Paul had shown the Gentiles, first their sins against God, then against themselves, then against their neighbours. He now inverts the order: for sins against God are the most glaring in a heathen, but not in a Jew. Thou that abhorrest idols—which all the Jews did, from the time of the Babylonish captivity. Thou committest sacrilege—doest what is worse, robbing Him 'who is God over all' of the glory which is due to Him. None of these charges were rashly advanced against the Jews of that age; for, as their own historian relates, some even of the priests lived by rapine, and others in gross uncleanness. And as for sacrilegiously robbing God and His altar, it had been complained of ever since Malachi; so that the instances are given with great propriety and judgment"—WESLEY.

"Thou therefore which teachest—a priest, a Levite, a teacher, whose lives were often very immoral, though they judged and condemned the Christians. From their moral character, he was bold to repress their pride and insolence by three questions: Dost thou steal? Dost thou commit adultery? Dost thou commit sacrilege? Where, then, is your boasted circumcision?"—SUTCLIFFE. "This appeal might be, 'Thou who art so jealous for God against idolaters, dost thou worship self and mammon in His presence?'"—C. B. "S. Paul tells the man the practical result of the conduct just described. There is one who exults in the thought that to his nation God has given an authoritative standard of right and wrong. Yet he tramples that standard under his feet; and by so doing leads others to view with contempt the God who gave it. Even the heathen saw the absurd contradiction of the man's words and works. Yet from his bold profession they supposed him to enjoy the favour of the God of the Jews. And they spoke with contempt of a Deity who, as they thought, smiled on such a worshipper. Through his profession and conduct the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles"—BEET.

25. Circumcision indeed profiteth—"he does not say, justifies. How far it profited is shown in the third and fourth chapters. Thy circumcision is become uncircumcision—is so already in effect. Thou wilt have no more benefit by it than if thou hadst never received it. The very same observation holds with regard to baptism"—WESLEY.

"Here, as in many other passages, the apostle speaks the thoughts of Jewish readers. They fancied that circumcision, by showing that they were descended from Abraham and were members of God's covenant, would ensure their salvation, though they were ever so wicked. But he tells them their circumcision would avail them only, if they practised the Law; that is, performed the things required in the covenant with Abraham (see ver. 12), in which case, as the seal of that covenant, it would give them assurance of salvation. But if they did not perform the precepts of that covenant, their circumcision would be of no use to them"—BENSON.

26. If the uncircumcision—"that is, a person uncircumcised—keep the Law (R.V. 'keep the ordinances of the Law')—walk agreeably to it—shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision—in the sight of God"—WESLEY.

"If the Gentile be found to act according to the spirit and design of the Law, his acting thus uprightly, according to the light which God has afforded him, will be reckoned to him as if he were circumcised and walked agreeably to the Law"—CLARKE.

27. Yea, the uncircumcision that is by nature—"those who are, literally speaking, uncircumcised. Fulfilling the Law—as to the substance of it. Shall judge thee—shall condemn thee in that day—who by the letter and circumcision—who having the bare, literal, external circumcision—transgressest the Law"—WESLEY.

"The comparative exemplariness of those who enjoy less means and make less profession of religion, will justly condemn those who, with greater advantages and more pretensions to piety, dishonour, by their unfaithfulness, the holy name whereby they are called"—COKE.

"Shall judge thee—shall proclaim the punishment which God will inflict"—BEET.

28. For he is not a Jew—"in the most important sense, i.e. one of God's beloved people—who is one in outward show only; neither is that the true, acceptable circumcision, which is apparent in the flesh"—WESLEY.

"He is not a genuine member of the Church of God, who has only an outward profession. Circumcision is a rite which represents a spiritual thing, viz. the change and purification of the heart, as may be seen (Jer. 4. 4, 6, 10; 9. 26; Ezek. 44. 7, 9)"—CLARKE. "We are nothing for or before God, but what we are in the inward man; all the rest is but shadow"—COKE.

29. But he is a Jew—"that is, one of God's people—who is one inwardly—in the secret recesses of his soul. And the acceptable circumcision is that of the heart—referring to Deut. 30. 6; the putting away all inward impurity. This is seated in the spirit, the inmost soul, renewed by the Spirit of God. And not in the letter—not in the external ceremony. Whose praise is not from men, but from God—the only Searcher of the heart"—WESLEY.

"Who is one inwardly—by the purification of his heart from all filthy lusts, evil affections, and sinful dispositions, and a circumcision of the heart and in the spirit—that is, a circumcision wrought in us by the Spirit of God, and not barely by the letter of the Law. And the praise of this is not of men, who cannot discern the heart, but of God, who is the Searcher of the heart. Men are very prone to rest upon church-privileges and external performances, as evidences of Divine favour, yet they are no testimonies or signs of the truth of grace. It is holiness of heart and life, the communion with God, in the exercise of faith and love, which testifies to the fulness of saving grace"—BURKITT. "From the seventeenth verse, we have a very pointed attack on the Jews, who boasted of privilege, of sacred knowledge, and despised the Gentiles; and who nevertheless committed the grossest crimes forbidden in the Law. The whole train of those arguments applies to the nominal Christians with equal force. The uncircumcised Gentile who obeyed the law of nature should be saved, while the Jew who slighted the Law of Moses should be condemned. Hence the inference, that 'he is a Jew,' or he is a Christian, 'which is one inwardly'; and circumcision is that of the heart. Learn then, O my soul, sincerely to follow the light thou hast, and the Lord will accept thee in the great day"—SUTCLIFFE.

CHAPTER III.

SECTION VI.—Vers. 1-9. THE JEWS HAVE REAL ADVANTAGES. — 1. "What then, may some say, is the advantage of the Jew, or of the circumcision?—that is, those that are circumcised, above the Gentiles"—WESLEY.

"In ch. 2. 25, S. Paul said that to those who keep the Law circumcision is profitable; and, in vers. 28, 29, that the distinctions which avail with God are not outward but inward. But circumcision is an outward ordinance. S. Paul therefore asks, What is the abovementioned benefit of it, and in what respects is a man a gainer by being a Jew? Jew and circumcision link Section viii. to Section vii. They keep before us the vain confidence expressed or implied in ch. 2. 17, 25"—BEET.

2. Chiefly in that they were entrusted with the oracles of God—"the Scriptures, in which are so great and precious promises. Other prerogatives will follow. (Ch. 9. 4, 5.) S. Paul here singles out this, by which, after removing the objection, he will convict them so much the more"—WESLEY.

"The oracles of God were entrusted to the Jews, for the good of all mankind. And the possession of them was, in S. Paul's day, the great distinction between Jews and Gentiles. While the heathen were vainly discussing the nature of the gods, the Jews were taught from childhood about Him who spoke to their fathers about the promised Deliverer. That the Jews were the first recipients of the oracles of God was in itself a sufficient proof of the advantage of being a Jew"—BEET.

3. Shall their unbelief disannul the faithfulness of God? "Will He not still make good His promises to them that do believe?"—WESLEY.

"Shall human inconstancy make God inconstant? Shall He revoke His promise to Abraham, and His oath to David? (2 Sam. 7. 25.) The promise to Abraham stands, though the rebels died; the oath to David is sure, though the sword departed not from his house. Covenants with men are futile, but with Christ they are sure. (Ps. 51. 4.) God is true; it is men who fluctuate and lie"—SUTCLIFFE.

4. "God forbid that anything should be insinuated which questions the faithfulness of God. Yea, let God be true, let Him be acknowledged true to His covenant and His promise, though every man should be esteemed a liar, and unworthy of confidence; or, though every Jew should disbelieve, and be cast off on that account"—BENSON. "Rather should we admit any charge of untruth against man, than the least against God. So David saw and wrote in his confession of his own sin; his main thought was (Ps. 51. 4) that he would own the very worst against himself, that God might be seen to punish him justly"—C. B.

5. But, "it may be further objected, if our unrighteousness be subservient to God's glory, is it not unjust in Him to punish us for it? I speak as a man—as human weakness would be apt to speak"—WESLEY.

"The mere raising of such a question as this requires an apology; it is only as a man might speak about man that he dares to utter such a thought. That, too, is an impossible objection, for if it held good there could not be any judgment. No sin would be punishable, for all sin would serve to emphasise the strict veracity of God in His denunciations of it, and therefore would ultimately conduce to His glory. It would thus cease to be sinful, and there would be nothing to hinder us from adopting the principle that is so calumniously attributed to us—that it is lawful to do evil that good may come. A calumny it is, and any such principle, with all that pertains to it, i.e. with the whole of the preceding argument, is justly condemned"—ELLICOTT.

6. God forbid. "By no means. If it were unjust in God to punish that unrighteousness which is subservient to His own glory, how should God judge the world—since all the unrighteousness in the world will then commend the righteousness of God"—WESLEY.

"By asking a second question S. Paul supports the denial with which he replies to the first. If it be unrighteous to punish the sins which show forth His own righteousness, God cannot punish anyone's sin. For all sin and all punishment will give additional proof that God is righteous. Thus the principle of the covert objection of ver. 5 would, if admitted, make it impossible for God to judge the world"—BEET.

7. But, "may the objector reply, if the truth of God hath abounded—has been more abundantly shown—through my lie—if 'my lie,' that is, practice contrary to truth, conduces to the glory of God, by making His truth shine with superior advantage — why am I still judged as a sinner? Can this be said to be any sin at all? Ought I not to do what would otherwise be evil, that so much 'good may come'? To this the apostle does not deign to give a direct answer, but cuts the objector short with a severe reproof"—WESLEY.

"If the faithfulness of God in keeping His promise made to our fathers is, through our unfaithfulness, made far more glorious than it otherwise would have been, why should we then be blamed for that which must redound so much to the honour of God?"—CLARKE. "Observe how different from the coldness of Western thought and speech is the language and tone of this verse. S. Paul meets with a man who claims immunity from punishment, because his sin will bring glory to God. He at once puts himself by the man's side and says, 'I also,' and therefore everyone else, 'may claim the same immunity'"—BEET.

8. Whose condemnation is just—"the condemnation of all who either speak or act in this manner. So the apostle absolutely denies the lawfulness of 'doing evil,' 'any evil,' 'that good may come'"—WESLEY.

"A good intention will not excuse, never justify, a bad action in the sight of God: He will condemn evil-doers, though they do evil that good may come"—BURKITT. "The last clause of this verse, whose condemnation is just, teaches that there are certain rules which God has laid down for us, disobedience to which, in any imaginable circumstances, is universally a moral evil; even though the quantity of good arising thence to our fellow-creatures should be greater than that arising from an observance of those rules"—COKE.

9. What then? "Here he resumes what he said (ver. 1). Under sin—under the guilt and power of it: the Jews, by transgressing the written Law; the Gentiles, by transgressing the law of nature"—WESLEY.

"Are we in worse case than they? (R.V.). This is a difficult verse. MEYER renders, "Are we in the position to apply a defence for ourselves?" Compare R.V. margin, "Do we excuse ourselves?"

SECTION VII. — Vers. 10-20. THE JEWS ARE CONDEMNED BY THEIR OWN LAW.—10, 11. As it is written. "That all men are under sin appears from the vices which have raged in all ages. S. Paul therefore rightly cites David and Isaiah, though they spoke primarily of their own age, and expressed what manner of men God sees, when He 'looks down from heaven'; not what He makes them by His grace. There is none righteous. This is the general proposition. The particulars follow: their dispositions and designs (vers. 11, 12); their discourse (vers. 13, 14); their actions (vers. 16-18)"—WESLEY.

The quotations from the Old Testament, extending from this point to ver. 18, are from the LXX. version of Psalms and Isaiah.

11. "There is none that understandeth—the things of God—or, lit., 'The man who understands, who seeks out God, exists not.' God looks down from heaven to see whether there are any who show their intelligence and prudence by seeking to know and to please Him. We have here the result. His eye cannot detect one righteous man. Not one acts wisely; not one makes it the object of life to find out God. All have strayed from the right path. All have together failed to attain their Maker's purpose. Not even one does good. It is evident that these words refer to Jews as well as Gentiles. Therefore S. Paul's charge in ver. 9 against the men of his day is but a repetition of an Old Testament declaration concerning the men of a former day"—BEET. The apostle's doctrine of human sinfulness (see Tit. 3. 3) is that the worst developments of individual sin only indicate the possibilities of the sinful heart in general. Passages like those cited here thus prove, not only what certain men were, but what man is. (See Jer. 17. 9)"—C. B.

12. They have all turned aside—"from the good way. They are become unprofitable — helpless, impotent, unable to profit either themselves or others"—WESLEY.

"They are together become unprofitable. Here the adjective is used to express a state of moral corruption and depravity. 'Together' means 'altogether'; 'the whole mass of mankind, with one consent, has fallen into ruin'"—BEET.

13. Their throat—"is noisome and dangerous as an open sepulchre. Observe the progress of evil discourse, proceeding out of the heart, through the throat, tongue, lips, till the whole mouth is filled therewith. The poison of asps—infectious, deadly, backbiting, tale-bearing, evil-speaking—is under (for honey is on) their lips. An asp is a venomous kind of serpent"—WESLEY.

"Their throat. By their malicious and wicked words they bury, as it were, the reputation of all men. The whole of this verse appears to belong to their habit of lying, defamation, slandering, etc., by which they wounded, blasted, and poisoned the reputation of others"—CLARKE. "'They drink iniquity like water' (Job 15. 16). These unclean things enter the heart, and defile the man"—SUTCLIFFE. "Emitting the noisome exhalations of a putrid heart"—Bishop HORNE.

14. Cursing—"against God. Bitterness—against their neighbour"—WESLEY.

"They never speak but in blasphemies and malice"—CLARKE.

15. "They make use of every means in their power to destroy the reputation and lives of the innocent"—CLARKE.

16. "Destruction and misery. If you trace their steps, you will find that they have left behind them destruction and calamity"—BEET.

17. Of peace — "which can only spring from righteousness"—WESLEY.

"Yet these men were Israelites. For the prophet declares that their sins have separated them from their God"—BEET.

18. The fear of God is not before their eyes—"much less is the love of God in their heart"—WESLEY.

"They have no sense of religion to restrain them from the commission of these enormities"—BENSON. "The want of the fear of God before our eyes is the fountain from which all other evils do proceed and flow. 'The fear of God' is the bridle and curb which restrains from sin. Where that is wanting, all iniquity abounds; where that is present and prevalent, it keeps the soul close to God (Jer. 32. 32)"—BURKITT. "The fear of God. This term is the normal expression for piety in the Old Testament; it is that disposition in man which has always God present in the heart—His will and judgment. Man may evoke or suppress this inward view of God, on which his moral conduct depends"—GODET.

19. Whatsoever the Law—the Old Testament—saith, it saith to them that are under the Law—"that is, to those who own its authority; to the Jews, and not the Gentiles. S. Paul quoted no Scripture against them, but pleaded with them only from the light of nature. Every mouth—full of bitterness (ver. 14), and yet of boasting (ver. 27)—may become guilty—may be fully convicted, and apparently liable to most just condemnation. These things were written of old, and were quoted by S. Paul, not to make men criminal, but to prove them so"—WESLEY.

"In order to bring home this testimony of Scripture more directly to the Jews, and to prevent any subterfuge by which they might attempt to shift the reference from themselves on to the Gentiles, the apostle calls attention to the fact that the Law, i.e. the Old Testament, from which he has been quoting, speaks especially to those to whom it was given. Guilty before God—rather, 'guilty to God'; the dative expresses the person to whom the penalty is due"—ELLICOTT. "S. Paul now states a principle known and admitted both by his readers and his opponents; and which immensely increases the importance of the foregoing quotations. That he speaks of the books from which the above quotations were taken as the Law, proves that these books were held by himself, his readers, and his opponents, to be an authoritative declaration of God's will concerning man's conduct, and of the principles on which He will govern and judge the world"—BEET.

20. No flesh shall be justified—"none shall be forgiven and accepted of God. By the works of the Law—on this ground, that he hath kept the Law. S. Paul means chiefly the moral part of it (vers. 9, 19; 2. 21, etc., 26), which alone is not abolished (ver. 31). And it is not without reason that he so often mentions the works of the Law, whether ceremonial or moral; for it was on these only the Jews relied, being wholly ignorant of those that spring from faith. For by the Law is only the knowledge of sin—but no deliverance either from the guilt or power of it"—WESLEY.

"Reason why the Law produces the above results. It is given in the words of Ps. 143. 2; and is therefore clothed with Old Testament authority. The writer prays God not to enter into judgment with him, on the ground that in His sight no living person is or will be righteous. That no one will be, implies that no one can be. Will not be justified, excludes justification both in this world and at the bar of God. The emphatic words, by works of Law, are added so as not to exclude justification by faith. . . . God gave the Law in order to make us conscious of our lost estate, and thus to prepare us for a revelation of righteousness through Christ. In ages to come we shall look back upon the Law, not as a failure, but as the guardian slave who drove us to Christ (Gal. 3. 24), and as an essential link of the chain which raised us from our lost estate to eternal obedience and blessedness"—BEET.

SECTION VIII.—Vers. 21–26. JUSTIFICATION THROUGH FAITH AND THROUGH CHRIST.—21. But now the righteousness of God (R.V. "But now apart from the Law a righteousness of God hath been manifested")—"that is, the manner of becoming righteous which God hath appointed—without the Law—without that previous obedience which the Law requires; without reference to the Law, or dependence on it—is manifested—in the gospel. Being attested by the Law itself, and by the Prophets—by all the promises in the Old Testament"—WESLEY.

"Righteousness of God. (Ch. 1. 17.) Manifest (ch. 1. 19) in contrast to 'hidden' (ch. 2. 28 f.; 15. 25), a state in which God's approbation is enjoyed has been made manifest once for all, i.e. set publicly before the eyes of mankind, by the appearance of Christ (2 Tim. 1. 10), and by the proclamation of the gospel. (Tit. 1. 3; Col. 1. 26.) It is day by day 'revealed in the gospel by faith' (ch. 1. 17), i.e. brought by faith into the consciousness of man as his actual possession. Apart from Law—that which could never come through the Law, which said, 'Do this and live,' has been proclaimed in the gospel without any mention of doing as a condition of life"—BEET.

22. To all—"the Jews—and upon all—the Gentiles—that believe: for there is no difference—either as to the need of justification, or the manner of it"—WESLEY.

"God's method of saving sinners is not of works, but by faith in Christ Jesus; and is not restrained to any particular people, as the Law and its privileges were, but is unto all mankind in its intention and offer, and becomes effectual to them that believe; for God hath now made no difference between the Jews and the Gentiles"—CLARKE. "Of the terms of our present admittance into the kingdom and covenant of God, he discourses in ch. 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, and of our obligations to obedience, after we are admitted, he speaks in ch. 6, 7, etc. But it is not here meant that no works or obedience but what are sinless will be accepted; or as if there were no allowance for repentance, or no benefit of pardon, now that we are taken into the kingdom and covenant of God. Pardon, upon repentance, is one of the privileges of that kingdom"—COKE.

23. For all have sinned—"in Adam, and in their own persons; by a sinful nature, sinful tempers, and sinful actions. And are fallen short of the glory of God—the supreme end of man; short of His image on earth, and the enjoyment of Him in heaven"—WESLEY.

"For all have sinned—and consequently are equally helpless and guilty; and as God is no respecter of persons, there is no reason why one should be preferred before another, therefore His endless mercy has embraced ALL"—CLARKE. "In this passage, the words 'glory of God' may be misunderstood, we use the words 'approbation of God.' Man once possessed the approval of God. God looked with joy upon His own image, the monument of His own skill (Gen. 1. 31). But man sinned, and thus lost his primal beauty. All have sinned, and thus fall short of the moral character which God approves. Therefore, in the sight of God, all human distinctions fade. And for this reason God has proclaimed salvation by the same means, for all men"—BEET.

24. And are justified—pardoned and accepted—freely—without any merit of their own—by His grace—not their own righteousness or works. Through the redemption—the price Christ has paid. Freely by His grace. "One of these expressions might have served to convey the apostle's meaning; but he doubles his assertion, in order to give us the fullest conviction of the truth, and to impress us with a sense of its peculiar importance. It is not possible to find words that should more absolutely exclude all consideration of our own works and obedience, or more emphatically ascribe the whole of our justification to free, unmerited goodness"—WESLEY.

"Justified. They receive the Judge's formal declaration that they shall not be punished. 'To justify' is to make righteous. And the righteous man is he whose conduct is right, agreeing with the standard with which it must be compared. We here meet for the first time with justification as a present blessing"—BEET. "Redemption—lit. 'ransoming.' The doctrine of the atonement thus stated is not peculiar to S. Paul, and did not originate with him. It is found in Matt. 20. 28; Mark 10. 45 (comp. 1 John 2. 2; 1 Pet. 1. 18, 19; 2. 24)"—ELLICOTT. "Redemption here denotes that kind of redemption of a captive from death, which is procured by paying a price for his life. The redemption purchased for us by Christ is deliverance from the guilt and power of sin, and the wrath of God consequent thereon, and from the power of our spiritual enemies, the devil, the world, and the flesh. (See Eph. 1. 7; Col. 1. 14; Tit. 2. 14; 1 Pet. 1. 18, 19)"—BENSON. "Being justified is qualified in three directions: those of the mode, the origin, and the means. The mode is expressed by the adverb, freely. It is not a matter of wages, it is a free gift. The origin of this gift is—His grace—God's free goodwill inclining Him to sinful man to bestow on him a favour. There is no blind necessity here; we are face to face with a generous inspiration of Divine love. The means is the deliverance wrought in Jesus Christ"—GODET. "By His grace—or 'favour' means that compassionate disposition of the Divine nature, whereby God freely remits His right of punishment, and receives penitent sinners into favour on terms which He was not bound in justice to do"—COKE.

25. Whom God hath set forth—"before angels and men—a propitiation—to appease an offended God. But if, as some teach, God never was offended, there was no need of this propitiation. And, if so, Christ died in vain. To declare His righteousness—to demonstrate not only His clemency, but His justice, even that vindictive justice whose essential character and principal office is, to punish sin. By the remission of past sins (R.V. 'Because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime')—all the sins antecedent to their believing"—WESLEY.

"The death of Christ had a twofold object or final cause—(1) It was to be, like the sacrifices of the old covenant, an offering propitiatory to God, and actualised in the believer through faith; (2) It was to demonstrate the righteousness of God by showing that sin would entail punishment, though it might not be punished in the person of the sinner"—ELLICOTT. "Divine love manifests itself in the gift of the Son, that it may be able afterwards to diffuse itself in the heart by the gift of the Spirit"—GESS. "By the appointment of God, Christ died as a sacrifice for sin, and God pardons sin through the merit of that sacrifice. Hence Christ is called 'a propitiation' (1 John 2. 2; 4. 10). By touching this doctrine, the apostle removed the great objection of the Jews and heathens against the gospel, that it had neither a priest nor a sacrifice"—MACKNIGHT. "Faith is presented under two leading views: the first is that of assent or persuasion, the second that of confidence or reliance. One is mere intellectual assent, the other is a work of the heart, a motion of the soul towards God, to lay hold upon His covenant engagements, and to rest in them"—WATSON.

26. For a demonstration of His righteousness—"both of His justice and mercy. That He might be just—showing His justice on His own Son—and yet the merciful justifier of every one that believeth in Jesus. 'That He might be just'—might evidence Himself to be strictly and inviolably righteous in the administration of His government, even while He is the merciful 'justifier' of the sinner 'that believeth in Jesus.' The attribute of justice must be preserved inviolate; and inviolate it is preserved, if there was a real infliction of punishment on our Saviour. On this plan all the attributes harmonise; every attribute is glorified, and not one superseded, no, nor so much as clouded"—WESLEY.

"To declare (R.V. 'For the showing'). The perfections of God, which were dishonoured by our rebellion, are glorified. He appears, by this method of justification, inconceivably rich in showing mercy; yet inflexibly steady in executing justice. The holiness of the Divine nature, and the dignity of the Divine government, are not only maintained, but most magnificently displayed"—COKE. "That He might be (i.e. practically, 'might be seen to be,' that He might be in His creatures' view)." "Our pardon, redemption, righteousness, are conferred by faith alone, as the sole condition of our justification; and this faith is such a belief of the gospel, by the power of the Spirit of God, as leads us to come to Christ, to receive Christ, to trust in Christ, and to commit the keeping of our souls to Him, in humble confidence of His ability and willingness to save"—SUTCLIFFE. "What was the end with a view to which this demonstration of righteousness was required at this time? The apostle answers: that He might be just, and a justifier—that is to say, 'that while being and remaining just, God might justify.' It was a great problem, a problem worthy of Divine wisdom, which the sin of man set before God—to remain just while justifying (declaring just) man who had become unjust. God did not shrink from the task. He had even solved the difficulty beforehand in His eternal counsel, before creating man free; otherwise would not this creation have merited the charge of imprudence? God had beside Him, in Christ, the means of being at once just and justifier—that is to say, just while justifying, and justifying while remaining just. . . . The cross re-establishes order by putting each in his place—the holy God on His throne, rebellious man in the dust. So long as this homage, making reparation for the past, remains without us, it does not save us; but as soon as we make it ours by faith in Jesus, it avails for us, and God can justly absolve us. By appropriating to himself the homage rendered to the majesty of God by the Crucified One, the believer is himself crucified as it were in the eyes of God; moral order is re-established, and judgment can take end by an act of absolution"—GODET.

SECTION IX.—Vers. 27–30. ALL BOASTING IS EXCLUDED.—27. "Where is the boasting then of the Jew against the Gentile? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay—this would have left room for boasting: but by the law of faith. Since this requires all, without distinction, to apply as guilty and helpless sinners, to the free mercy of God in Christ. The law of faith is that Divine constitution which makes faith, not works, the condition of acceptance"—WESLEY.

Boasting (R.V. "Glorying"). "Why is boasting shut out? By ver. 10. For its teaching rests on the truth that no man, by his own effort, can save himself from death. S. Paul looks round and cries, Where now is your exultation? It has vanished from view. It has been shut out. By what means? By a law (i.e. by a Divine proclamation of the way in which God will rule and judge His people). By what kind of law? By a law which re-echoes the voice of Moses, 'Do this and live'? No, God has shut out all boasting by promulgating a law which says, 'Believe and live.' The gospel is correctly called a law; for it is an authoritative declaration of God's will concerning us, and of the principles on which He governs us. It is a law of faith: for it requires faith; and is thus distinguished from the Mosaic Law, which required works. (Comp. John 6. 29; 1 John 3. 23.) The word 'law' reminds us that the Voice from Calvary is equal in authority to the Voice from Sinai"—BEET.

28. We conclude then that a man is justified by faith. "And even by this, not as it is a work, but as it receives Christ; and, consequently, has something essentially different from all our works whatsoever"—WESLEY.

We reckon therefore (R.V.). Many authorities read, "For we reckon"—i.e. "We reason, we maintain." "Justification from our sins is by faith alone, without respect to any works of ours, done either before or since conversion; and God will justify circumcised believers, and uncircumcised believers, one and the same way, even by the way of grace and faith"—BURKITT.

29. Surely of the Gentiles also—"as both nature and the Scriptures show"—WESLEY.

"Is He the God of the Jews only?—More lit. 'Does God belong to the Jews alone?'—i.e. as the Giver of peace and life by covenant"—MOULE. "Can it be imagined, that a God of infinite love and mercy, should limit and confine His favours to the little perverse people of the Jews, leaving all the rest of mankind in an eternally desperate condition? That would by no means agree with the idea we have of the Divine goodness, for 'His tender mercies are over all His works.' He is the God of the Gentiles also: and therefore hath established a way of justification, equally open to the Gentiles as to the Jews"—BENSON.

30. Seeing it is one God who—"shows mercy to both, and by the very same means" —WESLEY.

"The way of justification is the same to both—to the Jews by faith, and to the Gentiles, through the same faith. God shows mercy to both, and by the very same means"—BENSON. "Shall justify—the future signifies 'throughout the Christian dispensation'—wherever the Christian system extends"—ELLICOTT.

31. We establish the Law — "both the authority, purity, and the end of it; by defending that which the Law attests; by pointing out Christ, the end of it; and by showing how it may be fulfilled in its purity"—WESLEY.

"Do we then make void the Law through faith? Which is equivalent to asking, 'Does Christianity teach that the Law is no longer obligatory upon Christians, because it teaches that no man can be justified by it?' To this he answers, in the most solemn form of expression, God forbid; yea, we establish the Law" —WATSON. "The Law is holy and just and good, and is not disanulled, but established by the gospel: because by the gospel we obtain grace, in some measure, to fulfil the Law, and yield a sincere obedience to it; which for the sake of Christ's perfect and spotless obedience, shall find a gracious acceptance with God"—BURKITT. "This verse forms a true period to the whole passage (vers. 21–30). The Law had been called to give witness on the subject of the doctrine of universal condemnation; it had borne witness (vers. 7–19). It has just been cited again, and now in favour of the new righteousness; its testimony has not been less favourable (vers. 27–31)"—GODET. See WESLEY'S Sermon on this passage.)

CHAPTER IV.

SECTION X. — Vers. 1–25. ABRAHAM, AN APPARENT EXCEPTION TO THE RULE OF GRATUITOUS ACCEPTANCE, REALLY THE GREAT EXAMPLE OF IT.—"Having proved it by argument, he now proves by example, and such example as must have greater weight with the Jews than any other—(1) That justification is by faith; (2) That it is free for the Gentiles"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul introduces Abraham in order to test, by the case of the great father of the Jewish nation, the gospel which overthrows all Jewish boasting"—BEET.

1. That our father Abraham hath found —"acceptance with God. According to the flesh—that is, by works"—WESLEY.

"At the time of the Christian era the passage in Genesis relating to Abraham's faith had become a standard text in the Jewish schools—and the interest thus concentrated upon it prepared the way for the fuller and more spiritual teaching of the apostles"—LIGHTFOOT. "The flesh—i.e. human nature, in the Fall, as unrenewed and unassisted by Divine special grace"—C. B.

2. "The meaning is, if Abraham had been justified by works, he would have had room to glory. But he had not room to glory. Therefore he was not justified by works"—WESLEY.

"We may paraphrase: 'But as a fact he had no ground of boasting; for, in view of the holiness of God, that could not be even for him. And (ver. 3) Scripture bears this out in direct terms; for it records that he was accepted as believing'"—MOULE.

3. Abraham believed God—"that promise of God concerning the numerousness of his seed (Gen. 15. 5, 7); but especially the promise concerning Christ (Gen. 12. 3), through whom all nations should be blessed. And it was imputed to him for righteousness — God accepted him as if he had been altogether righteous"—WESLEY.

(So ver. 5; Ps. 106. 30, 31; 2 Cor. 5. 19.) "If Christ died not in vain, the ungodly is justified in Him alone; to whom, believing in Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is accounted for righteousness"—S. AUGUSTINE. "Wherefore Abraham, by believing, doth only embrace the grace tendered unto him, that it might not be in vain. If this be imputed unto him for righteousness, it follows that he is no otherwise righteous, but, as trusting or relying upon the goodness of God, he hath boldness to hope for all things from Him"—CALVIN. "By turning from Abraham to the sinner, S. Paul prepares the way for the quotation of the next verse. Gen. 15. 6 not only asserts that Abraham was justified by faith, but therefore implies that he was justified apart from works. Therefore he has no ground of self-exultation, but a good ground of exultation in view of God. And S. Paul, by proclaiming a new law which shuts out all boasting on the ground of works, does not overthrow, but supports, the authority of the old covenant and of the Jewish Scriptures" —BEET.

4. Now to him that worketh. "All that the Law requires, the reward is no favour, but an absolute debt. These two examples are selected and applied with the utmost judgment and propriety. Abraham was the most illustrious pattern of piety among the Jewish patriarchs. David was the most eminent of their kings. If, then, neither of these was justified by his own obedience, if they both obtained acceptance with God, not as upright beings who might claim it, but as sinful creatures who must implore it, the consequence is glaring. It is such as must strike every attentive understanding, and must affect every individual person"—WESLEY.

"If Abraham had been justified by works, the blessing he received would have been given to him as a reward for those works, and consequently his believing could have had no part in his justification, and his faith would have been useless"—CLARKE. "The two expressions—him that worketh, and him that worketh not (ver. 5)—are general and abstract, with this difference, that the first refers to any workman whatever in the domain of life, while the second applies only to a workman in the moral sense. To the hired workman who performs his task his reward is reckoned not as a favour, but as a debt. Now, according to the declaration of Moses, Abraham was not treated on this footing, therefore he is not one of those who have fulfilled their task. On the other hand, to the workman (in the moral sense) who does not labour satisfactorily, and who nevertheless places his confidence in God who pardons, his faith is reckoned for righteousness. Now, according to Moses, it is on this footing that Abraham was treated, therefore he belongs to those who have not fulfilled their task. These two harmonious conclusions—the one understood after ver. 4, the other after ver. 5—set forth the contents of the declaration of Moses: Abraham was treated on the footing, not of a good, but of a bad workman"—GODET.

5. But to him that worketh not—"it being impossible he should without faith—but believeth, his faith is imputed to him for righteousness. Therefore, God's affirming of Abraham, that faith was imputed to him for righteousness, plainly shows that he worked not; or, in other words, that he was not justified by works, but by faith only. Hence we see plainly how groundless that opinion is, that holiness or sanctification is previous to our justification. For the sinner being first convinced of his sin and danger by the Spirit of God stands trembling before the awful tribunal of Divine justice; and has nothing to plead but his own guilt, and the merits of a Mediator. Christ here interposes; justice is satisfied; the sin is remitted, and pardon is applied to the soul, by a Divine faith wrought by the Holy Ghost, who then begins the great work of inward sanctification. Thus God justifies the ungodly, and yet remains just and true to all His attributes. But let none hence presume to 'continue in sin'; for to the impenitent, God 'is a consuming fire.' On Him that justifieth the ungodly. If a man could possibly be made holy before he was justified, it would entirely set his justification aside; seeing he could not, in the very nature of the thing, be justified if he were not, at that very time, ungodly"—WESLEY.

"There can be no other mode of justification than by faith in that Christ who is Abraham's seed, and in whom, according to the promise, all the nations of the earth are to be blessed"—CLARKE. "S. Paul says, He who justifieth the ungodly. He might have said the sinner; but he chose the more forcible term to designate the evil of sin, that no category of sinners, even the most criminal, may think itself excluded from the privilege of being justified by their faith"—GODET. "Justifieth the ungodly. Guilt, therefore, precedes pardon; whilst that remains, so far are any from being justified, that they are 'under wrath,' in a state of condemnation, with which a state of justification cannot consist"—WATSON. "Justifieth the ungodly. 'Justification has respect to particular individuals, and is to be distinguished from that gracious constitution of God, by which, for the sake of Jesus Christ, He so far delivers all mankind from the guilt of Adam's sin, as to place them, notwithstanding their natural connection with the fallen progenitor of the human race, in a salvable state.' Justification is a blessing of a much higher and more perfect character, and is not common to the human race at large, but experienced by a certain description of persons in particular"—BUNTING. "Faith is imputed for righteousness, not because it carrieth any merit from us, but because it apprehends the goodness of God"—CALVIN. "S. Paul well applies to God the epithet, Him that justifieth the ungodly, this being the thing wherein the goodness and mercy of God is illustrated, since it is a fact that He gives the ungodly, who are His enemies, the most excellent thing of all He can give them, which is justification, by which they attain eternal life. God justifies the ungodly by giving him first to know his ungodliness. They who never know themselves to be ungodly, never come to be just and godly"—VALDES.

6. So David also. "David is fitly introduced after Abraham, because he also received and delivered down the promise. Affirmeth—a man is justified by faith alone, and not by works. Without works—that is, without regard to any former good works supposed to have been done by him"—WESLEY.

"Even as David also describeth (R.V. 'pronounceth'). In Ps. 32 this quotation is specially to the point, being not only an inspired statement of truth, but made by one who had been guilty of deep 'ungodliness,' and had himself experienced justification under that condition. 'Also,' i.e. as well as Moses in Genesis"—MOULE.

7. Happy are they whose sins are covered—"with the veil of Divine mercy. If there be indeed such a thing as happiness on earth, it is the portion of that man whose iniquities are forgiven, and who enjoys the manifestation of that pardon. Well may he endure all the afflictions of life with cheerfulness, and look upon death with comfort. Oh let us not contend against it, but earnestly pray that this happiness may be ours"—WESLEY.

"In David's day there were men thus justified, and he proclaims their happiness. Covered—explained by 'propitiation' (ch. 3. 25). The blood of the sacrifices cast a veil over the sin for which it was shed, and hid it from the view of the Judge. (Comp. Jas. 5. 20.) David looks to the past and future. Iniquity has been forgiven, and a veil cast over sin. We have in Ps. 32 the joyful song of a pardoned man'—BEET. "This quotation from David would have been nothing to the apostle's purpose, unless he had understood the forgiveness of sins, and the imputation of righteousness, and the non-imputation of sin, to signify the same thing as 'counting faith for righteousness,' with only this difference, that the introduction of the term 'faith' marks the manner in which the forgiveness of sin is obtained. To impute faith for righteousness is nothing more than to be justified by faith; placed by an act of free forgiveness, through faith in Christ, in the condition of righteous men, in this respect, that the penalty of the Law does not lie against them, and that they are restored to the Divine favour"—WATSON. Forgiven. The emphasis is upon this word. "Whose sins are not abolished, but forgiven; not annihilated, but covered up, removed from sight, hidden by the absolving grace of God"—ELLICOTT. "Blessed—for those things are forgiven which exposed him to the most grievous punishment. Covered—entirely removed out of sight, and thrown into oblivion"—CLARKE.

8. Impute (R.V. "Will not reckon").

9. This happiness—"mentioned by Abraham and David. On the circumcision—those that are circumcised only. (R.V. 'Is this blessing then pronounced upon the circumcision?') Faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness. This is fully consistent with our being justified—that is, pardoned and accepted by God upon our believing, for the sake of what Christ hath done and suffered. For though this, and this alone, be the meritorious cause of our acceptance with God, yet faith may be said to be 'imputed to us for righteousness,' as it is the sole condition of our acceptance. We may observe here forgiveness, not imputing sin, and imputing righteousness, are all one"—WESLEY.

"Faith was reckoned to him for righteousness—before he was circumcised. Therefore faith shall be reckoned to us for righteousness, 'if we believe in Him who raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead.' Abraham's faith rested solely on the promises"—SUTCLIFFE. "This question is very nervous. If this pardon, granted in this way, be essential to happiness—and David says it is so—then is it the privilege of the Jews exclusively? This cannot be; for, as it is by the mere mercy of God, through faith, the circumcision cannot even claim it. But, if God offer it to the circumcision, not because they have been obedient, for they also have sinned, but because of His mere mercy, then of course the same blessedness may be offered to the Gentiles who believe in the Lord Jesus"—CLARKE.

10. Not in circumcision—"not after he was circumcised; for he was justified before Ishmael was born (Gen. 15); but he was not circumcised till Ishmael was thirteen years old. (Ch. 17. 25)"—WESLEY.

"Faith was reckoned to Abraham for justification (Gen. 15. 6); but circumcision was not instituted till about fourteen or fifteen years after (Gen. 17. 1, etc.)—for faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness or justification at least one year before Ishmael was born. (Comp. Gen. 15 and 16)"—CLARKE. "There was a time in Abraham's life when, by his uncircumcision, he represented the Gentiles, as later after his circumcision he became the representative of Israel. Now if it was in the first of these two periods of his life, that is to say in his Gentilehood, that he was justified by faith . . . the conclusion was obvious at a glance. S. Paul makes full use of it against his adversaries. He expounds it with decisive consequences in the sequel"—GODET.

11, 12. "And—after he was justified—he received the sign of circumcision—circumcision, which was a sign or token of his being in covenant with God. A seal—an assurance on God's part, that He accounted him righteous, upon his believing, before he was circumcised. Who believe in circumcision—that is, though they are not circumcised"—WESLEY.

"Sign of circumcision. (Matt. 24. 30; Luke 11. 29.) Circumcision was enjoined as a visible mark or token of the covenant made by God with Abraham (Gen. 15. 18; 17. 11) in the day he believed. A seal—a solemn attestation of that to which it is annexed. It explains the meaning of the sign. (So 2 Cor. 1. 22; Eph. 1. 13; 2 Tim. 2. 19.) Among those who bear in their bodies the sign of the covenant, Abraham was to have a spiritual posterity. But his true children are those only who imitate that faith of their father which was older and nobler than circumcision. Walk—favourite metaphor with Paul (ch. 6. 4; 8. 4; 13. 13; 14. 15). Every act is a step forward in some direction"—BEET. And the father of the circumcision—"of those who are circumcised, and believed as Abraham did. To those who believe not, Abraham is not a father, neither are they his seed"—WESLEY.

"Abraham received this rite by Divine appointment, that he might also be the father of those who are circumcised, and believe as he did; for in the covenant which God made with him, He constituted him the father of all believers; and whatsoever promises were made to him and his seed were in reality made to believers of all nations, i.e. to all who, like Abraham, exercised a continued faith, and who from faith live a life of obedience to God to the end of their days. To those who do not thus believe and obey, Abraham is not a father, neither are they his seed"—BENSON.

13. The promise that he should be the heir of the world—"is the same as that he should be 'the father of all nations,' namely, of those in all nations who receive the blessing. The whole world was promised to him and them conjointly. Christ is the Heir of the world, and of all things; and so are all Abraham's seed, all that believed in Him with the faith of Abraham"—WESLEY.

Heir of the world—"describes the promise, not in the form given to Abraham, but as we, taught by the gospel, now understand it. Abraham's children, and they only, will one day possess the new earth and heaven which God will create. Abraham will look upon the new world as the reward of his own faith, because it will be given to those who have imitated that faith"—BEET. Heir of the world. "This promise was explained by the Jews of the universal sovereignty of the Messiah. Through the righteousness of faith—as a further consequence of that (imputed) righteousness which proceeds from faith"—ELLICOTT.

14. If they only who are of the Law—"who have kept the whole Law—are heirs, faith is made void—no blessing being to be obtained by it; and so the promise is of no effect"—WESLEY.

"They of the Law—they who make the Law their starting-point in seeking life, and whose claim is derived from the Law. (So Gal. 3. 10; ch. 2. 8; 3. 26; Gal. 3. 7, 9.) Heirs—those who receive the blessing in virtue of their imitation of and therefore spiritual descent from Abraham. Make vain (1 Cor. 15. 17). Of no effect (ch. 3. 3, 31; Gal. 3. 17)"—BEET. "Is made void—lit. 'emptied' of its meaning, becomes an empty name, and the promise is rendered nugatory. There is nothing left for either to do, if the votaries of the Law, simply as such, are to be the inheritors of the messianic kingdom"—ELLICOTT.

15. Because the Law—"considered apart from that grace which, though it was in fact mingled with it, yet is no part of the legal dispensation, is so difficult, and we so weak and sinful, that instead of bringing us a blessing, it only worketh wrath; it becomes to us an occasion of wrath, and exposes us to punishment as transgressors. Where there is no Law in force, there can be no transgression of it"—WESLEY.

"Where no Law is, there is no transgression. The same acts which would be harmless as to another world, had there been no Law, now since we are 'under Law,' and know we are under Law, have a very different character. They violate God's holy Law, and against every one the malediction lies"—WATSON. "But where no Law is, there are no limits to overstep. Before the Law there was sin, but it did not assume the form of transgression. If, when God gave the promise He had annexed the Law as their condition, He would have made fulfilment impossible. For none can keep the Law as it requires to be kept. Therefore God said nothing about the Law. He thus 'passed over' (ch. 3. 25) the sinfulness of those to whom He spoke, in view of the propitiation afterwards provided"—BEET. "The Law worketh wrath—that is, manifesteth it, and so seemeth to work it, as likewise affliction doth corruption in God's children; stir the puddle with a stick and the mud will soon be on the top of the water. Rub the brand and sparkles will fly abroad"—TRAPP.

16. Therefore it—"the blessing—is of faith, that it might be of grace—that it might appear to flow from the free love of God, and that the promise might be firm, sure, and effectual, to all the spiritual seed of Abraham; not only Jews, but Gentiles also, if they follow his faith"—WESLEY.

"Faith is here directly contrasted with works or merits, as it is also in all passages where justification is the subject. Faith, as it looks to God, as it is the recipient of the glad tidings, marks the freeness of grace; for what act can be more void of merit, or of moral qualifications in general, than the mere belief of good news? Faith, as it looks to man, as it brings the gospel to act on the mind, is the instrument of sanctification. Sure to all the seed. They are the children of faithful Abraham, who are the followers of his faith. And their faith produces similar effects. They give themselves up to the service of God; and thus, walking before Him, His covenant is established with them"—WATSON. According to grace—"that the fulfilment may be in proportion, not to man's merit, but to God's undeserved favour. Sure—something on which their confidence could rely, and rely safely. God made faith the condition of the promise, in order that both Jews and Gentiles may look forward with confidence to its fulfilment, a fulfilment measured not by their works but by God's grace"—BEET.

17. Before God—"though before men nothing of this appeared, those nations being then unborn. As quickening the dead. The dead are not dead to Him; and even the things that are not are before God. And calling the things that are not, summoning them to rise into being, and appear before Him. The seed of Abraham did not then exist; yet God said, 'So shall thy seed be.' A man can say to his servant actually existing, Do this, and he doeth it; but God saith to the light, while it does not exist, Go forth, and it goeth"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul goes back to the story of Gen. 17. Abraham stands as a believer in the presence of God, who beholds his faith. To God's eye the events of distant ages are present; and by Him they are completely controlled. In view of the future He says to Abraham, not 'I will,' but 'I have made thee a father of many nations.' He believed, may refer to Gen. 15 or 17. Because he believed in ch. 15, he stood before God as in ch. 17. His faith rested upon the character of Him in whose presence he stood"—BEET. God who quickeneth the dead—"He is the Creator, He gave being when there was none; He can as infallibly assure the existence of those things which are not, as if they were already actually in being. And, on this account, He can never fail of accomplishing whatsoever He has promised"—CLARKE. "Then, remember, that how depraved soever the heart may be, however hard and stubborn its habits, this God can give a new heart"—SUTCLIFFE. "God shows by His promise not only what He wills to exist for us but what He wills us to become, and what we already are in His sight, and we abstracting from our real state, and by a sublime effort taking the position which the promise assigns us, answer: Yea, I will be so; I am so. Thus it is that Abraham's faith corresponded to the promise of the God who was speaking to him face to face. It is this true notion of faith which the apostle seeks to make plain, by analysing more profoundly what passed in the heart of the patriarch at the time when he performed that act on which there rested the foundation of the kingdom of God on earth"—GODET.

18–21. "The apostle shows the power and excellence of that faith to which he ascribes justification. Who against hope—against all probability, believed and hoped in the promise. The same thing is apprehended both by faith and hope; by faith, as a thing which God has spoken; by hope, as a good thing which God has promised to us. So shall thy seed be—both natural and spiritual, as the stars of heaven for multitude"—WESLEY.

"This faith had Messiah for its great and ultimate object. And in its nature it was an entire affiance in the promise and faithfulness of God, with reference to the holy seed. So the object of that faith which is imputed to us for righteousness is Christ; Christ as having made atonement for our sins. Faith being thus understood excludes all notions of its meritoriousness"—WATSON. "Abraham's faith was a reliance upon the future, when, humanly speaking, the future promised nothing. To the end that, etc. (purpose of this faith). That what follows was the result of it. Abraham looked at his own aged body; but he looked also at the promise. He remembered that it was the promise of God. The doubt is always contrasted with faith, and proves that the faith which God requires excludes doubt. Had Abraham doubted, it would have been because he did not believe. (Comp. ch. 14. 23; Matt. 21. 21; Mark 11. 23; Jas. 1. 6)"—BEET. "It is the nature of faith to believe God upon His bare word; and that against sense in things invisible, against reason in things incredible. Sense corrects imagination, reason corrects sense, but faith corrects both. It will not be, saith sense; it cannot be, saith reason; it both can and will be, saith faith, for I have a promise for it"—TRAPP.

20. "Giving God the glory of His truth and power"—WESLEY.

"Already has He done that for us, which we had much less reason to expect or conceive than we now have to hope for anything remaining"—COKE.

21. And being fully persuaded—"his soul was full of confidence, that the truth of God bound Him to fulfil His promise, and His power enabled Him to do it"—CLARKE.

22. "For which reason God was graciously pleased to place his faith to his account; and to allow his reliance upon the Divine goodness, power, and faithfulness, for a title to the Divine blessing, which, otherwise, having been an idolater, he had no right to"—Dr. TAYLOR.

23. On his account only—"to do personal honour to him"—WESLEY.

24. But on ours also—"to establish us in seeking justification by faith, and not by works; and to afford a full answer to those who say that 'to be justified by works means only, by Judaism; to be justified by faith means, by embracing Christianity, that is, the system of doctrines so called.' Sure it is that Abraham could not in this sense be justified either by faith or by works; and equally sure that David (taking the words thus) was justified by works, and not by faith. Who raised up Jesus from the dead—as He did, in a manner, both Abraham and Sarah. If we believe on Him who raised up Jesus. God the Father therefore is the proper object of justifying faith. It is observable that S. Paul here, in speaking both of our faith and of the faith of Abraham, puts a part for the whole. And he mentions that part, with regard to Abraham, which would naturally affect the Jews most"—WESLEY.

"If we believe on, etc. To believe a promise is to lean upon Him who gave it. Raised Jesus from the dead—puts our faith beside that of Abraham as a reliance upon the power of God. Just as to him belief of the promise was impossible without an assurance that God is able to set aside the decay of nature, so now we cannot believe the gospel promise of eternal life unless we are sure that God is able to open the gates of death. For the gospel declares that God raised Christ from the dead. (Comp. ch. 10. 9; Acts 17. 18, 31)"—BEET. "In the case of Abraham, God revealed Himself by the promise of an event to be accomplished; the patriarch required therefore to believe in the form of hope, by cleaving to the Divine attribute which could realise it. In our position, now we are in presence of an accomplished fact, the display of the almighty grace of God in the resurrection of Jesus. The object of faith is therefore different in form, and yet the same in substance: God and His manifestation, then in word, now in act. What closely binds the two historical facts brought into connection, though so distant, the birth of Isaac and the resurrection of Jesus, is that they are the two extreme links of one and the same chain—the one the point of departure, the other the consummation of the history of salvation. But it must not be imagined that, because it falls to us to believe in an accomplished fact, faith is now nothing more than historical credence given to the reality of this fact. The apostle at once sets aside this thought when he says, not, 'when we believe in the resurrection of Jesus,' but, 'when we believe in God who raised Jesus.' (Comp. Col. 2. 12)"—GODET. "Faith elevates the soul to God, and ennobles all the affections. The sinner, viewing the glory and grace of Christ, penetrated with contrition for his past offences, says, concerning every promise which God has made to man, 'Let it be unto me according to Thy word'"—SUTCLIFFE.

25. "Who was delivered—to death—for our offences—as an atonement for them—and raised for our justification—to empower us to receive that atonement by faith"—WESLEY.

The apostle has, by these explanations, rendered it impossible for us to understand him as meaning anything else by faith, but the act of believing. To those who will, notwithstanding this evidence from the context, still insist upon understanding faith, in these passages, to mean the righteousness of Christ, BAXTER bluntly observes, "If it be not faith, indeed, that the apostle meaneth, the context is so far from relieving our understandings, that it contributeth to our unavoidable deceit or ignorance. Read over the texts, and put but 'Christ's righteousness' everywhere instead of the word 'faith,' and see what a scandalous paraphrase you will make. The Scripture is not so audaciously to be corrected." Raised for our justification. MEYER points out that God raised Jesus from the dead, for this object: the resurrection of the sacrificed One was required to produce in men the faith through which alone His atoning offering could be appropriated, and without which it could not attain its end—our justification.

CHAPTER V.

SECTION XII.—Vers. 1-11. THE SECURITY AND HAPPINESS OF THE STATE OF JUSTIFICATION.—1. Being justified by faith. "This is the sum of the preceding chapters. We have peace with God (R.V. 'Let us have peace')—being enemies to God no longer (ver. 10); neither fearing His wrath (ver. 9). We have peace, hope, love, and power over sin, the sum of the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth chapters. These are the fruits of justifying faith; where these are not, that faith is not"—WESLEY.

"The need of justification is established; and its equal terms for Jew and Greek, and the fact that faith is its one appointed condition; and the nature and actings of faith, specially as in Abraham's example. We now come to a fuller statement of some important details, which will lead up to a view of the effects of faith in the character and life of the justified"—MOULE. "We have peace. Justification is never alone; all the graces follow in clusters, privileges of the highest order. What need, then, for Christians so justified and ennobled to keep the Ceremonial Law! They have peace which passeth knowledge (Phil. 4. 7)"—SUTCLIFFE. "Peace—our guilty fears are silenced, and we are taught to look up to God with sweet serenity of soul. While we no longer conceive of Him as an enemy, but as a Friend and Father"—DODDRIDGE. There can be little doubt that Let us have peace is the true reading. BEET explains by a reference to ch. 4. 24. In the instance of Abraham, justification by faith was exhibited and has been recorded "for our sake." Let us then avail ourselves of it. Let us, justified by faith, have peace with God.

2. Into this grace—"this state of favour"—WESLEY.

"We do not come in our own strength; but are brought by Christ. Yet it is by faith. Had we not believed, we should still be far off. (Comp. Gal. 2. 29; 1 Pet. 1. 5.) In the favour of God we stand. (Ch. 11. 20; 1 Cor. 10. 12; 15. 1; 2 Cor. 1. 24; Eph. 6. 11-14.) To 'stand' represents the Christian life as the maintenance of our position, in spite of adversaries and burdens which would cast us down"—BEET.

3. We glory in tribulations also—"which we are so far from esteeming a mark of God's displeasure that we receive them as tokens of His fatherly love, whereby we are prepared for a more exalted happiness. The Jews objected to the persecuted state of the Christians as inconsistent with the people of the Messiah. It is therefore with great propriety that the apostle so often mentions the blessings arising from this very thing"—WESLEY.

We glory—same word as "rejoice" in ver. 2. (See ch. 8. 35-39 for a noble example of such rejoicing. See, too, Matt. 5. 11; Acts 5. 41; Heb. 10. 34; 1 Pet. 1. 5-9, and Jas. 1. 2, 4.) "Another exultation. Even the afflictions (ch. 2. 9) which were so great a part of their outward life, increase their joyful hope. This arises from knowing the purpose and effect of these troubles. In spite of them S. Paul and his readers hold on their way. And thus the trials call forth in them an 'endurance' (ch. 2. 7) and perseverance which otherwise would be unknown. Our endurance increases our hope of victory, but only by giving proof of the strength of the arm on which we lean. (Comp. Acts 5. 41; 2 Cor. 12. 9; Phil. 1. 28; Jas. 1. 2-4)"—BEET. Tribulation worketh patience—"is a principle of personal religion which we may carry into our relation to the great fellowship. The kingdom is one of slow development, and all who serve it must wait in patience, which is, like charity, one of its royal laws"—POPE. "Tribulation teaches the believer the possibility and blessedness of 'patient continuance in well-doing'"—C. B.

4. "And patience works more experience of the sincerity of our grace, and of God's power and faithfulness"—WESLEY.

And patience, experience (R.V. "And patience, probation, and probation hope").

"The patient enduring of tribulation gives us more experience of the truth and degree of our grace, of God's care of us, and of His power and love, and faithfulness engaged in supporting us under our sufferings, and causing them to work for our good"—BENSON.

5. Hope shameth us not (R.V. "And hope putteth not to shame")—"that is, gives us the highest glorying. We glory in this our hope, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts—the Divine conviction of God's love to us, and that love to God which is both the earnest and the beginning of heaven. By the Holy Ghost—the efficient cause of all these present blessings, and the earnest of those to come"—WESLEY.

"A hope that is not rationally founded will have its expectation cut off; and then shame and confusion will be the portion of its possessor. But our hope is founded on the goodness and truth of God, and our religious experience shows that we have not misapplied it, nor exercised it on improper objects"—CLARKE. "By the Holy Ghost. Their spiritual gifts were clear proofs of the love which God bears to them, and of His will that they should be saved"—COKE. "This verse is the central saying of the entire passage. On the one hand, it is directly connected with the two first verses: 'We no longer feel any fear; nay, rather, we triumph in the hope of glory, a hope which is rendered brighter even by suffering.' On the other hand, this verse contains all that follows. This hope will not be falsified in the end by the event, that is what the second part of the passage proceeds to prove (vers. 6–11). The word make ashamed refers to the non-realisation of the hope when the hour of glory has struck. The present maketh not ashamed is the present of the idea. . . . The matter in question in the context is the terrible position of the justified man who in the day of judgment should find himself suddenly face to face with unappeased wrath. S. Paul declares such a supposition impossible. Why? Because the source of his hope is the revelation of God Himself, which he has received, of the love of which he is the object. The reawakening of wrath against him is therefore an inadmissible fact"—GODET.

6. "How can we now doubt of God's love? For when we were without strength—either to think, will, or do anything good—in due time—neither too soon nor too late; but in that very point of time which the wisdom of God knew to be more proper than any other—Christ died for the ungodly—not only to set them a pattern, or to procure them power to follow it. It does not appear that this expression, of dying for anyone, has any other signification than that of rescuing the life of another by laying down our own"—WESLEY.

"Without strength (R.V. 'Were yet weak'). Christ not only died to set us an example, or to procure us power to follow it, but to atone for our sins"—BENSON. "The apostle having pointed out the glorious state of the believing Gentiles, contrasts this with their former state, and the means by which they were redeemed from it. They were, and we are, without strength; have lost our principle of spiritual power. Ungodly. The mind which was made for God is no longer His residence. For such Christ died"—CLARKE. "Christ died for us, when we were yet weak (R.V. 'powerless')—unable to save ourselves, either by atonement for the past, or by future obedience. In due season—at the most suitable point of time (Gal. 4. 4). This is in part evident even to us, and is an additional proof of God's love. S. Paul has plainly taught us in ch. 3. 24–26, of which this is an historical summary, that by God's appointment Christ saved us from death by Himself dying"—BEET.

7. A just man—"one who gives to all what is strictly their due. The good man—one who is eminently holy; full of love, of compassion, kindness, mildness, of every heavenly and amiable temper. Perhaps—one—would—even—dare to die. Every word increases the strangeness of the thing, and declares even this to be something great and unusual"—WESLEY.

"A merely just and righteous man would be admired, but he would not so take hold of the heart of another as to produce a willingness to die for him; yet peradventure, in some rare case, for a good man, a man of benevolence, adorned with the softer virtues, and abounding in the distribution of his favours,—for such a one some would even dare to die. Some one, overcoming even the love of life in the fulness of his gratitude, might venture to give him his own life to preserve that of such a one. But we were neither just nor good, we were sinners, and 'God commendeth His love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us'"—WATSON.

8. "But God recommendeth—a most elegant expression. Those are wont to be recommended to us, who were before either unknown to, or alienated from, us. While we were sinners—so far from being good, that we were not even just"—WESLEY.

"This verse develops the proof of God's love afforded by the contrast between what we can with difficulty conceive a man to do even for the best, and what Christ has already done for sinners. Just as the death of the sinless One gives proof of His love, this event of the past is ever present to us, and each day gives proof of God's love"—BEET. "As regards the wording of the verse, it is lit. 'For hardly for a just man will one die; for the good man, perhaps, one actually dares to die.' The whole point of the verse is that such acts of even such love among men are very rare and very limited indeed"—C. B.

9. By His blood (R.V. "Being now justified by His blood")—"by His bloodshedding—

we shall be saved from wrath through Him —that is, from all the effects of the wrath of God. But is there then wrath in God? Is not wrath a human passion? And how can this human passion be in God? We may answer this by another question: Is not love a human passion? And how can this human passion be in God? But to answer directly: wrath in man, and so love in man, is a human passion. But wrath in God is not a human passion; nor is love, as it is in God. Therefore the inspired writers ascribe both the one and the other to God only in an analogical sense"—WESLEY.

"Since it hath pleased God to give us such an unexampled display of His love as this, how high may our expectations rise, and how confidently may we conclude, that we shall be saved from wrath through Him! If He so loved us when we were mere guility sinners, we may assure ourselves, that having now constituted us as righteous, and accepted us as such, He will certainly save us from eternal damnation"—BENSON. "If God were so benign to us before our conversion, what may we not expect from Him now we are converted!"—WATSON. "Saved. We are justified when we believe, but not finally saved and safe until the battle of life is over. (So ch. 10. 10; 12. 11; Phil. 1. 19; 1 Thess. 5. 8; 2 Tim. 2. 10.) Our deliverance is begun (ch. 8. 24), and advances with every victory. This verse looks to the past, and from it draws an inference for the future. If God loves us so much as to pardon our sins at the cost of the blood of Christ, He will not leave us to perish for our sins in the day of judgment"—BEET.

10. If—"'As sure as'—so the word frequently signifies; particularly in this and the eighth chapter. We shall be saved—sanctified and glorified—through His life—who 'ever liveth to make intercession for us'"—WESLEY.

The enmity to goodness and to God which previously existed rendered reconciliation necessary, and the death of His Son by which it was made possible, also purchased the fulness of salvation. He died for our sins, and He rose again for our justification, and this justification, with every blessing resulting from it, is as possible as the godly sorrow which preceded it. In His life (ch. 8. 1) we have peace, and we also joy in God (ver. 11). His life. Not merely through His intercession (ch. 8. 34), but also through His whole working in His kingly office"—MEYER.

11. And not only so, but we also glory. "The whole sentence, from the third to the eleventh verse, may be taken together thus: We not only 'rejoice in hope of the glory of God,' but also in the midst of tribulations we glory in God Himself, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation"—WESLEY.

Atonement (R.V. "Reconciliation") now—in this present time. The full rewards of justification will not be ours till we "see Him" by whom we live. But even now we have a foretaste of the heavenly blessedness. We rejoice in God during the earthly pilgrimage as surely as those who have gained His "presence" dwell in the fulness of joy." Indeed, our hope of all that Christ has promised, when we shall "see Him as He is," is strengthened by the assurance of His favour, while so much remains simply a matter of faith in His word. "Now are we the sons of God."

SECTION XII.—Vers. 12-19. THE CURSE OF ADAM IS REVERSED.—12. Therefore. "This refers to all the preceding discourse; from which the apostle infers what follows. He does not therefore properly make a digression, but returns to speak again of sin and of righteousness. As by one man—Adam, who is mentioned, and not Eve, as being the representative of mankind—sin entered into the world—actual sin, and its consequence, a sinful nature. And death—with all its attendants. It 'entered into the world' when it entered into being; for till then it did not exist. By sin—therefore it could not enter before sin. Even so—namely, by one Man. In that—so the word is used also (2 Cor. 5. 4). All sinned—in Adam. These words assign the reason why death came upon all men; infants themselves not excepted, in that all sinned"—WESLEY.

"Here begins an important section, closing with the chapter. In point of language, and of links of thought, it is occasionally difficult, and moreover deals with the deep mystery of the effects of the Fall"—MOULE. "By one man—that is, by the wilful act of one man. (Comp. 1 Cor. 15. 21, 22, 45-49.) Sin, in this verse and Epistle, is not a mere act, but a living, ruling, hostile, deadly power. (Ch. 5. 21; 6. 12 f., 17, etc.) S. Paul here assumes that there was a time when man was beyond its dominion (Gen. 1. 31). For through one man sin entered into the world. The spirit of evil, although he had crept into Paradise, was, until man sinned, outside the sphere in which man lived. S. Paul sees everywhere the fatal power of sin, and looks back to the moment of Adam's disobedience as the entrance into our world of this fearful foe. He teaches plainly (see ver. 19) that just as we share the punishment, so in some sense we share the sin of Adam"—BEET. "The verse describes the entrance of death into the world. The emphasis is on the words: by one man. Adam is here characterised not merely as the first of sinners, but as the one who laid human life open to the power of sin. The term sin should be taken here in its greatest generality. The apostle is not speaking specially of sin either as a tendency or an act, either as an individual act or as a collective fact, but of the principle of revolt whereby the human will rises against the Divine in all its different forms and manifestations"—GODET.

13. For until the Law sin was in the world—All, I say, had sinned, for sin was in the world long before the written Law; but, I grant, sin is not so much imputed, nor so severely punished by God, where there is no express Law to convince men of it. Yet that all had sinned, even then, appears in that all died"—WESLEY.

The Scriptures own no other imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity than of Christ's righteousness to those that believe. The righteousness of Christ is imputed or given to those that believe, not in the letter and formality of it, but in blessings, privileges, and benefits purchased of God by the merit of it. So the sin of Adam is imputed to his posterity, not in the letter and formality of it (which is the imputation commonly urged), but in the demerit of it, that is, in the curse or punishment due to it"—WATSON. not imputed—so as to bring penalty. Therefore, had there been in no sense a (broken) law in the primeval age, there would have been no death. But death was universal.

14. Death reigned. "And how vast is his kingdom! Scarce can we find any king who has as many subjects, as are the kings whom he hath conquered. Even over them that had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression. Even over infants who had never sinned, as Adam did, in their own persons; and over others who had not, like him, sinned against an express law. Who is the figure of Him that was to come—each of them being a public person, and a federal head of mankind. The one, the fountain of sin and death to mankind by his offence; the other, of righteousness and life by His free gift. Thus far the apostle shows the agreement between the first and Second Adam; afterwards he shows the differences between them. The agreement may be summed up thus: As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so by one Man righteousness entered into the world, and life by righteousness. As death passed upon all men, in that all had sinned, so life passed upon all men (who are in the Second Adam by faith), in that all are justified. And as death through the sin of the first Adam reigned even over them who had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression, so through the righteousness of Christ, even those who have not obeyed, after the likeness of His obedience, shall reign in life. We may add, As the sin of Adam, without the sins which he afterwards committed, brought us death, so the righteousness of Christ, without the good works which we afterwards perform, brings us life: although still every good, as well as evil, work, will receive its due reward"—WESLEY.

"Death reigned from Adam to Moses. A visible and well-known fact, that men in those ages died as to the body, since he could not intend that all the generations of men, from Adam to Moses, died eternally. The death of the body is the first effect of the imputation of Adam's sin to his descendants, as stated in this chapter. A second is necessarily implied; a state of spiritual death—the being born into the world with a corrupt nature, always tending to actual offence. A third consequence is a conditional liability to eternal death, for that state which makes us liable to actual sin makes us also liable to actual punishment. But this is conditional, not absolute; for since the apostle makes the obedience of Christ available to the forgiveness of the 'many offences' we may commit in consequence of the corrupt nature we have derived from Adam, and this extends to all men, they can only perish by their own fault"—WATSON. "From this whole argument it appeared that Adam had been the sole author of the reign of death, and herein precisely was he the counterpart of Him who was to come to be the sole principle of life here below. Thus it is easy to understand why the apostle, after explaining the origin of death, closes with these words, appropriately introducing the statement of the other member of the parallel: Who is the type of the Adam that was to come"—GODET.

15. Yet not. "S. Paul now describes the difference between Adam and Christ; and that much more directly and expressly than the agreement between them. Now the Fall and the free gift differ (1) In amplitude (ver. 15); (2) He from whom sin came, and He from whom the free gift came (termed also 'the gift of righteousness') differ in power (ver. 16); (3) The reason of both is subjoined (ver. 17); (4) This premised, the offence and the free gift are compared, with regard to their effect (ver. 18), and with regard to their cause (ver. 19)"—WESLEY.

"The offence (R.V. 'the trespass'—lit. 'stumbling'). In every view, as S. Paul elsewhere says, the condition of man is bettered by the mediation of Christ. He has higher glory, a better paradise, and a more blessed hope, than Adam lost. And, as sin and death came on all, the free gift comes with more abundant grace on every believer"—SUTCLIFFE. "Believers shall by Christ be brought to a much nobler and more excellent life than that from which Adam fell, and which they lost in him"—BENSON. "Redemption is a positive exercise of surpassing grace and love, resulting in a glorious and eternal reversal, in the subjects of it, of the previous ruin; indeed, more than a reversal, because it brings with it the exaltation given to the brethren of the Second Adam. The much more here, and in ver. 17, is thus—q.d. 'The fall of the first Adam caused vast results of evil; the work of the far greater Second Adam shall much more cause vast results of good'"—S. C.

16. The sentence was by one offence to

Adam's condemnation—"occasioning the sentence of death to pass upon him, which, by consequence, overwhelmed his posterity. But the free gift is of many offences unto justification (R. V. 'The free gift came of many trespasses unto justification')—unto the purchasing it for all men notwithstanding many offences"—WESLEY.

"Such is sin, that Adam's sin brought death on all men; such is grace, that innumerable sins are, through the propitiation, 'abundantly pardoned.' The hereditary guilt and doom of the Fall is very distinctly taught in this verse. But the gift exceeds the ruin; for while the result of Adam's sin was just the lawful reign of death over men as sinners, the result of Christ's work shall be not a mere reversal of this, but the reign of justified men over death in glory"—LIAS.

17. "There is a difference between grace and the gift. Grace is opposed to the offence; the gift, to death, being the gift of life"—WESLEY.

"Notice the tone of triumph of this verse. Through Adam's sin death became our king. Although we look forward with certainty and joy to the day of deliverance, we cannot but recognise his sway. His dread summons we are compelled to obey. But the day is coming when, upon the throne now occupied by death, ourselves will sit in endless life. Through one man death became our king; through one Man we shall obtain eternal royalty"—BEET.

18. Justification of life—"is that sentence of God, by which a sinner under sentence of death is adjudged to life"—WESLEY.

The salvation wrought by the righteousness and obedience of Christ is a common salvation, provided for and freely offered to all men. It includes not only a justification that frees from death but that entitles to life.

19. As by the disobedience of one man many—"that is, 'all men'—were constituted sinners—being then in the loins of their first parent, the common head and representative of them all—so by the obedience of One—by His obedience unto death; by His dying for us—many—all that believe—shall be constituted righteous—justified, pardoned"—WESLEY.

"Obedience. This term is chosen in contradistinction to the disobedience of Adam. The obedience of Christ was an element in the atonement. (Comp. Phil. 2. 8, where it is said that He 'became obedient unto death'; and Heb. 10. 7, 'Lo, I come to do Thy will, O God,' specially in connection with the atonement)"—ELLICOTT. "With the disobedience of one there is contrasted the obedience of one. Some understand hereby the expiatory sacrifice of Jesus. But as in the Levitical cultus the victim required to be without blemish, so in the true expiatory sacrifice the Victim required to be without sin. It is impossible, therefore, to isolate the death of Christ here from His holy life; and the term 'obedience' embraces both. (Comp. Phil. 2. 8)"—GODET. "In accordance with the plain statements of Scripture, I hold that Christ died for all men; that He died as much for one man as for another; and that God's purpose of salvation embraces the race. In stating my views, I need no plainer words than those which Christ and His apostles have put into my lips. And these plain words of Scripture are not contradicted by any others. Apart of Christ, all men are dying. Looked at in view of eternity, and of eternal death, all advantages less than salvation are absolutely worthless. Unless Christ died in order to save all men, He did not in any sense whatever die for all men. Not only are we never taught that Christ died for one man in a higher, for another in a lower, sense; but such a distinction is impossible"—BEET.

SECTION XIII.—Vers. 20, 21. THE LAW WAS GIVEN TO PREPARE FOR THIS.—20. The Law came in between "the offence and the free gift. That the offence might abound—that is, the consequence (not the design) of the Law's coming in was, not the taking away of sin, but the increase of it. Yet where sin abounded, grace did much more abound—not only in the remission of that sin which Adam brought on us, but of all our own; not only in remission of sins, but infusion of holiness; not only in deliverance from death, but admission to everlasting life, a far more noble and excellent life than that which we lost by Adam's fall"—WESLEY.

"And the Law came in beside, that the trespass might abound (R.V.). The Law illustrates the plenitude of the obedience we owe to God, and by consequence demonstrates the shame, the baseness, the turpitude of sin, as reflected in that celestial mirror. There only can the real contrast between sin and holiness, love and hatred, be seen"—SUTCLIFFE. "Grace did much more abound. Not only is pardon for all that is past offered by the gospel, but also the Holy Spirit, in the abundance of His gifts and graces, is communicated. Thus the grace of the gospel not only redeems from death and restores to life, but brings the soul into such a relationship with God, and into such a participation of eternal glory, as we have no authority to believe ever would have been the portion of Adam himself, had he even eternally retained his innocence"—CLARKE.

21. That as sin had reigned—so grace also might reign—"which could not reign before the Fall, before men had sinned—through righteousness to eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord. Here is pointed out the source of all our blessings—the rich and free grace of God. The meritorious cause—not any work of righteous man, but the alone merits of our Lord Jesus Christ. The effect or end of all—not only pardon, but life; Divine life, leading to glory"—WESLEY.

"That as sin hath reigned unto death. In the wide and universal destruction made of those whom it had brought under that fatal sentence—so grace might reign—which could not reign before man had sinned, through righteousness imputed, implanted, and practised; through the justification of men's persons, the renovation of their natures, and their practical obedience to God's holy Law—unto eternal life by Christ Jesus our Lord. Here is pointed out—(1) The source of all our blessings—the rich and free grace of God; (2) The meritorious cause; not any works or righteousness of man, but alone the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ; (3) The effect or end of all—not only pardon, but life, Divine life leading to glory"—BENSON. "We have reached the close of the fundamental part of the treatise which forms the body of the Epistle. In the first section S. Paul had demonstrated universal condemnation. In the second he had expounded universal justification obtained by Christ and offered to faith. The third section has furnished the demonstration of the second, founding on the fact of the condemnation of all in one, rendered indubitable by the reign of death, and proceeding to establish the fact of the justification of all in one. The question now arises, whether the mode of justification thus expounded and demonstrated can secure the moral renewal of mankind, and explain the theocratic history of which it is the consummation. Such is the subject of the two following parts"—GODET.

CHAPTER VI.

SECTION XIV.—Vers. 1-10. IN THE DEATH OF CHRIST WE DIED TO SIN.—1. "The apostle sets himself more fully to vindicate his doctrine from the consequence above suggested (ch. 3). He had then only in strong terms denied and renounced it; here he removes the very foundation thereof"—WESLEY.

"What shall we say then?—What use shall we make of this sweet and comfortable doctrine? Shall we do evil that good may come? Shall we sin the more, because the more sin we commit the more will the grace of God be magnified in our pardon? Is this the use to be made of it? God forbid. Opinions that give any countenance to sin, or open a door to immoralities, how plausible soever they be rendered, by the pretension of advancing free grace, are to be rejected with the greatest abhorrence; for the truth as it is in Jesus is a truth according to godliness" (Tit. 1. 1)—M. HENRY.

2. Dead to sin—"freed both from the guilt and from the power of it"—WESLEY.

"We must not continue in sin, because God's purpose is that we be dead to sin, and living for God (Section XV.); and because sin is obedience to an enemy whose purpose is death (Section XVII.). Died to sin (vers. 10, 11; 7. 4; Gal. 2. 19; 6. 14)—separated by death from all contact with sin. For our chief idea of death is complete separation from the world in which we lived"—BEET.

3. As many as have been baptized into Jesus Christ, have been baptized into His death. "In baptism we, through faith, are ingrafted into Christ; and we draw new spiritual life from this new root, through His Spirit, who fashions us like unto Him, and particularly with regard to His death and resurrection"—WESLEY.

"Why has baptism this special connection with the death of Christ? In the first place, the death of Christ is the central and cardinal fact of the Christian scheme. It is specially related to justification, and justification proceeds from faith, which is ratified in baptism. In the second place, the symbolism of baptism was such as naturally to harmonise with the symbolism of death. It was the final close of one period, and the beginning of another—the complete stripping off of the past, and putting on of the 'new man'"—ELLICOTT.

4. We are buried with Him—"alluding to the ancient manner of baptizing by immersion. That as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory—glorious power—of the Father, so we also, by the same power, should rise again; and as He lives a new life in heaven, so we should walk in newness of life. This, says the apostle, our very baptism represents to us"—WESLEY.

"Walk in newness of life—as Christ being raised from the dead lives a new life in heaven"—BENSON. "Newness of life supposes newness of heart, for out of it are the issues of life; and there is no way of making the streams sweet, but making the spring so. All things become new. The man is what he was not, doth what he did not"—M. HENRY. "The principle of regeneration in our hearts is no other than the Divine nature, producing a death to sin and a life to righteousness"—SUTCLIFFE. "It requires the same 'glorious energy' to quicken the dead sinner, as to raise from the grave the dead Christ"—CLARKE.

5. For. "Surely these two must go together; so that if we are indeed made conformable to His death, we shall also know the power of His resurrection"—WESLEY.

"Proof that our burial with Christ was designed to lead to a life altogether new. United in growth. Our union with Christ is such that His human development is our development; that the facts of His human life reproduce themselves in us. They are already reproduced in our spirits, and will be in our bodies. (Phil. 3. 21.) Likeness (ch. 1. 23; 5. 14)—by union with Him we spiritually undergo a death like His. We shall be—as in ch. 4. 24; 5. 14, 19. For S. Paul was himself already (Gal. 2. 20) living a resurrection life"—BEET.

6. Our old man—"coeval with our being, and as old as the Fall; our evil nature—a strong and beautiful expression for that entire depravity and corruption which by nature spreads itself over the whole man, leaving no part uninfected. This in a believer is crucified with Christ, mortified, gradually killed, by virtue of our union with Him. That the body of sin—all evil tempers, words, and actions, which are the 'members' of the 'old man' (Col. 3. 5), might be destroyed"—WESLEY.

Here we have a further description of the destruction of sin. "Our old self" must be crucified, i.e. put to death—as surely as Christ was on the cross. Any less stringent process will fail to conquer the evil of our nature. The experience is painful, but absolutely necessary, that henceforth we should not serve sin. Without such a crucifixion, a man may abstain from sinful actions, but the old affections and inclinations will remain. He who would "walk in newness of life," must not only "mortify," so as to humiliate, but "crucify," and so destroy "the body of sin."

7. For he that is dead—"with Christ—is freed from the guilt of past, and from the power of present sin, as dead men from the commands of their former masters"—WESLEY.

Freed from sin—"from all its obligations, and from its condemning power. He in whose heart Christ lives, and grace reigns, is dead to his old habits of sin, as a dead man is to the duties of life. Though this may not be generally the case, yet S. Paul gives the perfect enjoyment of one who, like himself, could say, 'I live not, but Christ liveth in me'"—SUTCLIFFE.

8. Dead with Christ—"conformed to His death, by dying to sin"—WESLEY.

Conformed to His death by dying to sin, then may we be conformed to Him in life also. We shall live in fellowship with Him here, as surely as with Him in eternal glory hereafter. GODET says: "Jesus, from the depths of His heavenly state, communicates Himself to the man who has appropriated His death by faith, and thus fills up with His holy life the void formed in us by the renunciation of our own life."

9. Once, that is at His crucifixion, death had dominion over Christ. If the belief of ver. 8 is to be unfaltering and comforting, it must rest upon the truth that death hath no more dominion over Him.

10. He died to sin—"to atone for and abolish it. He liveth unto God—a glorious eternal life, such as we shall live also"—WESLEY.

"Nothing is more clearly taught in this Epistle than that the death of Christ was a sacrifice for sin; an atonement for guilty man, and accepted as such by God. The first proposition of this verse unfolds the reason why death was allowed to reign over Him for a little; the second explains the reason why this cannot be repeated. . . . The relation which Jesus sustained to sin was the sole cause of His subjection to death. He died to expiate sin, and to destroy it. There was a moment in His existence in which He bore its penalty, and thereby established its defeat. But this moment was short, and remains single and alone. Such is the force of the term once for all. It was a transient necessity which He consented to encounter; but such a crisis will not be renewed. The debt once paid is so, completely and for ever. (Comp. Heb. 7. 27; 9. 12, 26, 28; 10. 10; 1 Pet. 3. 18)"—GODET.

SECTION XV.—Vers. 11–14. THEN SERVE SIN NO MORE.—The words in Christ are all-important with S. Paul and S. John. They are explained in John 15. 1–7. Christ is the life-giving element in which we live and breathe; the root from which as branches we each moment draw our life.

12. Let not sin reign even in your mortal body. "It must be subject to death, but it need not be subject to sin"—WESLEY.

"Sin is represented as a king, a tyrant, who has the desires of the mind and the members of the body under his control; so that, by influencing the passions, he governs the body. Do not let sin have any place or being in you, or it will have dominion"—CLARKE.

13. Neither present your members to sin—"to corrupt nature, a mere tyrant—but to God—your lawful King"—WESLEY.

"To obey the desires of the body is to place them under the power of sin, and so to put ourselves in hostility to God; whereas our duty is to consecrate all our powers to Him. Present yourselves to God. Place your powers at His disposal—i.e. resolve that henceforth you will exist, and use all your powers, opportunities, and time, to work out His purposes. To resolve that God shall be the aim of our being is to resolve that our lips shall speak His message, our hands do His work, our feet run on His errands, and our lips show forth His praise"—BEET.

14. Sin shall not have dominion over you. "It has neither right nor power. For ye are not under the Law—a dispensation of terror and bondage, which only shows sin, without enabling you to conquer it—but under grace—under the merciful dispensation of the gospel, which brings complete victory over it to everyone who is under the powerful influences of the Spirit of Christ"—WESLEY.

"Laws are simply aids to weak folks, to tell them where to go, to help them to go, and to make them remember the next time if they do not go. If a man has a direct inspiration of God; or if his culture has gone so high that he does not need these external stimulants; or if he has another sphere of influences, which lead him to the same things from a higher point of view, the lower ones drop, not because they are wrong, but because the man is doing the same things better by a different set of instruments. Therefore it is, that there is no law to some men"—BEECHER.

SECTION XVI. — Vers. 15–23. EXPERIENCE PROVES HOW BAD IS THE SERVICE OF SIN.— 15. What then? — Shall we commit sin because the purpose of God's rule is not to treat us according to our conduct, but to do us good? The man of ch. 2. 4 did so. We must not be careless about the commands of God because God has promised to forgive sin.

16. Know ye not—a self-evident truth, that bond-service, once accepted, becomes binding, and forbids divided servitude; — this is true of the obligations of pardon as those of condemnation.

17. "The form of doctrine into which ye have been delivered — literally it is, The mould into which ye have been delivered— which, as it contains a beautiful allusion, conveys also a very instructive admonition; intimating that our minds, all pliant and ductile, should be conformed to the gospel precepts, as liquid metals take the figure of the mould into which they are cast"—WESLEY.

But thanks be to God, that, whereas ye were servants of sin, ye became obedient from the heart to that form of teaching whereunto ye were delivered (R.V.). "The verse proves that given up does not necessarily imply, though it frequently refers to, surrender to a hostile power. (So Acts 14. 26.) In the providence of God these people were handed over to the gospel as preached by S. Paul, that their hearts and lives might be moulded by it. And they obeyed the teaching under which they were placed. The patriarchs and Israelites, under Moses and under the Prophets, were handed over to another type of teaching"— BEET. "The apostle does not thank God that they were sinners; but that, although they were such, they had now received and obeyed the gospel"—CLARKE.

18. "Being then set free from sin. We may see the apostle's method thus far at one view:—

	CHAP.	VER.
1. Bondage to sin, . . .	III.	9
2. The knowledge of sin by the Law; a sense of God's wrath; inward death, .	III.	20
3. The revelation of the righteousness of God in Christ through the gospel, . .	III.	21
4. The centre of all, faith, embracing that righteousness	III.	22
5. Justification, whereby God forgives all past sin, and freely accepts the sinner, .	III.	24
6. The gift of the Holy Ghost: a sense of God's love; new inward life	V.	5
	VI.	4
7. The free service of righteousness, ...	VI.	12" —WESLEY.

"Then we may be made free from sin— free from its dominion and its curse. This glorious freedom involves a blessed servitude. He who frees them from sin claims their obedience, and promises abundant reward. They now obey one whose essence is conformity to the Law of God"—BEET.

19. I speak after the manner of men. "Thus it is necessary that the Scripture should let itself down to the language of men — because of the weakness of your flesh. Slowness of understanding flows from the weakness of the flesh, that is, of human nature. As ye have presented your members servants to uncleanness and iniquity unto iniquity, so now present your members servants of righteousness unto holiness. 'Iniquity' (whereof uncleanness is an eminent part) is here opposed to 'righteousness'; and 'unto iniquity' is the opposite of 'unto holiness.' 'Righteousness' here is a conformity to the Divine will; 'holiness,' to the whole Divine nature. Observe, they who are 'servants of righteousness' go on to 'holiness'; but they who are 'servants to iniquity' get no further. Righteousness is service, because we live according to the will of another; but liberty, because of our inclination to it, and delight in it"—WESLEY.

"I speak as a man. (Ch. 3. 5.) It might seem improper to describe believers by the common term used for slaves. But S. Paul teaches Divine things by the words of common life, and now warns us to distinguish carefully between the outward form and the underlying truth. In one sense, we are slaves of God; in another, we are not. The warning applies to the entire teaching of the Bible. In revelation God always speaks as a man"— BEET. "To uncleanness, and to iniquity. Wicked men take great pains for hell; would they but take the same for heaven, they could not likely miss of it"—TRAPP. "The lusts which war in the members are but weapons, instruments. You must therefore look to the higher powers of sin in the soul, to the throne of unrighteousness there, whose agents those lusts are"—GOODWIN.

20. When ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. "In all reason, therefore, ye ought now to be free from unrighteousness; to be as uniform and zealous in serving God as ye were in serving the devil"—WESLEY.

For when ye were servants of sin, ye were free in regard of righteousness (R.V). "These two servitudes are incompatible; if we cannot serve God and Mammon, surely we cannot serve Christ and Satan" — CLARKE. "If there is any bondage in doing right, at that time they were free from it. They have therefore given the service of sin a fair trial"— BEET.

21. Those things. "He speaks of them as afar off"—WESLEY.

To be ashamed of sin is one of the gracious, if painful experiences of life; and to remember the end of all evil, should make men hate this great curse of our race.

22. "But now being made free from sin.

While in the flesh we are said to be the servants of sin, and under the law of sin; but now, by a regenerate state, we are made the servants of righteousness"—SUTCLIFFE. Fruit unto holiness (R.V. "unto sanctification"). "Holiness of heart was the principle; and righteousness of life the fruit"—CLARKE. "You have your fruit. Your life produces, by the outworking of its own laws, good results. To live for God is to have the fruit of our toil (Phil. 1. 22), and the results are our eternal possessions. For sanctification. The results are in the direction of, and tend to develop, the devotion of our powers to God. Thus is daily realised the purpose (ver. 19) for which we give ourselves to righteousness"—BEET.

23. Death—"temporal, spiritual, and eternal—is the due wages of sin; but eternal life is the gift of God. The difference is remarkable. Evil works merit the reward they receive; good works do not. The former demand wages; the latter accept a free gift"—WESLEY.

The one recompence of sin is death. It can bring nothing that does not end in death. God's free gift not only saves from the endless war which sin involves, but provides eternal life for all. "Sin is a hard servitude; the wages more so"—SUTCLIFFE.

CHAPTER VII.

SECTION XVII.—Vers. 1-6. THROUGH CHRIST WE DIED TO THE LAW.—1. The apostle continues the comparison between the former and the present state of a believer, and at the same time endeavours to wean the Jewish believers from their fondness for the Mosaic Law. I speak to them that know the Law—to the Jews chiefly here. As long—so long, and no longer—as it liveth. "The Law is here spoken of, by a common figure, as a person, to which, as to a husband, life and death are ascribed. But he speaks indifferently of the Law being dead to us, or we to it, the sense being the same"—WESLEY.

Or are ye ignorant, brethren (R.V.). "S. Paul concedes to the Mosaic Law all it can claim. The Roman citizen might go beyond the frontiers of the empire, and thus escape from the laws of Rome. But as long as a Jew lives he is bound by the Law of God"—BEET. "To prove the believer's emancipation from legal bondage, S. Paul supports his argument by an article of the Law itself, which he applies spiritually (vers. 1-4); then he shows that the believer makes use of this right, not to yield himself more freely to sin, but to serve God better than he would have done under the Law (vers. 5, 6). His emancipation in relation to the Law is therefore legitimate—more than that, it is morally beneficial and necessary"—GODET.

2. She is freed from the law of her husband—"from that law which gave him a peculiar property in her"—WESLEY.

"Law of the husband. (Comp. Lev. 19. 20, etc.) S. Paul implies that the Mosaic Law touches only the present life. Although in the Old Testament a future life was plainly indicated, and in a few places distinctly asserted, yet the threatenings of Moses and the Prophets refer only to the present life. With the dead man they have nothing to do. Hence the law of the married woman is a fair sample of the whole"—BEET.

4. Thus ye also—"are now as free from the Mosaic Law as an husband is, when his wife is dead. By the body of Christ—offered up; that is, by the merits of His death, that Law expiring with Him"—WESLEY.

"We may sum up the contents of this and the three preceding verses, as follows:—As by His death Christ entered upon an existence set free from every legal statute, and determined by the life of God alone, so we, when we have died to sin, enter with Him into this same life in which, like a re-married widow, we have no other master than this new Spouse and His Spirit. The object of this union, says S. Paul, concluding this development (ver. 4), is, that we may bring forth fruit unto God. By this expression he unmistakably continues and completes the figure which he began, namely, that of marriage. The new issue which is to spring from this union between the risen One and His Church is an activity rich in holy works wrought in the service of God"—GODET. Bear fruit. (Col. 1. 10; ch. 1. 13.) We are not united to Christ simply that we may be saved from wrath through Him, but also that we may live a life of holy devotion, and so become daily illustrations of the power of the grace of God. Love, joy, peace, and every other evidence of newness of life, must testify to mysterious union with the source of life.

5. When ye were in the flesh—"carnally minded, in a state of nature; before we believed in Christ. Our sins which were by the Law—accidentally occasioned, or irritated thereby—wrought in our members—spread themselves all over the whole man"—WESLEY.

"The motions of sin (R.V. 'The sinful passions'). S. Paul here assumes of Christians that they were once in the flesh, when the sinful passions were full of energy; and he implies just as distinctly that they are so no longer. Fruit unto death—to produce those acts of transgression which subject the sinner to death, temporal and eternal"—CLARKE. "Death was, as it were, the power to which the results of the unregenerate life were dedicated. He 'who had the power of death' (Heb. 2. 14) was the usurping god"—C. B. "The word, the members, corresponds to the expression of the sins. Every evil instinct has, so to speak, an agent corresponding to it in one of the members of the body. The result of this impure working, caused by the shock of the holy Law against the carnal heart of the natural man, is an abundance of evil fruits which produce death in man. (Comp. Jas. 1. 14, 15.) In the affections of the flesh, it is said (ch. 8. 6) there is a secret aspiration after death. The man who acts without God tends to separate himself ever more profoundly from God"—GODET.

6. Being dead to that whereby we were held—"to our old husband, the Law. That we might serve in newness of spirit—in a new, spiritual manner—and not in the oldness of the letter—not in a bare, literal, external way, as we did before"—WESLEY.

"Now we are to love God with all our heart, according to the new spirit or covenant of the gospel. Here grace abounds more than sin"—SUTCLIFFE. "In newness of spirit—implies a freedom from the dominion of the flesh, by the power of the Spirit enabling us to mortify the deeds and lusts of the flesh (ch. 8. 13), and then serving God by the continual aid of the Holy Spirit"—BENSON.

SECTION XVIII.—Vers. 7-12. YET THE LAW IS NOT DEAD.—7. What shall we say then? "This is a kind of a digression, to the beginning of the next chapter, wherein the apostle, in order to show in the most lively manner the weakness and inefficacy of the Law, changes the person and speaks as of himself, concerning the misery of one under the Law. This S. Paul frequently does, when he is not speaking of his own person, but only assuming another character. (Ch. 3. 5; 1 Cor. 10. 30; 4. 6.) The character here assumed is that of a man, first ignorant of the Law, then under it, and sincerely but ineffectually striving to serve God. To have spoken this of himself, or any true believer, would have been foreign to the whole scope of his discourse—nay, utterly contrary thereto, as well as to what is expressly asserted. (Ch. 8. 2.) Is the Law sin—sinful in itself, or a promoter of sin. I had not known lust—that is, evil desire. I had not known it to be a sin—nay, perhaps I should not have known that any such desire was in me: it did not appear, till it was stirred up by the prohibition"—WESLEY.

It has been much discussed whether S. Paul, in this chapter, is describing his present or his pre-Christian experience. If the former, his language ill assorts with his other accounts of his spiritual state. It is practically certain that the conflict here described is fought in the soul of a "natural man." The present tenses are easily accounted for by the Hebrew fondness for those tenses, so as to secure greater life and vividness in the narration of past events. "It was through the tenth commandment that S. Paul discovered lust, and it was by finding out this inward fact of lust that he became conscious of his state of sin. In this picture of his inner life S. Paul gives us, without intending it, a very high idea of the purity of his life as a child and a young man. He might, when confronted with the nine commandments, have to the letter claimed for himself the verdict, 'not guilty,' like the young man who said to Jesus, 'All these have I kept from my youth up.' But the tenth commandment cut short all this self-righteousness, and under this ray of Divine holiness he was compelled to pass sentence of condemnation. Thus there was wrought in him, Pharisee though he was, without suspecting it, a profound separation from ordinary Pharisaism, and a moral preparation which was to lead him to the arms of Christ and His righteousness. To this so mournful discovery there was added the statement of the following verse, which records a second and still more painful experience"—GODET. "Here opens a new and important section, including the remainder of ch. 7, and passing on in close connection into ch. 8. The dogmatic statement and illustration of the union of the justified with Jesus Christ as (1) the Second Adam, (2) the new Master, (3) the mystic Husband, is now closed. All these aspects of redemption, but especially the last, have suggested the question now to be definitely treated, namely, What is the true Nature and Work of the Law? Is the Law sin? We have just read (ver. 5) that the instincts of our sins were by the Law. Does this mean that the Law is a sinful principle and motive? Is it the origin of sin? God forbid. Nay, S. Paul entirely rejects the suggestion that the Law is sin, but all the more insists on the fact that it does both detect sin, and (in a certain sense) evoke it"—C. B.

8. But sin—"my inbred corruption—taking occasion by the commandment—forbidding, but not subduing it, was only fretted, and wrought in me so much the more all manner of evil desire. For while I was without the knowledge of the Law, sin was dead—neither so apparent nor so active; nor was I under the least apprehensions of any danger from it"—WESLEY.

Concupiscence (R.V. "coveting"). Sin and the commandment together—sin, the evil principle in men, acting as the primary cause, and the commandment as the secondary cause—led their unfortunate victim into all kinds of violation of the Law. This is done in two ways—(1) The perverseness of human nature is such that the mere prohibition of an act suggests the desire to do that which is prohibited; (2) The act, when done, is invested with the character of sin, which hitherto it did not possess. It becomes a distinct breach of the Law, where previously there had been no law to break. This is what the apostle means by saying that "without the Law sin was dead." Until there was written prohibition, sin (the evil principle) was powerless to produce sinful actions.

9. And I was once alive without the Law

—"without the close application of it. I had much life, wisdom, virtue, strength; so I thought. But when the commandment—that is, the Law, a part put for the whole (but this expression particularly intimates its compulsive force), which restrains, enjoins, urges, forbids, threatens—came—in its spiritual meaning, to my heart, with the power of God—sin revived, and I died—my inbred sin took fire, and all my virtue and strength died away; and I then saw myself to be dead in sin, and liable to death eternal"—WESLEY.

And I was alive apart from the Law once (R.V.). "Such is the state of carnal men at ease in their sins, and thoughtless of Divine things. The filth of a prison is scarcely seen in the dark, but when the sun shines all the defilement appears. What a discovery and change of view is induced by awakening grace!"—SUTCLIFFE. "Note the sadness of the word once. To S. Paul life is but a memory of the far past. Sin came to life—awoke to power and activity. The purpose and aim of its activity was given in vers. 1–6. In the days of innocence sin was like a serpent, dormant and harmless in the bosom of S. Paul. At the voice of the Lord it awoke and slew him"—BEET. CALVIN says: "The death of sin is the life of man; and, on the contrary, the life of sin is the death of man." GODET adds: "From the moment he found himself called to apply the prescription of the Law seriously to his conduct, he was not slow to discover sin within him; for in the depths of his heart he found lust; and not only did the Law unveil this evil principle to him, but it intensified its power. The torrent bubbled and boiled on, meeting with the obstacle which came in its way."

10. The commandment which was intended for life. "Doubtless it was originally intended by God as a grand means of preserving and increasing spiritual life, and leading to life everlasting"—WESLEY.

"The Law was designed to save life, by guarding from death. (Lev. 18. 5; Deut. 5. 33.) Such was its natural tendency. But the human will refused obedience, and then this Law led to death by the curse of the broken commandment. The Law is the weapon with which sin slew S. Paul. But we do not blame a sword because, in the hands of an enemy, it has slain the man for whose defence it was made. The fault is, not with the Law, but with sin"—BEET.

11. Deceived me—"while I expected life by the Law, sin came upon me unawares, and slew all my hopes"—WESLEY.

For sin, finding occasion through the commandment, beguiled me, and through it slew me (R.V.). The "beguiling" and the "death" here mentioned is fully illustrated by the history of Paradise. (Gen. 3. 4, 5, 13.) By the very prohibition of God, Satan found "occasion" to "beguile" the woman, and so brought the threatened death. (See also 2 Cor. 11. 3 and 1 Tim. 2. 14.) From the Fall till now the process of so accomplishing deception and the destruction of man has never ceased.

12. The commandment—"that is, every branch of the Law—is holy, and just, and good. It springs from, and partakes of, the holy nature of God; it is every way just and right in itself; it is designed wholly for the good of man"—WESLEY.

"Wherefore—this word introduces a conclusion, not from the verse immediately preceding, but from the whole of the last five verses. The apostle glances back for a moment over the course of his argument"—ELLICOTT.

SECTION XIX.—Vers. 13–25. THE LAW SHOWS THE EVIL AND POWER OF SIN.—13. "Was then that which is good made the cause of evil to me; yea, of death, which is the greatest of evil? Not so. But it was sin which was made death to me, inasmuch as it wrought death in me, even by that which is good—by the good Law. So that sin by the commandment became exceeding sinful. The consequence of which was, that inbred sin, thus driving furiously in spite of the commandment, became exceeding sinful; the guilt thereof being greatly aggravated"—WESLEY.

"We have here another account, in addition to those of chaps. 3. 19 and 5. 20 of the purpose for which the Law was given. Each statement illustrates the others. The Law was the result of Adam's sin. It came that his sin might be multiplied into the many sins of his children, and that thus the principle of sin, which entered through Adam into the world, might make known its real character. Therefore S. Paul's death is in no way owing to the Law, but entirely to sin. For the coming of the Law was the result of the prior coming of sin through Adam into the world. Therefore both the Law and its results are altogether owing to sin"—BEET. The R.V. rendering here is needlessly difficult. It is best to supply a word in English which makes the sense quite plain—But sin did.

14. I am carnal. "S. Paul, having compared together the past and present state of believers, that 'in the flesh' (ver. 5), and that 'in the spirit' (ver. 6), in answering two objections, Is then the Law sin? (ver. 7), and, Is the Law death? (ver. 13), interweaves the whole process of a man reasoning, groaning, striving, and escaping from the legal to the evangelical state. This he does from ver. 7 to the end of this chapter. Sold under sin—totally enslaved; slaves bought with money were absolutely at their master's disposal"—WESLEY.

"The apostle, from indwelling sin, now proceeds to the habits of sin. The old man, the usurper, now acts openly as a tyrant. He catches men by their reigning passions, and holds them under the yoke of servitude, as Ahab, who sold himself to work wickedness. All this is exemplified in the words which follow"—SUTCLIFFE. "The language is indeed strong, but it is the strength of profound spiritual insight. The man who here 'does what he hates' is one who has so felt the absolute sanctity of God and of His law as to see sin in the slightest deviations of will and affection from its standard. Such penitence for such sin is not only possible in a life of Christian rectitude, but may be said to be a natural element in it"—C. B.

15. But what I hate that I do. "Here is the conflict between the two natures in man, the one drawing the mind to good, the other to evil, and evil which cannot be conquered by human efforts; it is by the aids of grace alone that sin can be subdued. 'If ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live'"—SUTCLIFFE. "This verse contains the proof from fact of the state of slavery which S. Paul has just affirmed. The slave knows not what he does, for he does the will of another. So S. Paul complains that his work is not the result of a distinct view in which he has, as it were, intellectually possessed himself beforehand of what he was going to do; it is the result of blind instinct, which drags him along as if without his knowledge, so that when he sees it realised, it is not what he wished—it is, on the contrary, what he detests"—GODET.

16. It is good. "This single word implies all the three that were used before (ver. 12), 'holy, just, and good'"—WESLEY.

The Law commands what I desire, therefore my desire is itself a testimony to the goodness of the Law. The reprobation with which S. Paul's conscience visits his own work is a solemn homage rendered by him to the Law, for thereby he takes part with the Law against himself.

17. "It is no more I that can properly be said to do it, but rather sin that dwelleth in me—that makes, as it were, another person, and tyrannises over me"—WESLEY.

"That S. Paul agrees with the Law, and yet does what in agreement with the Law he hates, proves that he is not the author of his own actions. And since these actions cannot be attributed to anyone outside himself, he comes to the awful conclusion that within him there is someone other than himself, who is the true author of his actions. This stranger, who has seized the helm of S. Paul's ship, he calls sin"—BEET.

18–20. In my flesh. "The flesh here signifies the whole man as he is by nature"—WESLEY.

"The corrupt and degenerate self, my animal appetites and passions, debased and enslaved as they are by sin through the Fall"—BENSON. "Enthralled is it, and the will is powerless. What I do and what I will are opposite things. It is therefore sin that acts, and not I"—ELLICOTT. "'Sin dwells in him' to such a degree that 'no good thing dwells in him'; the intruder has occupied the whole dwelling, and every part of it is infected; by vitiating the affections and will, sin has spoilt all"—C. B.

21. I find then a law—"an inward, constraining power, flowing from the dictate of corrupt nature"—WESLEY.

I find then the law, that, to me who would do good, evil is present (R.V.). There can be little doubt of the practical meaning of the verse. "Such is the relation between me and the law that my will is with it, my action is against it"—C. B. GODET adds: "Always the same two characteristics of his moral state; will for good, but powerless; evil carrying him away in practice. S. Paul is summing up the mode of his existence since the time when the law came in to affect his inward life, and from which the law gives him no means of escape." "I find, therefore, that to me who wish for the Law, to do that which is good, that to me the bad is present"—BEET.

22. For I delight in the Law of God. "This is more than 'I consent to' (ver. 16). The day of liberty draws near. The inward man—called the mind (vers. 23 and 25)"—WESLEY.

"I delight with all my soul in the Law of God—which is an emanation of His glory shining on the mind. My judgment approves, and all the oppressed emotions of grace working within, love it, as holy, just, and good"—SUTCLIFFE. "Every true penitent admires the Moral Law, longs most earnestly for a conformity to it, and feels that he can never be satisfied till he awakes up after this Divine likeness"—CLARKE. "The inward man. Same as the 'mind' in ver. 23. The Law which S. Paul approves, when he looks at it from the point of view of his inner and higher nature, becomes by that approval, and so far as it is understood and approved, 'the law of his mind.' This inner self is the subject of the Divine renewal which, from day to day, goes on in the Christian"—BEET.

23. But I see another law in my members—"another inward constraining power of evil inclinations and bodily appetites—warring against the law of my mind—the dictate of my mind, which delights in the Law of God—and captivating me—in spite of all my resistance"—WESLEY.

Another law (R.V. "A different law"). "The human nature, once wholly under the government of sin, is still the seat of this enemy, who carries on the conflict against the Law of God, and against S. Paul's own 'mind.' Two diverse laws claim obedience, and the law of sin often proves the stronger, and defeats the only power which can set this captive man free. Even after conversion, and when a moral change is wrought in the powers of the mind, there is a war between the flesh and the spirit"—WATSON. "S. Paul is a prisoner in his own body. He is a slave; his master is his greatest enemy, and the enemy dwells in his own breast"—BEET. The hand of a tyrannical stranger is upon the helm of his life.

24. Wretched man that I am. "The struggle is now come to the height; and the man, finding there is no help in himself, begins almost unawares to pray, Who shall deliver me? He then seeks and looks for deliverance, till God in Christ appears to answer his question. The word which we translate 'deliver' implies force. And, indeed, without this there can be no deliverance. The body of this death—that is, this body of death, this mass of sin, leading to death eternal, and cleaving as close to me as my body to my soul. We may observe, the deliverance is not wrought yet"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul's view of his own desperate position forces from him a cry for deliverance. Calamity-stricken. (Ch. 3. 16; Jas. 5. 1; Rev. 3. 17.) It describes, not the man's state of mind, but his circumstances. This death—i.e. of body and soul, as in chaps. 6 and 7. Body refers to 'the members of my body' (ch. 7. 23). By means of his body, sin forces S. Paul to commit sin. His body is therefore the shackle with which sin is dragging him to eternal death. He cries for deliverance. From whom? From his own body, by means of which his enemy compels him to sin, and holds him in bondage. But we need not conceive him to desire death. This would not save him. From the tyranny of his own body, from a life of obedience to the desires of the body (ch. 6. 12), S. Paul cries to be set free. This cry of anguish, even more than the picture of his captivity, reveals his terrible position"—BEET.

25. I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord—"that is, God will deliver me through Christ. But the apostle, as his frequent manner is, beautifully interweaves his assertion with thanksgiving; the hymn of praise answering in a manner to the voice of sorrow, 'Wretched man that I am!' So then. He here sums up the whole, and concludes what he began (ver. 7). I myself—or rather that I, the person whom I am personating, till this deliverance is wrought—serve the Law of God with my mind—my reason and conscience declare for God—but with my flesh the law of sin—but my corrupt passions and appetites still rebel. The man is now utterly weary of his bondage, and upon the brink of liberty"—WESLEY.

God heals the poor captive, and delivers him from his bondage. Grace is stronger than sin. (Ch. 5. 20.) Triumph and praise succeed the conflict and the despair. Light dawns on that dark experience, and the struggle ends, as with joy and gratitude he exclaims, I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. There is no other by whom such victory is won, and through Him all may have the final and eternal triumph. (1 Cor. 15. 57.) "When a machine is out of order, and the various parts grate and grind against each other, it is not necessary to say to one who hears the grinding, 'It is out of order.' Therefore no time is spent in the New Testament to prove that men are depraved. It is assumed to be a thing of universal consciousness as it is. But, by the power of God's Spirit, and by the discipline of life, complete ascendency may be gained by our supersensuous nature"—BEECHER. "It is in Jesus our Lord, to whom the thanks and praise are due, though without His intervention there can only be a divided service. The mere human self serves with the mind the Law of God, with the flesh the law of sin. I myself—apart from, and in opposition to the help which I derive from Christ. The abrupt and pregnant style by which, instead of answering the question, 'Where is deliverance to come from?' the apostle simply returns thanks for the deliverance that has really been vouchsafed to him, is thoroughly in harmony with the impassioned personal character of the whole passage. These are not abstract terms, but they are matters of intimate personal experience. The deliverance wrought by Christ is apparently here that of sanctification rather than of justification. It is from the domination of the body, from the impulses of sense, that the Christian is freed, and that is done when he is crucified to them with Christ"—ELLICOTT.

CHAPTER VIII.

SECTION XX.—Vers. 1–13. SECURITY OF THE JUSTIFIED.—1. There is therefore now no condemnation—"either for things present or past. Now he comes to deliverance and liberty. The apostle here resumes the thread of his discourse, which was interrupted (ch. 7. 7)"—WESLEY.

Who walk not after the flesh. (Ver. 4; Gal. 5. 16, 25.) Those in Christ Jesus—"they to whom Christ is the element and source of life and action. (Comp. ch. 16. 7; 1 Cor. 1. 30; 2 Cor. 5. 17)"—BEET. "The last chapter closed with an account of the deep distress of the penitent; this one opens with an account of his salvation. The now, therefore, in the text, must refer more to the happy transition from darkness to light, from condemnation to pardon, which this believer now enjoys, than to the Christian dispensation taking the place of the Jewish economy"—CLARKE. "An unbeliever shall have a double condemnation; one from the Law which he hath transgressed, and another from the gospel, which he hath despised; as a malefactor that, being condemned and dead in law, rejecteth his prince's pardon. But it is otherwise with those that are in Christ Jesus. The Law cannot condemn them, because they have appealed; the gospel cannot, because they have believed"—TRAPP.

2. The Law of the Spirit—"that is, the gospel, hath freed me from the law of sin and death—that is, the Mosaic dispensation"

—WESLEY. (See John 8. 36; ch. 6. 18, 22; Gal. 2. 9; 5. 1; ch. 7. 24, 25.)

"This verse explains the inference of ver. 1, and shows how S. Paul's former divided allegiance proves that he is no longer condemned, The Spirit is a new and conspicuous feature of ch. 8. The Holy Spirit ('The Spirit of God,' and of Christ,' vers. 9, 11) is the Author and Giver of life (ver. 6). His every impulse tends towards life. If by the Author of life, S. Paul has been made free, he cannot be condemned to die"—BEET.

3. "For what the Law of Moses could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh—incapable of conquering our evil nature. If it could, God needed not to have sent His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. We, with our sinful flesh, were devoted to death. But God sending His own Son, in the likeness of that flesh, though pure from sin, condemned that sin which was in our flesh; gave sentence, that sin should be destroyed, and the believer wholly delivered from it"—WESLEY.

"His own Son (as in ch. 1. 4; 5. 10; 8. 29, 32). His relation to God is of the closest possible nature, and altogether different from that of all others. (Phil. 2. 7; 1 John 4. 9.) He came in our nature. (Gal. 4. 5.) He conquered where we had fallen before our foe. He was in all things like unto us, but in sin; as the brazen serpent was like the fiery serpent, but only it had no sting"—TRAPP. "The end for which Christ was sent by God was, through the sacrifice of His death, to condemn sin; that is, to expiate and take away the guilt of sin; so that it shall never be charged upon believers to their eternal condemnation" — BURKITT. "How was I freed? Thus. Precisely on that very point where the Law of Moses showed its impotence, viz. in the attempt to get rid of sin, which it failed to do, because of the counteracting influence of the flesh—precisely on this very point God interposed by sending His Son in a body of flesh, similar to that in which sin resides, and as an offering to expiate human sin, and so dethroned and got rid of sin in the flesh which He had assumed. The flesh, the scene of its former triumphs, became now the scene of its defeat and expulsion. Where sin—in the flesh—had hitherto had the mastery, it now stood condemned and worsted; it was unable to exercise its old sway any longer"—ELLICOTT.

4. That the righteousness of the Law—"the holiness it required, described (vers. 5-11) —might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit—who are guided in all our thoughts, words, and actions, not by corrupt nature, but by the Spirit of God. From this place S. Paul describes primarily the state of believers, and that of unbelievers, only to illustrate this"—WESLEY.

"That the ordinance (or requirement) of the Law might be fulfilled in us (R.V.). Hitherto the Law could not be kept because of the antagonistic influence of the flesh; henceforth it may be kept for the reason that this influence has ceased, and that its place is taken by the influence of the Spirit"—ELLICOTT. "Since the Law was designed to mould our conduct, its purpose is accomplished when it is obeyed. Every act of obedience is God's work in us, and gift to us; and is an accomplishment of the Divine purpose for which Christ became man. Walk according to the flesh—to allow the indolence or appetites of the flesh to mark out our path. To do this is to obey sin, which dwells in the flesh. (Ch. 7. 18.) Walk according to the Spirit—to obey the law of the Spirit of life. God sent His Son to dwell in human flesh, that the Spirit of God, and no longer the flesh, may direct our steps; and that the purpose for which the Law of Sinai was given may be achieved in us"—BEET.

5. "They that are after the flesh—who remain under the guidance of corrupt nature—mind the things of the flesh—have their thoughts and affections fixed on such things as gratify corrupt nature, viz. on things visible and temporal; on things of the earth, on pleasure (of sense or imagination), praise, or riches. But they who are after the Spirit—who are under His guidance—mind the things of the Spirit—think of, relish, love things invisible, eternal; the things which the Spirit hath revealed, which He works in us, moves us to, and promises to give us"—WESLEY.

"One of the great contrasts between the past and present condition of the Christian. Once he sought to gratify and obey the sinful cravings of his human nature. Now, by the indwelling of the Spirit, he delights in those affections and duties which have been so graciously revealed to him. He is born of God, and in consequence has the spiritual mind, which is a distinct evidence of the regenerate soul. As if the apostle had said, When we lived under the dispensation of the Law, we brought forth fruit suitable to that state and condition; but now we serve God with new hearts and lives by the Spirit of Christ, according to the law of grace, and not carnally in the bondage and terror of the old Law, called (ver. 6) 'the oldness of the letter'"—BURKITT. "To be after the flesh is to be inwardly governed by it, as the natural man always is. The past here referred to is the deepest source of the moral life, whence the will is constantly drawing its impulses and direction. Hence the consequence: they are preoccupied with the things of the flesh, and aspire after them. The aspiration of which this verse speaks, proceeds from the being, and produces 'the walking' of ver. 4, the moral necessity of which S. Paul wishes to demonstrate, whether it be on the side of the flesh, or on that of the Spirit. The I is distinct from both tendencies; but it yields itself without fail to the one or the other—to the former, as the I of the natural man; to the latter, as the I of the regenerate man. As its state, so is its tendency; as its tendency, so is its conduct"—GODET.

6. For to be carnally minded—"that is, to mind the things of the flesh—is death—the sure mark of spiritual death, and the way to death everlasting. But to be spiritually minded—that is, to mind the things of the Spirit—is life—a sure mark of spiritual life, and the way to life everlasting—and attended with peace—the peace of God, which is the foretaste of life everlasting; and peace with God, opposite to the enmity mentioned in the next verse"—WESLEY.

For the mind of the flesh is death; but the mind of the Spirit is life and peace (R.V.). "To live under the influence of 'the mind of the flesh' is to live in a state of condemnation, leading to and involving eternal death. The contrast is perfect; 'the mind of the Spirit,' the Divine indwellings which regenerate, also brings 'life and peace.'" There is no changing the nature of these two states and walks (ver. 5), and no arresting the latter in its onward march (ver. 6). The way of salvation is to pass from the first to the second, and not to relapse thereafter from the second to the first'—GODET. "A disorder in nature is a prohibition to all happiness belonging to that nature; a distempered body under the fury of a disease, can find no delight in the pleasures of the healthful; a wicked man, with a troubled and foaming sea of sin and lust in his mind, would find no more rest in heaven than a man with his disjointed members upon a rack can in the beauty of a picture. We must be spiritually minded before we can have either life or peace. Righteousness in the soul is the necessary qualification for the peace and joy in the kingdom of God. It is a contradiction to think that any can be happy with a nature contrary to the very essence of happiness"—CHARNOCK.

7. Enmity against God—"His existence, power, and providence"—WESLEY.

Because the mind of the flesh is enmity (R.V.). "This enmity does not lie, as some fancy, in bad habits, education, or other such accidental and extraneous circumstances. It has its source in the mind itself. The carnal mind not only has, but is, enmity against God. If it were not so, man would not need to be born again, to get a new heart; like a watch that had started a jewel, or lost the tooth of a wheel, it were enough to be repaired without being renewed"—GUTHRIE.

8. They who are in the flesh—"under the government of it"—WESLEY.

"The flesh is to the unsaved, not only the physical but the moral element of life. He sees and hears only through the eyes and ears of the body. All he has and is depends upon the body. He is therefore at its mercy; at the mercy of that which is hostile to God"—BEET.

9. In the Spirit—"under His government. If any man have not the Spirit of Christ—dwelling and governing in him—he is none of His—he is not a member of Christ—not a Christian—not in a state of salvation. A plain, express declaration, which admits of no exception. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear!"—WESLEY.

"God's union with men is not a shadow, is not a figure, is not a dream; it is the statement of a fact as literal as any law in nature"—BEECHER. "It is remarkable that the Spirit of Christ is here used as the equivalent of the Spirit of God in the preceding proposition. The Spirit of Jesus is that of God Himself, whom He has converted by appropriating Him perfectly here below into His personal life, so that He can communicate Him to His own. It is in this form that the Holy Spirit henceforth acts in the Church. Where this vital bond does not exist between a soul and Christ, it remains a stranger to Him and His salvation"—GODET. "Dwell in you. This expression is the complement of the other, 'to be in the Spirit,' 'to be in Christ.' It denotes the closest possible contact and influence of spirit upon spirit. No mysticism, however vivid and intense, can really go beyond this without infringing the bounds of personality, and contradicting the direct testimony of consciousness"—ELLICOTT.

The results of the presence of Christ in the soul are declared in ver. 10.

10. Now if Christ be in you. "Where the Spirit of Christ is, there is Christ. The body indeed is dead—devoted to death—because of sin—heretofore committed. But the Spirit is life—already truly alive. Because of righteousness—now attained. From ver. 13, S. Paul, having finished what he had begun (ch. 6. 1), describes purely the state of believers"—WESLEY.

(See Eph. 3. 16, and also the seven epistles, Rev. 2 and 3.) "The supreme work of the Spirit is to acquaint the soul with Christ; hence the indwelling of the Spirit as the Divine Teacher results by holy necessity in the indwelling of Christ as the Divine Guest. (Comp. 2 Cor. 13. 5)"—MOULE. Christ in you. "The presence in us of the Spirit of Christ is the actual presence of Christ. Hence the Spirit is the bearer of the presence of Christ. (Comp. John 14. 18, 23, 26; 15. 26)"—BEET.

11. "Teaches that it is by the agency of the Holy Ghost that the saints shall rise again. Here on earth the bodies of believers are the temples of the Holy Ghost. He consecrates and sanctifies the very body in which, as in His temple, He dwells. The body is indeed dead, because of sin; it shall die, and seemingly perish. But it shall rise again; for the Spirit is the Spirit of life because of righteousness, and shall quicken our mortal bodies, and restore to a union with the glorified soul"—WATSON. "According to ver. 10 there was still left one power of death, that over the body. S. Paul now disposes of this also"—MEYER.

12. We are not debtors to the flesh—"we ought not to follow it"—WESLEY.

We owe nothing to the flesh, for "to live after" it, can only bring shame and death; but to "the Spirit," by whom we are brought into the possession of peace and life, "we are debtors."

13. The deeds of the flesh. "Not only evil actions, but evil desires, tempers, thoughts. If ye mortify—kill, destroy these—ye shall live—the life of faith more abundantly here, and hereafter the life of glory"—WESLEY.

"No man in his own strength can conquer sin. But if we by incessant prayer call in the aids of grace, we can, like S. Paul, do all things through Christ who strengthens us and gives us the victory"—SUTCLIFFE. "As long as corrupt nature is not mortified, but the principle left whole in a man, it is a vain thing to expect that it should not govern. But if the old nature be indeed mortified, and a new heavenly nature infused, then may it well be expected that men will walk in newness of life"—EDWARDS. "Be always an enemy to the devil and the world, but specially to your own flesh"—ROBERT SMITH. "The acts of which the body is the simple instrument are not its own. S. Paul would suppress those of which it is the independent author, and wherein, consequently, it withdraws from the dominion of the Spirit. These should come to an end, because in the Christian the spirit should direct and penetrate all, even his eating and drinking, according to the example quoted by the apostle. (1 Cor. 10. 31.) In all these acts of life the body should not guide, but be guided. Every act of sacrifice whereby the independence of the body is denied, and its submission to the spirit forcibly asserted, secures a growth of spiritual life in man"—GODET.

SECTION XXI. — Vers. 14–39. THE JUSTIFIED: AIDED BY THE HOLY SPIRIT, AND CHEERED BY THE PROSPECT OF ETERNAL GLORY PREPARED FOR THEM.—14. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God—"in all the ways of righteousness—they are the sons of God. Here S. Paul enters upon the description of those blessings which he comprises (ver. 30) in the word glorified; though, indeed, he does not describe mere glory, but that which is still mingled with the cross. The sum is, through sufferings to glory"—WESLEY.

"Led by the Spirit — living and acting under His gracious power, and joyfully conscious of subjection to His will, in thought and conversation and work. The Holy Spirit is as surely the Divine Teacher and Guide of the sons of God, as the witness of their adoption into the sonship. Sons. On this sacred word, as used here, comp. John 1. 12, 13; 2 Cor. 6. 16–18; Gal. 3. 26; Phil. 2. 15; 1 John 3. 1, 2; 5. 1, 4, 5. In this verse (1) a glorious privilege is proclaimed, the being sons of God; (2) a description of the persons to whom the privilege belongs, they are such as are led by the Spirit of God. He directs their actions, enlightens their understanding, and guides their inclinations; and where He guides, He governs. Such as are 'led by God's Spirit' are undoubtedly 'God's children,' and such as are not His children refuse to be led by His Spirit, but live under the uncontrolled activity of their own"—BURKITT.

15. For ye—"who are real Christians—have not received the spirit of bondage. The Holy Ghost was not properly a spirit of bondage, even in the time of the Old Testament. Yet there was something of bondage remaining even in those who then had received the Spirit. Again—as the Jews did before. We—all and every believer. Cry. The word denotes a vehement speaking, with desire, confidence, constancy. Abba, Father. The latter word explains the former. By using both the Syriac and the Greek word, S. Paul seems to point out the joint cry both of the Jewish and Gentile believers. 'The spirit of bondage' here seems directly to mean those operations of the Holy Spirit by which the soul, on its first conviction, feels itself in bondage to sin, to the world, to Satan, and obnoxious to the wrath of God. This, therefore, and the Spirit of adoption, are one and the same Spirit, only manifesting itself in various operations, according to the various circumstances of the persons"—WESLEY.

"There is no spirit of slavery or of fear in our adoption into the family of God. The new relationship brings freedom and love. Once God was only known as a justly offended King, whose laws had been wickedly disobeyed, but now He is the reconciled Father to whose will it has become a joy to submit. Spirit of adoption—the Holy Spirit, so called because given to us when God makes us His sons. With this verse compare Gal. 4. 6. By crying in our hearts, 'Father,' the Spirit moves us to utter the same filial cry. How He moves us we learn from ver. 5. He reveals to all believers, by means of the gospel, God's fatherly love, manifested in the death of Christ. In the gospel calls us children. The Spirit speaks the gospel in our hearts. We hear and know the voice, and cry, 'My Father, God.' By prompting this cry, the Spirit given to us proves Himself to be the 'Spirit of adoption"—BEET.

16. The same Spirit beareth witness with our spirit—"with the spirit of every true believer, by a testimony distinct from that of his own spirit, or the testimony of a good conscience. Happy they who enjoy this clear and constant!"—WESLEY.

"The Spirit itself (R.V. 'The Spirit Himself'). In the order of cause and effect, the witness of God's Spirit precedes that of our own spirit; but in the order of thought, our own cry comes first. We are first conscious of our own filial confidence, and then observe that it is wrought in us by the Holy Spirit. The process of assurance is as follows: The gospel proclaims that through the death of Christ, God receives into His favour and family all who believe the good news. We have proof that this proclamation is the voice of God. We therefore accept it as true; we dare to believe that God accepts those that believe, and therefore ourselves, into His favour. We thus come consciously into the number of those whose acquittal the gospel proclaims. In the moment of our faith God accepts us as righteous, adopts us to be sons, and sends forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts. The Spirit opens our mind to understand the meaning of the death of Christ, and thus makes known to us God's love. The love of God thus revealed assures us that the hope called forth by the promise will not deceive us. We now look up to God as our Father; and find that while we do so we have power to conquer our inveterate habit of sin. We accept these results of the gift of the Spirit as the confirmation of our hope"—BEET.

17. Joint-heirs—"that we may know it is a great inheritance which God will give us; for He hath given a great one to His Son. If we suffer with Him—willingly and cheerfully, for righteousness' sake. This is a new proposition, referring to what follows"—WESLEY.

"How much depends on our adoption, and how glorious the prospect which is unfolded to the 'children of God'! All the wealth of the heavenly inheritance shall come into the possession of the joint-heirs with Christ. Our sonship may involve suffering, but even this shall help to prepare for the heritage of glory. The very relation of a godly man to his everlasting glory is an honour ten thousand times surpassing the honour of all kingdoms of the world"—BAXTER. "All God's sons are heirs; not so the sons of earthly princes. Jehoshaphat gave his younger sons great gifts of silver, of gold, and of precious things; but the kingdom he gave to Jehoram, because he was the first-born. (2 Chron. 21. 3.) God's children are all higher than the kings of the earth. (Ps. 89. 27)"—TRAPP.

18. For I reckon. "This verse gives the reason why he but now mentioned sufferings and glory. When that glory 'shall be revealed in us,' then the sons of God will be revealed also"—WESLEY.

Revealed in us (R.V. "Revealed to usward"). A brave and scriptural way of regarding earthly tribulation. With present sufferings S. Paul was well acquainted, and not less so with the anticipations of glorification with Christ. The contrast between the experience and the expectation was great, but to reckon on the future glory prevented repining under the sorrows of time. Trial is short; triumph is eternal. (2 Cor. 4. 17; 1 Pet. 1. 6.) There is a vast disproportion between the Christian's present liability to suffering, and the certainty of his future glory; and surely those who have been exercised by the testings of time may joyfully anticipate the glory which shall be revealed in us. The glory already exists in Christ, it only remains to be revealed in us. (Comp. Gal. 3. 23; see also Col. 3. 4; Tit. 2. 13; 1 Pet. 1. 4.)

19. For the earnest expectation. "The word denotes a lively hope of something drawing near, and a vehement longing after it. Of the creation—of all visible creatures, believers excepted, who are spoken of apart; each kind, according as it is capable. All these have been sufferers through sin; and to all these (the finally impenitent excepted) shall refreshment redound from the glory of the children of God. Upright heathens are by no means to be excluded from this 'earnest expectation': nay, perhaps something of it may at some times be found even in the vainest of men; who (although in the hurry of life they mistake vanity for liberty, and partly stifle, partly dissemble, their groans, yet) in their sober, quiet, sleepless, afflicted hours, pour forth many sighs in the ear of God"—WESLEY.

Manifestation (R.V. "Revealing"). "The true and glorious character of the sons of God, and the blessedness of their eternal reward, shall be revealed. They will not always be in a condition of probation and testing as now. When Christ 'shall appear, we shall be like Him.' Nature waits for that day, and 'new heavens and a new earth' shall add to the endless triumph of our resurrection to 'the body that shall be'"—S. C.

"The creation specially distinguished from the children of God, and therefore does not include them. The words 'subject' and 'groan' exclude the happy spirits of other worlds. The coming liberation excludes bad angels, and those who finally reject the gospel. For to the latter, the coming of Christ will bring wrath (ch. 2. 8); and we cannot conceive it to bring liberty to the former. It therefore remains that the word denotes the entire world around us, living and without life, man alone excepted. It is what we call Nature; but reminds us that Nature is the work of God"—BEET.

20. The creation was made subject to vanity—"abuse, misery, and corruption—by Him who subjected it—namely, God. (Gen. 3. 17; 5. 29.) Adam only made it liable to the sentence which God pronounced; yet not without hope"—WESLEY.

For the creation was subjected to vanity (R.V.). "On the whole, notwithstanding serious difficulties, it seems necessary to take the word 'Creation' here to mean what we popularly call 'Nature.' Was made subject—apparently at the Fall. Not that there was no animal suffering and death previously. From Gen. 3. 17–19, we find that some change for the worse passed over man's abode when he fell; a change impossible now to define. But it may be that all distress and failure in creation are, in the sight of the Eternal, connected with the entrance of sin, whether or no they have followed the Fall in order of time"—C. B.

21. The creation itself shall be delivered.

"Destruction is not deliverance: therefore whatsoever is destroyed, or ceases to be, is not delivered at all. Will, then, any part of the creation be destroyed? Into the glorious liberty—the excellent state wherein they were created"—WESLEY.

Creation which was blighted when man sinned, shall share in his eternal renewal. Now its beauty fades, and its glories pass away. This was not its original destiny, and every intention of the Almighty Creator must be fulfilled. There is a deliverance from the bondage of corruption for "Nature," as surely as glorious liberty for the children of God. BEET adds: "This freedom, Creation will share. The bondage of corruption was designed to last only for a time. It was imposed when man fell; and will be removed when man's redemption is complete (ver. 23)."

22. "For the whole creation groaneth together—with joint groans, as it were with one voice—and travaileth—lit. 'is in the pains of childbirth,' to be delivered of the burden of this curse—until now—to this very hour; and so on till the time of deliverance"—WESLEY.

Its full and eternal glory is not yet. It bears many evidences of the great curse. Its voices are out of harmony. Destruction and corruption and death unite to spoil its grandeur and its powers. "We have here another proof (comp. 1. 20) of S. Paul's careful contemplation of the material world. For an important coincidence, see Acts 14. 17; 17. 24. If our exposition be correct, these verses teach us plainly that the world beneath our feet will be rescued from the curse of sin, to be our eternal home. (Comp Acts 3. 21; Rev. 21. 1.) Just as the sin of man's spirit brought a curse upon the body in which the spirit dwells, so it brought a curse also upon the greater dwelling-place of the entire race. And just as the body will some day share the liberation which the spirit already enjoys, so will the world around. Thus are the fortunes of the material world indissolubly joined to those of its inhabitant, man"—BEET.

23. And even we, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit—"that is, the Spirit, who is the first-fruits of our inheritance. The adoption. Persons who had been privately adopted among the Romans were often brought forth into the Forum, and there publicly owned as their sons by those who adopted them. So at the general resurrection, when the body itself is redeemed from death, the sons of God shall be publicly owned by Him in the great assembly of men and angels. The redemption of our body—from corruption to glory and immortality"—WESLEY.

"This verse compares the present state of the children of God with the present state of Nature. Nature groans, waiting for liberation; we groan, waiting for adoption and redemption"—BEET. "Our Lord (Luke 20. 36) terms those who shall be accounted worthy to obtain the heavenly world, 'the children of God,' because 'they are the children of the resurrection'; they being thereby manifestly shown to be His children. The apostle therefore had good reason to call the redemption of our body from death, the adoption"—BENSON. "We have here a special description of God's adopted children; they have the first-fruits of the Spirit—that is, they have the Holy Spirit in His sanctifying gifts and graces and comforts, and this is an evidence that God will give them more. Grace is an earnest of glory, and a pledge of everlasting life"—BURKITT. "Nor is it only the rest of creation that groans. We Christians, too, though we possess the first-fruits of the Spirit, nevertheless inwardly groan, sighing for the time when our adoption as the sons of God will be complete, and even our mortal bodies will be transfigured. The redemption of our body. One sign of the imperfect sonship of the Christian is that mortal and corruptible body in which the better and heavenly part of him is imprisoned. That, too, shall be transformed and glorified, and cleared from all the defect of its earthly condition. (Comp. 1 Cor. 15. 49–53; 2 Cor. 5. 1; Phil. 3. 21)"—ELLICOTT.

24. For we are saved by hope. "Our salvation is now only in hope. We do not yet possess this full salvation"—WESLEY.

For by hope were we saved (R.V.). The heavenly inheritance, the eternal, uninterrupted blessedness of our salvation, is not yet in our possession, but it is anticipated. We hope for the fulfilment of every promise of God as surely as we believe in His word.

26. Likewise the Spirit. "Nay, not only the universe, not only the children of God, but the Spirit of God also Himself, as it were, groaneth, while He helpeth our infirmities, or weaknesses. Our understandings are weak, particularly in the things of God; our desires are weak; our prayers are weak. We know not—many times—what we should pray for—much less are we able to pray for it—as we ought: but the Spirit maketh intercession for us—in our hearts, even as Christ does in heaven—with groanings—the matter of which is from ourselves, but the Spirit forms them; and they are frequently inexpressible, even by the faithful themselves"—WESLEY.

"To know the way to heaven, sometimes to cast a longing eye in that direction, and by fit and start to make a feeble effort heavenwards, can end in nothing. Man must get the Spirit of God. Thus only can we be freed of the shackles that bind the soul to earth, the flesh, and sin"—GUTHRIE. Likewise. "While on the one hand the prospect of salvation sustains him, so, on the other hand, the Divine Spirit interposes to aid him. The one source of encouragement is human (his own human consciousness of the certainty of salvation), the other is Divine. Infirmities. The correct reading is the singular, 'infirmity.' Without this assistance we might be too weak to endure, but the Spirit helps and strengthens our weakness by inspiring our prayers. With groanings, etc. When the Christian's prayers are too deep and too intense for words, when they are rather a sigh heaved from the heart than any formal utterance, then we may know that they are prompted by the Spirit Himself. It is He who is praying to God for us"—ELLICOTT. "Such is my belief in the reality and existence and agency of the Divine Spirit, that I think I should have no hope and no faith as a minister, and as a labourer for the enfranchisement of mankind, if it were not that I believed there was an all-prevalent, vitalising, Divine Spirit" —BEECHER.

27. But He who searcheth the hearts—"wherein the Spirit dwells and intercedes—knoweth—though man cannot utter it—what is the mind of the Spirit, for He maketh intercession for the saints—who are near to God—according to God—according to His will, as is worthy of God, and acceptable to Him"—WESLEY.

"He that searches, etc. (Jer. 17. 10; 1 Sam. 16. 7; 1 Kings 8. 39, etc.) The hearts —in which (Gal. 4. 6) the Spirit cries. Although the yearnings of the Spirit within us cannot find adequate expression in words, they are effective with God. For He knows the secrets of the hearts, and hears the groaning of His own Spirit there"—BEET. "Fluency in prayer is not essential to praying; a man may pray most powerfully, in the estimation of God, who is not able to utter even one word"—CLARKE. He that searcheth the hearts. "Certainly here the Father. But it is the more noteworthy that the same words are used of the Son. (Rev. 2. 23.) 'The hearts' here are human hearts. In them the Father sees below the surface of 'ignorance what to pray for as they ought,' the sacred longings which are the expression of the Spirit's influence. Knoweth —and meeteth with a corresponding answer; crossing perhaps the saint's explicit prayer, but granting the implicit"—C. B.

28. And we know. "This in general; though we do not always know particularly what to pray for—that all things—ease or pain, poverty or riches, and the ten thousand changes of life—work together for good—strongly and sweetly for spiritual and eternal good—to them that are called according to His purpose—His gracious design of saving a lost world by the death of His Son. This is a new proposition. S. Paul being about to recapitulate the whole blessing contained in justification (termed 'glorification,' ver. 30), first goes back to the 'purpose' or decree of God, which is frequently mentioned in Holy Writ. To explain this (nearly in the words of an eminent writer) a little more at large:—When a man has a work of time and importance before him, he pauses, consults, and contrives; and when he has laid a plan, resolves or decrees to proceed accordingly. Having observed this in ourselves, we are ready to apply it to God also; and He, in condescension to us, has applied it to Himself. The works of providence and redemption are vast and stupendous, and therefore we are apt to conceive of God as deliberating and consulting on them, and then decreeing to act according to 'the counsel of His own will'; as if, long before the world was made, He had been concerting measures both as to the making and governing of it, and had then writ down His decrees, which altered not, any more than the laws of the Medes and Persians. Whereas, to take this consulting and decreeing in a literal sense, would be the same absurdity as to ascribe a real human body and human passions to the ever-blessed God. This is only a popular representation of His infallible knowledge and unchangeable wisdom; that is, He does all things as wisely as a man can possibly do, after the deepest consultation, and as steadily pursues the most proper method as one can do who has laid a scheme beforehand. But then, though the effects be such as would argue consultation and consequent decrees in man, yet what need of a moment's consultation in Him who sees all things at one view? Nor had God any more occasion to pause and deliberate, and lay down rules for His own conduct from all eternity, than He has now. What! was there any fear of His mistaking afterwards, if He had not beforehand prepared decrees, to direct Him what He was to do? Will any man say, He was wiser before the creation than since? or had He then more leisure, that He should take that opportunity to settle His affairs, and make rules for Himself, from which He was never to vary? He had doubtless the same wisdom and all other perfections at this day which He had from eternity; and is now as capable of making decrees, or rather has no more occasion for them now than formerly: His understanding being always equally clear and bright, His wisdom equally infallible"—WESLEY.

"Work together for good. Then Almighty God takes charge of all their interests; by His watchful care, His gracious and providential dispensations, all things are co-operating for their good; conspiring for the improvement of their moral state on earth, and securing and heightening their eternal glory. The called —lit. 'the invited.' There is an allusion to persons invited to a feast. It is the same word that is used by Jesus Christ in the Parable of the Marriage of the King's Son. He sent and invited his guests. The called according to His purpose—this is, according to the previous intention of God. And the reason why the apostle alludes to this is to answer an objection which the Jews might make (and against which a great part of the Epistle is directed), that the Gentiles were not to be invited to be fellow-heirs and partakers of the promises of Christ by the gospel. The apostle justifies his own conduct by referring to the eternal purpose of God, in subordination to which was the calling of the Jews, which was only intended to be exclusive for a limited period. According to this eternal purpose, they had been called to inherit a blessing, not only by the outward call of the word, but by the internal operation of the Holy Ghost. To this they had not been disobedient. The word had come to them in power, and they had received it. They were thus effectually called. They had not only been invited to the feast, but they had sat down at the table so richly spread with gospel blessings"—WATSON. "To them who are the called. Further description of those 'who love God.' They have also, as in His eternal counsels He had designed it should be, obeyed the call given to them in the preaching of the gospel, and definitely enrolled themselves in the kingdom of the Messiah" — ELLICOTT. Them that love God—"as His children; in whose hearts His love has been 'outpoured by the Holy Ghost' (ch. 5. 5). Observe that this note of saintship stands first in this memorable passage; not eternal election, but that conscious love to God in Christ which is its sure fruit, and without which no speculation of mysteries brings the soul near to Him. It is the true God alone who makes this His unalterable demand: 'Thou shalt love ME.' To them who are the called. Identical with 'them that love Him.' 1 Cor. 1. 24, 26, 27 is a clear illustration, in contrast with Matt. 20. 14, 16, 22. In the Gospels the word 'call' refers to outward hearing; in the Epistles to inward reception, due to a special and sovereign influence from above. (See, too, Rev. 17. 14)"—C. B. According to purpose. (2 Tim. 1. 9; Eph. 1. 11; 3. 11.) This purpose is universal. (1 Tim. 2. 14.)

29. Whom He foreknew, He also predestinated, conformable to the image of His Son. "Here the apostle declares who those are whom He foreknew and predestinated to glory, namely, those who are 'conformable to the image of His Son.' This is the mark of those who are foreknown and will be glorified. (2 Tim. 2. 19; Phil. 3. 10, 21)"—WESLEY.

Foreknew. (Ch. 11. 2; Acts 2. 23; 26. 5; 1 Pet. 1. 2, 20; 2 Pet. 3. 17, etc.) "Always to know beforehand." There is nothing in this verse which suggests any other than the common meaning. In the everlasting past we stood before the mind of God. He knew us, our circumstances, our disposition, our conduct. To be conformed, etc.—before they were born, and therefore from eternity. God resolved that believers should be made like His Only-begotten Son. The image, etc.—the self-manifestation of Christ. (Comp. 1 Cor. 15. 49; 2 Cor. 3. 18; Col. 3. 10.) That image of splendour God has resolved to reproduce in His adopted sons. All spiritual growth is an increase of likeness to Christ, and is therefore an approach to the accomplishment of this Divine purpose. We must carefully avoid the error of supposing that our foreseen faith moved God to predestine us to salvation. God was moved to save us simply by our foreseen misery, and His own infinite mercy. (2 Tim. 1. 9; Tit. 3. 5.) Having resolved to save, He was moved, by His infinite wisdom and undeserved favour, to select persevering faith as the condition of salvation. And having chosen this condition, He now uses means (ch. 2. 4) to lead men to repentance and faith. So far from our faith being the ground, it is a result, of God's predestination. But although salvation is altogether the result of God's eternal purpose, and in no way whatever the result of anything we have done or shall do, God nevertheless permits man to resist effectually the influences which lead to salvation. He thus makes the salvation of each individual dependent upon his self-surrender to the Divine influences. But since this self-surrender was foreseen, God knew from the beginning the exact results of the death of Christ"—BENGEL.

30. Them He—"in due time—called—by His gospel and His Spirit. And whom He called—when obedient to the heavenly calling (Acts 26. 19)—He also justified—forgave and accepted. And whom He justified—provided they 'continued in His goodness' (ch. 11. 22)—He in the end glorified. S. Paul does not affirm, either here or in any other part of his writings, that precisely the same number of men are called, justified, and glorified. He does not deny that a believer may fall away and be cut off between his special calling and his glorification (ch. 11. 22). Neither does he deny that many are called who never are justified. He only affirms that this is the method whereby God leads us step by step toward heaven. 'He glorified.' He speaks as one looking back from the goal, upon the race of faith. Indeed grace, as it is glory begun, is both an earnest and a foretaste of eternal glory"—WESLEY.

"'Merciful and gracious' are the designs of God, 'who will have all men to be saved,' and the way by which He has provided for securing our salvation. Called, justified, glorified, are words which describe the Divine order, and we may personally experience each of these conditions of blessedness. In the scheme in question the sanctification of the saved is viewed as quite as much foreordained, and quite as necessary a part of the process, as any other; and that the only evidence to the conscience that the person is 'foreknown' lies, not in any intuition of a Divine decree, but in the presence of faith and love, and their fruits in heart and life. These will be always attributed, and justly, to Divine grace alone; but the presence of that grace will be traced in them alone"—C. B. "He also glorified. By inward holiness, changing them from glory into glory, in progressive religion, and by admission to sit in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and by all the endowment of the rich and hallowed gifts of the Holy Spirit"—SUTCLIFFE.

31. What shall we say then to these things—"related in the third, fifth, and eighth chapters? As if he had said, We cannot go, think, or wish anything further. If God be for us. Here follow four periods, one general and three particular. Each begins with glorying in the grace of God, which is followed by a question suitable to it, challenging all opponents; to all which, 'I am persuaded,' etc., is a general answer. The general period is, If God be for us, who can be against us? The first particular period, relating to the past time, is, He that spared not His own Son, how shall He not freely give us all things? The second, relating to the present, is, It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? The third, relating to the future, is, It is Christ that died—Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?"—WESLEY.

"What shall we then say? S. Paul now applies the whole previous facts and reasons to the final proof of the safety of the children of God. He seems to refer not only to the former part of this chapter, but to the whole previous argument of the Epistle; for there, rather than in ch. 8, we find the doctrines which are here applied—the sacrifice of Christ, and consequent justification. No eloquence could be nobler than that of these closing verses, taking them merely in point of language. It is the eloquence of profound fact and truth, expressed with the sublime force and beauty of a lofty mind filled with the love of God"—C. B. ELLICOTT says of this verse, and the eight verses which follow it: "Now follows the sublime and triumphant conclusion from the foregoing—expressed with passionate energy and with the most intense consciousness of the reality of a Christian belief in penetrating and sustaining the mind in all outward trials, however severe." ERASMUS remarks on this, that "Cicero never said anything grander." It is needless to add that, setting aside other considerations, Cicero was not for a moment comparable in spiritual intensity, and therefore in true eloquence, to S. Paul. "Rejoice then, O my soul, in hope of the glory of God; and take good heed to the conditions of thy salvation, ever continuing in the faith, and enduring to the end"—SUTCLIFFE.

33. He that. "This period contains four sentences: He spared not His own Son; therefore He will freely give us all things. He delivered Him up for us all; therefore, none can lay anything to our charge. 'Freely'—for all that follows justification is a free gift also. All things—needful or profitable for us"—WESLEY.

"No argument was ever addressed to creatures, capable of being persuaded and obliged, equal to this. For while it convinces the understanding, it raises every tender and devout feeling in the heart, and is a continual source both of hope and gratitude. After having given us a gift of infinite value, because it was necessary for us, and we could not otherwise be redeemed and saved, will He deny us smaller blessings, which, though inferior, are nevertheless closely connected with our redemption and salvation?"—BENSON. "He spared not His Son. 'Tis this that silences the rising fear; 'Tis this that makes the hard thought disappear; He spared not His Son"—BONAR.

33. God's elect. "The above-cited author (ver. 28) observes, that long before the coming of Christ the heathen world revolted from the true God, and were therefore reprobated, or rejected. But the nation of the Jews were chosen to be the people of God, and were therefore styled, 'the children' or 'sons of God' (Deut. 14. 1); 'holy people' (Deut. 7. 6; 14. 2); 'a chosen seed' (Deut. 4. 37); 'the elect' (Isa. 41. 8, 9; 43. 10); 'the called of God' (Isa. 48. 12). And these titles were given to all the nation of Israel, including both good and bad. Now, the gospel having the most strict connection with the books of the Old Testament, where these phrases frequently occur; and our Lord and His apostles being native Jews, and beginning to preach in the land of Israel, the language in which they preached would of course abound with the phrases of the Jewish nation. And hence it is easy to see why such of them as would not receive Him were styled reprobated. For they no longer continued to be the people of God; whereas this and those other honourable titles were continued to all such Jews as embraced Christianity. And the same appellations which once belonged to the Jewish nation were now given to the Gentile Christians also; together with which they were invested with all the privileges of 'the chosen people of God'; and nothing could cut them off from these but their own wilful apostasy. It does not appear that even good men were ever termed 'God's elect' till above two thousand years from the creation. God's electing or choosing the nation of Israel, and separating them from the other nations, who were sunk in idolatry and all wickedness, gave the first occasion to this sort of language. And as the separating the Christians from the Jews was a like event, no wonder it was expressed in like words and phrases; only with this difference, the term 'elect' was of old applied to all the members of the visible Church; whereas in the New Testament it is applied only to the members of the invisible"—WESLEY.

"God's elect. The expression is found Matt. 24. 31; Mark 13. 27; Luke 18. 7; Col. 3. 12; Tit. 1. 1. God's 'elect' (chosen) are they who are 'foreknown, foreordained, called, justified, and glorified.' The eternal safety of every believer in Christ who is 'faithful' to Him, is taught in the concluding verses of this chapter in gracious words, to the force of which no explanation can add. It is God that justifieth. It is Christ that died. Who shall 'charge,' or who condemn? The questions remain unanswered, and the man who is justified through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, who proves his 'election' by his holy life, may still ask these questions with brave defiance to every foe, and with ever-growing trust in the grace and power which has made his salvation possible." "God's elect. Whatever God does, He purposed from eternity. Therefore, since God designs us to be sharers of the holiness of Christ, we infer that from eternity He formed for us this glorious design. And since the holiness of the Son of God includes or implies His entire moral grandeur, of which His visible splendour is but the outshining, we infer that, before the world was, God foreordained us to be the sharers of the image of His Son. (Comp. 1 Cor. 2. 7.) Upon our knowledge of this purpose rests our hope of glory. Predestination is simply a purpose; and by no means implies the inevitable accomplishment of the purpose. The boy marked out for one trade may enter another. It might, however, be supposed that what God foreordained must in every case be realised. But God has thought fit that the accomplishment of His own purposes shall depend upon man's faith. Hence S. Paul solemnly warns his readers (ch. 11. 21, 22) that unless they continue in faith, they will, although foreordained to glory, be cut off. So, in Jer. 18. 7–12, God expressly declares that the accomplishment of His purpose of blessing to Israel depends upon Israel's conduct. The doctrine of predestination is thus consistent with the teaching that salvation depends upon each man's own faith (ch. 9. 32; 11. 22 f.); with the teaching that God is using means to lead all men to repentance (ch. 2. 4); and with the universality of the purpose of redemption (ch. 5. 18)"—Beet. "Who shall lay anything? This is that confident interrogatory of a good conscience. (1 Pet. 3. 21.) It is God that justifieth. And if the judge acquit a prisoner, he cares not though the jailor or fellow-prisoners condemn him" — Trapp. "Who shall lay anything? All things shall be freely given to the Christian. Nothing can frustrate this; either on the side of God, for when He justifies none can condemn; or on the side of Christ, whose death and resurrection and ascension and intercession are pledges that nothing can separate us from His love. What have we to fear? When God pronounces our acquittal there is none who can pronounce our condemnation. Lit. 'God is He who justifies, who then can condemn?' and answering to this in the next verse we have, Christ is He that died, etc. This is the twofold answer to the question, 'Who shall come forward to accuse God's elect?' It is a conclusive reply to this to state the relation in which the accused stand to God and to Christ"—Ellicott.

34. Yea rather, that is risen. "Our faith should not stop at His death, but be exercised further on His resurrection, kingdom, second coming. Who maketh intercession for us—presenting there His obedience, His sufferings, His prayers, and our prayers sanctified through Him"—Wesley.

This is the only direct reference to the Ascension in the Epistle, and yet none more surely realised the presence of the Lord in heaven than S. Paul. We also must believe in the risen living Christ. He has exalted our human nature, and now maketh intercession for us. No wonder we have the teaching of a salvation "to the uttermost." (Heb. 7. 25.) Learn the glorious possibilities of faith in Christ. (Heb. 4. 14–16.) Yea rather ("Yea more"). The pledges that Christ has given us of His love did not end, but only began with His death.

35. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ—"toward us? Shall affliction or distress? He proceeds in order, from less troubles to greater; can any of these separate us from His protection in it; and, if He sees good, deliverance from it?"—Wesley.

"He speaks in view of these amazing proofs of the grace and truth of the Father and the Son. The whole context here relates to our security through the goodness of God. In what sense are the things now to be named viewed as 'not separating' us from this love? Probably they are to be taken as so many veils or clouds between us and the (outward) manifestation of the love; things which might tempt the believer to think that his Lord had forsaken him. S. Paul assures him that this cannot be really so; the separation is but seeming; the love is indissoluble. Who shall separate us? The Syriac is, Who shall separate me?"—C. B. Love of Christ. This may refer to either Christ's love for us, or our love to Christ. Origen and many others prefer the latter view. But the context seems to demand the former.

36. All the day—"that is, every day, continually. We are accounted—by our enemies; by ourselves"—Wesley.

As it is written—"in Ps. 44. 22. There were men who suffered death in God's service, in the earlier days. In suffering and in saintliness, the believing Church is one throughout all time. (1 Pet. 4. 12.) The sufferings of God's people are at all times typical of each other. At the same time, the tone of the Psalmist wants the exulting and triumphant confidence of the apostle."

37. We more than conquer—"we are not only no losers, but abundant gainers, by all these trials. This period seems to describe the full assurance of hope"—Wesley.

Men do suffer from their foes, but when their tribulations strengthen faith and love, they result in great gain. Christ intends a glorious victory for His people. (2 Cor. 4. 16–18.) They now anticipate the eternal triumph, and even when "the last enemy" comes to conquer, they may say, "Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 15. 54-57).

38, 39. I am persuaded. "This is inferred from the thirty-fourth verse in an admirable order:—

'Neither DEATH' shall hurt us	For	'Christ is DEAD:'
'Nor LIFE'	,,	,, is RISEN.'
'Nor ANGELS, nor PRINCIPALITIES, nor POWERS; nor things present, nor things to come' .	,,	,, is at the RIGHT HAND of GOD:'
'Nor HEIGHT, nor DEPTH, nor any other creature'	,,	,, maketh INTERCESSION for us.'

Neither death—terrible as it is to natural men; a violent death in particular (ver. 36). Nor life—with all the affliction and distress it can bring (ver. 35); or a long, easy life; or all living men. Nor angels—whether good (if it were possible they should attempt it) or bad, with all their wisdom and strength. Nor principalities, nor powers—not even those of the highest ranks, or to them eminent power. Nor things present—which may befall us during our pilgrimage; or the whole world, till it passeth away. Nor things to come—which may occur either when our time on earth is past, or when time itself is at an end, as the final judgment, the general conflagration, the everlasting fire. Nor height, nor depth—the former sentence respected the differences of times; this, the differences of places. How many great and various things are contained in these words, we do not, need not, cannot know yet. The height—in S. Paul's sublime style, is put for heaven. The depth—for the great abyss—that is, neither the heights, I will not say of walls, mountains, seas, but of heaven itself, can move us; nor the abyss itself, the very thought of which might astonish the boldest creature. Nor any creature—nothing beneath the Almighty; visible enemies he does not even deign to name. Shall be able—either by force (ver. 35), or by any legal claim (ver. 33), etc. To separate us from the love of God in Christ—which will surely save, protect, deliver us who believe, in and through and from them all"—WESLEY.

"Proof of their victory. Since Christ is our strength, our wealth, our joy, our life, nothing can injure us, unless it can separate us from Him. Persuaded—suggests deliberation, followed by full conviction. Death—put first, because (ver. 36) the sword ever hung before the early Christians. Principalities—those who hold the dignity of princes, i.e. angel-princes or archangels (as in Eph. 1. 21; 3. 10; Cor. 1. 16; 2. 10), of good angels; and (in 1 Cor 15 24; Eph. 6. 12; Col. 2. 15) of bad ones. Doubtless they were 'the chief princes' of Dan. 10. 13, 21; 12. 1. Angels—not even angels are strong enough to tear us from God. Powers—kings, magistrates, etc. Which is in Christ Jesus. In the body of Christ was God's love manifested to the world, and we come personally and consciously within its embrace by union with the Spirit of Christ. 'Neither the hand of death, nor the events of a prolonged life, nor angels of ordinary or extraordinary rank, neither the hardships of the present nor the uncertainties of the future, nor powers of whatever kind, neither exaltation nor the deepest debasement, nor anything else which God has made, can put us beyond the reach of that love of God which shone upon us in the person, and from the cross of our Master, the anointed Jesus.' Therefore the assault of our enemies is utterly vain. We are more than conquerors"—BEET. "Height: Depth—vastness of intervening space. The Lord who loved us is 'above all heavens,' as to His bodily presence; but His love reaches thence to our 'depth' below, and holds us fast. Any other creature—a phrase meant to be absolutely inclusive of everything except the uncreated One. And it is the Uncreated who loved us! The previous phrases had logically included 'all creatures'; but S. Paul would fain preclude even the least definable causes of apprehension. This closing passage of ch. 8, taken as the climax of the whole previous part of the Epistle, is a remarkable illustration of the vital connection between revealed trust and sacred love"—C. B.

CHAPTER IX.

SECTION XXII.—Vers. 1-6. JEWISH UNBELIEF: S. PAUL'S DISTRESS IN VIEW OF IT.—In this chapter S. Paul, after strongly declaring his love and esteem for them, sets himself to answer the grand objection of his countrymen, namely, that the rejection of the Jews and reception of the Gentiles was contrary to the word of God. That he had not here the least thought of personal election or reprobation is manifest—(1) Because it lay quite wide of his design, which was this, to show that God's rejecting the Jews and receiving the Gentiles was consistent with His word; (2) Because such a doctrine would not only have had no tendency to convince, but would have evidently tended to harden, the Jews; (3) Because, when he sums up his argument in the close of the chapter, he has not one word, or the least intimation about it.

1. In Christ. "This seems to imply an appeal to Him. In the Holy Ghost—through His grace"—WESLEY.

"I lie not. The special reason for such words here is, perhaps, the thought that both Gentile Christians and unbelieving Jews (for different reasons) might think him now regardless of his earthly kindred, because so resolute in teaching the entire spiritual equality of all believers, Jew or Gentile. The Epistle might possibly be heard or read by unconverted Jews; and such words as these might reach their hearts"—MOULE. "The apostle had both the testimony of his own conscience, the testimony of the Holy Ghost"—CLARKE. "My conscience, etc. S. Paul appeals to that faculty by which he contemplates his own inner self; and reminds us that he uses this faculty under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Those who knew S. Paul could not resist this appeal to Christ, in union with whom they knew that he lived and spoke, and to the Spirit who evidently permeated his entire life and thought"—BEET.

2. I have great sorrow. "A high degree of spiritual sorrow and of spiritual joy may consist together. (Ch. 8. 39.) By declaring his sorrow for the unbelieving Jews, who excluded themselves from all the blessings he had enumerated, he shows that what he was now about to speak he did not speak from any prejudice to them"—WESLEY.

S. Paul's sorrow for the Jews was great. Multitudes of them did not believe in Christ; they were under the condemnation of God. He saw well not only what they were, but what they might become, and yet what they blindly refused. No wonder he had great sorrow, and unceasing pain in his heart (R.V.). No doubt the expressions here are the more intense because of the contrasted recent view of the coming glory of believers, and their security in the love and covenant of God.

3. I could wish. "Human words cannot fully describe the motions of souls that are full of God. As if he had said, I could wish to suffer in their stead; yea, to be an anathema from Christ in their place. In how high a sense he wished this, who can tell, unless himself had been asked and had resolved the question? Certainly he did not then consider himself at all, but only others, and the glory of God. The thing could not be; yet the wish was pious and solid, though with a tacit condition, if it were right and possible"—WESLEY.

"Notice the intensity of S. Paul's patriotism. When he became a Christian, he did not cease to be a Jew, even though the Jews rejected Christ. A similar case of self-devotion in Ex. 32. 32. Perhaps in these moments S. Paul and Moses shared most fully the mind of Him who actually did (Gal. 3. 13; Matt. 27. 46) what their hearts vainly prompted them to do. The greatness of S. Paul's sorrow for the Jews, and the sacrifice to which it prompts him, proves how terrible was their position. S. Paul was sad for them, just as many to-day, who themselves rejoice amid the trials of life in the smile of God, are sad because some whom they love are away from Christ, and because there is reason to fear that they will be separated from Him for ever"—BEET.

4. Whose is the adoption, etc. "He enumerates six prerogatives, of which the first pair respect God the Father, the second Christ, the third the Holy Ghost. The adoption and the glory—that is, Israel is the first-born child of God, and the God of glory is their God. (Deut. 4. 7; Ps. 106. 20.) These are relative to each other. At once God is the Father of Israel, and Israel are the people of God. He speaks not here of the ark, or any corporeal thing. God Himself is 'the glory of His people Israel.' And the covenants, and the giving of the Law. The covenant was given long before the Law. It is termed 'covenants' in the plural, because it was so often and so variously repeated, and because there were two dispositions of it (Gal. 4. 24), frequently called two covenants, the one promising, the other exhibiting the promise. And the worship, and the promises. The true way of worshipping God; and all the promises made to the fathers"—WESLEY.

The name Israelites implied their high dignity; and they, as a nation, were taken into a peculiar relationship with God. They were called His sons and first-born. (Ex. 4. 22; Deut. 14. 1; Jer. 31. 9; Hos. 11. 1.) This Divine adoption was a high privilege. With them God had made special covenants. (Ex. 19. 5; 24. 7; 34. 27; Deut. 29. 1.) These 'covenants' included the most gracious promises about the Messiah and His reign, and as to the glory of their land. To S. Paul these "promises" were all sure of fulfilment to all who should prove faithful to the conditions on which they were given. BEET says: "All the promises about the Messiah, and the glory of His reign, which had been the solace and strength of Israel during ages of disaster, were the result of the adoption and the covenants."

5. "To the preceding, S. Paul now adds two more prerogatives. Theirs are the fathers—the patriarchs and holy men of old—yea, the Messiah Himself. Who is over all, God blessed for ever. The original words imply the self-existent, independent Being, who was, is, and is to come. 'Over all'—the Supreme; as being God, and consequently 'blessed for ever.' No words can more clearly express His Divine, supreme majesty, and His gracious sovereignty both over Jews and Gentiles"—WESLEY.

"The fathers—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the twelve patriarchs, etc., the most renowned of men, and especially so because of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came. Here the twofold nature of our Lord—His divinity and His humanity—appears. He who 'was God' (John 1. 1) was 'found in fashion as a man' (Phil. 2. 7, 8). The divinity of Christ is most clearly taught, and every true heart responds Amen. To Him, the Lord of all. (Acts 10. 36.) God has given 'a name above every name' (Phil 2. 9), and this shall be acknowledged in the eternal praises of the glorified. (Rev. 5. 12, 13.) Safely may we say, with Doddridge, that it is 'a memorable text, and contains proof of Christ's proper deity which the opposers of that doctrine have never been able, nor will ever be able, to answer.' God, who is over all—who rules over and disposes all things according to His will. (Eph. 1. 11 ; 4. 6.) Blessed for ever—as in ch. 1. 25. At the mention of the name and birth of Christ, S. Paul cannot refrain from an outburst of praise to the great Ruler of the world who had chosen Israel, and had given Christ to be born in S. Paul's own day and nation. His sorrow for the Jews implies that the religious advantages of the old covenant, which were designed to lead them to Christ, and the birth of Christ in their midst, had utterly failed to profit them. Therefore, had the sentence ended here, it might have appeared that these advantages were of little worth. But they were infinitely the greatest advantages with which any nation had been endowed. And to S. Paul and the Jewish believers they had actually been the means of the inward and spiritual and eternal blessings of the new covenant. Notice how readily and frequently, and sometimes unexpectedly, S. Paul turns to God in prayer or praise, even from matters in which God is not expressly mentioned. (Ch. 1. 25 ; 15. 5, 13 ; 16. 20, 25.) To do so was natural to him because he looked upon everything in its relation to God"—BEET.

SECTION XXIII. — Vers. 7-33. GOD IS NOT UNFAITHFUL OR UNRIGHTEOUS.—6. Not as if. "The Jews imagined that the word of God must fail if all their nation were not saved. This S. Paul now refutes, and proves that the word itself had foretold their falling away. The word of God—the promises of God to Israel. Had fallen to the ground—this could not be. Even now, says the apostle, some enjoy the promises, and hereafter 'all Israel shall be saved.' This is the sum of the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters. For—here he enters upon the proof of it—all are not Israel who are of Israel. The Jews vehemently maintained the contrary, viz. that all who were born Israelites, and they only, were the people of God. The former part of this assertion is refuted here ; the latter, ver. 24, etc. The sum is, God accepts all believers, and them only ; and this is no way contrary to His word. Nay, He hath declared in His word, both by types and by express testimonies, that believers are accepted as the 'children of the promise,' while unbelievers are rejected, though they are 'children after the flesh.' 'All are not Israel' —not in the favour of God—'who are' lineally descended 'of Israel'"—WESLEY.

"But it is not as though the word of God hath come to nought (R.V.). The apostle is speaking of the rejection of the Jews from being any longer the visible Church of God, on account of natural descent ; and in this passage he shows that the purpose of God to construct His Church upon a new basis, that of faith in Christ, although it would exclude the body of the Jewish people from this Church, since they refused 'the election of grace' through faith, would not prove that the word of God had fallen to the ground, or, as the literal meaning of the original is rendered in our version, 'has taken none effect.' All are not Israel (God's visible Church and acknowledged people) who are of Israel, or Jacob ; for a great part of the ten tribes who had been carried into captivity before the Babylonian invasion of Judah had never returned, had never been again collected into a people, and had, for ages, been cast out of their ancient Church state and relation, though by natural descent they were 'of Israel,' that is, descendants of Jacob"—WATSON. "S. Paul's sorrow, and the present sad position of the unbelieving Jews, do not by any means imply that the word of God has failed. S. Paul thus meets an objection to the gospel, viz. that if it be true, God has broken His promise. His previous teaching implies that the mass of the Jews are outside the family of God, and condemned to die. According to present appearances, many of them will, if the gospel is from God, be shut out of the long foretold glory. But with Abraham's seed, God made an everlasting covenant, and promised to be their God for ever. (Gen. 17. 7.) It might therefore be objected to the gospel that, by limiting salvation to those who believe, it implies the partial failure of the ancient promise. S. Paul admits that these old promises, on which the Jews based their claims, are 'the word of God.' But in this verse he declares that the position of the Jews does not imply that the promises have failed. So long as they continue in their present unbelief, they are outside the number of those for whom the promises were given"—BEET.

7. Neither because they are lineally the seed of Abraham, will it follow that they are all children of God. "This did not hold even in Abraham's own family ; and much less in his remote descendants. But God then said, in Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, Isaac, not Ishmael, shall be called thy seed ; that seed to which the promise is made"—WESLEY.

From the first it was expressly stated that the posterity of Abraham, strictly so called, was to be that derived through Isaac. In Isaac shall thy seed be called, thus excluding the descendants of Hagar. God had, in His sovereign pleasure, conferred the Church relation upon the seed of Abraham only in certain lines. By the exercise of the same sovereignty God had now resolved not to connect the Church relation with natural descent, but to establish it on a ground which might comprehend the Gentile nations also—the common ground of faith in Christ. ELLICOTT says : "The apostle explains the restriction mentioned in this verse in a spiritual sense. Mere natural descent gives no claim to membership in the theocracy." See the note on Gal. 3. 7.)

8. That is, Not the children, etc. "As if he had said, This is a clear type of things to come; showing us that in all succeeding generations, not the children of the flesh, the lineal descendants of Abraham, but the children of the promise, they to whom the promise is made, that is, believers, are the children of God"—WESLEY.

"Mere natural descent gives no claim to membership in the Church. It was with respect to their faith in Christ that men were chosen out of the world, and thus chosen into the Church. The rule, too, is universal; and if so, if it universally holds good that actual election has respect to faith, then, unless God's eternal purpose to elect be at variance with His electing, then His eternal purpose to elect had respect both to faith and obedience"—WATSON.

9. For this is the word of the promise—"by the power of which Isaac was conceived, and not by the power of nature. Not, Whosoever is born of thee shall be blessed, but, At this time — which I now appoint — I will come, and Sarah shall have a son—and he shall inherit the blessing"—WESLEY.

"Rather, this saying is of promise. The children of promise, I say, for the saying, 'At this time will I come,' etc., is a matter of promise: it implied a Divine and miraculous intervention, and did not come in the ordinary course of nature"—ELLICOTT. "This verse is simply intended to justify the expression, 'children of the promise' (ver. 8). When the apostle says, a word of promise, he means a word which had the free character of a promise, and which did not in the least imply the recognition of a right. The term, at this time, signifies, 'Next year, at the moment when this same time (this same epoch) will return'"—GODET.

10, 11. "And that God's blessing does not belong to all the descendants of Abraham, appears not only by this instance, but by that of Esau and Jacob, who was chosen to inherit the blessing, before either of them had done good or evil. The apostle mentions this to show, that neither were their ancestors accepted through any merit of their own. That the purpose of God according to election might stand—whose purpose was to elect or choose the promised seed. Not of works—not for any preceding merit in him He chose. But of Him that called—of His own good pleasure, who called to that privilege whom He saw good"—WESLEY.

"Here a still stronger example of sovereign choice occurs. Isaac and Ishmael had only one parent in common; Jacob and Esau had both. In the former case, the choice of Isaac was declared only after Ishmael's birth and childhood; in the latter, the choice of Jacob was declared before the brothers were born. Nothing could go beyond this (ver. 11), in stating that the reasons of the Divine choice lie wholly within the Divine mind, and not in the works and characters of the choice. According to election — i.e. as determined, or characterised, by the sovereign choice of the Divine mind. S. Paul is treating the Divine choice in the widest and most absolute respects; and the sovereign gift to Jacob of sacred privileges, determining his whole course and his posterity, is thus taken as illustrating the fact of an equally sovereign gift, to 'whomsoever God will,' of the capacity to repent, believe, and love. Throughout the argument we must remember who the 'elect' are in the grand special case in hand, viz. the 'remnant' who actually (not only potentially) are true believers, under both the old and new dispensations"—C. B.

12. The elder—Esau — shall serve the younger—"not in person, for he never did, but in his posterity. Accordingly, the Edomites were often brought into subjection by the Israelites"—WESLEY.

"The oracle is taken from Gen. 25. 23. The question whether it refers to the two brothers personally, or to the two peoples who shall spring from them, is settled by the words preceeding: 'Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall issue from thee.' Hence it follows that the oracle neither speaks of the two peoples separately from their fathers, nor of the two fathers separately from their descendants. Possibly Genesis gives greater weight to the idea of the two peoples; whereas S. Paul (ver. 11) thinks chiefly of the two fathers"—GODET.

13. As it is written—"with which word in Genesis, spoken so long before, that of Malachi agrees—I have loved Jacob—with a peculiar love—that is, the Israelites, the posterity of Jacob. And I have, comparatively, hated Esau—that is, the Edomites, the posterity of Esau. But observe—(1) This does not relate to the person of Jacob or Esau; (2) Nor does it relate to the eternal state either of them or their posterity. Thus far the apostle has been proving his proposition, namely, that the exclusion of a great part of the seed of Abraham, yea, and of Isaac, from the special promises of God, was so far from being impossible, that, according to the Scriptures themselves, it had actually happened. He now introduces and refutes an objection"—WESLEY.

"The apostle speaks not of the persons of Jacob or Esau, but of their posterity. It is therefore evident that neither the love of God to Jacob, nor the hatred of God to Esau, were such, according to which the eternal states of men, either in happiness or misery, are to be determined; nor is there here any scriptural or rational ground for the decree of unconditional personal election and reprobation, which comparatively modern times have endeavoured to build on these Scriptures. For (1) it is here proved that Esau is not mentioned under any personal consideration, but only as the head of his posterity; (2) The testimony of Scripture amply proves that all Esau's posterity were not, even in this sense, reprobated, nor all Jacob's posterity elected; (3) Neither does that service, or subjugation to Jacob, which the Divine oracle imposed on Esau, import any such reprobation as some contend for; as the servant may be elected, while the master himself is in a state of reprobation; (4) Were it even granted that servitude did import such a reprobation, yet it is certain that Esau, in person, never did serve Jacob. The scope of the apostle's reasoning is to show that God is the Sovereign of His own ways, has a right to dispense His blessings as He chooses, and to give salvation to mankind, not in the ways of their devising but in that way most suitable to His infinite wisdom and goodness"—CLARKE. "Loved: Hated. Human passions are attributed to God, to teach that He acts as men do when influenced by such passions. Only thus can men understand God. Hence God is angry (ch. 1. 18, etc.), repents (Gen. 6. 6; Jer. 18. 8), and hates (Ps. 5. 5 f.). God acts as though He were angry; as a man does who repents or hates. God acted as a friend of Jacob's children, and as an adversary of the sons of Esau. Mal. 1. 2 teaches that God's different treatment of the two nations did not arise from anything the fathers or their children had done; and the story of the two brothers and their descendants teaches the same. Therefore, looking back upon the words to Rebecca, S. Paul is justified in saying that God spoke them in order to declare the great principle, that the blessings of the covenant are given without consideration of human conduct"—BEET.

14, 15. Is there injustice with God? "Is it unjust in God to give Jacob the blessing rather than Esau? or to accept believers, and them only? God forbid—in no wise. This is well consistent with justice; for He has a right to fix the terms on which He will show mercy, according to His declaration to Moses, petitioning for all the people, after they had committed idolatry with the golden calf. I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy—according to the terms I Myself have fixed—and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion—namely, on those only who submit to My terms, who accept of it in the way that I have appointed"—WESLEY.

"The objection is not based on God's hatred to Esau, but on 'not of works.' For no Jew would say that God's treatment of Esau was unjust. Unrighteousness—or, in a ruler, injustice. S. Paul has completely overturned one objection, viz. that the gospel is contrary to the faithfulness of God. But the unbelieving Jew might still object on the ground of justice. S. Paul appeals to words spoken to Moses in one of the most solemn moments of his life. (Ex. 33. 19.) Mercy—kindness towards the unfortunate and helpless. Compassion—a stronger form of the same. Since, apart from God we are helpless and wretched, all God's gifts to us are acts of mercy. While granting Moses' prayer to see His glory, God asserts the great principle that His gifts are acts of mercy, and that therefore the objects of them are chosen, not because of their merit, but because of their helplessness and God's pity. God revealed His glory to Moses, not because he deserved it, but because God had compassion on him. Ver. 16 is S. Paul's inference from God's words"—BEET. "How can we decide on the means which the supreme Being employs, while we are ignorant of the reasons which move Him, and the plan which He holds in view? Before we censure, let us understand"—JAY.

16. It—"the blessing—therefore is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth. It is not the effect either of the will or the works of man, but of the grace and power of God. The will of man is here opposed to the grace of God, and man's running to the Divine operation. And this general declaration respects not only Isaac and Jacob, and the Israelites in the time of Moses, but likewise all the spiritual children of Abraham, even to the end of the world"—WESLEY.

"Of him that runneth. A metaphor taken from the foot races, as S. Paul may very possibly have seen them practised at Corinth. (Comp. ch. 9. 16; Gal. 2. 2; 5. 7; Phil. 2. 16.) The meaning is that the prize does not depend on human will or human effort, but on the grace of God"—ELLICOTT. "When God gives, it is not because a human will (he that willeth) or a human work (he that runneth) lays Him under obligation, and forces Him to give, in order not to be unjust by refusing. It is in Himself the initiative and the efficacy are (Him that calleth), whence the gift flows. He gives not as a thing due, but as a fruit of His love, which does not imply that therein He acts arbitrarily. Such a supposition is excluded, precisely because the Giver in question is God, who is wisdom itself, and who thinks nothing good except what is good. The principle here laid down included God's right to call the Gentiles to salvation when He should be pleased to grant them this favour"—GODET.

17. Moreover. "God has an indisputable right to reject those who will not accept the blessings on His own terms. And this He exercised in the case of Pharaoh; to whom, after many instances of stubbornness and rebellion, He said, as it is recorded in Scripture, For this very thing have I raised thee up—that is, unless thou repent, this will surely be the consequence of My raising thee up, making thee a great and glorious king, that My power will be shown upon thee (as indeed it was, by overwhelming him and his army in the sea), and My name declared through all the earth—as it is at this day. Perhaps this may have a still further meaning. It seems that God was resolved to show His power over the river, the insects, other animals (with the natural causes of their health, diseases, life, and death), over the meteors, the air, the sun (all of which were worshipped by the Egyptians, from whom other nations learned their idolatry), and at once over all their gods, by that terrible stroke of slaying all their priests, and their choicest victims, the firstborn of man and beast; and all this with a design, not only to deliver His people Israel (for which a single act of omnipotence would have sufficed), but to convince the Egyptians that the objects of their worship were but the creatures of Jehovah, and entirely in His power, and to draw them and the neighbouring nations, who should hear of all these wonders, from their idolatry, to worship the one God. For the execution of this design (in order to the display of the Divine power over the various objects of their worship, in variety of wonderful acts, which were at the same time just punishment for their cruel oppression of the Israelites) God was pleased to raise to the throne of an absolute monarchy, a man, not whom He had made wicked on purpose, but whom He found so,—the proudest, the most daring and obstinate of all the Egyptian princes; and who, being incorrigible, well deserved to be set up in that situation, where the Divine judgments fell the heaviest" —WESLEY.

"From the case of Pharaoh, S. Paul will prove that God hardens whom He will, and thus put it beyond doubt that He has mercy on whom He will. The Scripture says—as in ch. 4. 3. For the solemn and express words of God to Pharaoh, S. Paul claims no higher authority than that they are the voice of Scripture. (See ch. 11. 2; Gal. 4. 30; 3. 8, 22.) This implies that the whole of the Scriptures had for S. Paul the authority of God. (Comp. ch. 3. 19.) The quoted passage is Ex. 9. 15 f. Instead of destroying the king at once, God permitted him to continue his resistance, and thus reserved him for a more conspicuous overthrow, which should spread to all nations the name and fame of the God of Israel. This purpose was attained. (Josh. 2. 10.) For 'made thee to continue,' S. Paul writes I raised thee up. (Comp. Acts 13. 22 f.) S. Paul's alternation embodies a correct inference. Those who occupy thrones are placed on them by God (Dan. 4. 25) to work out His purposes (Isa. 37. 26). God said that He had formed a purpose that through Pharaoh His name should be made known. Therefore we cannot doubt that, for this end, God not only spared his life, but placed on the throne of Egypt at that time a man of Pharaoh's character. In later days, to accomplish a different purpose, He placed on the throne of Babylon (Ezra 1. 2) a man of different character. God's perfect foreknowledge (ch. 8. 29) enabled Him to do all this without interfering with human freedom. He knew beforehand the men to whom He gave the sceptre, and knew that their character would serve His purpose. We therefore infer from Ex. 9. 16 that God placed Pharaoh on the throne, that his obstinacy and overthrow might be the means of making known to the nations around the greatness of God"—BEET. ELLICOTT says: "The converse proposition is also true, that God also uses the wickedness of men as a means of exhibiting His power and justice. Raised thee up—brought into the world and on to the scene of history. Show My power—by the plagues of Egypt and by the overthrow of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea." MOULE adds: "Pharaoh is here quoted as an example of Divine sovereignty. He appears as one who might (in human judgment) have been dealt with and subdued by a process of grace and mercy, but who was left to his own evil will. No evil was infused into him, but good influences were not infused, and his evil took its course. It is instructive and a relief in a certain sense to read this passage in the light of the history of Exodus, where it is remarkable that the 'hardening' seems to be attributed in ten places to the Lord, and certainly in ten to Pharaoh himself; and where the narrative, in its living simplicity, at least shows how perfectly real was the action of the human consciousness and will. But we must not think that this solves the mystery, nor must we lose sight of S. Paul's object in quoting Pharaoh's case here, viz. to establish the fact of the sovereignty with which God shows, or does not show, mercy."

18. So then—that is, accordingly, He does show mercy on "His own terms, namely, on them that believe. And whom He willeth—namely, them that believe not—He hardeneth—leaves to the hardness of their hearts"—WESLEY.

"The doctrine of the Divine sovereignty is here expressed in its most trenchant and logical form. In Ex. 8. 32; 9. 34; 13. 15, etc., the hardening of Pharaoh's heart is attributed to his own act. God's decrees include human free will, without destroying it. But how they do this we cannot say"—ELLICOTT. "The final obduration of all Pharaohs must be regarded as judicial; and as the last, and not the first, act of a righteous judge. God foresaw what Pharaoh would do; but it can never be conceded that a father who, with weeping eyes, foresees the destruction of his prodigal, is accessory to his ruin"—SUTCLIFFE.

19. Why doth He still find fault? "The particle 'still" is strongly expressive of the objector's sour, morose murmuring. For who hath resisted His will? The word 'His' likewise expresses his surliness and aversion to God, whom he does not even deign to name" —WESLEY.

"S. Paul is still, as so often before, writing as if an opponent were at his side. How vividly this suggests that he had himself experienced the conflicts of thoughts which indeed every earnest mind more or less encounters! But conflicts do not always end in further doubts. But why, after such statements of His sovereignty, does He go on to treat us as free agents? Here is the second head of objection. God's justice was the first, now it is man's accountability"—C. B. "For who hath resisted His will? Who hath been, is, or ever will be, able to hinder that from coming to pass which God willeth shall come to pass?"—BENSON. The brief and peremptory questions of this verse have a tone of discontent and presumption, which is met in ver. 20 by a stern rebuke: explanation follows later, in ver. 22.

20. Nay, but who art thou, O man—"little, impotent, ignorant man—that repliest against God—that accusest God of injustice, for Himself fixing the terms on which He will show mercy? Shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, Why hast Thou made me thus?—Why hast Thou made me capable of honour and immortality, only by believing?"—WESLEY.

"God is infinitely just, whether we apprehend the fact or not. It is impossible for Him to do anything but what is right; but it is very possible that we, who are but men, may fail to discern it. He is the Creator, we are His creatures, and are not therefore in a position to judge Him. When we regard His ways imperfect, it is because we do not comprehend them. Nay but, O man. The answer is not so much a solution of the intellectual difficulty, as an appeal to the religious sense to prevent it from being raised. That His dealings should be questioned at all is a breach of the reverence due to God"—ELLICOTT. "Why hast Thou made me thus? Why hast Thou made me capable of honour and immortality, only on the terms of repentance and faith? Or, why was I not entitled by birth to advantages which others were born to?"—BENSON. "What makes the prophet's language (see Isa. 29. 16; 45. 9; 64. 8) so exactly appropriate to the apostle's argument is, that they are both dealing with the same subject, namely, God's formation of Israel as a nation, and His consequent unquestionable right to deal with it as seems good to Him"—GIFFORD.

21. Hath not the potter power over the clay—"and much more hath not God power over His creatures, to appoint one vessel, namely, the believer, to honour, and another, the unbeliever, to dishonour? If we survey the right which God has over us, in a more general way, with regard to His intelligent creatures, God may be considered in two different views—as Creator, Proprietor, and Lord of all; or, as their moral Governor and Judge. God, as sovereign Lord and Proprietor of all, dispenses His gifts or favours to His creatures with perfect wisdom, but by no rules or methods of proceeding that we are acquainted with. The time when we shall exist, the country where we shall live, our parents, our constitution of body and turn of mind,—these, and numberless other circumstances, are doubtless ordered with perfect wisdom, but by rules that lie quite out of our sight. But God's methods of dealing with us, as our Governor and Judge, are clearly revealed and perfectly known, namely, that He will finally reward every man according to his works: 'He that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned.' Therefore, though 'He hath mercy on whom He willeth, and whom He willeth He hardeneth'—that is, suffers to be hardened in consequence of their obstinate wickedness—yet, His is not the will of an arbitrary, capricious, or tyrannical being. He wills nothing but what is infinitely wise and good; and therefore His will is a most proper rule of judgment. He will show mercy, as He hath assured us, to none but true believers, nor harden any but such as obstinately refuse His mercy"—WESLEY.

"When the apostle speaks of the potter making of the same lump one vessel to honour and another to dishonour, the last term does not fully apply to the state of a people devoted to inevitable destruction. It is true that, in a following verse, he speaks of 'vessels of wrath fitted to destruction'; but that is another view of the case of the Jews; nor does he affirm that they were 'fitted to destruction' by God. There he speaks of what men fit themselves for; or that fitness for the infliction of the Divine wrath upon them which they themselves, by their perverseness, create. Here he speaks of an act of God, using the figure of a potter forming some vessels to honour, others to dishonour. But dishonour is not destruction, No potter makes vessels to destroy them; and we may be certain that when Jeremiah went down to the potter's house to see him work the clay upon the wheel, that the potter was not employed in forming vessels to destroy them. On the contrary, says the prophet, when the lump of clay was 'marred in his hand,' so that, not for want of skill in himself, but of proper quality in the clay, it took not the form he designed: of the same lump he made 'another vessel, as it seemed good to the potter to make it'; a meaner vessel, as the inferior quality or temper of the clay admitted, instead of that finer and more ornamental form which it would not take. The application of this was natural and easy to the house of Israel. It had become a lump of marred clay in the hands of the potter, which answered not to his design, and yielded not to his will"—WATSON. "What does the lump represent? Some think that it is the people of Israel, and that God is described as having the right to make them either His elect people, or a rejected nation. This meaning breaks down in vers. 23 and 24, where we see that the vessels unto honour are elected from among the Gentiles as well as from among the Jews.

The lump, therefore, represents the whole of humanity, not humanity as God creates it, but in the state in which He finds it every moment when He puts it to the service of His kingdom. This state includes for each individual the whole series of free determinations which have gone to make him what he is. It belongs to God Himself to decide, according to His wisdom, the part which He will assign to every human being. (Comp. 2 Tim. 2. 21)"—GODET.

22. What if God, being willing—"referring to vers. 18, 19—that is, although it was now His will, because of their obstinate unbelief—to show His wrath—which necessarily presupposes sin—and to make His power known. This is repeated from ver. 17. Yet endured—as He did Pharaoh—with much long-suffering—which should have led them to repentance—the vessels of wrath—those who had moved His wrath by still rejecting His mercy—fitted for destruction—by their own wilful and final impenitence. Is there any injustice in this?"—WESLEY.

"Describes still further the man who replies to God, and makes still more evident the folly of his reply. Has borne—as if it were a burden to Him. In much long-suffering. (Comp. ch. 2. 4.) God not only delays punishment, but takes active means to lead them to repentance. Vessels—keeps up the idea of ver. 21. Of anger; so 'children of anger' (Eph. 2. 3), vessels with which God is angry. So 'vessels' on which God has 'mercy.' Made ready; by whom? S. Paul leaves us to infer. Since they were hardened by God, they were made ready by Him for destruction; since their hardening was the punishment of their own resistance, they had, by rejecting the gospel, made themselves ready. Every act of sin makes the sinner more fit for perdition. Destruction. It is the second death. (Matt. 7. 13; John 17. 12; Phil. 1. 28; 3. 19; 1 Tim. 6. 9; Heb. 10. 39)"—BEET.

23. That He might make known. "What if by showing such long-suffering even to 'the vessels of wrath,' He did the more abundantly show the greatness of His glorious goodness, wisdom, and power, on the vessels of mercy—on those whom He had Himself, by His grace, prepared for glory. Is this any injustice?"—WESLEY.

This is a direct and primary purpose of God's long-suffering towards vessels of wrath. The glory of God is, in general, the manifestation of the Divine perfections, and, here, more especially the manifestation of His goodness and mercy (Ex. 33. 18, 19), and "the riches of His glory" (Eph. 1. 18; 3. 16; Col. 1. 27), is that inexhaustible wealth of goodness which embraces all vessels of mercy in the fulness of blessing. ELLICOTT says: "Now the apostle explains who are meant by these abstract terms. The 'vessels of glory' are those who were intended to accept the Christian teaching, whether Jews or Gentiles. The 'vessels of wrath' are the unbelieving mass of the people of Israel."

24. Even us. "Here the apostle comes to the other proposition, of grace free for all, whether Jew or Gentile. Of the Jews. This he treats of, ver. 25. Of the Gentiles—treated of in the same verse"—WESLEY.

"He has drawn—by long-suffering, not only from the midst of the lost mass of the Jews, but also from among the Gentiles. This was what Jesus had declared: 'I have yet other sheep which are not of this fold' (John 10. 16). And this S. Paul had in view in the words, 'the riches of His glory.' While He gleaned among the Jews, He reaped a harvest among the Gentiles, and thus carried out the free and large plan of salvation which He had formed on the sole prevision of faith"—GODET.

25. Beloved—"as a spouse. Who once was not beloved—consequently, not unconditionally elected. This relates directly to the final restoration of the Jews"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul quotes these words, which refer primarily to the ten tribes, in proof that God, when He called men from the midst of the Gentiles to be vessels of mercy, acted on the principles announced by Hosea. The Gentiles could not be more completely aliens than those whom God declared to be neither His people nor objects of His mercy. But He foretold that, in days to come, He would speak again to the outcasts, and call them His children"—BEET.

26. There shall they be called the sons of God—"so that they need not leave their own country and come to Judea"—WESLEY.

"In the gospel this prophecy is fulfilled. And the fulfilment, though wider than the promise, exactly accords with its spirit. What in the days of Hosea, God promised to say in days then future, He really said (ch. 8. 14) in the gospel preached by S. Paul"—BEET. (See Hos. 1. 10; 2. 23.)

27. "But Isaiah testifies, that as many Gentiles will be accepted, so many Jews will be rejected; that out of all the thousands of Israel, a remnant only shall be saved. This was spoken originally of the few that were saved from the ravage of Sennacherib's army"—WESLEY.

"Crieth—with reference to the impassioned utterance of the prophet. A remnant—rather, 'the remnant.' 'The remnant, and only the remnant.' Shall be saved—in the original, 'shall return'—i.e. as explained in the previous verse, 'return to God.' S. Paul has followed the LXX. in putting the consequences of such conversion for the conversion itself"—ELLICOTT. "There is a contrast: Hosea speaks of the bringing in of Gentile believers; Isaiah of the rejection of all Jews except Jewish believers"—MOULE. "The force of the quotation (Isa. 10. 22) is evident. In ch. 9, S. Paul looks at the gospel in its bearing upon the relation of Jew and Gentile.

If it be true, many Gentiles are members of the family of God, and many Jews are, and apparently will be for ever, excluded from that family and from the salvation brought by the Messiah. This latter thought gave S. Paul deep sorrow. But he has shown that it involves neither unfaithfulness nor injustice in God. And the quotation from Hosea proves that the reception of the Gentiles, and that from Isaiah proving the limitation of salvation to a portion of the Jews, accord with prophecy"—BEET.

28. For He is finishing or cutting short His account—"in rigorous justice, will leave but a small remnant. There will be so general a destruction that but a small number will escape"—WESLEY.

"For He will finish. Lit., according to the correct rendering, 'For a sentence, accomplishing and abridging it, will the Lord execute upon the earth'—in other words, 'A short and summary sentence will the Lord execute upon the earth.' The severity of the sentence is a proof that only a remnant can be saved from it"—ELLICOTT.

29. As Isaiah had said before—"namely, Isa. 1. 9, concerning those who were besieged in Jerusalem by Rezin and Pekah—Unless the Lord had left us a seed—which denotes, (1) The present paucity; (2) The future abundance. We had been as Sodom—so that it is no unexampled thing for the main body of the Jewish nation to revolt from God, and perish in their sin"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul says that Isaiah's description of things around him was a prophecy of gospel days. God treated the covenant people on definite principles. Consequently, His dealings with them at one time were prophetic of times to come. Sabaoth a Hebrew word denoting 'armies.' The Lord of Sabaoth is Jehovah, whose bidding is done by the powers of heaven and earth. (Dan. 4. 35; Ps. 103. 20 f.; 148. 2.) Seed—from the LXX., instead of 'remnant.' The remnant of Judah in the days of Isaiah was a seed in which the life of the sacred people was preserved for future generations. It might be objected to the gospel that, by making faith the condition of salvation, it practically reduced the ancient people to a small remnant, viz. the believing Jews. But Isaiah tells us that in his day, by death and captivity, the covenant people was reduced to a small remnant; and that, but for the help of God, it would then have been as completely destroyed as were Sodom and Gomorrah. Consequently, if the gospel be true, God is doing now only what Isaiah says He did then"—BEET. CHRYSOSTOM says: "Here again he points out another circumstance, that not even the small remnant escaped of themselves, but would all have perished, had not God in great mercy saved them by faith."

Vers. 30, 31. What shall we say then—"what is to be concluded from all that has been said but this, That the Gentiles, who followed not after righteousness—who a while ago had no knowledge of, no care or thought about it—have attained to righteousness—or justification—even the righteousness which is by faith. This is the first conclusion we may draw from the preceding observations. The second is, that Israel—the Jews, although following after the law of righteousness—that law which, duly used, would have led them to faith, and thereby to righteousness—have not attained to the law of righteousness—to that righteousness or justification which is one great end of the Law"—WESLEY.

"What shall we say then? What conclusion shall we draw from this view of God's dealings? The answer consists of two parts—(1) A statement of facts (vers. 30, 31) drawn from the whole preceding discussion (vers. 6–29); and (2) A declaration of the cause (vers. 32, 33). 'The two strange things are that Gentiles attained righteousness, and that they attained it without seeking it' (CHRYSOSTOM). (Comp. ch. 2. 14.) Gentiles, that have not a law, to quicken the moral sense, are not, like Jews, consciously seeking to obtain righteousness; yet they attained to righteousness, but the righteousness that is of faith. If here S. Paul 'with the fewest words touches the deepest foundations of the matter' (EWALD), it is because he has already (ch. 3. 4) fully discussed the nature of that righteousness of faith in which the whole solution lies. Observe the thrice-repeated 'righteousness,' as in ver. 31, the repetition of law of righteousness. The whole passage is framed for pointed effect. The hearer is strongly affected by the repetition of the same word, as if a weapon were to pierce the same part of the body again and again"—MEYER. "Israel—the mass of the Jews, in contrast with the believing Gentiles. To obey a rule of right or wrong was to their mind the only way to obtain God's favour. Such a rule, if they could find out and obey it, would be to them a law of righteousness. This ideal law they set before themselves; and by morality, anxiety, or ritual, they were striving to realise it in themselves. Come up to—continues the idea of a race. They had not come up practically to their ideal law, and were therefore destitute of righteousness. That some who were striving after righteousness had not obtained it, while others who till lately thought nothing about it now lived in its enjoyment, illustrates ver. 16. (Comp. Matt. 21. 31)"—BEET.

32. "And wherefore have they not? It is because God eternally decreed they should not? There is nothing like this to be met with; but agreeable to his argument the apostle gives us this good reason for it, Because they sought it not by faith—whereby alone it could be attained—but as it were—in effect, if not professedly, by works.

For they stumbled at that stumblingstone—Christ crucified"—WESLEY.

"The great reason for the rejection of Israel and for the admission of the Gentiles is that the Gentiles did, and that they did not, base their attempts at righteousness upon faith. Righteousness is the middle term which leads to salvation. The Gentiles, without seeking, found; the Jews, seeking in a wrong way, failed to find it"—ELLICOTT. BEET says: "Reason why the Jews have not obtained righteousness—they sought it, not in God's way, by faith, but in their own way, as though righteousness came by works. They stumbled, etc. Comment on their failure, 'stone of stumbling'; one against which men strike their foot. Same word in ch. 14. 13, 20; 1 Cor. 8. 9; and 1 Pet. 2. 6, referring, as here, to Christ. (Comp. Luke 20. 1 f.) The Jews rejected the gospel because Christ was not what they expected. He thus became a stone against which the men of Israel, as they ran after righteousness, struck their foot. (Comp. 1 Cor. 1. 23; Matt. 13. 58.)"

33. As it is written—"foretold by their own prophet. Behold, I lay in Sion—I exhibit in My Church, what, though it is in truth the only sure foundation of happiness, yet will be in fact a stumblingstone and rock of offence—an occasion of ruin to many, through their obstinate unbelief"—WESLEY.

"As it is written. (Isa. 28. 16.) This is a remarkable example of the freedom with which S. Paul quotes the language of the Old Testament. This passage, as well as Ps. 118, were referred by the Jews to Messiah. S. Paul by taking the words, 'stone of stumbling and rock of offence' (Isa. 8. 14) and substituting them in Isa. 28. 16, instead of 'for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation,' has combined both the threat and the promise in one quotation. The best comment is 1 Pet. 2. 6–8, where the different passages are all quoted separately"—Dr. GIFFORD. "What are we to conclude from all this? That the apostle in this chapter, far from vindicating, as is ordinarily thought, the rights of Divine election over against human freedom, vindicates, on the contrary, the rights of God's freedom in regard to His own election relating to Israel. His decree does not bind Him, as an external law imposed on His will would. He remains sovereignly free to direct His mode of acting at every moment according to the moral conditions which He meets with in humanity, showing grace when He finds good, even to men who were not in His covenant, rejecting when He finds good even men who were embraced in the circle which formed the object of His election. S. Paul did not therefore think of contending in behalf of Divine sovereignty against human freedom; he contended for God's freedom in opposition to the chains which men sought to lay on him in the name of their own election. We have here a treatise not for, but against unconditional election"—GODET.

CHAPTER X.

SECTION XXIV.—Vers. 1–13. IGNORANCE A CAUSE OF UNBELIEF.—The subject of this chapter is the fact asserted in ch. 9. 31–33, that Israel failed to attain a law of righteousness, because they sought a righteousness dependent on the merit of their own works. But before entering on the painful and invidious task of condemning his own nation, S. Paul renews the assurance of his heartfelt interest in their salvation.

1. My prayer to God is, that they may be saved. "He would not have prayed for this, had they been absolutely reprobated"—WESLEY.

My heart's desire—strictly, "the goodwill of my heart." Israel had rejected salvation, and they had been plainly warned of their peril, but their case was not hopeless. It is a blessed thing when every desire for our own, or for another's good prompts to prayer to God.

2. They have a zeal, but not according to knowledge. "They had zeal without knowledge; we have knowledge without zeal"—WESLEY.

"They were zealous for the Law and the Temple; but (like himself, 1 Tim. 1. 13) they acted 'ignorantly in unbelief.' None deserve our sympathy and prayer more than those who are earnest for God, but know not how to serve Him"—BEET. Justice must be done to the heroic spirit of the Jews. But it was zeal directed into the most mistaken channels. Their religion was legal and formal to the last degree. Under an outward show of punctilious obedience, it concealed all the inward corruption described by the apostle in ch. 2. 17–29.

3. For they being ignorant of the righteousness of God—"of the method God has established for the justification of a sinner—and seeking to establish their own righteousness—their own method of acceptance with God—have not submitted to the righteousness of God—the way of justification which He hath fixed"—WESLEY.

"Mere right-doing, and abstinence from wrong-doing, is not all that is required of men. A man's whole life is more than any individual act. The opposition of the heart to God is of itself a thing meriting judgment-day condemnation. Nothing more than this is required to exclude a man from the glory of the eternal heavens"—BEECHER.

4. For Christ is the end of the Law—"the scope and aim of it. It is the very design of the Law, to bring men to believe in Christ for justification and salvation. And He alone gives that pardon and life which the Law shows the want of, but cannot give. To every one—whether Jew or Gentile, treated of, ver. 11, etc.—that believeth—treated of, ver. 5, etc."—WESLEY.

"Christ put an end to the Law in order that all who believe in Him may have the righteousness He only can bestow. We may so receive this righteousness, and rejoice in its possession. The Messiah brought a free righteousness—offered to faith; His coming consequently put an end to man's attempt to establish his own righteousness on the observance of the Law; thus, then, fell the whole legal economy, which had now fulfilled its task. It was not so the Jews understood it. If they, in a measure, accepted the salvation of the Gentiles, they thought of it only as an annexation to Israel and a subjection to the sovereignty of Moses. It was under this idea 'that they compassed sea and land, to make proselytes' (Matt. 23. 15). But Jesus taught Matt. 5; 9. 11–17; 15. 1. S. Paul declares the same profound truth in this verse. The Law falls to the ground with the coming of Him who brings a completely made righteousness to the believer"—GODET.

5. For Moses describeth the only righteousness which is attainable by the Law, when he saith, The man who doeth these things shall live by them—"that is, he that perfectly keeps all these precepts in every point, he alone may claim life and salvation by them. But this way of justification is impossible to any who have ever transgressed any one law in any point"—WESLEY.

So Moses wrote in Lev. 18. 5. The same teaching is found in Ezek. 18. 22, 24. In these scriptures God declares that only by obedience to the Law can men obtain the blessings promised in the Law. We certainly can never be made righteous in this way. Our obedience to the commandments of God is as imperfect as our nature is sinful. Calvin reasons thus: "You wish to be justified by your own doing. Well! But in that case let your doing be complete! If your obedience is to make you live, it must be worthy of Him to whom it is offered."

Vers. 6, 7. But the righteousness which is by faith—"the method of becoming righteous by believing—speaketh a very different language, and may be considered as expressing itself thus (to accommodate to our present subject the words which Moses spake, touching the plainness of his Law), Say not in thy heart, Who shall ascend into heaven, as if it were to bring Christ down: or, Who shall descend into the grave, as if it were to bring Him again from the dead? Do not imagine that these things are to be done now, in order to procure thy pardon and salvation"—WESLEY.

The original of the quotations here is Deut. 30. 12–14. Alford argues that the practical import of the passage in Deuteronomy is that the Law, as the revelation of God's will, is not an unintelligible mystery to man, but a thing that can be known and loved; but that, if so, then this is true "of Him who is the end of the Law, and of the commandment to believe in Him, which (1 John 3. 23) is now God's commandment." Our duty now is to believe in Christ, that we may be saved.

8. "But what saith he—Moses. Even these words, so remarkably applicable to the subject before us. All is done ready to thy hand. The word is nigh thee—within thy reach; easy to be understood, remembered, practised. This is eminently true of the word of faith—the gospel—which we preach—the sum of which is, If thy heart believe in Christ, and thy life confess Him, thou shalt be saved"—WESLEY.

"But what does it (the righteousness of faith) say? Moses' words apply to the gospel; and are therefore a voice of the righteousness of faith. (Comp. Gal. 3. 8.) God has put the gospel, has He then put the Law, into human lips and hearts? That is—asserts that Moses' words apply to the gospel. Word of faith — the word concerning faith"—BEET. "In the passage quoted, Moses said (Deut. 30. 14), This saying was, in the ancient economy, a relative truth. It becomes in Christ absolute truth. In these words Moses had in a sense, without suspecting it, given the exact formula of the righteousness of faith; and it is because the apostle was conscious of this fundamental identity of feeling between Moses and the gospel on this point, that he could venture, as he does here, to apply the saying of the one to the teaching of the other. S. Paul has done what we do or should do in every sermon—(1) Disentangle from the temporary application, which is the strict sense of the text, the fundamental and universal principle which it contains; (2) Apply freely the general principle to the circumstances in which we are ourselves speaking"—GODET.

9. If thou confess with thy mouth—"even in time of precaution, when such a confession may send thee to the lions"—WESLEY.

"Simple as these words are, our conscience will not permit us to believe them until we repent, i.e. till we resolve to forsake sin. For so long as we continue in sin, the Law written within proclaims in words louder than those of the gospel, and of equal authority, that God is angry with us. Consequently, repentance is absolutely needful for salvation; not as another condition beside faith, but because without repentance faith is impossible"—BEET.

10. For with the heart—"not the understanding only—man believeth to righteousness—so as to obtain justification. And with the mouth confession is made — so as to obtain final salvation. Confession here implies the whole of outward, as believing does the root of all inward religion"—WESLEY.

"Belief is not intellectual, but moral. Religion is not a question of mere notions, but the expression of the entire spiritual life. It would be as logical to contend that a man is going a journey because he can explain the construction of an engine, as to contend that a man is going to heaven because he can correctly answer theological questions"—PARKER. "The 'confession with the mouth' represents in fact the whole process by which the Christian, in his life on earth, owns and obeys Christ as his Lord; refuses to 'deny Him' in the evil world. It thus stands here for the 'narrow path,' along which the justified move to their promised and assured home. Faith, indeed, 'saves'—the Christian, in every sense, lives by faith in the Son of God (Gal. 2. 20). But his 'life' is manifested in obedience, which alone is the path to heaven. (See Eph. 2. 8–10)"—MOULE. "From Abel down to Abraham, and thence to Christ, all the holy fathers obtained righteousness by faith. How should it be otherwise? We are all gone out of the way; we are all guilty before God. We are wholly without strength. The mercy is therefore adapted to the misery of man. Look, and be healed—believe, and be saved;—Come unto Me, and I will give you rest"—SUTCLIFFE.

12. The same Lord of all is rich—"so that His blessings are never to be exhausted, nor is He ever constrained to hold His hand. The great truth proposed in the eleventh verse is so repeated here, and in the thirteenth, and further confirmed (vers. 14, 15) as not only to imply, that 'whosoever calleth upon Him shall be saved,' but also that the will of God is, that all should savingly call upon Him"—WESLEY.

"For there is no difference (R.V. 'No distinction between Jew and Greek')—as to the way of obtaining salvation"—BENSON. All are equally welcome to this salvation. Here the Jew has no exclusive privilege; and from this the Greek is not rejected. One simple way of being saved is proposed to all, viz., faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; because He is the same Lord who made all and governs all, and is rich in mercy to all that call upon Him"—CLARKE.

13. Whosoever shall call. "Believing in Christ, or God (ver. 11), and 'calling upon Him' (vers. 12, 13, 14), are in effect the same thing, as calling upon God necessarily supposes faith in Him; and he who duly believes in Christ, has such a sense of his dependence upon Divine grace, that he looks unto and trusts in the power and goodness of his God alone for happiness; which is the true religion of the gospel"—Dr. TAYLOR.

SECTION XXV. — Vers. 14–21. ISRAEL'S UNBELIEF WAS FORETOLD.—14–16. But how shall they preach, unless they be sent? "Thus, by a chain of reasoning, from God's will that the Gentiles also should 'call upon Him,' S. Paul infers that the apostles were sent by God to preach to the Gentiles also. The feet—their very footsteps; their coming"—WESLEY.

And how shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard? "Even the works of nature and providence must be made known to mankind by instructors, to make them able to understand them; much more the gospel of Christ"—BAXTER. "There is—(1) No salvation without the gospel—a dispensation of mercy and grace from God alone; (2) This must be proclaimed in the world for the obedience of faith; (3) The preacher must have a Divine mission—sent, must have both authority and power from on high; (4) The commissioned one must be heard, and the 'word' must be credited; (5) They who believe must pray"—CLARKE.

17. Faith—"indeed, ordinarily cometh by hearing, even by hearing the word of God"—WESLEY.

So belief cometh of hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ (R.V.)—"as in Lydia's conversation. Truth illuminates the understanding, and grace persuades the heart"—SUTCLIFFE. "Preaching the gospel is the ordinary means of salvation; faith in Christ is the result of hearing the word, the doctrine of God preached. Preaching God sends; if heard attentively, faith will be produced; and if men believe the report, the arm of the Lord will be revealed in their salvation"—CLARKE.

18. "But their unbelief was not owing to the want of hearing. For they have heard. Yes, verily—so many nations have already heard the preachers of the gospel, that I may in some sense say of them as David did of the lights of heaven"—WESLEY. (See Ps. 19. 4; Acts 8. 4.)

The amazing progress that Christianity made in the world, when first promulgated, is a strong argument in its favour. It was not propagated by the sword, nor enforced by the arts of vain philosophy, or the enticing words of man's wisdom; it derived all its force and evidence from the power of God exerted in the performing of miracles.

19. But hath not Israel known? "They might have known, even from Moses and Isaiah, that many of the Gentiles would be received, and many of the Jews rejected. I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are not a nation. As they followed gods that were not gods, so He accepted in their stead a nation that was not a nation—that is, a nation that was not in covenant with God. A foolish nation—such are all which know not God"—WESLEY.

"How much the Jews were irritated at the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles is well known. (Matt. 21. 43, etc.; Acts 22. 21, 22; 1 Thess. 2. 15, 16)"—COKE. "Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy—by the Gentiles whom you despise; and Isaiah says, 'I am found of them that sought Me not.' These are bold sayings. Moses and Isaiah, two princes of the prophets, foretelling the accession of the Gentile nations to Christ, and leaving the Jews in their sinful obduracy, were terrific arguments, and very humiliating to the carnal Jews"—SUTCLIFFE. "What Moses had only announced darkly in these words, Isaiah proclaimed with open mouth. He declares unambiguously: God will one day manifest Himself to the Gentiles by a proclamation of grace, while the Jews will obstinately reject all the blessings which shall be offered to them"—GODET.

20. But Isaiah is very bold—"and speaks plainly what Moses but intimated"—WESLEY.

"Bold—speaks in the fullest manner and plainest language (ch. 65. 1), notwithstanding the danger to which such a declaration exposed him. I was found of them that sought Me not—the Gentiles, who were not seeking Me, and they have found that redemption which the Jews rejected"—CLARKE.

21. An unbelieving and gainsaying people—"just opposite to those who believed with their hearts, and made confession with their mouths"—WESLEY.

"Who are continually objecting, whom no persuasion can induce to regard their own happiness, so as to be willing to admit the evidence of truth and the counsels of wisdom, and whose character is just opposite to that of those who believe with their hearts. The prophet's words are an allusion to the action of an orator, who, in speaking to the multitude, stretches out his arms to express his earnestness and affection"—BENSON. This verse is a picture of "the everlasting arms" spread open in unwearied love, and reveals God's patience and long-suffering towards His own people, though they persist in disobeying and refusing His invitations. The idea of the whole chapter is briefly summed up in these last words.

CHAPTER XI.

SECTION XXVI.—Vers. 1-24. GOD HAS NOT CAST OFF HIS PEOPLE.—1. Hath God rejected His whole people—"all Israel? In nowise. Now there is 'a remnant' who believe (ver. 5), and hereafter 'all Israel will be saved' (ver. 26)"—WESLEY.

Did God cast off His people? (R.V.). S. Paul himself, and thousands of other believing Jews, afforded proof that God had not rejected Israel. He would have looked upon such a thing with horror, and he rejects the suggestion with indignation. God forbid. It is not enough to reject with righteous abhorrence the thought that the unbelief of some could make void God's faithfulness to others. God's truth is absolute and independent; it cannot be impaired, even if man's falsehood be universal.

2. God hath not rejected that part of His people whom He foreknew—"speaking after the manner of men. For, in fact, knowing and foreknowing are the same thing with God, who knows or sees all things at once, from everlasting to everlasting"—BENSON. "The question in view here is, 'Was the nation ever so rejected as that members of it, as such, were rejected?' This S. Paul negatives by pointing to the 'nation within the nation,' the elect faithful"—MOULE. "Jehovah promised, without any mention of conduct, to be a God to Abraham's seed for ever. And when He gave that promise, He foresaw all that Abraham's seed would do. God's perfect foreknowledge makes it inconceivable that He should change His purpose, or leave His promise unfulfilled. (Comp. 8. 29)"—BEET.

4. To Baal—"nor to the golden calves"—WESLEY.

"Baal was the God of Jezebel; his worship was then the worship of the state; but there were thousands of pious Israelites who had not acknowledged this idol, and did not partake in the idolatrous worship"—CLARKE.

5. According to the election of grace—"according to that gracious purpose of God, 'He that believeth shall be saved'"—WESLEY.

"According to that purpose of God—whereby He hath chosen those, whether Jews or Gentiles, for His people, that break off their sins by repentance, and believe on Jesus, with their hearts, unto righteousness"—BENSON. This idea of the remnant may be very profitably studied in Isaiah, chaps. 1 to 39.

6. And if by grace then it is no more of works—"whether ceremonial or moral. Else grace is no longer grace. The very nature of grace is lost. And if it be of works, then it is no more grace: else work is no longer work—but the very nature of it is destroyed. There is something so absolutely inconsistent between the being justified by grace, and the being justified by works, that, if you suppose either, you of necessity exclude the other. For what is given to works is the payment of a debt; whereas grace implies an unmerited favour. So that the same benefit cannot, in the very nature of things, be derived from both"—WESLEY.

The whole of the new covenant is grace; nothing remains for impotent man but consent. "Not by works done in righteousness, which we did ourselves, but according to His mercy He saved us, through the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Tit. 3. 5). Good works are not the cause of our salvation, but a sign and result of it. Human merit can never be the cause of spiritual blessing. GODET says: "The apostle wishes to express the idea, that if Israel possesses the privilege of always preserving within their bosom a faithful remnant, it is not because of any particular merit they have acquired before God by their works, it is purely a matter of grace on the part of Him who has chosen them."

7. What then? "What is the conclusion from the whole? It is this: that Israel in

"Knowing and foreknowing are the same thing general hath not obtained justification; but those of them only who believe. And the rest were blinded—by their own wilful prejudice"—WESLEY.

"What then? (Ch. 3. 9.) What Israel seeks after—viz. righteousness. (Ch. 9. 31; 10. 3; Acts 26. 7.) The election—collective term for the elected ones. Compare 'selection' for selected objects. Hardened—more or less deprived of spiritual understanding. It is explained in vers. 8-10. (Comp. ch. 9. 18; Mark 8. 17; John 12. 40, etc.) But the rest, etc. The only alternative is righteousness or hardening. S. Paul infers from the present state of the Jews, not that God has cast off His people, but that a portion only of the nation has obtained what all seek for; and that all the others have become spiritually blind"—BEET.

8. "God hath at length withdrawn His Spirit, and so given them up to a spirit of slumber; which is fulfilled unto this day"—WESLEY.

"Spirit of slumber (R.V. 'Spirit of stupor'). The very word and revelation of God, which should have awakened their consciences, and opened their eyes and ears, have had a different effect"—CLARKE.

9. And David saith—"in that prophetic imprecation, which is applicable to them as well as to Judas. A recompence—of their preceding wickedness. So sin is punished by sin; and thus the gospel, which should have fed and strengthened their souls, is become a means of destroying them"—WESLEY.

"And David saith. (Ps. 69. 22.) The whole Psalm is full of Messiah. The point of the quotation is that the Psalm indicates a judicial turning of blessing into curses, and a judicial blindness and impotence of the soul, as the way in which retribution would come on Messiah's enemies. Seeing, then, that this imprecation remains for all the adversaries of Christ—that their meat should be converted into poison (as we see the gospel is to be the savour of death unto death), let us embrace with humility and trembling the grace of God"—CALVIN. "The table is, in the Psalmist's sense, the emblem of the material pleasures in which the ungodly live. Their life of gross enjoyments is to become to them what the snares of all sorts, with which men catch them, are to the lower animals. It is difficult to avoid thinking that the apostle is here applying this figure in a spiritual sense; for the punishment which he has in view is of a spiritual nature—it is moral hardening"—GODET.

11. Have they stumbled so as to fall—"totally and finally? No. But by their fall—or slip—it is a very soft word in the original—salvation is come to the Gentiles. See an instance of this in Acts 13. 46. To provoke them—the Jews themselves—to jealousy"—WESLEY.

"Here begins a new section of the discussion, lasting to the end of the chapter, and of the subject. S. Paul has shown that the rejection of Israel was never total; he now declares that it is not final. A time is to come when the mass of the bodily Israel shall believe, and be restored to the Church. The salvation of the Gentiles was indeed always in the Divine purpose; but Jewish unbelief was the occasion which that purpose took for its actual development"—C. B.

12. "The first part of this verse is treated of, ver. 13, etc.; the latter, How much more their fulness—that is, their full conversion, ver. 23, etc. So many prophecies refer to this grand event, that it is surprising any Christian can doubt of it. And these are greatly confirmed by the wonderful preservation of the Jews as a distinct people to this day. When it is accomplished, it will be so strong a demonstration, both of the Old and New Testament revelation, as will doubtless convince many thousand deists, in countries nominally Christian; of whom their will, of course, be increasing multitudes among merely nominal Christians. And this will be a means of swiftly propagating the gospel among Mohammedans and Pagans, who would probably have received it long ago, had they conversed only with real Christians"—WESLEY.

The things which caused the fall of the Jews, and their diminishing—i.e. a "falling short," in respect of numbers, also promoted the spread of the gospel to the Gentiles. Their fulness—the spiritual blessing which shall bring so many of them to Him from whom they fell away, will, in days to come, vastly increase the legions of the true Israel of God. For the glory of God, and the final triumph of His kingdom, we should eagerly seek the salvation of the Jews. By the riches of the world, S. Paul understands the grace into which the Gentiles are introduced by faith in a free salvation. The riches of the Gentiles denotes that indefinite number of Gentile nations who, as the gospel shall reach them, shall enter into the Church, and thus fill up the void arising from the reduction of Israel to so small a number of believers.

13. I magnify my office (R.V. "I glorify my ministry"). "Far from being ashamed of ministering to the Gentiles, I glorify therein; the rather, as it may be a means of provoking my brethren to jealousy"—WESLEY.

Apostle of the Gentiles. (Eph. 3. 8; comp. Acts 22. 21.) No other apostle claimed this distinction. MEYER says, "A noble self-consciousness here finds expression." The claim was just. (See Acts 9. 15; Gal. 2. 7, 8; Eph. 3. 8.) Because of the blessings which will come to the Gentiles, as surely as for their own good. S. Paul will seek the salvation of his own countrymen.

14. My flesh—"my kinsmen"—WESLEY.

"See Gen. 37. 27; Judg. 9. 2; 2 Sam. 5. 1. Comp. 1 Cor. 9. 22. For this intense desire to 'save some,' whether Jews or Gentiles, S. Paul does not deceive himself; he does not reckon on a conversion of Israel en masse before the last times; but he would like, at least, he adds, to save some of them, as first-fruits of the harvest. But we are not at the goal. That even is only a means. The final aim is declared in ver. 15"—GODET.

15. Life from the dead—"overflowing life to the world, which was dead"—WESLEY.

The argument implies that this is something very much greater than the reconciliation of the world. It can therefore be nothing less than the glorious life ushered in by the resurrection of the dead. This verse puts in stronger and more complete form the argument of ver. 12, to show how deep an interest the Gentiles have in the salvation of the Jews"—BEET.

16. And this will surely come to pass. "For if the first-fruits be holy, so is the lump. The consecration of them was esteemed the consecration of all; and so the conversion of a few Jews is an earnest of the conversion of all the rest. And if the root be holy—the patriarchs from whom they spring, surely God will at length make their descendants also holy"—WESLEY.

"The main effect of this passage, to ver. 24, is to prove that the restoration of the Jews to the Church of the Messiah, so far from being unlikely is in the nature of the case likely. Their peculiar connection, by lineal descent, with the fathers, makes it certain that their return will be as abundantly welcome to their God, as the admission of the Gentiles. We might say more welcome, but for the fact that no welcome can be fuller than that which awaits the true believer of whatever nation. The first-fruits—the Jewish patriarchs, but perhaps specially Abraham, who was eminently 'holy' in the sense of consecration to the purposes of God. The root. Here again the figure points to the patriarchs, and especially to Abraham. (Comp. Isa. 51. 2 for yet another figure, that of the quarry, with the same reference)"—C. B.

17. Thou—O Gentile—being a wild olive tree. "Had the graft been nobler than the stock, yet its dependence on it for life and nourishment would leave it no room to boast against it. How much less when, contrary to what is practised among men, the wild olive tree is engrafted on the good"—WESLEY.

"What a transfer of covenant favour, from the unbelieving Jews to the believing Gentiles! What forms does grace assume to gain the heart and bring the soul to God!'—SUTCLIFFE. An illustration similar to that of our Lord in John 15. 5, of the union of true believers to Christ and His Church.

18. Boast not against the branches. "Do not they do this who despise the Jews? or deny their future conversion?"—WESLEY.

"Boast not—there is no merit in the graft. The Jew may yet come in, and the haughty Gentile be again cut off, and perish. This verse is a reason why they should not exult. The root owes nothing to the twigs, the twigs everything to the root. All the spiritual life of the world was developed in Israel. (Comp. ch. 15. 27.) To exult over Israel was to exult over the nation to which they owed all their real good"—BEET.

20. They were broken off for unbelief, and thou standest by faith—"both conditionally, not absolutely: if absolutely, there might have been room to boast. 'By faith'—the free gift of God, which therefore ought to humble thee"—WESLEY.

Neither will He spare thee (R.V.). "It might be possible for the Gentile to claim a special providence in his substitution for the Jew. He should rather be reminded that there is a condition—faith—which is attached to this substitution; this he must be careful to observe, or else he will lose all that he has gained"—ELLICOTT.

21. Be not highminded, but fear. "We may observe, this 'fear' is not opposed to trust, but to pride and security"—WESLEY.

"Be not 'highminded' is applicable to every Christian: a sanctifying 'fear' is the guard of sanctifying joy. Learn to flee apostasy, pride, and all the errors which ruined the Jews, and come daily to the atoning righteousness of our Redeemer and Lord"—SUTCLIFFE.

22. Else shalt thou—"also, who now 'standest by faith,' be both totally and finally cut off'—WESLEY.

"Goodness and severity of God. Look round this world. The aspect of things is stern; very stern. If they be ruled by love, it is a love which does not shrink of human agony. There is a law of infinite mercy here, but there is a law of boundless rigour too. Sin, and you will suffer—that law is not reversed. The young and the gentle and the tender are inexorably subjected to it. We would shield them if we could; but there is that which says they shall not be shielded. They shall weep and fade and taste of mortal anguish, even as others. Carry that out into the next world, and you have wrath to come"—ROBERTSON.

24. Contrary to nature. "For, according to nature, we graft the fruitful branch into the wild stock; but here the wild branch is grafted into the fruitful stock"—WESLEY.

If Gentiles, who were aliens, can be brought into the family of God, we may be sure that those who, by birth, belong to the chosen people will not be rejected if they seek His mercy through Jesus Christ.

SECTION XXVII.—Vers. 25-36. THERE IS SALVATION FOR THE JEW. PRAISE TO GOD.—25. "S. Paul calls any truth known but to a few, a mystery. Such had been the calling of the Gentiles: such was now the conversion of the Jews. Lest ye should be wise in your own conceits—puffed up with your present advantages; dreaming that ye are the only church, or that the church of Rome cannot fail. Hardness in part is happened to Israel, till—Israel therefore is neither totally nor finally rejected — the fulness of the Gentiles be come in—till there be a vast harvest among the heathens"—WESLEY.

The illustration of the olive tree is now left, and S. Paul declares in plain language that Israel will be saved. This prediction he supports by an ancient prophecy (Isa. 59. 20), vers. 5, 7, 17, and the expressions here in part, show that even in the darkest days of Israel there had been some of the people who had not rejected Christ. Instead of boasting, and of consequent "conceits," he would have us keep in view the great and glorious consummation of the Divine plan, when Jews and Gentiles shall come in. Their number, and their eternal blessedness, is taught in Rev. 7. 9. "The Lord is King!"

26, 27. And so all Israel shall be saved—"being convinced by the coming of the Gentiles. But there will be a still larger harvest among the Gentiles, when all Israel is come in. The Deliverer shall come—yea, the Deliverer is come; but not the full fruit of His coming"—WESLEY.

This mighty triumph—the salvation of all Israel—has not yet come. As a prophecy, the words are still unfulfilled, but the Deliverer shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. He said Himself, "I will draw all men unto Me" (John 12. 32). Moreover, the "covenant" declares the same glad truth. (Isa. 31. 31-34.) Men may doubt, or deny the possibility of so great a triumph of the Messiah. They are answered, if not yet silenced, by the reply to all such unbelievers. "The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

28. They are now enemies—"to the gospel, to God, and to themselves, which God permits. For your sakes: but as for the election—that part of them who believe—they are beloved"—WESLEY.

"The real position of the Jews is this: They have been suffered to fall into a state of estrangement. But this does not abrogate God's original choice of them. They are still His beloved people, for the sake of their forefathers, the patriarchs, if not for their own"—ELLICOTT. "God hates the sinner in the same sense in which the sinner ought to hate himself, that is to say, his own life. This sentiment is only the hatred of holiness to evil; and then to the wicked man in so far as he is identified with evil"—GODET.

29. For the gifts and the calling of God are without repentance. "God does not repent of His 'gifts' to the Jews, or His 'calling' of the Gentiles"—WESLEY.

"The Lord changeth not. (Matt. 3. 6.) He repents not of the design of grace in the redemption of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ. The covenant declares His grace: it has its oath, its promises, its conditions, as in the preceding words—vers. 20–22. (1 Sam. 2. 30; 1 Chron. 28. 10.) It is enough for a child to rest on a father's love, lending a willing ear to all the cautions in the Christian Scriptures"—SUTCLIFFE.

32. For God hath shut up all together in disobedience—"suffering each in their turn to revolt from Him. First, God suffered the Gentiles in the early age to revolt, and took the family of Abraham as a peculiar seed to Himself. Afterwards, He permitted them to fall through unbelief, and took in the believing Gentiles. And He did even this to provoke the Jews to jealousy, and so bring them also in the end to faith. This was truly a mystery in the Divine conduct, which the apostle adores with such holy astonishment"—WESLEY.

"This verse is a restatement, in reference to God's mercy and to the division of mankind into Jews and Gentiles, of the teaching of ver. 18. We have not the words 'all men,' because S. Paul speaks here, not of human beings as such, but of the two theological divisions of the race. But the first all certainly includes the unbelieving Jews of S. Paul's day, whose disobedience to the gospel had led to the salvation of the Gentiles to whom he writes. And if so, they must be included in the second all. Yet there were sad reasons to fear that many of them would perish. Now if the unbelieving Jews were included in God's purpose of mercy, all men are included. That in many God's purpose will not be accomplished is no reason for putting aside the plain meaning of the plain words, which say that all are objects of His purpose of mercy"—BEET.

33. the depth of the riches, and wisdom, and knowledge of God. "In the ninth chapter, S. Paul had sailed but in a narrow sea: now he is in the ocean. The 'depth of the riches' is described, ver. 35; the 'depth of wisdom,' ver. 34; the 'depth of knowledge,' in the latter part of this verse. 'Wisdom' directs all things to the best end; 'knowledge' sees that end. How unsearchable are His judgments—with regard to unbelievers. His ways—with regard to believers. 'His ways' are more upon a level; 'His judgments' a great deep. But even His ways we cannot trace"—WESLEY.

From this verse to the end of the chapter has been called the "Doxology to the Eternal Sovereign." His majesty and His mercy, as revealed in all that S. Paul has taught, alike demands the praise here offered to Him. The mystery of His sovereignty and grace and judgment is profound, and beyond all human computation; but even we may wonder and adore. His riches (Phil. 4. 19), wisdom, knowledge, judgments, are all unsearchable, all beyond human conception; but we may join the apostle in his triumphant exclamation ascribing "Glory to God." From Jew and Gentile, of whom he has written so much, and for whose salvation he so ardently desires, he turns to Him whose grace and power has provided, through Christ, eternal blessedness for all, and to Him he presents worship and praise. We also may respond "Amen!"

34. Who hath known the mind of the Lord—before or any further than He has revealed it"—WESLEY.

See Isa. 40. 13 and Jer. 23. 18. S. Paul will further show that God has the right to all the adoration he presents to Him. He who existed "from everlasting" could need no counsellor. Nay, none could know the mind of the Eternal. God's designs are impenetrable until He reveal them Himself to His apostles and prophets, and by them to His people.

35. Given to Him—"either wisdom or power"—WESLEY.

This question is also a Scripture quotation, which S. Paul employs to glorify God. It is taken from Job 41. 11. Who can pretend to have any demands upon God? To whom is He indebted? Have either Jews or Gentiles any right to His blessings? May He not bestow His favours as He pleases, and to whom He pleases? How can the Creator be indebted to the creature? How can the Author of Providence, and the Father of every good and perfect gift, be under obligation to them for whom He provides, and who are wholly dependent on His bounty?

36. Of Him—as the Creator—through Him—as the Preserver—to Him—as the ultimate end, are all things. To Him be the glory of His riches, wisdom, knowledge. Amen—a concluding word, in which the affection of the apostle, when it is come to the height, shuts up all"—WESLEY.

"For of Him, etc. This is so far from being the case, for OF Him, as the original designer and author; and BY Him, as the prime and efficient cause; and TO Him, as the ultimate end for the manifestation of His eternal glory and goodness, are all things in universal nature, through the whole compass of time and eternity. To whom be glory—let Him have the praise of all His works, from all His intelligent creatures, for ever—throughout all the generations of men. Amen—so be it! Let this be established for ever"—CLARKE. "God's absolute independence, man's total dependence in everything which might be a matter of glory to Him. Such is the thought of this verse, the termination of this vast survey of the plan of God. What the apostle was concerned to say in closing was that, all things proceeding from the creative will of God, advancing through His wisdom and terminating in the manifestation of His holiness, must one day celebrate His glory, and His glory only. The application of the word all things might be restricted to the two portions of mankind spoken of (as in ver. 32). But S. Paul rises here to the general principle, of which ver. 32 was only a particular application, and hence also he substitutes the neuter 'all things' for the masculine 'all.' What is meant, therefore, is the totality of created things, visible and invisible. The glory of God, the reflection of His perfections in all that exists,—that glory, now veiled, in so many respects in the universe, must shine forth magnificently and perfectly for ever and ever. For, as HODGE says, 'the highest end for which all things can exist and be ordered, is to display the character of God.' This goal of history is, as it were, anticipated by the wish and prayer of the apostle: 'To Him be glory'"—GODET. "As the rivers return again to the place whence they came, they all come from the sea, and they all run into the sea again; so all our store, as it issued at first from the fountain of His grace, so should it fall at last into the ocean of His glory"—Bp. SANDERSON.

CHAPTER XII.

SECTION XXVIII.—Vers. 1, 2. A CONSECRATED BODY AND A RENEWED MIND.—1. I exhort you. "S. Paul uses to suit his exhortations to the doctrines he has been delivering. So here the general use from the whole is contained in the first and second verses. The particular uses follow, from the third verse to the end of the Epistle. By the tender mercies of God. The whole sentiment is derived from chaps. 1–5. The expression itself is particularly opposed to 'the wrath of God' (ch. 1. 18). It has a reference here to the entire gospel, to the whole economy of grace or mercy, delivering us from 'the wrath of God,' and exciting us to all duty. To present—(so ch. 6. 13; 16. 19; now actually to exhibit before God)—your bodies—that is, yourselves: a part is put for the whole; the rather, as in the ancient sacrifices of beasts, the body was the whole. These also are particularly named in opposition to that vile abuse of their bodies mentioned. (Ch. 1. 2.) Several expressions follow, which have likewise a direct reference to other expressions in the same chapter. A sacrifice—dead to sin, and living—by that life which is mentioned in ch. 1. 17; 6. 4, etc. Holy. Such as the holy Law requires. (Ch. 7. 12.) Acceptable. (Ch. 8. 8.) Which is your reasonable service—the worship of the heathens was utterly unreasonable (ch. 1. 18, etc.), so was the glorying of the Jews (ch. 2. 3, etc.). But a Christian acts in all things by the highest reason, from the mercy of God inferring his own duty"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul now passes from the main argument of the Epistle to practical exhortations based upon the preceding doctrines. His thoughts seem to flow on in a natural order, of which the general course can be easily traced. He begins by requiring personal consecration to God's service. "It will be observed how comprehensively he surveys the whole range of human action and conduct. He passes in review the private and public duties—ministering, teaching, exhorting, giving, ruling, and obeying; he depicts the spirit of the Christian in business and in rest, in joy and in sorrow, in hope and in tribulation, towards friends and towards enemies, in peace and in wrath; and he lays down the Christian principles of civil government and civil obedience"—WACE. I beseech you therefore. "The apostle now urges the application of truth to life. He would teach men how to live. He has asserted the Divine majesty and sovereignty in ch. 11. 33–36; and with equal earnestness he sets forth the duties of the creature. Your bodies—answer to 'your members' (ch. 6. 13); practically, your energies. Through our body the world acts upon us, and we upon the world. Living sacrifice—a contrast to Mosaic sacrifices. This metaphor is used elsewhere of the Christian's tokens of thanksgiving. (Phil. 4. 18; 1 Pet. 2. 5)"—C. B. "The spirit of this exhortation is, seeing that God had called the Roman saints to all the glory of His covenant, they should now be a holy nation, consecrated to the living God, serving Him daily with prayer and praise. Such sacrifice must be presented without spot, and acceptably. It is a rational obligation, that a creature should live to the glory of his Creator, and especially with regard to spiritual endowments"—SUTCLIFFE.

2. And be not conformed—"neither in judgment, spirit, nor behaviour—to this world—which, neglecting the will of God, entirely follows its own. That ye may prove—know by sure trial; which is easily done by him who has thus presented himself to God—what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. 'The will of God' is here to be understood of all the preceptive part of Christianity, which is in itself so excellently 'good,' so 'acceptable' to God, and so 'perfective' of our natures"—WESLEY.

And be not fashioned according to this world (R.V.)—as in 1 Pet. 1. 14. Transformed—same word as in Matt. 17. 2, was "transfigured." "A saint must be separated, not locally, but in regard to intimate friendship. There are some remote courtesies that come from us, as men, to all, be they what they will; there are others to those that are nearer, and there are others that are nearest of all; and those are they with whom we hope to have communion for ever in heaven, the blessed people of God"—SIBBES. "If the views and conduct of others coincide with the Christian, it is well. If they do not, they are not at liberty to demand that he shall be conformed to them. He has higher laws, and a higher object. He has a purpose which strikes on to eternity. His aim is to prepare for heaven; theirs, to live for time. Nor can they claim jurisdiction over conduct that has been directed by the Son of God, and that He has judged best in ordering His peculiar community. The simple question is, whether a proposed course of conduct or opinion is consistent with the spirit and life demanded by the King of Zion?"—BARNES. "Sanctification must extend to man's whole nature, and include both separation from all that is unholy, and an inward change in the man himself. But this work of the Spirit does not exclude the co-operation of man's will, which is presupposed in the exhortation, 'Be ye transformed'"—GIFFORD.

SECTION XXIX.—Vers. 3–8. VARIETY OF GIFTS.—3. And I say. "He now proceeds to show what that will of God is—through the grace which is given to me. He modestly adds this, lest he should seem to forget his own direction. To everyone that is among you—believers at Rome. Happy, had they always remembered this! The measure of faith—treated of in the first and following chapters, from which all other gifts and graces flow"—WESLEY.

God had given great grace to the apostle, and special qualifications for teaching others. (See ch. 1. 5; 15. 15, 16; comp. also 1 Cor. 3. 10; 15. 10; Gal. 2. 9; Eph. 3. 2, 7, 8.) Here he commends "sober thinking." It is easy to over-estimate our own powers; and self-exalting thoughts are inconsistent with Christian discipleship. The man who deludes himself by self-esteem is generally guilty of contempt of others. The Pharisee not only looked upon himself as a great saint, but regarded the publican as a wretched sinner. He was, unfortunately, not the last of his race. A man's faith determines his spiritual condition, and God graciously bestows this gift on all Christians.

5. "So we—all believers—are one body—closely connected together in Christ, and consequently ought to be helpful to each other"—WESLEY.

4, 5. A happy illustration. One body in Christ—our union with Him involves our relationship with each other. The body and its members show the mutual connection, and the mutual dependence of the saints of God. (See 1 Cor. 10. 17; 12. 12–30; Eph. 1. 23; 4. 4–16; 5. 23–30; Col. 1. 18, 24; 2. 19; 3. 15.) God has distributed His gifts according to His holy will and infinite wisdom (Matt. 25. 14–30), and no man can afford to be independent of others. Christian fellowship, with its mutual helpfulness, is intended to bring each one into closer communion with Christ.

6. Having then gifts differing according to the grace which is given us. Gifts are various; grace is one. Whether it be prophecy. "This, considered as an extraordinary gift, is that whereby heavenly mysteries are declared to men, or things to come foretold. But it seems here to mean the ordinary gift of expounding Scripture. Let us prophesy according to the analogy of faith. S. Peter expresses it, 'as the oracles of God'; according to the general tenor of them; according to that grand scheme of doctrine which is delivered therein, touching original sin, justification by faith, and present, inward salvation. There is a wonderful analogy between all these; and a close and intimate connection between the chief heads of that faith 'which was once delivered to the saints.' Every article, therefore, concerning which there is any question, should be determined by this rule; every doubtful scripture interpreted according to the grand truths which run through the whole"—WESLEY.

Here is further teaching from the preceding comparison. Our gifts differ; and graces are not bestowed by God in equal proportions, but each one may use "that which he hath," and must be responsible for its employment. "We live in an age of ordinary gifts, but it is as true of these ordinary, as of those extraordinary, gifts of the Spirit, that there is as much utility as beauty in the diverse temperaments and endowments of Christian men. What is diverse is not of necessity adverse. God has different kinds of work to do; and since He chooses to employ men, He has need of different kinds of instruments"—GUTHRIE. "Men have different spheres. It is for some to evolve great moral truths, as the heavens evolve stars, to guide the sailor on the sea and the traveller on the desert; and it is for some, like the sailor and the traveller, simply to be guided"—BEECHER. "Some people forget that there are diversities of gifts. He who taught the lark to trill, taught the eagle to scream; He who moulded the dewdrop and caused it to hang in silence on the fringe of the flower, poured out the boundless sea and caused it to roar night and day, as if uttering the prayer of all earthly trouble. We should allow more for all this marvellous diversity. The foot and hand, the eye and ear, are members of the same body, and there should be no schism"—PARKER.

7. Ministering — "as deacons. He that teacheth—catechumens; for whom particular instructors were appointed. He that exhorteth—whose peculiar business it was to urge Christians to duty, and to comfort them in trials"—WESLEY.

"The word rendered ministry is the same word as ch. 11. 13, where it means the apostolic service. It is a largely inclusive word; the main fixed idea being that of active 'practical' duty in the Church, of whatever kind or degree. Almost any work other than that of inspired utterance, or miracle working, may be included in it here. 'In the service,' i.e. 'let us be really in it, devoted to it.' So 'in the teaching,' 'in the exhortation,' just below. He that teacheth. In 1 Cor. 12. 28, 29, 'teachers' are mentioned as a class of commissioned workers in the Church. Perhaps they were especially the expositors of revealed truth"—MOULE. "Since in this passage S. Paul is speaking of various special gifts, and distinguishes ministry from prophecy, teaching, and exhortation, the word must be taken in a limited sense, as service in things temporal and external, such as the wants of the poor, the sick, and the stranger. Or he that teacheth. The teacher's gift lies in an enlightened understanding, and a faculty of clear exposition: he uses 'the word of wisdom' or 'the word of knowledge' to arrange, develop, and enforce truths previously revealed. In 1 Cor. 12. 28, he is ranked next after the apostles and prophets"—GIFFORD.

8. He that presideth — "that hath the care of a flock. He that showeth mercy —in any instance — with cheerfulness — rejoicing that he hath such an opportunity"—WESLEY.

Here also other Christian works are specified. To exhort demands less knowledge than to teach, but not less earnest devotion. Giving is a duty of every Christian, and is most blessed when done in simplicity, i.e. with liberality. Ruling with diligence, means not only with earnestness of purpose, but with careful attention; and showing mercy with cheerfulness, surely implies works of self-sacrificing love, done with the gladness and kindliness which ever adds so much to their value.

SECTION XXX. — Vers. 9–21. INDIVIDUAL AND SOCIAL DUTY IN LIFE. — 9. "Having spoken of faith and its fruit (ver. 3, etc.), he comes now to love. Vers. 9, 10, and 11 refer to ch. 7; ver. 12 to ch. 8; ver. 13, of communicating to the saints, whether Jews or Gentiles, to ch. 9, etc.; ver. 16 is repeated from ch. 11. 25. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good—both inwardly and outwardly, whatever ill-will or danger may follow"—WESLEY.

Here we have plain teaching on Christian duty and practice. We are under obligation to live to bless men, as we are to serve God. He demands our love (Deut. 6. 5), and this is declared impossible unless we love one another. (1 John 4. 20.) Love to man, as to God, must be sincere — without hypocrisy (R.V.). (2 Cor. 6. 6; 1 Pet. 1. 22; 1 Tim. 1. 5; 2 Tim. 1. 5; Jas. 3. 17.) Abhor (R.V. "Hate"), as in Ps. 97. 10. Cleave to good. The two duties are connected, as in Isa. 1. 16, 17. "Love is the bond of perfection. Earthly societies associate and obey by interest, by custom, or by fear; but love, the pure and perfect charity of Christ, actuates the saints. They visit the sick and help the needy with true benevolence of heart"—SUTCLIFFE. "This is not here a commonplace recommendation to detest evil and love good. S. Paul means that love is not pure except when it is the declared enemy of evil, even in the person of those whom we love, and that it applies all its energy to labour for their progress in goodness. Destitute of this moral rectitude, which is the spirit of holiness, love is only a form of selfishness"—GODET.

10. In honour preferring one another—"which you will do, if you habitually consider what is good in others, and what is evil in yourselves"—WESLEY.

In love of the brethren be tenderly affectioned one to another (R.V.). "The members of the spiritual body should do the same good offices for one another as the members of the natural body"—CHRYSOSTOM. "Christian affection has the permanence it derives from an indissoluble bond; the vigour given it by a participation in sufferings and reproaches; and the depth it receives from the prospect of an unbounded futurity"—TAYLOR.

11. Whatsoever ye do, do it with your might. In every business diligently and fervently serving the Lord—"doing all to God, not to man"—WESLEY.

"In diligence not slothful (R.V.). An idle, slothful person can never be a Christian"—CLARKE. "Oh for grace to be in the world and not of the world,—to be performing diligently and cheerfully our part in the present life—yet ever pressing towards our eternal rest"—NEWMAN HALL. Not slothful. The precept includes an exhortation to thoroughness in earthly duty, but much more besides. Serving the Lord. DE WETTE remarks that "the Christian should certainly employ the opportunity, but not serve it." He will often have to go apparently counter to it, in the path of duty. Fervent in spirit—continuing instant in prayer. "Earnestness does not express itself in long, inflated, pompous sentences. It is brief; it is simple. S. Peter sinks amid the boisterous waves of Galilee, and all the prayer of lips the cold water kisses is, as he stretches out his hand to Jesus, 'Save me, I perish!' And the publican, like a man who is falling over a crag, catches the arm of a friendly tree, throws his whole soul into this cry—these few, blessed, accepted words, 'God be merciful to me a sinner!'"—GUTHRIE.

12. "Rejoicing in hope—of perfect holiness and everlasting happiness. Hitherto of faith and love; now of hope also—see chaps. 5 and 8; afterwards of duties towards others; saints (ver. 13); persecutors (ver. 14); friends, strangers, enemies (ver. 15, etc.)"—WESLEY.

"Rejoicing in hope—of that glory of God that to each faithful follower of Christ shall shortly be revealed"—CLARKE. "The fervour of devotion, referred to in ver. 2, has no more powerful auxiliary than joy; for joy disposes us to kindness, and even to self-sacrifice. But this applies only to Christian joy, to that which is kept up in the heart by the glorious hopes of faith. The passage (ch. 5. 3, 4) shows the intimate bond which unites this joy of hope with the patient endurance which the believer should display in the midst of trial. (Comp. 1 Thess. 1. 3.) And what are we to do to keep up in the heart the joyful spring of hope, and that firmness of endurance which holds out? Continue instant in prayer, says the apostle. Such is the fruitful principle of those admirable dispositions"—GODET.

13. Communicate to the necessities of the saints. "Relieve all Christians that are in want. It is remarkable that the apostle, treating expressly of the duties flowing from the communion of saints, yet never says one word about the dead. Pursue hospitality—not only embracing those that offer, but seeking opportunities to exercise it"—WESLEY.

"Distributing — communicating, sharing your own with them. This was almost the first instinct of the Church of Christ; and it was felt to be connected naturally with the sublimest truths of eternity. Given to hospitality. (Comp. Heb. 13. 2, where lit. 'forget not hospitality.') The duty of succouring and aiding fellow-Christians from a distance would be a chief (though by no means the only) point of exhortation"—MOULE. "We are to seek opportunities of Christian hospitality. (Comp. 1 Tim. 3. 2; Tit. 1. 8; Heb. 13. 2; 1 Pet. 4. 9; 1 John 3. 17; Matt. 10. 42.) It is not only needful to enable the servants of God to do their work, but it is a practical proof of brotherly love"—BEET. The two duties here and elsewhere enjoined by S. Paul were of special importance in the circumstances of the early churches.

14. Curse not—"no, not in your heart"—WESLEY.

According to the Lord's own example (Luke 23. 34) and His express precept (Luke 6. 28). S. Paul had not yet seen our present written Gospels, but he must have known the substance of our Lord's teaching.

15. Rejoice. "The direct opposite to weeping is laughter; but this does not so well suit a Christian"—WESLEY.

"On this beautiful and precious precept, comp. 1 Cor. 12. 26, and see the Lord's example at Cana and at Bethany. S. Paul himself knew how to practise his own precept. (2 Cor. 2. 2-4)"—C. B. "Sympathy is a duty of our common humanity, but far more of our regenerated manhood. Those who are one in the higher life should show their holy unity by true fellow-feeling. Joyful sympathy is doubly due when the joy is spiritual and eternal"—SPURGEON. "The degree to which the success and joy of others causes joy to us, and the converse, is the measure of our Christian life. Many cherish feelings exactly opposite to this. And to rejoice at the joy of others is more difficult than to share their sorrow"—BEET.

16. Mind not high things—"desire not riches, honour, or the company of the great"—WESLEY.

"'Let there be, in the breast of each, one thought and purpose touching all the others.' The context implies that this one thought must be 'according to Christ' (ch. 15. 5). This oneness of purpose is the true and only source of real Christian harmony. Prudent in your own eyes recalls Prov. 3. 7 (LXX.). To take to ourselves credit for prudence is to betray ignorance. For we are wise only so long as we are guided by the presence and wisdom of God. Apart from His guidance all human prudence is folly in disguise"—BEET.

17. Provide—"think beforehand; contrive to give as little offence as need be to any"—WESLEY.

"From the mutual duties of brethren in Christ, S. Paul passes to the wider relations of the Christian towards all men, and especially towards his enemies. Enmity being the world's prevailing attitude, how must the Christian meet it? The question is answered in the following verses (17–21). The precept, render to no man evil for evil, is derived from the Sermon on the Mount. (Matt. 5. 38–48.) Provide things honest. Again, to disarm enmity, use such forethought that your conduct may not only be blameless in the sight of God, who reads the heart, but may be also honourable in the sight of all men, through its transparent goodness and justice. A Christian should give no cause of suspicion or offence. Ver. 18 may be paraphrased, 'Live peaceably with all men, if through their conduct it be possible; at least, as far as it depends on you, live peaceably with all men.' Peace is a mutual relation which may be broken on either side; accordingly the duty of living peaceably with all men is absolute, so far as it depends on ourselves, conditional so far as its possibility depends on others"—GIFFORD.

19. Dearly beloved—"so he softens the rugged spirit—revenge not yourselves, but leave that to God. Perhaps it might more properly be rendered, leave room for wrath, that is, the wrath of God, to whom vengeance properly belongs"—WESLEY.

"The apostle's purpose throughout the verse is to put in the strongest light of emphasis and contrast the truth that vengeance is not for us but for God"—GIFFORD. "Instead of punishing those who injure us, we must give place for God's anger, and treat them with kindness"—BEET. "In Heb. 10. 30 the same words are quoted with another view, namely, to warn Christians that their God will visit their transgressions, as the chastiser of His people"—MOULE. "Some professors pass for very meek, good-natured people until you displease them. They resemble a pool or pond, which, while you let it alone, looks clear and limpid, but if you put in a stick and stir the bottom, the rising sediment soon discovers the impurity that lurks beneath"—TOPLADY.

20. Feed him—"with your own hand; if it be needful, even put bread into his mouth. Heap coals of fire upon his head—that part which is most sensible.

'So artists melt the sullen ore of lead,
By heaping coals of fire upon its head;
In the kind warmth the metal learns to glow;
And pure from dross the silver runs below.'"
—WESLEY.

"The passage means, show to thine enemy such kindness as shall make him ashamed of his hatred; so wilt thou inflict the sharpest and the most salutary pain. The figure is probably that of the melting-pots. As the object of heaping coals of fire on a vessel is to melt down its contents, so here the object is to melt a stubborn heart, a process not least painful when effected by undeserved kindness. This interpretation is confirmed by the closing sentence of Prov. 25. 22 (not quoted by S. Paul), 'and the Lord shall reward thee,' namely, for the good deeds done to thine enemy"—GIFFORD. ALFORD'S explanation is: "In thus doing, you will be taking the most effectual vengeance, the idea of vengeance being, in the Christian's view, transformed, so as to become the victory of love. Q.d. 'You shall thus exactly secure that sort of vengeance which alone a servant of God can desire.'"

21. "And if you see no present fruit, yet persevere. Be not overcome with evil—as all are who avenge themselves. But overcome evil with good. Conquer your enemies by kindness and patience"—WESLEY.

"Never allow any evil principle or act to conquer the gifts of God's grace. Every triumph of the good over evil develops and strengthens our moral character. Religion does not consist in dreading evil, but rather in gaining constant victories over it. We must watch against it daily, but if we do nothing more, it will never be overcome. The evil: the good—that of the evil-doer and the sufferer respectively. Q.d. 'Do not let his evil principles and acts conquer the better mind that is in thee by grace, but use "the good" given to thee—the good of Divine peace and love shed abroad in thy heart—to subdue the evil in him'"—MOULE. "If we retaliate, we do wrong, and thus evil gains a victory over us. But if the injury be met with kindness, it develops our moral character, and thus does us good. In this way, by doing good, we gain a victory over evil. And if our kindness lead the adversary to repentance, goodness gains a double victory. The alternative here mentioned is the only one. If a man do wrong to us, we must always either conquer or be conquered by the evil"—BEET;—who also adds, "In this section (vers. 9–21) which treats of Christian morals, S. Paul refers three times to the Book of Proverbs; another example of his respect, in every point, for the Old Testament. Each verse of this section will repay the most careful study. Observe the easy and natural flow, and the intense reality of the whole. There are no formal divisions, and no artificial order. But each thought suggests some other suitable thought, and the whole sets before us with wonderful completeness the principles which ought to regulate our dealings one with another."

CHAPTER XIII.

SECTION XXXI.—Vers. 1–7. OBEDIENCE TO RULERS.—1. "S. Paul, writing to the Romans, whose city was the seat of the empire, speaks largely of obedience to magistrates; and this was also, in effect, a public apology for the Christian religion. Let every soul be subject to the supreme powers — an admonition peculiarly needful for the Jews. 'Power,' in the singular number, is the supreme authority; 'powers' are they who are invested with it. That is more readily acknowledged to be from God than these. The apostle affirms it of both. They are all from God, who constituted all in general, and permits each in particular by His providence. The powers that be are appointed by God. It might be rendered, 'are subordinate to,' or 'orderly disposed under, God,' implying that they are God's deputies or vicegerents, and consequently their authority being, in effect, His, demands our conscientious obedience"—WESLEY.

"This passage states, as a primary truth of human society, that civil authority is, as such, a Divine institution. Whatever may be the details of error or of wrong in its exercise, it is nevertheless, even at its worst, so vastly better than anarchy, that it forms a main instrument and ordinance of the will of God. It does not touch on the question of the forms of government. It distinctly forbids revolutionary action in a Christian, and yet it by no means forbids Christians to take full advantage of existing authority and law, as S. Paul himself took advantage of his civil rights. But its unmistakable drift is, what is always the drift of Scripture (as it is not that of human nature), to emphasise the Christian's duties far more than his rights"—C. B. "Every soul—not exactly the same as every man. Our submission must be inward. (Comp. ch. 2. 9; Acts 2. 13; Eph. 6. 6; Matt. 22. 37.) For, etc. (reason for submission). There is, etc. (emphatic). The very existence of civil authority is the work of God, who has so constituted society that men are compelled to appoint rulers, and thus to create authority. And those that exist, etc. Not only is civil authority as an abstract principle the work of God, but the persons who now exercise it have been put by God in their place of power"—BEET. "In enforcing the duty of submission, S. Paul clearly asserts a Divine right of civil government, as derived from God, the source of all authority and power; and he extends that Divine right to all rulers 'as the bearers of a Divine ordained office' (MEYER), but does not touch any question of the Christian's duty in reference to conflicting claims on his allegiance"—GIFFORD. "S. Paul means, first, that the institution of the State is according to the plan of God, who created man a social being, so that we are called to recognise in the existence of a power (authority) the realisation of a Divine thought. In the second proposition he goes further. He declares that at each time the very persons who are established in office occupy this exalted position only in virtue of a Divine dispensation"—GODET.

2. Whosoever resisteth the power—"in any other manner than the laws of the community direct—shall receive condemnation—not only from the magistrate, but from God also"—WESLEY.

"This verse exhibits the guilt, and as a consequence the inevitable punishment of revolt. The application of the principle laid down here remains always the same, whatever may be the form of government, monarchical or republican. S. Paul here reproduces in a certain sense, but in another form, the sayings of Jesus. (Matt. 26. 52.) It is obvious that Jesus and S. Paul have only one and the same watchword to give to the believer in regard to his relations to the State—submission, and, when necessary, patience"—GODET.

3. For rulers are—"in the general, notwithstanding some particular exceptions—a terror to evil works—only. Wouldest thou then not be afraid? There is one fear which precedes evil actions, and deters from them; this should always remain. There is another fear which follows evil actions; they who do well are free from this"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul enforces the certainty of 'judgment' in this case by pointing out its manifest justice. Rulers are, as a fact, an agency on the side of right and order; it is just, then, a sin in the sight of God to resist their authority"—MOULE. "In this and the following verse it is clearly the ideal aspect of the magistracy that the apostle has in view. Occasional failures of justice on the part of the executive do not make the strict administration of justice any the less its proper duty and office"—ELLICOTT.

4. The sword—"the instrument of capital punishment, which God authorises him to inflict"—WESLEY.

"Experience proves that the last punishment of the law is often the means of opening up in the heart of the malefactor a way for Divine grace. The penalty of death was the first duty imposed on the State at the time of its Divine founding. (Gen. 9. 6.) It is profound respect for human life, which in certain cases enjoins the sacrifice of human life. The question involved is not that of simple social expediency, but that of keeping up the human conscience to the level of the value which God Himself attaches to the human person"—GODET.

5. Not only for fear of wrath—"that is, punishment from man—but for conscience' sake—out of obedience to God"—WESLEY.

In other words, we are bound to submit to the ruler, not only for fear of punishment, but also that we may have a consciousness that we are doing right. (Comp. 1 Cor. 10. 25, 29; 1 Pet. 2. 19.) MATTHEW HENRY'S Note is: "Thou hast the benefit and advantage of the Government, and therefore must do what thou canst to preserve it, and nothing to disturb it. Protection draws allegiance. By upholding the Government we keep up our own hedge."

6. For this cause—"because they are the ministers (officers) of God for the public good. This very thing—the public good"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul says that our admitted obligation to pay taxes rests upon the sacred authority of the power which imposes them. Since this obligation cannot otherwise be accounted for, it affords confirmation of the teaching that the rulers of the State are ordained by God"—BEET. Ministers. "The choice of such terms harmonises with the conception which is presented in this chapter of the Divine origin and character of the State system"—ELLICOTT.

7. To all—"magistrates. Tribute—taxes on your person or estates. Custom—for goods exported or imported. Fear—obedience. Honour—reverence. All these are due to the supreme power"—WESLEY.

"Tribute—the general tax or national impost, which was paid by Joseph in Bethlehem. (Luke 2. 2.) Custom—a local or occasional tax paid by our Saviour. (Matt. 17. 24.) What good is the farmer's corn, and the merchant's wealth, if they be not protected by the civil power? The seaman who holds the helm must be supported as well as the men before the mast. A contraband trade is an injustice to the State, and also to the fair trader"—SUTCLIFFE. "This section must have been written before the civil power began deliberately to oppose Christianity, as it did in the latter days of Nero, and at intervals afterwards. For, although the opposition of the State to Christianity did not altogether destroy the obligation to obedience, it introduced into the question difficulties which no one who wrote on the subject could pass over in silence. This section is therefore a mark of the early date, and consequently of the genuineness of the epistle"—BEET.

SECTION XXXII.—Vers. 8–14. CHRISTIAN DUTIES.—8. "From our duty to magistrates he passes on to general duties. To love one another—an eternal debt, which can never be sufficiently discharged; but yet, if this be rightly performed, it discharges all the rest. For he that loveth another—as he ought—hath fulfilled the whole Law—towards his neighbour"—WESLEY.

"Owe no man anything. The special precept here beautifully expands into the general. Not rulers only but all men (and here particularly all Christians) are to receive 'their dues.' The precept, in its particular application to money-debts, no doubt counsels immediate payment where possible and desirable. Its spirit, however, obliges the Christian only to a watchful avoidance of a state of debt, by careful restriction of expenses within means, and a thoughtful care for the interests of the creditor, to whom deferred payment may be a serious loss. (See Prov. 3. 27, 28.) But it is obvious that the 'owing' here is not of money only, but of every kind of 'due' from man to man"—C. B.

9. "If there be any other—more particular—commandment—toward our neighbour, as there are many in the Law—it is summed up in this—so that if you was not thinking of it, yet if your heart was full of love, you would fulfil it"—WESLEY.

If there be any other . . . it is summed up. In Lev. 19. 18, sundry laws forbidding injury to one's neighbour are summed up in a saying which contains them all in principle, as it also contains all the commandments of the Decalogue, to which S. Paul here applies it. The several laws which flow from love are thus gathered up again in love, their fountain-head. Thou shalt love, etc. (Lev. 19. 18.) See the Lord's own quotation of the words, Matt. 22. 39. (Comp. Jas. 2. 8.)

10. Therefore love is the fulfilling of the Law. "For the same love which restrains from all evil, incites us to all good"—WESLEY.

"Charity is the bond of perfection, the consummation of every other grace"—SUTCLIFFE. "In the room of burdensome rites and former rules, Jesus Christ gave us the law of faith and love; and thereby made His doctrine a doctrine of principles—living, active, pure, universal, eternal"—HARE. "Love is spoken of here only as the means and pledge of the fulfilment of justice. S. Paul has thus closed his exposition of the Christian's duties as a member of civil society"—GODET.

11, 12. And do this—"fulfil the law of love in all the instances above mentioned—knowing the season—full of grace, but hasting away—that it is high time to awake out of sleep. How beautifully is the metaphor carried on! This life, a night; the resurrection, the day; the gospel shining on the heart, the dawn of this day; we are to awake out of sleep, to rise up and throw away our night-clothes, fit only for darkness, and put on new; and, being soldiers, we are to arm and prepare for fight, who are encompassed with so many enemies. The day dawns when we receive faith, and then sleep gives place. Then it is time to rise, to arm, to walk, to work, lest sleep steal upon us again. Final salvation, glory, is nearer to us now, than when we first believed. It is continually advancing, flying forward upon the swiftest wings of time. And that which remains between the present hour and eternity is comparatively but a moment"—WESLEY.

"The apostle now gives a reason for enforcing this and other duties upon his readers. The end of the world itself is near. Like others (comp. 1 Pet. 4. 7; Rev. 22. 20), S. Paul certainly believed that the second coming of Christ was near at hand. This was in strict accordance with Mark 13. 32, and resulted naturally from the peculiar form of the Jewish messianic expectation. A great shock had been given to the disciples by the crucifixion of Him whom they thought to be the Messiah, and though they began to recover from this as soon as they were convinced of His resurrection, they yet could not reconcile themselves to it entirely. The humiliation of the cross was still a stumbling-block to them, taken alone; but, falling back upon another portion of their beliefs, they looked to see it supplemented, and its shameful side cancelled, by a second coming 'in power and great glory.' Their previous expectations, vague as they were, led them to regard this as part of the one manifestation of the Messiah, and they did not expect to see a long interval of time interposed"—ELLICOTT. The apostle enforces all his teaching by the assertion of the coming of the day of resurrection; the eternal day of full and complete deliverance from every penalty of sin. (See 1 Thess. 5. 5.) There are many other passages where 'the day' means the Lord's return. The works of darkness. (Comp. John 3. 19; Acts 25. 18; 2 Cor. 6. 14; Eph. 5. 11; 1 Pet. 2. 9; 1 John 1. 6.) Every evil habit must cease—must be cast off; and the armour, or the weapons of light, must be put on. The whole of this language describes the Christian's earthly experience. The night of his natural condition is past, the brighter day of eternal reward is nigh. The light of the coming day is dispelling the darkness of the night. The glorious light of the gospel shines into our hearts, and will lead us to the heaven of which it is written, "And there shall be night no more" (Rev. 22. 5).

13. Banqueting—"luxurious, elegant feasts" —WESLEY.

As in the day—with light all around him. Probably the "light" of 1 John 1. 7; the light of the knowledge of God. (See Ps. 139. 12.) God ever condemns the idle and unmanly, as surely as the envious and the contentious. Such men are out of harmony with the spirit of Christianity.

14. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ. "Herein is contained the whole of our salvation. It is a strong and beautiful expression for the most intimate union with Him, and being clothed with all the graces which were in Him. The apostle does not say, Put on purity and sobriety, peacefulness and benevolence; but he says all this, and a thousand times more at once, in saying, Put on Christ. And make not provision—to raise foolish desires, or, when they are raised already, to satisfy them"—WESLEY.

"To lay aside what belongs to the night of worldly life is only the first part of the preparation to which we are called by the rising of the great day. Our concern must be, besides, to put on the dispositions which are in keeping with so holy and brilliant a light. What is this new equipment which we must haste to substitute for the old? S. Paul indicates it in the expression: to put on Jesus Christ. He certainly speaks of Christ here not as our righteousness, but as our sanctification. (1 Cor. 1. 30.) The toilet of the believer, if one may venture so to speak, in view of the approaching salvation, consists solely in putting on Christ, in appropriating, by habitual communion with Him, all His sentiments and all His manner of acting. He thus becomes for His redeemed ones Himself the robe for the marriage feast. The Christian will be unable to stand before Him except, in so far as he is 'found in Him' (Phil. 3. 9)"—GODET. "The essential element of union with Christ is the Spirit of Christ, and the Spirit's power is needed continually to maintain and develop the life once bestowed. Each new step in the development of this life may be regarded as a new putting on of Christ, and so may be the subject of special exhortation"—GIFFORD.

CHAPTER XIV.

SECTION XXXIII.—Vers. 1–23. MUTUAL TOLERATION AND PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY. —"The great principle of Christian love commended in the preceding chapter is here applied to enforce the special duty of mutual forbearance in all things indifferent.—1. Him that is weak—through needless scruples—receive—with all love and courtesy into Christian fellowship—but not to doubtful disputations —about questionable points"—WESLEY.

One of the many cautions against disputes, which have so frequently divided the Church of Christ, and so accomplished more mischief than all its enemies. The religion which improves a man's morals is intended to also improve his manners. Respect the conscientious scruples of others, as you wish them to respect yours.

2. All things—"all sorts of food, though forbidden by the Law"—WESLEY.

The meaning is, "who has a faith firm enough to be able to eat anything without scruple." Eateth herbs. This is given as an extreme case. Anxiety to avoid "defilement" of animal food by idol sacrifices, the weak man will eat "herbs," that is to say, nothing else.

3. Despise him that eateth not—"as overscrupulous or superstitious. Judge him that eateth—as profane, or taking undue liberties. For God hath received him—into the number of His children notwithstanding this"—WESLEY.

Avoid all such judgment. (Matt. 7. 1–5.) The man who feels himself strong must sympathise with rather than look with disdain upon the timidity or anxious doubts of the weak. For God hath received him—when he accepted and acknowledged Christ as his Lord and Saviour. Although, it may be, still "weak," he is a "new creature." God has made him one of His own people, and his stronger brother is not to condemn him for his conscientiousness. S. Paul's meaning is, "Condemn not for his freedom the man whom God has taken to Himself and received into His Church in this freedom." (1 Cor. 10. 29; Gal. 5. 13.)

4. To his own master he standeth or falleth. "The idea is: it is to the advantage or disadvantage of his master, not of his fellow-servants, that a servant fulfils or neglects his task. The terms 'standing' and 'falling' refer, not to the servant's absolution or condemnation at the judgment, but to his daily faithfulness or unfaithfulness, and to the strengthening or weakening his inward relation to Christ. Yea, he shall be made to stand (R.V.). It is as if S. Paul said to the weak, 'Thou mayest assure thyself about him; for, even if he is mistaken, his Master is powerful enough to avert the bad effects of a piece of flesh.' This argument applies, of course, only to things which arise exclusively in the domain of the individual conscience"—GODET.

5. One day above another—"as new moons, and other Jewish festivals. Let every man be fully persuaded—that a thing is lawful, before he does it"—WESLEY.

"The question has been much debated whether the observance of the Sabbath was one of the tenets of the 'weak brethren,' and so whether it is here ruled by S. Paul to be not of permanent moral obligation. (Comp. Col. 2. 16.) If by 'the Sabbath' is meant the last day of the week strictly, the answer to both questions must be yes. But, as to the observance of a divinely consecrated weekly rest, it is evident (from Gen. 2. 3; Ex. 20. 8–11) that the institution stands on a very different level from that of the monthly and yearly Mosaic festivals. It is antecedent to all Jewish law, and in the decalogue of Exodus it is based on strictly universal grounds, and placed among the great elements of moral duty. No doubt it is impossible to trace the whole process of transition from the observance of the seventh day to that of the first; but the plain fact remains that the sanctity of the primeval weekly worship-rest was of a kind most unlikely to be slightingly put aside by the apostles; and thus, in such places as this and Col. 2. 16, it is far more likely that the wrong opinion in question was that the whole Mosaic code of festivals was still binding in full detail, that therefore the Saturday was the only possible Sabbath, and that it was to be observed by the Rabbinic rules"—C. B.

6. Regardeth it to the Lord—"that is, out of a principle of conscience toward God. To the Lord he doth not regard it—he also acts from a principle of conscience. He that eateth not—flesh—giveth God thanks—for His herbs"—WESLEY.

There may be many variations of opinion and of practice, without sin; and their existence should make manifest forbearance and brotherly love, not jealousy and disputation. In everything the example of Christ is to be our model. (See Mark 9. 38–40.) It being presupposed that each is fully assured in his own mind that he is doing right, then he that sets his mind upon the day in question, and is zealous for its observance, does so for the Lord's sake, considering that "this day is holy to the Lord." This passage shows the universal custom of thanksgiving before a meal. (Matt. 15. 36; Acts 27. 35; 1 Cor. 10. 30; 11. 24.)

7. None of us—"Christians, in the things we do—liveth to himself—is at his own disposal; doeth his own will"—WESLEY.

"Sages of old contended that no sin was ever committed whose consequences rested on the head of the sinner alone, that no man could do ill and his fellows not suffer. They illustrated it thus:—'A vessel sailing from Joppa, carried a passenger who, beneath his berth, cut a hole through the ship's side. When the men of the watch said, "What doest thou, O miserable man?" the offender calmly replied, "What matters it to you? The hole I have made lies under my own berth."' This ancient parable is worthy of the utmost consideration. No man perishes alone in his iniquity; no man can guess the full consequences of his transgression"—SPURGEON.

8. "The whole of this passage is deeply significant of the true object of a Christian's life. We are bound indeed to 'live to others'; but this bond is but a part of the supreme obligation to 'live and die unto the Lord'"—C. B. "Death divides us not from Christ, but brings us home to Him (2 Cor. 5. 6)"—TRAPP.

9. That He might be Lord both of the dead and living. "The Christian's relation to his Lord, both in life and in death, is founded on the facts of Christ's personal history. Here S. Paul states one great intended effect of the mode of salvation. It was redemption, deliverance by purchase, and thus it made the saved the personal possession of the Saviour. It was also, specially, through death and revival, with a view to the realisation by His servants that He who, to save them, had dwelt in both worlds, was their Master in both"—C. B.

10. Or why dost thou despise thy brother? "Hitherto the apostle has addressed the weak brother; now he speaks to the stronger"—WESLEY.

"If Christ is the Lord of all, what right has the weak to judge, or the strong to despise his brother? For, instead of judging each other, all are to be judged of the Lord. The judgment seat here is that of the great day, when 'the books will be opened.' This passage by no means implies that the Christian must wait till then to know whether he is accepted or not; but it does imply that the judicial declaration of his acceptance, and also of the Lord's verdict upon his life of new obedience, will be made to him as to one at the bar, and before the Judge"—C. B.

11. As I live. "An oath proper to him, because he only possesseth life infinite and independent. It is Christ who is here termed both Lord and God; as it is He to whom we live, and to whom we die. Every tongue shall confess to God—shall own Him as their rightful Lord; which shall then only be accomplished in its full extent. The Lord grant we may find mercy in that day; and may it also be imparted to those who have differed from us! yea, to those who have censured and condemned us for things which we have done from a desire to please Him, or refused to do from a fear of offending Him"—WESLEY.

"The certainty of the universal judgment is attested by the solemn declaration of Isa. 45. 23, where for the Hebrew phrase, 'By Myself have I sworn' (Gen. 22. 16), which is literally rendered in LXX., S. Paul, quoting from memory, substitutes the more frequent form, 'I live,' equivalent to 'By My own life I swear.' (Comp. Numb. 14. 21, 22, 28; Deut. 32. 40)"—GIFFORD. "God solemnly proclaims that the day is coming when everyone in the world will do homage and swear allegiance to Him. He refers to the willing submission of the re-created earth. Therefore God claims the homage of all. And, if so, He will require an account from those who resist His claim. Isaiah's words do not refer expressly to the judgment day, but it is evident that they will then be fulfilled. This quotation is not needed for logical proof, but adds greatly to the weight of the argument. Notice the vivid reality depicted by every knee and every tongue"—BEET.

12. Each of us—"emphatic, like 'we all,' 'every knee,' 'every tongue.' If we walk in the light of that day we shall see our own littleness, and be saved from contempt of the least of our brethren; we shall see our heavy responsibility, and be kept back from judging others"—BEET. "S. Paul here applies to every individual in particular what has just been said of all in general. The preceding context signifies, 'Judge not thy brother, for God will judge him'; this verse signifies, 'Judge thyself, for God will judge thee'"—GODET.

13. But judge this rather—"concerning ourselves—not to lay a stumblingblock—by moving him to do as thou doest, though against his conscience—or a scandal—moving him to hate or judge thee"—WESLEY.

"Wonderfully does this passage show the harmony of true Christian independence with Christian unselfishness. The gospel teaches that man has not merely a right to his opinion, a truth which, taken alone, leads to little save mutual repulsion or indifference. It teaches that he is responsible for his opinion to the Lord; and this leads his Christian neighbour to thoughtful watchfulness lest his own example should lead another astray in this deep matter of forming opinions for which account must be given. (See 1 Cor. 8. throughout for illustrations)"—C. B.

14. I am assured by the Lord Jesus—"perhaps by a particular revelation—that there is nothing—neither flesh nor herbs—unclean of itself—unlawful under the gospel"—WESLEY.

"I am persuaded indicates that this conviction has penetrated to his very conscience, and set it practically free from all perplexity. The words in the Lord Jesus remind us that it is He who has put an end to the obligations imposed by the Ceremonial Law. The emancipation which faith finds in Him arises not only from His doctrine (Matt. 15. 11, for example), but above all from the redemption wrought by Him. There is nothing except the possession of salvation which can practically give full liberty to the soul. S. Paul says 'everything is clean through Him'"—GODET.

15. If thy brother is grieved—"that is, wounded, led into sin. Destroy not him for whom Christ died. So we see, he for whom Christ died may be destroyed. With thy meat. Do not value thy meat more than Christ valued His life"—WESLEY.

"The Christian should not put a stumbling-block in his brother's way. Not, indeed, that there is anything unclean in itself, but relatively to the person who so regards it, it is unclean. (Therefore the Christian should be careful of what he does.) For to cause distress to another about a mere matter of food is to be uncharitable"—ELLICOTT. "We refrain from that which may injure those whom we love. Therefore, to eat food which may be to our brother an occasion of spiritual loss and sorrow proves that love is no longer the guiding principle of our life. This verse teaches plainly that there is danger lest the spiritual sorrow end in final apostasy. How frequently do those who have fallen away look back to some one wrong step as the cause of all that followed. And the danger is greatest in those who, like this man, are weak in faith. That spiritual injury may lead to eternal death is a strong reason why we should carefully avoid whatever may cause injury. Christ died—supports the exhortation by contrasting Him who died to save with those whose indulgence destroys their brethren. The verse clearly implies the possibility of the death of those for whom Christ died, of those who are now, as S. Paul assumes throughout, servants of Christ. If we were sure that God would not permit the injury occasioned by our conduct to go to the length of final ruin, we could not be kept back from it by fear of destroying him for whom Christ died"—BEET.

16. "Let not then your good and lawful liberty be evil spoken of by being offensive to others"—WESLEY.

Let no uncharitable use of your liberty give occasion to the weak in faith to condemn and speak evil of that which is to you a real good. Men must not use their liberty so as to provoke the indignation and blame of their weaker brethren. (Comp. 1 Cor. 8. 9–11, and 10. 29, 30.)

17. For the kingdom of God—"that is, true religion, does not consist in external observances. But in righteousness—the image of God stamped on the heart; the love of God and man, accompanied with the peace that passeth all understanding, and joy in the Holy Ghost"—WESLEY.

"The kingdom of God. (See 1 Cor. 4. 20; 6. 9, 10; Gal. 5. 21; Eph. 5. 5; Col. 4. 11; 1 Thess. 2. 12; 2 Thess. 1. 5; 2 Tim. 4. 18.) In these passages (as generally in the New Testament) the radical meaning of the phrase is always the same—the reign of God over the redeemed man, revealed and effectuated by the gospel. Its special meaning here is, the dignity and privilege (here or hereafter) of the subjects of the kingdom. Q.d. 'What we gain as the subjects of the kingdom of God is not freedom to eat what we please, but the possession of righteousness, peace, and joy'"—MOULE. "Religion is the product of the soul. It is a vital, mental state. It is a living power in the individual man"—BEECHER. "To be godly is to be godlike. The full accord of the soul with His character, in whom, as their native home, dwell 'whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely,' and the full conformity of the will to His sovereign will who is the life of our lives—this, and nothing shallower, nothing narrower, is religion in its perfection; and the measure in which we have attained to this harmony with God is the measure in which we are Christians. As two stringed instruments may be so tuned to one keynote that, if you strike the one, a faint, ethereal echo is heard from the other, which blends undistinguishably with its parent sound; so drawing near to God, and brought into unison with His mind and will, our responsive spirits vibrate in accord with His, and give forth tones, low and thin indeed, but still repeating the mighty music of heaven"—MACLAREN.

18. In these—"righteousness, peace, and joy. Men—wise and good men"—WESLEY.

"You are to accept as a Christian everyone whose life and disposition are Christlike, no matter how heretical the denomination may be to which he belongs. Wherever you find faith and righteousness and love and joy in the Holy Ghost—these things—you are to look upon them as the stamped coin of Christ's kingdom, and as a legal tender from God to you"—BEECHER. "Acceptable to God. He is a happy man that can be acquitted by himself in private, in public by others, in both by God"—TRAPP.

19. Peace and edification are closely joined. Practical divinity tends equally to peace and to edification. Controversial divinity less directly tends to edification, although sometimes, as they of old, we cannot build without it. (Neh. 4. 17)"—WESLEY.

"Practical lesson from the above—Pursue (as in ch. 12. 13). Of peace—explains 'peace' in ver. 17. Edification (lit. 'building up'). The 'work of God' in us is often represented as a building. (Ch. 15. 20; 1 Cor. 3. 9; Eph. 11. 21 f.) It makes most progress in those who are at 'peace' with each other. Since the approval both of God and of our fellows depends, not upon what we eat, but upon righteousness, peace, etc., let us do those things which tend to peace and to advance God's work in each other. (So ch. 15. 2.) To act thus is (ver. 15) to work according to love"—BEET. "The apostle considered that gift most desirable by which men might most edify one another. The most trifling act which is marked by usefulness to others is nobler in God's sight than the most brilliant accomplishment of genius. To teach a few Sunday-school children, week after week, commonplace simple truths—persevering in spite of dulness and mean capacities—is a more glorious occupation than the highest meditations or creations of genius which edify or instruct only our own solitary soul"—ROBERTSON.

20. The work of God—"which He builds in the soul by faith, and in the Church by concord. It is evil to that man who eateth with offence—so as to offend another thereby"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul is not speaking here of the evil which the strong believer does to himself, but of that which he does to his brother, carried away into sin. We may be astonished to find the apostle regarding the salvation of the weak as compromised by this one trespass. But is not one voluntary sin interposing between Christ and the believer enough to disunite them, and if this sin is not blotted out, and the state is prolonged, to plunge him again in death?"—GODET.

21. Thy brother stumbleth—"by imitating thee against his conscience, contrary to righteousness. Or is offended—at what thou doest to the loss of his peace. Or made weak—hesitating between imitation and abhorrence, to the loss of that joy in the Lord which was his strength"—WESLEY.

"This verse is the summing up of the whole warning addressed to the strong from ver. 13. Here S. Paul teaches, there is nothing except what is honourable, in abstaining when we sacrifice our liberty to charity"—GODET. It is good—is worthy and noble conduct in one who denies himself rather than offend a brother. (1 Cor. 8. 13.) S. Paul does not limit his maxim to the eating or drinking of things which cause offence, but extends it to all actions which are in themselves morally indifferent.

For a still stronger expression of the noble principle of this verse, see 1 Cor. 8. 12.

22. Hast thou faith—"that all things are pure? Have it to thyself before God—in circumstances like these, keep it to thyself, and do not offend others by it. Happy is he that condemneth not himself—by an improper use of even innocent things! and happy he who is free from a doubting conscience! He that has this may allow the thing, yet condemn himself for it"—WESLEY.

The faith which thou hast, have thou to thyself before God. Happy is he that judgeth not himself in that which he approveth (R.V.). Dr. TAYLOR says on the first part of the verse, "The apostle means, 'I own thou hast a right persuasion concerning thy Christian liberty; and I advise thee to hold that persuasion steadfastly, with respect to thyself, in the sight of God.'" And Dr. CLARKE has written of the latter part, Happy is he, etc., "That man only can enjoy peace of conscience who acts according to the full persuasion which God has given him of the lawfulness of his conduct; whereas he must be miserable who allows himself in the practice of anything for which his conscience upbraids and accuses him. Take good heed that conscience approve what passions allow."

23. Because it is not of faith—"he does not believe it lawful; and, in all these cases, whatsoever is not of faith is sin—whatever a man does without a full persuasion of its lawfulness, it is 'sin' to him"—WESLEY.

"Is damned (R.V. 'Condemned'). What a man cannot do as Christ's redeemed one, and in the joy of His salvation, must not be done at all. Otherwise this act, of which faith is not the soul, becomes sin, and may lead to the result indicated (ver. 20), the total destruction of God's work in us"—GODET. "Whatever a man does without a full persuasion of its lawfulness (see ver. 22) is to him sin; for he does it under a conviction that he may be wrong in so doing. Therefore if he makes a distinction in his own conscience between different kinds of meats, and yet eats of all indifferently, he is a sinner before God; because he eats either through false shame, base compliance, or an unbridled appetite; and any of these is in itself a sin against the sincerity, ingenuousness, and self-denying principles of the gospel of Christ"—CLARKE.

CHAPTER XV.

SECTION XXXIV.—Vers. 1-13. THE LORD'S EXAMPLE TO HIS PEOPLE.—1. We who are strong—"of a clearer judgment, and free from these scruples. And not to please ourselves—without any regard to others"—WESLEY.

"Because of the weakness of some we put a restraint upon ourselves, and we thus save them from that which might crush them into the dust. Their weakness is thus a burden which we bear, a burden light to us because of the strength which faith gives, but dangerously heavy to them. (Comp. Gal. 6. 1 f.) Thus in some small sense we are permitted to imitate Him 'who bore our griefs and carried our sorrows.' Where mutual love is, weakness gives one a claim to help from the strong"—BEET.

2. For his good. "This is a general word; edification is one species of good"—WESLEY.

"There are two ways of seeking to please our neighbour. In the one we are self-seeking; we seek to satisfy our interest or self-love. In the other we seek the good of our neighbour himself. It is this latter way only which the apostle recommends. The life of S. Paul was all through the realisation of this precept. (Comp. 1 Cor. 10. 33, 34)"—GODET.

3. "But bore not only the infirmities, but reproaches, of His brethren; and so fulfilled that scripture"—WESLEY.

"Reason why we should please, not ourselves, but others: it develops an argument suggested by 'Christ died.' (Ch. 14. 15.) If Christ instead of gratifying self submitted willingly to sufferings caused by His countrymen's inexcusable hostility to God, in order to save them from the well-merited consequence of their hostility, can we refuse to save a brother and a servant of Christ from the terrible danger to which his weakness exposes him, by submitting to a restraint not otherwise needful?"—BEET.

4. Aforetime — "in the Old Testament. That we through patience and consolation of the Scriptures may have hope — that through the consolation which God gives us by these we may have patience and a joyful hope"—WESLEY.

"The translation from ver. 3 to ver. 4 is this: 'If I thus apply this saying of the Psalmist to Christ and ourselves, it is because, in general, all Scripture was written to instruct and strengthen us'" — GODET. "Written aforetime. This refers not only to the quotation from Psalm 69, but to all the Old Testament Scripture. And, from what he says here of them, we learn that God had not intended them merely for those generations in which they were first delivered, but for the instruction of all the succeeding generations of mankind"—CLARKE.

5. "According to the power of Christ Jesus"—WESLEY.

"From patience and comfort, and the hope of glory, S. Paul passes at once to the duty of affectionate unanimity. The stronger was the sense of peace and hope in each individual believer, the more would the believing community be lifted above the bitterness and littleness of secondary controversies"—S. C.

6. That ye — "both Jews and Gentiles, believing with one mind, and confessing with one mouth"—WESLEY.

"Further purpose to be gained by the 'one mind'; and consequent by a further motive for harmony. With one accord, else the one mouth is hypocrisy. But where there is inward harmony, outward union will follow as its suitable expression. Glorify. (Ch. 1. 21.) We glorify God with our mouth, when by telling His greatness and goodness we express our own admiration, and call forth admiration of God in those who hear us. Our oneness of heart and voice, being evidently God's work, itself shows forth His glory. (John 17. 21)"—BEET. Glorify God—whose praise is the ultimate aim of all His gifts to His people. (Comp. on ch. 11. 33–36; see, on the holy unanimity enjoined here, Phil. 3. 15. 16.)

7. Receive ye one another—"weak and strong, with mutual love"—WESLEY.

"The compassionate welcome which Christ has given to all the members of the Church individually ought to be perpetually reproduced in the welcome of goodwill and tenderness which they give one another in all the relations of life. And if there is some concession to make, some antipathy to surmount, some difference of opinion to allow, some injury to forgive, one thing ought to lift us above all these conveyances—the thought that we are thereby labouring for the glory of God, who received us in grace through Jesus Christ. Mutual love ought to reign supremely in a church wholly composed of the Lord's well-beloved"—GODET.

8. Now I say. "The apostle here shows how Christ received us. Christ Jesus—'Jesus' is the name, 'Christ' the surname. The latter was first known to the Jews, the former to the Gentiles. Therefore He is styled Jesus Christ, when the words stand in the common, natural order. When the order is inverted, as here, the office of Christ is more solemnly considered. Was a servant—of His Father. Of the circumcision—for the salvation of the circumcised, the Jews. For the truth of God—to manifest the truth and fidelity of God"—WESLEY.

"That his statement, and the proof of it, are addressed more especially, though not exclusively to the strong in faith, is evident both from the repetition of the phrase used in ch. 14. 1, and also from the great prominence given in the following context to the reception of the Gentiles, to whom 'the strong' for the most part belonged"—GIFFORD. "The distinction of Jews and Gentiles, so prominent in this Epistle, but lost sight of since ch. 11, here meets us again. It suggests that the weak in faith were chiefly Jews, and the strong in faith chiefly Gentiles. (Comp. Acts 21. 20.) If so, the united praise of weak and strong, which in ver. 6, S. Paul desires, would also be the united praise of Jews and Gentiles. And if so, the quotations which follow have a very evident bearing upon the matter in hand, viz. our treatment of the weaker brethren. We have thus an explanation of the apparently sudden change of subject"—BEET.

9. As it is written—"in Ps. 18, where the Gentiles and Jews are spoken of as joining in the worship of the God of Israel"—WESLEY.

S. Paul is appealing more especially to "the strong," i.e. to the Gentiles, and in order to move them to greater forbearance and goodwill towards their weaker Jewish brethren, he shows that Christ Himself became in all things a Jew to fulfil God's promises to the Jews, and thereby to extend His mercy to the Gentiles. Even for Gentiles "salvation is of the Jews," not secured by covenant, but granted of free mercy.

10. See Deut. 32. 43.

11. See Ps. 117. 1. Both clauses are addressed to Gentile nations.

12. There shall be the Root of Jesse. "That kings and the Messiah should spring from his house, was promised to Jesse before it was to David. In Him shall the Gentiles hope—who before had been 'without hope' (Eph. 2. 12)"—WESLEY.

"The root—which lives unseen in the ground after the trunk has been cut down, and from which, after a time, a new sprout rises up to be an ensign to the people. The passage evidently refers to Christ and to the final victory, and is an express prophecy that in the blessings of the kingdom of Christ the Gentiles will share"—BEET. "The quotation is from Isa. 11. 10. The literal meaning of the Hebrew is: 'And in that day there shall be a shoot of Jesse, which shall be set up as a banner for the peoples.' . . . For the figure of an erected banner, the LXX. have substituted the idea of a person rising up to reign; S. Paul quotes after them. In meaning it comes to the same thing. With what emotion does S. Paul refer to all these passages, each of which was the motto, as it were, of his own work among the Gentiles. One understands, in reading such quotations, what he said in ver. 4, undoubtedly from his own experience of the patience and consolation which are kept up in the believer by the daily use of the Scriptures, as well as of the ever new hope which they inspire. This idea of hope is that which is expressed in the prayer uttered (ver. 13). For this adoration of the Gentiles, to which the four preceding quotations refer, is the fruit not only of the enjoyment of present blessings, but also, and above all, of the hope of future blessings"—GODET.

13. Now the hope of God—"a glorious title of God, but till now unknown to the heathens; for their goddess Hope, like their other idols, was nothing; whose temple at Rome was burned by lightning. It was, indeed, built again not long after, but was again burned to the ground"—WESLEY.

"The God of hope—i.e. of our hope, the special hope in question; the Christian's hope of glory. That ye may abound in the hope. S. Paul takes up the word of the last quotation, and applies it in this expression of holy and loving desire. He ceases now to speak of controversy, and looks joyfully heavenward. On the whole verse, comp. ch. 5. 1–5. In believing. The word seems to sum up the great argument of the Epistle. Here closes its course of explicit instruction, whether concerning doctrine or practice. The remainder is devoted to personal and other incidental topics. Meyer calls the passage (ch. 15. 14–33) the 'Epilogue' of the Epistle"—C. B. "The last words: the power of the Holy Spirit, point out once more (as in ch. 14. 17) the true power which they ought to seek, in opposition to the factitious power by which one exalts himself so easily above others. The former unites, for it strives to serve (ch. 15. 1), whereas the second disunites"—GODET. "S. Paul begs us to receive them, because the united praise of them and us will show forth the grandeur of God. He reminds us that for this end Christ received us; that this united song of praise was foretold in ancient prophecy; and that peace with our brethren will increase the hope with which, by God's grace, we already look forward to the coming glory"—BEET.

SECTION XXXV.—Vers. 14–33. S. PAUL'S APOSTOLATE AND WORK.—14. There are several conclusions of this Epistle. The first begins at this verse; the second, ch. 16. 1; the third, ver. 17; the fourth, ver. 21; and the fifth, ver. 25. "Ye are full of goodness—by being created anew. And filled with all knowledge—by long experience of the things of God. To admonish—to instruct and confirm"—WESLEY.

The apostle passes on from exhortation to an explanation of his own motives and intentions. The rest of the Epistle contains personal matters between S. Paul and the Romans (ch. 15. 14–33); salutations and doxology (ch. 16). MOULE says: "In this verse and the next we have an echo, as it were, of ch. 1. 8, 11, 12, 15. What S. Paul says here is no insincere diplomatic compliment, but the well-grounded conviction of his mind as to the Roman Christians as a body. And it is quite in harmony with the substance and tone of the Epistle, which is evidently written for those who were no novices in Christian doctrine, and who were also comparatively free from such faults of Christian practice as defiled, for instance, the Corinthian church. He wrote to them as he had written, just because they were in a state of spiritual vigour and maturity. Perhaps, too, he instinctively expresses this conviction the more strongly, because he is writing to the church of the imperial metropolis, the mighty centre of influence."

15. Because of the grace—"that is, because I am an Apostle of the Gentiles"—WESLEY.

"As putting you in mind. He has been telling them of something they did not know before, but merely reminding them of what they knew. And he claims the right to do this because of the special grace given to him as an apostle. The judaising section in the church at Rome did not go so far as that in Galatia. It recognised the apostleship of S. Paul, and he knew that he could safely appeal to this recognition"—ELLICOTT.

16. The offering up of the Gentiles—"as living sacrifices"—WESLEY.

BEET says of vers. 14–16: "Notice the courtesy and modesty of S. Paul. He apologises for the earnest tones which in some parts of his letter seems to betray a consciousness of superiority; and assures his readers that he does not undervalue their goodness, and their ability to instruct each other. He does but recall to their mind what they already know. And his boldness in doing so is prompted, not so much by their need as by God's undeserved kindness to himself, by the sacredness of the office to which God has called him, and by God's purpose to make him a channel of blessing to the Gentiles, of blessing wrought, not by S. Paul, but by the Spirit of God."

17. I have whereof to glory through Jesus Christ—"all my glorying is in and through Him"—WESLEY.

"This is really the title on which I rest my claim. I can boast of a specially sacred office and ministry given to me by Christ, and not merely of my own devising. The sphere of this office is a religious sphere, it relates to 'the things pertaining to God'"—ELLICOTT.

18. By word—"by the power of the Spirit. By deed—namely, through 'mighty signs and wonders'"—WESLEY.

The apostle explains and confirms the limit of his glorying in ver. 17 as a "glorying in Christ Jesus." "I will glory," he means, only of what has been accomplished, not by me, but by Christ through me. This verse may be paraphrased, "To justify this exultation, I need not presumptuously intrude on the work of others, putting in a false claim to credit for that work; I need only speak of what Christ has done through my personal efforts, both of preaching and miracle, in bringing Gentile converts to Him," etc.

19. Through mighty signs. "The 'might of signs' is the might (of influence and effect) resulting from the display of miracle. Signs and wonders. Same words as Matt. 24. 24; Mark 13. 22; John 4. 48; Acts 2. 19, 22; 15. 12; 2 Cor. 12. 12; 2 Thess. 2. 9; Heb. 2. 4. There is, no doubt, a difference of precise meaning between the words; but taken together they are a summary phrase for supernatural works of all kinds"—C. B.

20. Not where Christ had been named. "These places he generally declined, though not altogether, having an holy ambition (so the Greek word means) to make the first proclamation of the gospel in places where it was quite unheard of, in spite of all the difficulty and dangers that attended it. Lest I should only build upon another man's foundation. The providence of God seemed in a special manner, generally, to prevent this, though not entirely, lest the enemies of the apostle, who sought every occasion to set light by him, should have had room to say that he was behind other apostles, not being sufficient for planting of churches himself, but only for preaching where others had been already; or that he declined the more difficult part of the ministry"—WESLEY.

"To confirm the reality of his apostleship to the Gentiles, S. Paul has referred to the successes with which his activity thus far had been crowned in the east; and now, to pass to the idea of his future work in the west and of his visit to Rome, he recalls the principle by which he has always been guided in the direction of his labours. An apostle is not a simple pastor or evangelist; his mission is, as S. Paul himself says (1 Cor. 3. 10), to 'lay the foundation' on which others after him may build, consequently to preach where others have not yet come. S. Paul might have said 'to preach the gospel where Christ has not yet been named,' but he prefers to give his expression a still more negative turn, and to say more precisely, 'to preach the gospel, not where He has been named.' He wishes to preach the gospel, but not where anyone has done so before him"—GODET. "The apostle set it before him as a point of honour, not merely not to carry forward a work that others had begun, but to build up the whole edifice from the foundation himself"—ELLICOTT.

22. Therefore I have been long hindered from coming to you—"among whom Christ had been named"—WESLEY.

"My considering it a point of honour to build on no other man's foundation; and, finding that the gospel has been long ago planted at Rome, I have been prevented from going thither, purposing rather to spend my time and strength in preaching where Christ has not, as yet, been proclaimed"—CLARKE.

23. Having no longer place in these parts—"where Christ has now been preached in every city"—WESLEY.

"The work had been finished, so far as the apostle was concerned, in Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Greece. The churches had been founded, and fairly set going; and now he felt it his duty to go on to new fields, his duty in this respect also falling in with his wishes, as it would bring him to Rome"—ELLICOTT.

24. Into Spain—"where the gospel had not yet been preached. If first I may be somewhat satisfied with your company. How remarkable is the modesty with which he speaks! They might rather desire to be satisfied with his. 'Somewhat satisfied'—intimating the shortness of his stay; or, perhaps, that Christ alone can thoroughly satisfy the soul"—WESLEY.

"Before setting out for the west, the apostle has yet a task to fulfil; he proposes to seal by a solemn act the union between the two portions of the Church in that part of the world which he is about to leave. Such is the object of a last visit which he yet reckons on making to Jerusalem. He must transmit to the mother church of Jerusalem, on behalf of the churches of Greece, the fruits of a collection which they have made spontaneously for it. The apostle is concerned to inform the Christians of Rome on this point, not only because this journey will detain him some time yet in the east, but especially because it may involve him in danger, and because he has a request to address to them in this relation. Such are the perfectly natural contents of the end of the chapter"—GODET.

25. "I go unto Jerusalem. (See Acts 19. 21; 24. 17.) To minister, i.e. to carry temporal relief. He gives a good, because wholly unselfish, reason for the new delay of his visit to Rome. This very journey to Jerusalem was, in fact, in God's purpose, his way to Rome"—C. B.

26. The poor of the saints that are in Jerusalem. "It can by no means be inferred from this expression, that the community of goods among the Christians was then ceased. All that can be gathered from it is, that in this time of extreme dearth (Acts 11. 28, 29) some of the church in Jerusalem were in want; the rest being barely able to subsist themselves, but not to supply the necessities of their brethren"—WESLEY.

Lit. For the poor among the saints. "It cannot, therefore, be inferred from this that the church at Jerusalem consisted entirely of poor. Still, from the first it would seem as if persons like Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, and Mary the mother of Mark, were exceptions, and we know that the church at Jerusalem suffered severely during the famine in the reign of Claudius. Wealthier churches, such as those of Macedonia and Greece, would naturally be glad to have the opportunity of sending relief to the mother church, from which they might be said to be derived themselves. S. Paul himself proceeds to urge this very argument. From Jerusalem went forth the gospel which had been preached in Greece and Macedonia, and it would be but a small and due return if some of the superfluous wealth of those more favoured regions found its way to Jerusalem"—ELLICOTT.

27. It hath pleased them; and they are their debtors—"that is, they are bound to it, in justice, as well as mercy. Spiritual things—by the preaching of the gospel. Carnal things—things needful for the body"—WESLEY.

"Alms are called righteousness. (Ps. 112. 9.) Being but stewards of what we have, we owe it there where our great Master orders us to dispose of it; but here there was a special debt owing; the Gentiles were greatly beholden to the Jews, and were bound in gratitude to be very kind to them. From Israel came Christ Himself according to the flesh; out of the same flock came the prophets and apostles and first preachers of the gospel. Thus did the Gentiles partake of their spiritual things, and therefore their duty is to minister unto them in carnal things"—M. HENRY.

28. When I have sealed to them this fruit—"when I have safely delivered to them, as under seal, this fruit of their brethren's love—I will go by you into Spain. Such was his design; but it does not appear that S. Paul went into Spain. There are often holy purposes in the minds of good men, which are overruled by the providence of God so as never to take effect. And yet they are precious in the sight of God"—WESLEY.

"This fruit—of the success of my ministry and of your conversion to God. I will come by you into Spain. This was his desire; he had fully purposed it, if God should see meet to permit him; but it does not appear that he ever went. (See ver. 24)"—CLARKE. "There are often holy purposes in the minds of good men, which are overruled by the providence of God. It is evident from this, and from ver. 28, as well as from ch. 1. 10, 11, that S. Paul wrote this Epistle while he was at liberty, and before Christ had told him, as mentioned Acts 23. 11, that he must testify of Him at Rome; and before he was constrained to appeal to Cæsar, as is related Acts 25. 11, for in this Epistle he speaks still of his journey to Rome as of a voluntary undertaking, not supposing that he should be sent thither as a prisoner"—BENSON.

30. I beseech you by the love of the Spirit—"that is, by the love which is the genuine fruit of the Spirit—to strive together with me in your prayers. He must pray himself, who would have others strive together with him in prayer. Of all the apostles, S. Paul alone is recorded to desire the prayers of the faithful for himself. And this he generally does in the conclusions of his Epistles; yet not without making a difference. For he speaks in one manner to them whom he treats as his children, with the gravity or even the severity of a father, such as Timothy, Titus, the Corinthians, and Galatians; in another, to them whom he treats rather like equals, such as the Romans, Ephesians, Thessalonians, Colossians, Hebrews"—WESLEY.

"A touching request for his readers' prayers, supported by an appeal to their loyalty to their Master, Jesus Christ, whose work S. Paul is doing, and to the love with which the Spirit fills their hearts. 'Love' to our fellow-men, as in ch. 12. 9; 13. 10; 14. 15; 1 Cor. 13, and always when not otherwise defined. Of the Spirit. It is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5. 22). Therefore, to refuse S. Paul's appeal is to resist the Spirit. Wrestle (lit. 'contend as in public games'). It sets forth, better than any other English word, the intense efforts of the combatants. Same word (Col. 1. 29; 4. 12; Luke 13. 24). In prayer we struggle with all our spiritual power against unbelief, and against our spiritual foes. S. Paul begs his readers to join with him and thus help him in this conflict"—BEET.

31. That I may be delivered. "He is thus urgent from a sense of the importance of his life to the Church. Otherwise he would have rejoiced 'to depart, and to be with Christ.' And that my service may be acceptable—in spite of all their prejudices; to the end the Jewish and Gentile believers may be knit together in tender love"—WESLEY.

"There was need for prayer lest the prejudices of the Jewish Christians should lead them to misunderstand the kindness of the Gentile believers"—BEET. "The enemies to be removed are, above all, the unbelieving Jews. It is to them the first that refers; the second intimates that there are other adversaries within the Church itself; they are 'those thousands of Jews who have believed' (Acts 21. 20, 21), and who have been filled with prejudices against S. Paul's person and work. All those hearts must be prepared by God Himself to receive well the offering which is about to be brought them"—GODET.

32. That I may come to you—"this refers to the former, with joy to the latter, part of the preceding verse"—WESLEY.

This verse gives a further purpose of these prayers. In joy—seeing the success of my ministry for the Jewish Christians (2 Cor. 9. 12 ff.). Through the will of God—as in ch. 1. 10. With you be refreshed (ch. 1. 12). He looked forward to rest in the bosom of the Roman church after the conflict he foresaw at Jerusalem. The earnestness of S. Paul's request proves his firm belief that prayer avails to rescue us even from the violence of bad men; and, therefore, that such violence is under God's control. (Comp. 2 Cor. 1. 11; also Eph. 6. 19; Col. 4. 3.)

33. "The God of peace be with you. The whole object of the Epistle is to establish peace between the believing Jews and Gentiles, and to show them their mutual obligations, and the infinite mercy of God to both; and he concludes with praying that the God of peace—He from whom it comes, and by whom it is preserved—may be for ever with them"—CLARKE. "It is quite needless to take this verse as an intended close to the Epistle. We may be sure that some personal greetings must have been all along in S. Paul's intention; and none have yet been written. The wish here expressed quite naturally follows the previous context, and also marks the pause before the commendation and salutations now to follow"—C. B.

CHAPTER XVI.

SECTION XXXVI.—Vers. 1–27. SALUTATIONS AND WARNING.—1. I commend unto you Phebe—"the bearer of this letter. A servant.

The Greek word is a 'deaconess.' Of the church in Cenchrea. In the apostolic age some grave and pious women were appointed deaconesses in every church. It was their office, not to teach publicly, but to visit the sick, the women in particular, and to minister to them both in their temporal and spiritual necessities"—WESLEY.

This is the only mention of Phebe. Probably she was the bearer of the Epistle to Rome, hence the special prominence given to her name. SUTCLIFFE says: "A deaconess in the oriental churches corresponded with a matron of the synagogue. She was ordained; and their forms of ordination still exist in the Greek Church. They prophesied, and helped the apostles in the Lord. They visited the sick among the women, to whom ministers had no access. Such offices were essential in all the oriental churches." Cenchrea — the eastern port of Corinth. Mentioned also in Acts 18. 18.

2. In the Lord — "that is, for the Lord's sake, and in a Christian manner. S. Paul seems fond of this expression"—WESLEY.

As becometh saints (Phil. 2. 29)—"with all the attention and delicacy due from the Church to a saintly woman. She had further claim on their attention from the fact that she had given care and succour to many, including the writer himself."

3. Priscilla and Aquila—mentioned also in Acts 18. 2, 18, 26; 1 Cor. 16. 16; and Tim. 4. "Priscilla is an example of what a married woman may do, for the general service of the Church, in conjunction with home duties, just as Phebe is the type of the unmarried servant of the Church, or deaconess"—HOWSON.

4. Who have for my life, as it were, laid down their own necks — "that is, exposed themselves to the utmost danger. But likewise all the churches of the Gentiles—even that at Rome, for preserving so valuable a life" —WESLEY.

It is here plainly implied that Aquila and his wife had risked their lives for S. Paul's. Such self-sacrifice of Christian love well deserved remembrance, and the thanks, not only of the apostle, but of all the churches, to whom the apostle had been preserved. We do not know where or when these Christians had so proved helpful to S. Paul.

5. Salute the church that is in their house. "Aquila had been driven from Rome in the reign of Claudius, but was now returned, and performed the same part there which Caius did at Corinth. (Ch. 16. 23.) Where any Christian had a large house, there they all assembled together; though as yet the Christians at Rome had neither bishops nor deacons, so far were they from any shadow of papal power. Nay, there does not appear to have been then in the whole city any more than one of these domestic churches. Otherwise there can be no doubt but S. Paul would have saluted them also. Epenætus. Although the apostle had never been at Rome, yet had he many acquaintances there. But here is no mention of Linus or Clemens; whence it appears, they did not come to Rome till after this. The first-fruits of Asia—the first convert in the proconsular Asia"—WESLEY.

There are other scriptures which show that the church assembled for divine worship, and for Christian fellowship, in private houses. (See 1 Cor. 16. 19; Col. 4. 15; Philem. 2.) On this passage GODET says: "What is certain is, that these two persons are saluted here, not only as particular friends of S. Paul, but because of the important part they played in the work of his apostleship. The passage (Acts 18. 24–28) presents an example of their activity, and of the powerful influence they exercised; and it is most probable that what they had been at Ephesus, they had also been at Rome, from the day when they returned to it. In a word, they were evangelists of the first order. This is what recommends them to the respectful attention of the Church, and assigns them the first rank in this list of apostolic salutations. This circumstance throws light on the character of the whole list."

7. Who are of note among the apostles. "They seem to have been some of the most early converts. Fellow-prisoners — for the gospel's sake"—WESLEY.

My kinsmen. Probably S. Paul means no more than that they were Jews; for, in ch. 9. 3, he calls all the Jews 'his kinsmen according to the flesh'"—CLARKE. Were in Christ—i.e. had become Christians.

9. Our fellow-labourer — "mine and Timothy's (ver. 21)"—WESLEY.

Our helper in Christ—the "helper," that is, both of S. Paul and of the Roman church by her efforts in spreading the gospel.

10. Apelles, approved in Christ. "Some suppose the 'Appelles' was the same with 'Apollos'"—CLARKE.

11. Those of the family of Aristobulus and Narcissus, who are in the Lord. "It seems only part of their families were converted. Probably some of them were not known to S. Paul by face, but only by character. Faith does not create moroseness, but courtesy, which even the gravity of an apostle did not hinder" —WESLEY.

Narcissus is an historical name. There had been a famous Narcissus, a freed man and favourite of Claudius, who had been put to death three or four years before this Epistle was written. His household would naturally pass into the hands of the emperor, though still keeping his name. In the case of Aristobulus, the transference would be effected by bequest, in that of Narcissus by confiscation. Many instances of both methods occur in the history and records of the time. This interpretation, and the identification of Aristobulus and Narcissus with the historical bearers of those names, is some way short of certain, but may be said to have some degree of probability"—ELLICOTT.

12. "Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa—probably they were two sisters"—WESLEY.

It is supposed they were attached to the court, who had been distinguished in the service of the Church.

13. Salute Rufus—"perhaps the same that is mentioned (Mark 15. 21)—and his mother and mine. This expression may only denote the tender care which Rufus's mother had taken of him"—WESLEY.

"Chosen in the Lord. HOFMANN, judging from what follows, understands, 'The man whom I have specially chosen as my brother in the Lord.' But it more probably means distinguished, excellent, as in 2 John 1. 13. His mother and mine prove that S. Paul was united to this family by the closest ties—that he had even lived in it"—GODET.

14. Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, etc. "He seems to join those together, who were joined by kindred, nearness of habitation, or any other circumstance. It could not but encourage the poor especially, to be saluted by name, who perhaps did not know that the apostle had ever heard of them. It is observable that whilst the apostle forgets none who are worthy, yet he adjusts the nature of his salutation to the degrees of worth in those whom he salutes"—WESLEY.

"Of the names in this and the next verse, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, Philologus, Julia, Nereus (with the corresponding female name Nereis) all occur with more or less frequency in inscriptions relating to the household. Hermas and Hermes are very common. The first is a contraction from several longer forms. Patrobas is contracted from Patrobius. We find that a freed man of Nero's who bore this name was put to death by Galba; but the person saluted by S. Paul is more likely to have been a dependant of his than the man himself. Taking the list of names as a whole, and comparing them with the inscriptions, we may—without going so far as to identify individuals, which would be precarious ground—nevertheless note the general coincidence with the mention of 'Cæsar's household' in Phil. 4. 22"—ELLICOTT.

15. Salute all the saints. "Had S. Peter been at Rome, S. Paul would doubtless have saluted him by name; since no one in this numerous catalogue was of an eminence comparable to his. But if he was not then at Rome, the whole Roman tradition, with regard to the succession of their bishops, fails in the most fundamental article"—WESLEY.

"The saints which are with them—perhaps forming, with those whose names are given, a 'church,' such as that of ver. 5. If so, the next verse may similarly be a greeting to a similar district 'church,' meeting under another roof. At the close of this long roll of names we cannot but remark on it as a noble and beautiful illustration of the 'family affection of Christianity.' It is often observed that a peculiar charm attaches to successions of names, 'Lancelot, or Pelleas, or Pellenore;' and such a rhythmical charm is not absent here. But far above it is the charm of the pure, intense, spiritual intimacy of hearts, an intimacy created by the possession of 'one Lord, one hope,' and which, with the advent of the gospel, touched the weary world as a new and unknown visitor from heaven"—C. B.

16. Salute one another with an holy kiss—"termed by S. Peter, 'the kiss of love' (1 Pet. 5. 14). So the ancient Christians concluded all their solemn offices; the men saluting the men, and the women the women. And this apostolical custom seems to have continued for some ages in all Christian churches"—WESLEY.

"As a mark of brotherly feeling among themselves, S. Paul desires those who are assembled at the reading of his Epistle to greet each other in a Christian way. It is to be their own act, and not a salutation coming from him"—ELLICOTT. "Salute, with an holy kiss. We may be assured that in the apostolic churches all was done with order and dignity. This is what is expressed by the epithet 'holy,' which recurs in 1 Cor. 16. 20; 2 Cor. 13. 12; and 1 Thess. 5. 26. Probably the president of the assembly gave the kiss to the brother who sat next him, and he to his neighbour, while the same thing took place on the part of the women"—GODET.

17. Mark them who cause divisions—"such there were, therefore, at Rome also. Avoid them—avoid all unnecessary intercourse with them"—WESLEY.

"It is probable he means either those Jews who pleaded the necessity of circumcision and observation of the Mosaic rites, as necessary to the salvation of the Gentiles, or the Gnostics, to whom the following characters do well agree. Whoever they were, they were dangerous seducers, and to be avoided" — BURKITT. Bishop LIGHTFOOT, in his Note on Phil. 3. 18, gives good reason to think that the teachers specially in view here are not Judaisers, but their antipodes — Antinomians. "They (the persons in this passage) are described as . . . holding plausible language (ver. 18), as professing to be wise beyond others (ver. 19), and yet not innocent in their wisdom. They appear therefore to belong to the same party to which the passage in ch. 6. 1–23; 14. 1; 15. 6, of that Epistle (to the Romans) are chiefly addressed."

18. By good words — "concerning themselves, making great promises. And fair speeches—concerning you, praising and flattering you. The harmless—who, doing no ill themselves, are not upon their guard against them that do"—WESLEY.

These words condemn all selfish indulgence. Meyer remarks that S. Paul did not write thus severely till after long and full experience. It equally condemns all false professions. The man who seeks to enter the Church of Christ from no higher motive than worldly gain is utterly unworthy to be there. He would serve himself, not our Lord Jesus Christ, and his rewards can only be those of unrighteousness.

19. But I would have you — "not only obedient, but discreet also. Wise with regard to that which is good—as knowing in this as possible. And simple with regard to that which is evil—as ignorant of this as possible" —WESLEY.

"This verse may be paraphrased, These sectaries deceive the simple. I do not say they deceive you; for your heartfelt acceptance of the truth is known everywhere, and I rejoice to think of you in this light, whatever I may have to mourn over in others. But a caution, even for you, may be in season; do not be led astray by tempting baits of fancied wisdom. Be deep in the wisdom of humble faith; be content to be untainted by acquaintance with a wisdom which at its root is evil"—C. B.

20. And the God of peace—"the author and lover of it, giving a blessing to your discretion—shall bruise Satan under your feet —shall defeat all the artifices of that sower of tares, and unite you more and more together in love"—WESLEY.

"The God of peace. We can well understand how the apostle, in the midst of 'fightings without and fears within,' should look forward with joyous confidence to the time when, both for him and his readers, all this turmoil and conflict would give way to 'peace.' The reference seems to be to his near expectation of the Messiah's return, and with it the final victory of the faith"—ELLICOTT. "The God of peace (ch. 15. 33). From the authors of discord S. Paul turns to the author of peace. Satan—the real and superhuman author of all confusion, in contrast to the God of peace. Only here in this Epistle. Will crush Satan. etc.—recalls the first promise (Gen. 3. 15), which is in part fulfilled in each victory over evil. Under your feet—our feet will crush Satan, but only as God makes them strong to do so. Quickly—as soon as the enemy comes. The grace, etc. May you live in the favour of our Master, Jesus Christ!"—BEET.

21. Timotheus, my fellow-labourer—"here he is named even before S. Paul's kinsmen. But as he had never been at Rome he is not named of in the beginning of the Epistle"—WESLEY.

(See Acts 16. 3; 17. 14 f.; 18. 5.) When S. Paul started from Corinth for Jerusalem (Acts 20. 4), Timothy was with him. Lucius, same name in Acts 13. 1. Jason, same name in Acts 17. 5. Sosipater may be the same as Sopater (Acts 20. 4). Timothy's name appears in eleven epistles—Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Timothy, Philemon, and Hebrews.

22. I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you. "Tertius, who wrote what the apostle dictated, inserted this, either by S. Paul's exhortation or ready permission. Caius —the Corinthian (1 Cor. 1. 14)—my host, and of the whole church—who probably met for some time in his house"—WESLEY.

"Tertius—the apostle's amanuensis. It was the custom of S. Paul to add a few words of parting benedictory encouragement or admonition in his own handwriting, partly as a mark of his own personal interest in his readers and partly as a precaution against forgery. (See especially Gal. 6. 2 and 2 Thess. 3. 17)"—ELLICOTT. "Tertius, who had hitherto written from S. Paul's dictation and in his name, is now permitted to send a greeting in his own name. To have sent his greeting in the third person, would have been to treat him as a mere machine"—GODET. We have therefore in this little detail an instance of S. Paul's characteristic courtesy, and at the same time a strong proof of the genuineness of the passage; for what forger would have thought of introducing such an incident?

23. The chamberlain of the city—"of Corinth"—WESLEY.

The officer here mentioned had charge of the revenues of the city.

25. Now to Him who is able. "The last words of the Epistle exactly answer the first (ch. 1. 1-5); in particular, concerning the power of God, the gospel, Jesus Christ, the Scriptures, the obedience of faith, all nations. To establish you—both Jews and Gentiles. According to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ—that is, according to the tenor of the gospel of Jesus Christ, which I preach. According to the revelation of the mystery—of the calling of the Gentiles, which, as plainly as it was foretold in the prophets, was still hid from many even of the believing Jews"—WESLEY.

The power of God is needed to stablish—i.e. to strengthen and confirm the Christian character, as surely as it is to save from sin. "Christ the power of God in man" is to sanctify the nature, and so to make the life accord with the profession. To "stand fast" to the principles of the gospel, and to "let patience have her perfect work," is as much an evidence of the work of grace in man as the joy of salvation, and man may be so stablished by devotion to those duties which the gospel enjoins. And the preaching of Jesus Christ—and in accordance with that preaching, the subject-matter of which is Christ. The establishment of the Roman Christians was to take place through those appointed ways and means that are laid down in the gospel, and form the main topic of Christian preaching. All means of grace centre in Christ, and it is only in accordance with the due proclamation of Him that the Christian can hope to become confirmed and strengthened.

26 According to the commandment—"the foundation of the apostolical office—of the eternal God—a more proper epithet could not be. A new dispensation infers no change in God. Known unto Him are all His works, and every variation of them, from eternity. Made known to all nations—not barely that they might know, but enjoy it also, through obeying the faith"—WESLEY.

Unto obedience of faith (R.V.). "There is a grievous error in inquiring whether we have faith, instead of seeking 'the obedience of faith.' It is childish folly to be inquiring whether we have faith, when we should be exclusively directing our attention to the object of the promise, and going forwards at the voice of invitation"—CHALMERS. "So far from its being true that we have to trust only, to leave all in the hands of Jesus, having committed ourselves to Him, having put our faith in Him, we should now care more for His commandments than ever; we should feel more responsible than ever; we should feel that our obligations are heavier; and that, more than ever, we should be giving ourselves to the great work involved in the duties of the Christian life"—DAVID THOMAS. "The everlasting God. The gospel is now revealed and proclaimed according to the will of God, who appoints and adjusts all the developments of His providence, alike past, present, and to come. He who rules all duration knows when to keep silence and when to break it"—C. B.

27. To the only wise God—"whose manifold wisdom is known in the Church through the gospel. (Eph. 3. 10.) 'To Him who is able' and 'to the wise God' are joined, as in 1 Cor. 1. 24, where Christ is styled 'the wisdom of God' and 'the power of God.' To Him be glory, through Christ Jesus for ever. And let every believer say Amen!"—WESLEY.

The construction of this doxology is remarkable, not only in itself, but in the fact that it was evidently left unaltered by S. Paul and his friends. No various reading of the least importance occurs throughout it. For ever, Amen. Justly does the great Epistle end with the highest of all thoughts—the GLORY OF GOD everlastingly manifested and confessed. Amen, so be it.

"Thus this glorious Epistle leaves us gazing into the endless succession of ages, whose moments are ages, and listening to the song which throughout each successive age will rise with louder and with sweeter note to Him who, before the ages were, formed for us, whom He foresaw in sin and ruin, His wondrous and costly purpose of salvation and life; who throughout the successive ages of the earlier dispensation carried His purpose towards and to its historic completion in Jesus of Nazareth; and who now day by day carries forward the same purpose by His Spirit in the hearts of us His children, until that day when we and Paul, and the whole family of earth and heaven, shall join in that anthem of praise whose notes from afar, as the weary pen of the apostle falls from his hand, are already ringing in his ears"—BEET.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

"CORINTH was a city of Achaia, situate on the isthmus which joins Peloponnesus, now called the Morea, to the rest of Greece. Being so advantageously situated for trade, the inhabitants of it abounded in riches, which, by too natural a consequence, led them into luxury, lewdness, and all manner of vice.

"Yet even here S. Paul planted a numerous church, chiefly of heathen converts, to whom, about three years after he had left Corinth, he wrote this Epistle from Ephesus, as well to correct various disorders of which they were guilty, as to answer some questions which they had proposed to him.

"THE EPISTLE CONSISTS OF—

CHAPTER I.

SECTION I.—Vers. 1–9. THE ADDRESS.—1. Paul, called to be an apostle. "There is great propriety in every clause of the salutation, particularly in this, as there were some in the church of Corinth who called the authority of his mission in question. Through the will of God—called 'the commandment of God' (1 Tim. 1. 1). This was to the churches the ground of his authority; to S. Paul himself, of an humble and ready mind. By the mention of God, the authority of man is excluded (Gal. 1. 1); by the mention of the will of God, the merit of S. Paul (ch. 15. 8, etc.). And Sosthenes—a Corinthian, S. Paul's companion in travel. It was both humility and prudence in the apostle thus to join his name with his own, in an Epistle wherein he was to reprove so many irregularities. Sosthenes the brother—probably this word is emphatical; as if he had said, who, from a Jewish opposer of the gospel, became a faithful brother"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul belonged to Jesus of Nazareth, the Anointed One, as one sent by Him on a special mission to men, and thus placed by Him in the first rank in His Church. (Acts 26. 17; ch. 12. 28.) Through the will of God. (2 Cor. 1. 1; Eph. 1. 1; 2 Tim. 1. 1; more fully, 1 Tim. 1. 1.) As usual, S. Paul rises from the Son to the Father, whose will is the source of whatever Christ has done, and therefore of S. Paul's apostleship. (Comp. Gal. 1. 4.) In this letter S. Paul will be compelled to use his apostolic authority. He therefore begins by reminding his readers that he received this authority by an express summons, and by the will of God"—BEET. Through the will of God. "This was, to the churches, the ground of his authority; to S. Paul himself, of a humble and ready mind. By the mention of God, the authority of man is excluded (Gal. 1. 1), by the mention of the will of God, the merit of Paul (ch. 15. 8, etc.)"—BENSON. "This extraordinary humility and equally remarkable boldness and authority had one common root in his perception, that it was through Christ's call and by God's will he was an apostle. The work of going to all the busiest parts of the world and proclaiming Christ was to his mind far too great a work for him to aspire to at his own instance. But God called him to it; and, with this authority at his back, he feared nothing, neither hardship nor defeat. And this is for us all the true and eternal source of humility and confidence. It is altogether a new strength with which a man is inspired when he is made conscious that God calls him to do this or that; when behind conscience or the plain requirements of human affairs and circumstances the presence of the living God makes itself felt"—DODS.

2. To the church of God which is in Corinth. S. Paul, writing in a familiar manner to the Corinthians, as also to the Thessalonians and Galatians, uses this plain appellation. To the other churches he uses more solemn address. Sanctified through Jesus Christ—and so undoubtedly they were in general, notwithstanding some exceptions. Called—of Jesus Christ. (Rom. 1. 6.) And—as the fruit of that calling made holy. With all that in every place. Nothing could better suit that Catholic love which S. Paul labours to promote in this Epistle than such a declaration of his good wishes for every true Christian upon earth. Call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. This plainly implies that all Christians pray to Christ, as well as to the Father through Him"—WESLEY.

S. Chrysostom says these opening words are a protest against the party-spirit prevailing at Corinth. "The Church of God—not of this or that man." "Sanctified in Christ Jesus. This is not another class of persons, but a description of those who compose 'the Church,'—who are further described as 'called to be saints'—i.e. 'holy.' The term saints is never used by S. Paul with its restricted modern meaning, but it is applied to the whole Church. The English word which most nearly expresses the apostolic idea is 'Christians'—used in its most comprehensive sense'—ELLICOTT. "Called to be saints. We are apt to form mistaken notions of God's saints. To think of them as if they were beings of a different order from ourselves, raised above the level of human infirmity. And from this mistaken notion flows great practical mischief. We imagine that no man is a saint who is mixed up in the daily intercourse of society. Why not? What one sound reason can be assigned why there should not be now men as zealous, as devoted, as simple-minded as the apostles and saints of the primitive Church"—GOULBURN.

4. Always—"whenever I mention you to God in prayer"—WESLEY.

The grace of God which is given you by Jesus Christ. Rather, perhaps, the "favour" of God which is given you "in" Jesus Christ. "We are to conceive of Jesus Christ as filled with grace and as pouring it out upon the human race"—OLSHAUSEN.

5. In all utterance and knowledge—"of Divine things. These gifts the Corinthians particularly admired. Therefore this congratulation naturally tended to soften their spirits, and make way for the reproof which follows"—WESLEY.

"A mind divinely illuminated and, like Apollos, mighty in the Scriptures, pours forth the effusions of the heart as a copious fountain to water the Church of God. A people so taught by an associated ministry, 'come behind in no gift,' being glorious within and beautiful without, waiting for the Bridegroom's return"—SUTCLIFFE. "Only from the state of grace could the abundance of gifts arise which distinguishes the church of Corinth, and which more especially gives occasion to the apostle's gratitude. The in everything is qualified by the two following terms—knowledge and utterance. The sequel of the Epistle leaves no doubt as to the meaning of these two terms. Chaps. 12–14 will show what a wealth of gifts, both of Christian knowledge and of manifestations in utterance (tongues, prophecies, doctrines) had been bestowed upon the Church"—GODET. "See here what is the Christian's riches. So David reckons his wealth. (Ps. 119. 32.) He cannot be poor in whom the word of God dwells richly (Col. 3. 16)"—TRAPP.

6. The testimony of Christ—"the gospel —was confirmed among you—by these gifts attending it. They knew they had received these by the hand of S. Paul; and this consideration was highly proper, to revive in them their former reverence and affection for their spiritual father"—WESLEY.

"The testimony of Christ was S. Paul's preaching concerning Christ. It was 'confirmed' by the outpouring of His Spirit. Even the testimony of Christ. The gospel, which testifies of Christ, and declares the will of God concerning the way of saving sinners (Matt. 24. 14) was confirmed in, or among you—i.e. was plainly proved to be from God (Rev. 19. 10), by these gifts bestowed upon you"—BENSON. All utterance—"ability to speak forth the truth in 'all' the modes needful to convey it to the various sorts of men. All knowledge. Mental comprehension of the truth in 'all' its aspects. These gifts seldom go together in one man. But he who possesses either of them is an enrichment to his church. And the church which possesses, in its various members, these gifts in a special degree is truly rich. 'Utterance' is put first as the more conspicuous"—BEET.

7. Waiting — "with earnest desire. For the glorious revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ—a sure mark of a true or false Christian, to long for, or dread, this revelation"—WESLEY.

"So that ye come behind in no gift. The hallowed end of all eloquence and tongues—of all divine endowments shed down on this church, and enumerated in the twelfth chapter—was to nourish their souls in faith and holiness, and confirm them in all their joyful expectations of the coming of the Lord, that in the day of His glory they might appear blameless in His presence"—SUTCLIFFE. "Waiting for. (Rom. 8. 19, 23, 25.) They already possessed spiritual gifts which were a proof of God's favour, while at the same time they were eagerly looking forward to that day when Jesus will visibly appear to bring in the final glory. These added words remind us that the Christian life is essentially a looking forward to future glory. All present enrichment is but an earnest of the better things which Christ, at His coming, will bring"—BEET.

8. Who will also—"if you faithfully apply to Him—confirm you to the end. In the day of Christ. Now it is our day, wherein we are to work out our salvation; then it will be eminently the day of Christ, and of His glory in the saints"—WESLEY.

"Since God confirmed S. Paul's preaching at Corinth by the gifts which His Spirit produced there, He will certainly confirm believers in their faith in the gospel to the end. This end is the Lord's coming again, for which the Church should constantly watch, for the very reason that it knows not the time of it. (Comp. Luke 12. 35-36; Matt. 13. 32.) If this event does not happen during the life of this or that generation, death takes its place for each, till that generation for which it will be realised externally"—GODET.

9. God is faithful—"to all His promises; and therefore 'to him that hath shall be given.' By whom ye are called—a pledge of His willingness to save you unto the uttermost"—WESLEY.

"Were the establishing on the part of Christ not to take place, God's calling unto fellowship with His Son would remain without effect, which would not be compatible with the faithfulness of Him from whom the call comes"—MEYER. "God is faithful. It will not be God's fault, but our own, if the promises of the last verse are not realised. The fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ. The important word here rendered 'fellowship' has unfortunately different renderings in our version. Sometimes, as in ch. 10. 16, it is rendered 'communion'; and in 2 Cor. 6. 14, where it is thus rendered, another word is rendered 'fellowship.' In 2 Cor. 9. 13 it is rendered 'distribution.' Its usual signification would appear to be the 'sharing together, joint participation' as common possessors of anything. Here it refers to the life which, by means of faith, is common to the believer and his Lord. (Comp. Gal. 2. 20.)"—C. B.

SECTION II.—Vers. 1-10. (Ch. 4. 21.) THE PARTIES IN THE CHURCH OF CORINTH.—10. Now I exhort you. "Ye have faith and hope; secure love also. By the endearing name of our Lord Jesus Christ—infinitely preferable to all the human names in which ye glory. That ye all speak the same thing—they now spoke different things (ver. 12). And that there be no schisms among you—no alienation of affection from each other. Is this word ever taken in any other sense in Scripture? But that ye be joined in the same mind—affections, desires. And judgment—touching all the grand truths of the gospel"—WESLEY.

"Brothers—exact term used for sons of one human father. S. Paul supports his earnest and affectionate appeal (Rom. 15. 30; 16. 17) by mentioning that one great Name (ver. 2; comp. Rom. 1. 5) which awakens in all Christians the deepest emotions of love and gratitude, which all Christians profess and seek to exalt among men, and which should be a bond of union to the universal Church. Divisions — separations arising naturally from expressed difference of opinion. Fully equipped—quite ready for use or service; akin to 'thoroughly-furnished' (2 Tim. 3. 17)"—BEET. "These words are a pathetical exhortation to a most important duty. In which note the duty itself, directed and exhorted to, and that is, unity and unanimity amongst Christians. This is threefold, the unity of the head, of the heart, and of the tongue, i.e. unity in judgment and opinion, unity in love and affection, and in language and expression, when all speak the same things, and with one mouth, as well as with one mind, glorify God. S. Paul intimates that this unity in judgment and affection is the first and last thing to be respected among Christians, as being both the beginning and perfection of Christianity"—BURKITT.

11. It hath been declared to me by them of the family of Chloe—"whom some suppose to have been the wife of Stephanas, and the mother of Fortunatus and Achaicus. By these three the Corinthians had sent their letter to S. Paul. (Ch. 16. 17.) That there are contentions—a word equivalent with schisms in the preceding verse"—WESLEY.

Chloe was evidently a woman well known in Corinth, and probably was resident there, although EVANS says, "It is more in harmony with S. Paul's discretion to suppose that she was an Ephesian known to the Corinthians, whose people had been in Corinth and returned to Ephesus." Contentions (R. V. "Divisions"). Those things which destroy the unity of which he has spoken, and which have so often blighted the fairest prospects of the Church of Christ.

12. Now this I say—"that is, what I mean is this: there are various parties among you, who set themselves, one against another, in behalf of the several teachers they admire. And I of Christ. They spoke well, if they had not on this pretence despised their teachers. (Ch. 4. 8.) Perhaps they valued themselves on having heard Christ preach in His own person"—WESLEY.

"From this verse we learn that at Corinth there were four parties, calling themselves by these four names; and that to one or other of these parties all the church members belonged. That S. Paul puts all the parties side by side proves that all were to blame, even the last. That Paul is mentioned first, then Apollos, suggests perhaps that the parties arose in the order here given. That Cephas was a party name is no proof that S. Peter, any more than Christ, had actually preached at Corinth. The Aramaic name suggests that the party was founded by Jews who appealed to the authority of S. Peter. Possibly something S. Peter had said or done (comp. Gal. 2. 11) may have been misconstrued for their own purposes by unscrupulous partisans. One party had dared to inscribe on its banner, in token doubtless of assumed superiority, the name of Christ"—BEET.

13. Is Christ divided—"are not all the members still under one Head? Was not He alone crucified for you all; and were ye not all baptized in His name? The glory of Christ then is not to be divided between Him and His servants; neither is the unity of the body to be torn asunder, seeing Christ is one still"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul would ask if Christ, into whose Name the whole Church has been baptized, and whose Body (Eph. 1. 23) the whole Church is, can thus be split up into portions, and each portion appropriated by one of the parties mentioned. Were ye baptized in the name of Paul? He is reminding them that the 'Name' of Christ, standing as it does for Himself, is the only way of salvation, that Christ is the only Head of the Church, and he disclaims any attempt to claim for himself that close connection with the inner life of all who profess belief in Christ, which is the prerogative of Christ alone. (Matt. 28. 19; Acts 3. 16; 4. 12)"—LIAS. Were ye baptized in the name of Paul? "Here the question implies that he considered the form of baptism as so sacred that the introducing the name of a teacher into it was the same thing as introducing a new master into the kingdom of Christ"—WATSON. "It is with something akin to horror that S. Paul goes on to ask, 'Was Paul crucified for you?' He implies that only on the death of Christ can the Church be founded. If those who prided themselves on being followers of S. Paul were in danger of exalting him into the place of Christ, they were forfeiting their salvation, and had no right to be in the Church at all. Take away the death of Christ, and the personal connection of the believer with the crucified Redeemer, and you take away the Church"—DODS.

14. I thank God—"(a pious phrase for the common one 'I rejoice')—that, in the course of His providence, I baptized none of you, but Crispus, once the ruler of the synagogue, and Caius"—WESLEY.

Crispus (Acts 18. 8) and Caius, with whom he had lodged (Rom. 16. 23). He baptized the jailor's household, and Lydia's also, at Philippi, though he had baptized only two or three at Corinth. SUTCLIFFE says: "The Jews baptized all proselytes by households, as stated in Matt. 3. His 'thanking God' on this occasion conveys by implication a reproach on those who made partisans of the families they had baptized. Christ sent him not to baptize but to preach the gospel, which surpasses all other ordinances."

15. Lest any should say that I had baptized in my own name—"in order to attach them to myself"—WESLEY.

"It is possible that S. Paul had noticed at Corinth a tendency to hero-worship, and to guard against it had been specially careful to keep himself in the background"—BEET.

16. I know not—"that is, it does not at present occur to my memory—that I baptized any other"—WESLEY.

"How the precise mention of these three names brings out the conscientiousness of S. Paul! Another exception to S. Paul's custom. House (Matt. 10. 13; 12. 25)—the household, including wife, children, and servants. The family of Stephanas, as of Crispus (Acts 18. 8), joined its head in accepting the gospel (ch. 16. 15). Perhaps even before S. Paul came they were like Cornelius (Acts 10. 2), who feared God with all his house"—BEET.

17. For God did not send me to baptize. "That was not my chief errand; those of inferior rank and abilities could do it: though all the apostles were sent to baptize also. (Matt. 28. 19.) But to preach the gospel. So the apostle slides into his general proposition: but not with wisdom of speech—with the artificial ornaments of discourse, invented by human wisdom. Lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect. The whole effect of S. Paul's preaching was owing to the power of God accompanying the plain declaration of that great truth, 'Christ bore our sins upon the cross.' But this effect might have been imputed to another cause, had he come with that 'wisdom of speech' which they admired"—WESLEY.

"Preaching was eminently the work of the apostles. The deacons used to baptize. (Acts 10. 48.) The mention of 'the preaching of the glad tidings' affords an opportunity for the apostle stating in vindication of himself why that, and not philosophy, was the subject of his preaching, 'lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect.' Such, and not inability or ignorance, was the grand cause of his simplicity"—ELLICOTT. "Even the less learned can baptize perfectly, but perfectly to preach the gospel is a far more difficult task, and requires qualifications which are far more rare"—AUGUSTINE. "What is to be noted here is that for doing the work proper to the gospel, for making men Christians, it is not theory or explanation, but fact, that is effective. It is the presentation of Christ as He is presented in the written Gospels, the narrative of His life and death, which stands in the first rank of efficiency as a means of evangelising the world. It is the direct vision of the cross, and not anything which is said about it, which is most effective in producing penitence and faith. And it is the business of the preacher to set Christ and Him crucified clear before the eyes of men. Make men see Christ, set the Crucified clear before them, and you need not tell them to repent and believe; if that sight does not make them repent, no telling of yours will make them"—DODS.

18. To them that perish. "By obstinately rejecting the only name whereby they can be saved. But to us who are saved—now 'saved from our sins, and in the way to everlasting salvation, it is the great instrument of the power of God "—WESLEY.

For the word of the cross is to them that are perishing foolishness; but unto us which are being saved it is the power of God (R.V.). "The connection of this verse with the preceding is not quite clear. It may, however, be thus explained: The doctrine of the cross is folly to those who are perishing, because they conceive of some inherent excellence in humanity, whereas the cross proclaims and justifies God's sentence of death against the human race. The same doctrine is the power of God to those who are in the way of salvation, because it is through faith in Christ's blood alone that man can be justified from sin, crucified to the old man, and united to the new man which is created in righteousness and true holiness. To preach the gospel, then, with wisdom of words—to exalt, that is, the human element—is to take away the power of the gospel, and to make it in reality the folly which it is deemed to be by unspiritual men. (Comp. Rom. 1. 16; 3. 22; Eph. 4. 22, 23; Col. 3. 9, 10)"—LIAS. "We are taught, 'as sin is a fact, salvation must be laid hold of above all as a fact, not as a system. It is an act wrought by the arm of God, telling with power on the conscience and on the heart of the sinner: this alone can rescue from ruin a world which is perishing under the curse and in the corruption of sin'"—GODET.

19. For it is written—"and the words are remarkably applicable to this great event"—WESLEY.

"See Isa. 29. 14, which refers probably to the invasion of Sennacherib (Isa. 36. 1). Isaiah had said, when Sennacherib was threatening Judah, that the deliverance granted by Jehovah to His people would be His work, not that of politicians who directed the affairs of the kingdom. On the same principle, says the apostle, God now proceeds in saving the world. He snatches it from perdition by an act of His own love, and without deigning in the least to conjoin with Him human wisdom, which on the contrary He sweeps away as folly"—GODET.

20. Where is the wise? etc. "The deliverance of Judea from Sennacherib is what Isaiah refers to in these words, in a bold and beautiful allusion to which the apostle, in the clause that follows, triumphs over all the opposition of human wisdom to the victorious gospel of Christ. What could the 'wise' men of the Gentiles do against this? or the Jewish scribes? or the disputers of this world?—those among both, who, proud of their acuteness, were fond of controversy, and thought they could confute all opponents. Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world—that is, shown it to be very foolishness"—WESLEY.

"These are 'triumphant questions' (comp. 15. 55; Rom. 3. 27) suggested in form perhaps by Isa. 19. 12; 33. 18, but prompted by the complete failure of human wisdom to bring salvation. Scribe—lit. 'man of letters,' 'Scripture man'—a class of Jews devoted to the study of the Scriptures. (2 Sam. 8. 17; 2 Chron. 34. 13; Ezra 7. 6, 11; Matt. 7. 29; 17. 10)"—BEET. "The wise generally, the Jewish scribe, the Greek disputer"—ALFORD. "The words, of this world, apply not to the disputer alone, but to all three"—DE WETTE. "But it is asked, why God chose to treat human wisdom so rudely. Did He wish to extinguish the torch of reason which He had Himself lighted? Ver. 21 answers this question: it explains the ground of the judgment which God visits on human reason, by the irrational nature of the gospel—to wit, that, in the period anterior to the coming of Christ, reason had been unfaithful to its mission"—GODET. "Of this world. These words qualify all three mentioned, and not exclusively the disputer. 'World' (more literally, age) does not here mean the physical world, but, in an ethical sense, 'this age,' in contrast to that which is 'to come' (Matt. 12. 32; Mark 10. 30). It is employed afterwards (last word of ver. 20 and in ver. 21) to designate all who are outside the Christian communion, as in the next verse it is contrasted with 'them that believe'"—ELLICOTT.

21. For since in the wisdom of God—"according to His wise disposals, leaving them to make the trial—the world—whether Jewish or Gentile—by all its boasted wisdom knew not God—though the whole creation declared its Creator, and though He declared Himself by all the prophets—it pleased God, by a way which those who perish count mere foolishness, to save them that believe"—WESLEY.

"Even the wisest of the Greeks had attained only to inadequate and indefinite views of God. To pass even from Plato to the Gospel of S. John is really to pass from darkness to light. Plato philosophises, and a few souls seem for a moment to see things more clearly; S. Peter preaches, and three thousand souls spring to life. The world by wisdom knew not God. No safer assertion regarding the ancient world can be made. That which, in point of fact, has made God known is the cross of Christ. All the power that dwells in God to draw men out of sin to holiness and to Himself, was actually in the cross. To them that believe in the God there revealed, the cross is the power of God"—DODS. "The apostle says, 'Because men made so ill a use of their power of discovering truth, that they attained only to an apparent wisdom, God, as it were in punishment, has published salvation by means of the foolish preaching of the cross, which they have no power to understand, being blinded by their own false wisdom.' It is true, the preaching of the cross has also its inward and needful foundation, but S. Paul has here no occasion to discourse upon it; he merely brings forward the side which appears to him calculated to show the vanity of confiding in human wisdom"—OLSHAUSEN.

22. "For whereas the Jews demand of the apostles, as they did of their Lord, more signs still, after all they have seen already; and the Greeks, or Gentiles, seek wisdom—the depths of philosophy, and the charms of eloquence"—WESLEY.

"The Jews (Matt. 12. 38; 16. 1; Mark 8. 11; Luke 11. 16; John 2. 18; 6. 30) required external attestations of the power of Christ, and especially that of the subjugation of the world to His kingly authority. The Greeks sought dialectic skill from one who aspired to be their teacher"—LIAS. "Jews and Gentiles conspire together in their contempt and rejection of the gospel. The Jews require a sign—i.e. besides all the miracles and the resurrection of Christ. And the Greeks seek after wisdom—they look for profound, eminent learning, and deep philosophy in the gospel, and not finding what they expected they scorn it"—BURKITT.

23. "We go on to preach, in a plain and historical, not rhetorical or philosophical, manner, Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling-block—just opposite to the "signs" they demand—and to the Greeks foolishness—a silly tale, just opposite to the wisdom they seek"—WESLEY.

Christ crucified was always the chief subject of apostolic preaching. The multitudes on the day of Pentecost, and the solitary Saul of Tarsus, were alike awakened and converted by this great truth. It was a doctrine the very reverse of what Jews and Greeks demanded. They expected a triumphant king, instead of which the apostles preached salvation through Him who had been "crucified, dead, and buried." No wonder the truth was an offence and foolishness. And yet "in none other is there salvation" (Acts 4. 12). Men must always be pointed to the cross when they seek a demonstration of the power of God in Christ, and when they see there the overpowering love of God, it is no longer a stumbling-block, but the means of salvation from sin.

24. But to them that are called—"and obey the heavenly calling—Christ—with His cross, His death, His life, His kingdom. And they experience, first, that He is the power, then that He is the wisdom of God"—WESLEY.

"The called ones—they in whom the proclamation rejected by others has proved itself to be a summons from God"—BEET. "While all men have been called, they who were minded to obey received the name of 'called ones.' Called—S. Paul always speaks of all Christians as 'the called,' not using that word in the narrower sense to which some modern religious sects have restricted it"—ELLICOTT. "Christ the power of God—opposite to the power of miracles required by the Jews—and the wisdom of God—opposite to the Grecians' worldly wisdom"—TRAPP.

25. Because the foolishness of God—"the gospel scheme, which the world judge to be mere foolishness—is wiser than the wisdom of men; and, weak as they account it, stronger than all the strength of men"—WESLEY.

"What was folly in the eyes of the Greek, or weakness in the eyes of the Jew, was yet far wiser and stronger than their highest conception. The revelation of God in the Man Christ Jesus—the foolishness of God, the Infinite allying itself to the finite—was the perfection of the Divine wisdom; the crucifixion of sin in the death of Christ—the weakness of God—God suffering, dying—was the highest manifestation of Divine power, in that it destroyed what nothing else could destroy. For whosoever unites himself to Christ by faith in His blood acquires the faculty of putting sin to a lingering death"—LIAS. "Because—this introduces the reason why Christ, as being crucified, is the power and wisdom of God, viz. because God's folly (as they call it) is wiser, not than the wisdom of men, as some understand the passage, but than men themselves—embracing in the word all that men can know or hope ever to know; and the weakness of God (as they regard it) is stronger than men"—ELLICOTT.

26. Behold your calling—"what manner of men they are whom God calls. That not many wise men after the flesh—in the account of the world. Not many mighty—men of power and authority"—WESLEY.

"The ancient Christians were, for the greater part, slaves and persons of humble rank; the whole history of the progress of the Church is in fact a gradual triumph of the unlearned over the learned, of the lowly over the great, until the emperor himself cast his crown at the foot of Christ's cross"—OLSHAUSEN. "Christianity with the irresistible might of its weakness shook the world."

27, 28. Things that are not. "The Jews frequently called the Gentiles, 'Them that are not' (2 Esdras 6. 56, 57), in so supreme contempt did they hold them. The things that are—in high esteem"—WESLEY.

"And things which are not, i.e. 'things which by comparison are non-existent'—things which, by the side of other things of higher importance in our human eyes, appear to us as nothing. Yet these, in the counsels of God, are to change places, and more than change places, with things that are highly regarded in the sight of men"—LIAS. "By choosing as His instruments things reckoned to be nothing, and passing by things reckoned to be much, God made the latter to be practically nothing"—BEET.

29. That no flesh—"a fit appellation. Flesh is fair, but withering as grass—may glory before God. In God we ought to glory"—WESLEY.

"All ground of boasting is removed from those who are within the Christian Church. It is not their wisdom or strength, but God's work, which has given them superiority to the wise and noble of the world. No flesh can glory in God's presence. The wise and mighty of the earth cannot glory, for their wisdom and might availed nothing to bring them to God; those who are in Christ Jesus can as little glory, for it is not on account of any wisdom or might of theirs, but because of God's call and energy, they are what they are. God called them and gave them a new and hopeful life in Christ Jesus"—DODS.

30. Of Him—"out of His free grace and mercy—are ye—engrafted into Christ Jesus, who is made unto us that believe wisdom, who were before utterly foolish and ignorant. Righteousness—the sole ground of our justification, who were before under the wrath and curse of God. Sanctification—a principle of universal holiness, whereas before we were altogether dead in sin. And redemption—that is, complete deliverance from all evil and eternal bliss both of soul and body"—WESLEY.

"Who of God is made unto us wisdom (R.V.). Ye are not, says he, in this or the other school of vain philosophy; ye have left the wise men after the flesh; but of God—that is of His mercy and power—ye are in Christ Jesus—in the fellowship of His disciples and family—who of God is made unto us wisdom—and truly so; as well as righteousness, sanctification, and redemption"—WATSON. "God's law we may have found it possible to resist; its threatenings we may have been able to put out of our mind. The natural helps to goodness which God has given us in the family, in the world around us, in the fortunes of life, we may have found too feeble to lift us above temptation and bring us into a really high and pure life. But in the cross we experience what Divine power is; we know the irresistible appeal of Divine self-sacrifice, the regenerating pathos of the Divine desire to save us from sin and destruction. The cross is the actual point of contact between God and man. To receive the whole benefit and blessing that God can now give us we need only be in true contact with the cross; through it we become direct recipients of the holiness, the love, the power of God. In it Christ is made to us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption"—DODS. "This last word sums up the dominant idea of the whole passage from ver. 13, viz. Christ's unique place in relation to the Church. Let others be teachers, He alone is LORD; for He alone has paid the ransom. To Him alone be the praise"—GODET.

31. Let him glory in the Lord—"not in himself, not in the flesh, not in the world"—WESLEY.

The whole work of salvation is of God. The Corinthians, like many others since, were inclined to take some of the credit to themselves. The apostle reminds them to whom it is due. These words are a paraphrase of Jer. 9. 23, 24. Our only true boasting before God is that we are in Christ, that all we have we owe entirely to Him; we can only glory in, not ourselves or what we have or are, but in the fact that He is our Benefactor. Thus, in S. CHRYSOSTOM'S quaint words, S. Paul "always fasteneth them on with nails to the name of Christ." This concludes S. Paul's general explanation of God's method, and he then turns to his own conduct, to show how entirely it was in harmony with God's plan, which he has just explained and vindicated.

CHAPTER II.

1. "And I accordingly came to you, not with loftiness of speech or of wisdom—I did not affect either deep wisdom or eloquence—declaring the testimony of God—what God gave me to testify concerning His Son"—WESLEY.

The apostle now proceeds to justify his preaching, and to show how he had acted in accordance with those great principles which he has already explained as God's method. The testimony of God is S. Paul's testimony concerning God in Christ. (Ch. 1. 6; 2 Tim. 1. 8.)

2. I determined not to know anything—"to waive all my other knowledge, and not to preach anything, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified—that is, what He did, suffered, taught. A part is put for the whole"—WESLEY.

"No other system could tell guilty and wretched man that 'God so loved the world, as to give His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life.' Tell a sinful man that he is wrong—he knows it; but that alone breaks not, subdues not, the heart. But tell him that, although he is cast out, he is not forsaken; though he has forgotten God, God has never forgotten him; that He is waiting to forgive and to bless;—by this, how many hearts have been subdued! and by this the wide world shall be subdued also"—WATSON.

"These words must not be understood absolutely, but comparatively; not as if the apostle did absolutely despise or contemn all other study and knowledge, for all knowledge is useful to him that knows how to refer it to right ends, and God has made nothing in vain, but that all other knowledge, without the knowledge of Jesus Christ, is insignificant and ineffectual"—BURKITT.

3. And I was with you—"at my first entrance—in weakness—of body (2 Cor. 12. 7)—and in fear—lest I should offend any. And in much trembling—the emotion of my mind affecting my very body"—WESLEY.

"To show that the real force of his teaching lay in its subject-matter, and not in any power with which he may have proclaimed the gospel, the apostle now dwells upon his own physical weakness. The 'weakness and fear and trembling' of which S. Paul speaks here, had in it probably a large element of that self-distrust which so noble and sensitive a nature would feel in the fulfilment of such an exalted mission as the preaching of the cross. There is a reference also to what we may call a physical apprehension of danger. The bravest are not those who do not experience any sensation of fear, but rather those who keenly appreciate danger, who have an instinctive shrinking from it, and yet eventually, by their moral might, conquer this dread. There are traces of this element in S. Paul's character to be found in several places—as, for example, in Acts 18. 9, when the Lord encourages him when labouring at Corinth with the hopeful words, 'Be not afraid'; again in Acts 23. 11, when the terrible scene before Ananias had depressed him, the Lord is with him to strengthen him, 'Be of good cheer, Paul'; and in Acts 27. 24, when the angel of the Lord appears to him amid the storm and shipwreck, 'Fear not, Paul'"—ELLICOTT.

4. "And my speech in private, as well as my public preaching, was not with the persuasive words of human wisdom, such as the wise men of the world use; but with the demonstration of the Spirit and of power—with that powerful kind of demonstration, which flows from the Holy Spirit; which works on the conscience with the most convincing light, and the most persuasive evidence"—WESLEY.

The apostle returns from his person to his preaching. Of the words speech and preaching, MEYER says, "My discourses in general, and especially my preaching." NEANDER explains them as meaning, "My private conversations, and my public discourses." "In demonstration of the Spirit and of power—not persuasive arguments, but appeals to the conscience and to the influence of a higher power. It is doubtful whether we should translate 'the Spirit' here, as though the Holy Spirit were meant, and more than doubtful whether we should interpret 'power' of miracles as generally understood. The apostle is perhaps rather referring to that conviction of sin, righteousness, and judgment (John 16. 8), which the Spirit of God produces in the spirit of man, and of the power to produce a change of heart and life which is the leading characteristic of the gospel. This view seems confirmed by the next verse, in which S. Paul says that the ground of our faith is not the wisdom of men, but the power of God"—LIAS.

5. "That your faith might not be built on the wisdom or power of man, but on the wisdom and power of God"—WESLEY.

"The ground of our faith is not the wisdom of men, but the power of God. The preacher's task in this work lies, not in wishing to act in the place and stead of the Spirit, with the resources of his own eloquence and genius, but in opening up the way for Him by simple testimony rendered to Christ"—GODET.

6. Yet we speak wisdom—"yea, the truest and most excellent wisdom—among the perfect — adult, experienced Christians. By wisdom here he seems to mean, not the whole Christian doctrine, but the most sublime and abstruse parts of it. But not the wisdom admired and taught by the men of this world, nor of the rulers of this world, Jewish or heathen, that come to nought—both they and their wisdom, and the world itself"—WESLEY.

Howbeit we speak wisdom. "I there then no wisdom possible for a Christian? no sphere for the exercise of those faculties of the intellect which we received from God? the hearer may say. Certainly, says the apostle (for to say otherwise would be to contradict the Jewish Scriptures, especially Prov. 1. 9), but it must take as its starting-point the truths revealed by Christ, and it will be proportionate, not to the secular knowledge or intellectual power of the inquirer, but to his moral and spiritual attainments, that is, to his proficiency in the doctrine of Christ"—C. B. "Perfect—better, 'full-grown' or 'mature'—that which has reached its full development or goal: common in classic Greek for a full-grown man in contrast to a child. (Comp. ch. 3.1.) Same word in ch. 13. 10; 14. 20; Eph. 4. 13; Heb. 5. 14; Phil. 3. 15; Col. 1. 28; 4. 12; Rom. 12. 2. 'Full-grown' refers, not to knowledge merely, but to the entire Christian life"—BEET.

7. "But we speak the mysterious wisdom of God, which was hidden for many ages from all the world, and is still hidden even from 'babes in Christ'; much more from all unbelievers. Which God ordained before the world—so far is this from coming to nought, like worldly wisdom. For our glory—arising from the glory of our Lord, and then to be revealed when all worldly glory vanishes"—WESLEY.

"Was S. Paul disposed to concede that Christianity, in that simple and inartificial form in which he announced it, was either 'foolish' or contemptible? Just the contrary. He boldly asserted its claims to supremacy. Do the admirers of Gentile philosophy boast of wisdom? We speak wisdom. Do they boast of the secrets of their celebrated mysteries?—our religion is a mystery"—BEET. "The wisdom we speak is the wisdom of God, and the mystery was ordained before the world, formed in the depths of the Divine mind, before time began, and now revealed 'to the glory' of all true believers. Let this wisdom of God be the subject of your daily investigation"—WATSON. "A mystery. "The word 'mystery' has taken in theological language a meaning which it has not in the New Testament, to wit, a truth which human reason cannot fathom. In S. Paul's writings it simply signifies a truth or a fact which the human understanding cannot, of itself, discover, but which it apprehends as soon as God gives the revelation of it. (See Luke 8. 10; Rom. 16. 25; Eph. 3. 4)"—GODET.

8. Had they known it—"that wisdom—they would not have crucified—punished as a slave—the Lord of glory. The giving Christ this august title, peculiar to the great Jehovah, plainly shows Him to be the supreme God. In like manner the Father is styled, 'the Father of glory' (Eph. 1. 17); and the Holy Ghost 'the Spirit of glory' (1 Pet. 4. 14). The application of this title to all the three shows that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are 'the God of glory,' as the only true God is called (Ps. 29. 3; Acts 7. 2)"—WESLEY.

Which none of the princes of this world knew. "These words seem to be written for the instruction of the class of persons who attach importance to the opinions of those high in position and influence—the princes, or rather rulers of this world, its statesmen. Such persons, the apostle points out, are apt, in spite of, or rather in consequence of, their worldly wisdom, to make strange mistakes. The crucifixion of Christ was a memorable instance of the shortsightedness of worldly policy. Not a single calculation of those who compassed the Saviour's death was destined to be fulfilled. Pilate did not escape the emperor's displeasure. Caiaphas (John 11. 50) did not save Jerusalem. The scribes and Pharisees did not put down the doctrine of Jesus. The Lord of glory. The majesty of the Lord, designedly contrasted, says S. Chrysostom, with the ignominy of the cross. Perhaps there is also an allusion to our glory in the last verse, of which He is the source. (Comp. Jas. 2. 1)"—C. B. "What a full proof the apostle gives of their ignorance of this Divine wisdom which the gospel reveals. Had they known it—that is, practically known it, so as to believe it, to be influenced and persuaded by it—they would not have crucified the Lord of glory"—BURKITT.

9. "But this ignorance of theirs fulfils what is written concerning the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. No natural man hath either seen, heard, or known, the things which God hath prepared, saith the prophet, for them that love Him"—WESLEY.

"There has been much discussion whence these words are derived, but they are quite sufficiently near to the passage in Isa. 64. 4 to be regarded as a quotation from thence"—C. B. "This is not the only place in which S. Paul would seem to thus refer to the Old Testament Scriptures (see ch. 1. 19, 20) when he is not basing any argument upon a particular sentence in the Scriptures, but merely availing himself of some thoughts or words in the Old Testament as an illustration of some truth which he is enforcing"—ELLICOTT. "The wisdom of which S. Paul has been speaking is not on a level with human philosophies, nor is it of a similar origin. It is not just one more added to human searches after truth. The princes of this world, its men of light and leading, have had their own theories of God and man, and yet have really 'come to nought.' But the wisdom taught by S. Paul is a disclosure made by God of knowledge unattainable by human endeavour. The three great sources of human knowledge—seeing, hearing, and thought—alike fail here. Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, it has not entered into the heart of man to conceive this wisdom. Hitherto it has been a mystery, a thing hidden, now God has Himself revealed it (ver. 10)"—DODS.

10. But God hath revealed—"yea, and 'freely given' (ver. 12)—them to us—even inconceivable peace, and joy unspeakable—by His Spirit—who intimately and fully knows them. For the Spirit searcheth even the deep things of God—be they ever so hidden and mysterious; the depths both of His nature and of His kingdom"—WESLEY.

"Here the emphatic word is us. The latter part of vers. 8 and 9 are parenthetical, and the sense goes back to the beginning of ver. 8. 'None of the princes of this age know these things, but God hath revealed them unto us, His apostles and teachers.' (Matt. 13. 11 ; 16. 17 ; 2 Cor. 12. 1.) This revelation of spiritual truth is made by the Holy Spirit of God to our spirits. (Rom. 8. 16.) The apostle gives two proofs that the apostles have this knowledge, and that the Holy Spirit is the source of it:—(1) (vers. 10 and 11), because the Holy Spirit alone is capable of imparting this knowledge; and (2) (vers. 12–16) because the Holy Spirit has been given to us, the apostles"—ELLICOTT. For the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. "In this and the next verse we gather (1) the personality of the Holy Ghost, (2) His distinction from the Father. He not only searches the deep things of God, which He could not be described as doing were He identical with the Father, but though, on account of His perfect knowledge of the mind of God, He is likened to the spirit of man which is one of the component elements of His being, the apostle speaks of the one as the 'spirit of a man which is in him,' but of the other as the Spirit which is from (proceeding out of) God. Searches. 'The word to search is here indicative not of ignorance, but of accurate knowledge, at least if we may judge from the fact that this is the very phrase the apostle has used even of God, saying, "He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit"' (CHRYSOSTOM). The knowledge, in fact, as ver. 11 shows, is of the same kind as the knowledge of the spirit of man concerning what passes within his breast, though, of course, infinitely more complete"—C. B.

11. For what man knoweth the things of a man—"all the inmost recesses of his mind; although men are all of one nature, and so may the more easily know one another. So the things of God knoweth no one but the Spirit—who, consequently, is God"—WESLEY.

"The things of God are made known to man only by revelation, and that revelation cannot be effectually understood except by the influence and aid of the same Spirit by whom it was first given to mankind. As the internal thoughts of a man are only known to himself, till he informs others of them, so no man can know the things of God, except as they are made known by God Himself"—WATSON. "There is in every man a life hidden from all eyes, a world of impressions, anxieties, aspirations, and struggles, of which he alone, in so far as he is a spirit—that is to say, a conscious and personal being—gives account to himself. This inner world is unknown to others, except in so far as he reveals it to them by speech"—GODET.

12. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world. "This spirit is not properly 'received'; for the men of the world always had it. But Christians receive the Spirit of God, which before they had not"—WESLEY.

"We may think of revelation either as the act of God, or as it is received by man. God reveals Himself in all He does, as man discloses his character in all he does. With God's first act, therefore, in the remotest past revelation began. As yet there was none to receive the knowledge of God, but God showed His nature and His purpose as soon as He began to do anything. And this revelation of Himself has continued ever since. In the world around us, and the earth on which we live, God reveals Himself. Still more fully is God's nature revealed in man; in conscience, distinguishing between right and wrong; in the spirit craving fellowship with the Eternal. And at length in Jesus Christ God gave the fullest possible manifestations of Himself. The veil was entirely lifted, and God came as much as possible into free intercourse with His creatures. He put Himself within reach of our knowledge"—DODS. "That we might know—a secret mercy; the cormorants of the world will not let their heirs know what they will do for them till they die. But God assures His of heaven aforehand. Thus we have not received of the spirit of this world; but we have received a better thing, and have no reason to repine"—TRAPP.

13. Which also we speak—"as well as know. In words taught by the Holy Spirit—such are all the words of Scripture. How high a regard ought we, then, to retain for them! Explaining spiritual things by spiritual words; or, adapting spiritual words to spiritual things—being taught of the Spirit to express the things of the Spirit"—WESLEY.

"Comparing spiritual things with spiritual. These words have been interpreted in several ways—(1) Wyclif renders them 'maken a liknesse of (i.e. explaining) spyritual things to goostli men'; (2) the Vulgate and English versions render the Greek word by 'compare'; (3) some interpret, 'explaining spiritual things in spiritual ways' (Luther so renders it); (4) another explanation is, 'explaining spiritual things by spiritual,' i.e. interpreting the revelation of God by the inward promptings of the spirit. The first would seem preferable and most agreeable to the context, for S. Paul is speaking of the doctrine he delivered, which he says is unintelligible to the natural man, but capable of being brought home to the understanding of him who possesses spiritual qualifications"—C. B. "Which things (knowing them true) we also utter—utter them how? Not in the rhetoric of human wisdom, not in arguments copied from a formulated philosophy (that would be like putting new wine into old bottles, or dressing a man in a panther's hide), but in arguments taught of spirit, with spiritual phrase matching spiritual truth"—EVANS.

14. But the natural man—"that is, every man who hath not the Spirit; who has no other way of obtaining knowledge, but by his senses and natural understanding—receiveth not—does not understand or conceive—the things of the Spirit—the things revealed by the Spirit of God, whether relating to His nature or His kingdom—for they are foolishness to him. He is so far from understanding, that he utterly despises them. Neither can he know them—as he has not the will, so neither has he the power. Because they are spiritually discerned—they can only be discerned by the aid of that Spirit, and by those spiritual senses, which he has not"—WESLEY.

"Natural—that is—lit. that part of our nature which we call 'mind.' And hence signifies that man in whom pure intellectual reason and the merely natural affections predominate. Now, such an one cannot grasp spiritual truth any more than the physical nature, which is made to discern physical things, can grasp intellectual things. Spiritual truth appeals to the spirit of the man, and therefore is intelligible only to those who are 'spiritual'"—ELLICOTT. "The word of God and its promises, the throne of grace and its privileges, the things of faith in all their varieties, have no existence to worldly men; and when constrained to bear others company in outward ordinances, they are thankful when the prayer concluded, or the sanctuary closing, sends them back to the world again"—HAMILTON. "The natural man—that is, the man whose perceptions do not extend beyond the region of the intellect, the part of his being which he has in common with the animal creation, can never attain to the things of the Spirit. The term must not be understood in the same sense as our word animal now bears, i.e. as equivalent to sensual. Because they are spiritually discerned. There is but little analogy between mental and spiritual discernment, or rather processes which the apostle has been contrasting throughout the whole of this chapter. The one is the result of knowledge, investigation, argument; the faculties which produce the other are sharpened by self-discipline, humility, communion with God, love of Him and the brethren. To those who are thus exercised many things are clear which are mysterious to the most learned and the most acute"—C. B.

15. But the spiritual man—"he that hath the Spirit—discerneth all the things of God whereof we have been speaking. Yet he himself is discerned by no man—no natural men. They neither understand what He is, nor what He says"—WESLEY.

"The gospel in its essence is neither theoretic, abstract, nor reflective, nor even imaginative: it is historical, but this history is Divine. The preaching of the gospel is a revelation of God's doings. When belief is well established, then, and then alone, may God's acts become subjects of theory or research among the members of the Church, and even then, so far only as the whole investigation proceeds from faith. Of such an inquiry faith could never be the consequence. In God's Spirit alone has faith its origin"—OLSHAUSEN. "Judgeth all things—by his spirit of discerning (ch. 14), his spiritual senses exercised to discern good and evil (Heb. 5. 14), his undoubted persuasion of that truth he professeth (Col. 2. 3), and whereof he hath felt the sweetness (Col. 1. 9). Is judged of no man—of no natural man, who can judge no more of Divine truths than a blind man can do of colours, or a sick man of meats"—TRAPP.

16. Who—"what natural man? We—spiritual men; apostles in particular. Have—know, understand. The mind of Christ—concerning the whole plan of gospel salvation'—WESLEY.

"But we—that is, spiritual men, including the apostles. The apostle here identifies Christ with the Spirit, whom he has previously spoken of as the Teacher of spiritual things. He does not mean to assert that the apostles knew all that the mind of Christ knew, but that all things which they did know were from Him, and spiritual (John 15. 15)"—ELLICOTT. "No one had ever greater right than S. Paul to say, 'I have the mind of Christ.' Every day of his life he said the same thing. He once entered into Christ's mind, and more than any other man carried it out. It was by his moral sympathy with Christ's aims that he entered so completely into the knowledge of His person and work. He lived his way into the truth. And all our best knowledge is reached in the same way. The truths we see most clearly and have deepest assurance of are those which our own experience has taught us. Spiritual truth is of a kind which only spiritual men can understand"—DODS.

CHAPTER III.

1. And I, brethren—"he spoke before (ch. 2. 1) of his entrance, now of his progress, among them—could not speak to you as unto spiritual—adult, experienced Christians—but as unto men who were still in great measure carnal, as unto babes in Christ—still weak in grace, though eminent in gifts (ch. 1. 5)"—WESLEY.

"The apostle had said much of the superiority of the wisdom which is the result of spiritual illumination. He now warns the Corinthians that the majority of them do not possess it, or at least but in the scantiest measure, and thus remain on the threshold of the Christian life; and he shows how general principles which he has just explained were exemplified in his own conduct. He also teaches them that their own character, wanting in spirituality, was the real hindrance to his teaching them higher spiritual truth, which may be called 'the wisdom' of the gospel." "Carnal is here the opposite of 'spiritual,' and does not involve any reference to what we would commonly speak of as carnal sin. Babes in Christ. This is the opposite of the 'full-grown' in ch. 2. 6, to whom the 'wisdom' could be taught. See also Col. 1. 28, 'full-grown in Christ'"—ELLICOTT.

2. I fed you—as babes—with milk. "The first and plainest truths of the gospel. So should every preacher suit his doctrine to his hearers"—WESLEY.

"The figures used by the apostle relate to the term babes. Milk, according to ch. 2. 2, denotes the preaching of Jesus crucified, with its simplest contents and its most immediate consequences—expiation, justification by faith, the sanctification of the justified believer by the Holy Spirit, what saves by converting and regenerating. Meat represents what S. Paul has just called 'wisdom,' the contemplation of the Divine plan in its entirety from its eternal predestination to its final consummation"—GODET.

3. "For while there is among you emulation in your hearts, strife in your words, and actual divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk according to man—as mere men; not as Christians, according to God"—WESLEY.

"Are ye not carnal? The word 'carnal' conveys a stronger reproach than 'natural' (ch. 2. 14). The latter signifies the man whose hopes and desires are bounded by the limits of the physical principle of life. The former is applicable to those who are under the dominion of their sensual passions. If it be asked how 'they who are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called saints,' can at the same time be carnal, we may answer, with Olshausen, that the spiritual man becomes carnal when he mingles his old unregenerate views with the new element of life he has received in Christ"—C. B. And walk as men. "Christians should be as Saul was, higher than the people by head and shoulders. Something singular is expected from them (Matt. 5. 47)"—TRAPP.

4. "I am of Apollos. S. Paul named himself an Apollos, to show that he would condemn any division among them, even though it were in favour of himself, or the dearest friend he had in the world. Are ye not carnal—for the Spirit of God allows no party zeal"—WESLEY.

"One saith, I am of Paul. These and the following words explain exactly what the apostle means by their being 'carnal' and walking after a merely human manner. Only two of the factions—those of Paul and Apollos—are mentioned as types of the rest. The factious spirit was in each and all the 'parties' the same, but the particular difference between the teaching of the higher wisdom, and the simpler truths of the gospel, was best illustrated by these two. The selection for rebuke of those who called themselves by the apostle's own name was, no doubt, intended by him to show that it was no matter of personal jealousy on his part. He specially condemns those who magnified his name. It is for his Master alone that he is jealous"—ELLICOTT.

5. "Ministers—or servants—by whom ye believed, as the Lord, the Master of those servants, gave to every man"—WESLEY.

"Since they call themselves followers of Paul or Apollos, S. Paul asks what these men are, i.e. what are their position, powers, and achievements. Ministers (see Rom. 12. 7) through whom (Rom. 1. 2; comp. John 1. 7; 1 Pet. 1. 21)"—BEET.

6. "God gave the increase. We are truly taught that the good done upon the earth is done by the Lord. Such declarations as this bring God very near to His Church"—WATSON. "The harp yields no sound till it be touched by the hand of the musician. The heart is never made good till the heavens answer the earth (Hos. 2. 21), till God strikes the stroke. Holy Melancthon, being newly converted, thought it impossible for his hearers to withstand the evidence of the gospel. But soon after he complained that old Adam was too hard for young Melancthon"—TRAPP.

7. God that giveth the increase—"is all in all: without Him neither planting nor watering avails"—WESLEY.

What harvest would have sprung up from the labour of the two workers without the life which God alone could give? What, then, are those workers? It is folly to raise servants to the rank of masters. They are not anything in comparison with God. (See ch. 10. 19; Gal. 2. 6; 6. 3.) In the next verse we have a transition to the recompense of teachers hereafter, according to the quality of their work here.

8. But he that planteth and he that watereth are one—"which is another argument against division. Though their labours are different, they are all employed in one general work—the saving souls. Hence he takes occasion to speak of the reward of them that labour faithfully, and the awful account to be given by all. Every man shall receive his own peculiar reward according to his own peculiar labour—not according to his success; but he who labours much, though with small success, shall have a great reward. Has not all this reasoning the same force still? Ministers are still barely instruments in God's hand, and depend as entirely as ever on His blessing to give the increase to their labours. Without this, they are nothing; with it, their part is so small, that they hardly deserve to be mentioned. May their hearts and hands be more united; and, retaining a due sense of the honour God doeth them in employing them, may they faithfully labour, not as for themselves, but for the great Proprietor of all, till the day come when He will reward them in full proportion to their fidelity and diligence!"—WESLEY.

"Now the planter and the waterer are one thing. Viewed in the light of subordination to the high God, they are just one element. Like one bough of two branches, Paul and Apollos are both together in the hand of the Almighty, one ministerial implement, disparting into two distinct lines of office—that of planting or founding a church, and that of nurturing and edifying the same. In relation to Him, who from heaven employs them here on earth, the two persons are but as one thing; even as from the summit of a stately cathedral two neighbouring houses far below seem dwarfed and blended into an undistinguishable one; but when you descend, they are found, on nearer inspection, to be two several habitations. And this relative oneness of element is true of all who are officially engaged in God's service, however manifold their several employments"—EVANS. "He that planteth and he that watereth are one. As though to make his depreciation of man as emphatic as possible, the apostle uses the neuter gender here. The instruments are one thing, parts of a vast piece of machinery which God has put in motion for the salvation of the world. As channels of Divine grace it is our duty to forget their personality"—LIAS. "Are one. The planter and the waterer are one, in that they are both working in the same cause. 'But,' says the apostle (not 'and,' as in our version), 'each man shall receive his own reward from God, not from man, according to his labour.' There is an individuality, as well as a unity, in the work of the ministry. This is, however, not a thing to be noticed by men, but it will be recognised by the Great Master"—ELLICOTT. "Are one—lit. 'one thing'; they are practically the same. (Ch. 11. 5.) Just so in the vineyard, the man who plants is in a position neither better nor worse than the man who waters. These words, cautiously used, will cast light on John 10. 30; 17. 11, 21. But each man, etc., points both to the owners, and the individuality, of the servants of God. Because they stand in exactly the same relation to the Master, each will receive according to his labour. Reward—suggests their humble position as men paid for their work. Labour—not according to results, but according to the quantity and quality of his toil. His own reward, and his own labour, exactly correspond"—BEET.

9. For we are all fellow-labourers—"God's labourers, and fellow-labourers with each other. Ye are God's husbandry. This is the sum of what went before; it is a comprehensive word, taking in both a field, a garden, and a vineyard. Ye are God's building—this is the sum of what follows"—WESLEY.

"Throughout this paragraph it is this thought that S. Paul dwells upon—that the Church is originated and maintained, not by men, but by God. Teachers are but God's instruments; and yet, being human instruments, they have each his own responsibility, as each has his own work. From this truth that God alone is the Giver of spiritual life and that the Church is His building several inferences may be drawn:—(1) Our praise for any good we have received of a spiritual kind should be given, not solely to men, but mainly to God; (2) It is to God we must look for all further growth; (3) If we are God's husbandry and building, let us reverence God's work in ourselves; (4) For the same reason we must hope for others as for ourselves—it is the foundation of all hope to know that God has always been inclining men to righteousness and will always do so; (5) The chief inference S. Paul draws from the truth that the Church is God's building is the grave responsibility of those who labour for God in this work"—DODS.

10. According to the grace of God given to me. "This he premises, lest he should seem to ascribe it to himself. Let everyone take heed how he buildeth thereon—that all his doctrines may be consistent with the foundation"—WESLEY.

"According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder—rather, 'which was given to me,' i.e. when he laid the foundation. S. Paul now desires to identify himself with the teachers of the Corinthian church, so far as they were really carrying on the work which he had begun. His object is to combat the individualism which had led the Corinthian church astray. If their teachers be genuine ministers of Christ, it is but one work that they are carrying on. They are merely proceeding with the superstructure of that which the apostle had founded. Comparison of their personal claims with those of S. Paul, and still more an attitude of antagonism to him and to one another, are entirely out of place. But let every man take heed. A fresh subject is here introduced. We are now told of what kind the labour of a minister of Christ is to be, and what his reward. There is, there can be, but one foundation, but there are many ways of building on that foundation"—LIAS. "One might see in the words, as a wise master-builder, nothing more than an idea analogous to that expressed in Matt. 7. 24–27. S. Paul would then simply mean, 'I did not build on ground without laying a foundation for the building.' But the idea of prudence, or better still of ability, seems rather to relate to the manner in which he laboured in laying the foundation, than to the simple act itself of laying it. 'The master-builder' is not only he who draws the plan of the building—in this sense the title would revert to God—but also the man who directs its execution"—GODET.

11. For other foundation—"on which the whole Church, and all its doctrines, duties, and blessings may be built—can no man lay than what is laid—in the counsels of Divine wisdom, in the promises and prophecies of the Old Testament, in the preaching of the apostles, S. Paul in particular. Which is Jesus Christ—who, in His person and offices, is the firm, immovable ROCK OF AGES, every way sufficient to bear all the weight that God Himself, or the sinner, when he believes, can lay upon Him"—WESLEY.

"Any teacher who professes to lay another foundation thereby gives up his claim to be a Christian teacher. If anyone proceeds to lay another foundation than Christ, it is not a Christian Church he is meaning to build. He who does not proceed upon the facts of Christ's life and death, he whose instruction does not presuppose Christ as its Foundation, may be useful for some purposes of life, but not as a builder of the Christian temple. And the question at present, says S. Paul, is not what other institutions you may profitably found in the world, but how this institution of the Church, already founded, is to be completed"—DODS. "The apostle preached Christ—Christ the Example, Christ the Life, Christ the Son of Man, Christ the Son of God, Christ risen, Christ the King of Glory"—ROBERTSON. "Which is Jesus Christ. The doctrine of His person and offices is the foundation of Christian religion, and must therefore be kept pure and entire by all means possible. Every particle of truth is precious, and not to be parted with"—TRAPP.

12. If anyone build gold, silver, costly stones—"three sorts of materials which will bear the fire—true and solid doctrines. Wood, hay, stubble—three which will not bear the fire. Such are all doctrines, ceremonies, and forms of human invention; all but the substantial, vital truths of Christianity"—WESLEY.

"Now if any man build upon this foundation. It must be remembered that it is not the conduct of Christians, however applicable the principles here enunciated may be to it, but the doctrine of teachers which is spoken of here. The materials mentioned are of two classes, those that will endure fire and those that will not. We may dismiss from our consideration such preaching as is dictated by vain-glory or self-interest, for the simple reason that it is not building upon Christ at all. The two kinds of preaching thus become, on the one hand, that which leads to permanent results, the glory of God and the real well-being of man; and, on the other, that which, though the offspring of a genuine zeal, is not according to knowledge"—LIAS. "Many ingenious attempts have been made to apply the imagery of this passage in detail to various doctrines or Christian virtues, but it seems best to regard it as broadly and in outline bringing before the reader the two great ideas of permanent and ephemeral work, and the striking contrast between them. The truth brought forward is primarily, if not exclusively, for teachers. The image is taken from what would have met the eye of a traveller in Ephesus where S. Paul now was, or in Corinth where his letter was to be first read. The stately palaces of marble and granite, with roof and column glittering with gold and silver decorations, and close by these the wretched hovels of the poor and outcast, the walls made of laths of wood, and a thatched roof above. Then arose before the apostle's vision the thought of a city being visited by a mighty conflagration, such as desolated Corinth in the time of Mummius. The mean structures of perishable wood and straw would be utterly consumed, while, as was actually the case in Corinth, the mighty palaces and temples would stand after the fire had exhausted itself. Thus, says S. Paul, it will be with the work of Christian teachers when the 'day of the Lord is revealed in fire.' The fire of that day will prove and test the quality of each work"—ELLICOTT.

13. "The time is coming when everyone's work shall be made manifest; for the day of the Lord, that great and final day, shall declare it — to all the world. For it is revealed—what faith beholds as so certain and so near is spoken of as already present. By fire; yea, the fire shall try every one's work, of what sort it is. The strict process of that day will try every man's doctrines, whether they come up to the Scripture standard or not. Here is a plain allusion to the flaming light and consuming heat of the general conflagration. But the expression, when applied to the trying of doctrines, and consuming those that are wrong, is evidently figurative; because no material fire can have such an effect on what is of a moral nature. And therefore it is added, he who builds wood, hay, or stubble, shall be saved as through the fire—or, as narrowly as a man escapes through the fire, when his house is all in flames about him. The text, then, is so far from establishing the Romish purgatory, that it utterly overthrows it. For the fire here mentioned does not exist till the day of judgment; therefore, if this be the fire of purgatory, it follows that purgatory does not exist before the day of judgment"—WESLEY.

The day of the coming of the Lord is always represented in similar language to this. (See Matt. 3. 1, 2, 3; 4. 1; 2 Thess. 1. 8; 2. 8.) We and our work must be judged by such a test. Only that which will not burn will abide the test of "fire." The work that has been well and wisely done will stand; vain, foolish, and selfish work will perish. WATSON'S note on this verse is: "And if, with all its imperfections, communion with the Church is so profitable and delightful, what shall it be when all imperfections, both in her and ourselves, are for ever done away? Our happiness greatly depends on our society; and that shall be a society all intellect, all purity, all love." In the new life, only the useful and the blessed shall remain to us. "It shall be revealed by fire—rather, 'it is revealed in fire,' being that in which the judgment day shall consist, i.e. in the fire of God's judgment, fire being one of His many attributes. (Heb. 12. 29; Deut. 4. 24; 9. 3; Ps. 50. 3; 97. 3; Isa. 66. 15, 16; Mal. 3. 2, 3; 2 Thess. 1. 8.) As fire does, so does God in the end thoroughly search out and destroy all that is vile or refuse, all that is not thoroughly genuine and durable" —LIAS. "The apostle had declared (ver. 8) that each would be appraised and recompensed according to the nature of his work. He now points out when and how this discrimination will take place. The same figure continues. The edifice before being inhabited by the Master must pass through the proof of fire, in which the materials will come forth intact. Commentators are mostly at one in our time in applying the day of which the apostle speaks to the epoch of the Lord's advent"—GODET.

14. He shall receive a reward—"a peculiar degree of glory. Some degree even the other will receive, seeing he held the foundation; though through ignorance he built thereon what would not abide the fire"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul, with his unfailing discernment, accepts it as a very possible contingency that a Christian man may do poor work. In that case, S. Paul says, the man will be saved as by fire; his work shall be burned, but himself be scatheless. He shall be in the position of a man whose house has been burnt; the man is saved, but his property, all that he has slowly gathered round him and valued as the fruit of his labour, is gone. He may have received no bodily injury, but he is so stripped that he scarcely knows himself, and the whole thought and toil of his life seem to have gone for nothing. So shall the new life we are to pass into absolutely annihilate what is not in keeping with it, and leave only what is useful and congruous"—DODS.

15. "He shall suffer loss—the loss of that peculiar degree of glory"—WESLEY.

"Yet so as by fire. The absolute equality of all in the world to come is no part of S. Paul's system. 'One star differeth from another star in glory' (ch. 15. 41). But the history of the apostle himself is a sufficient evidence that God will not punish with the loss of His presence the man who has acted up to the highest dictates of a conscience not yet fully enlightened. The work perishes, but he who believed himself to be actively serving God when in fact he was doing nothing shall not be driven into the outer darkness. 'Sincerity does not verify doctrine, but it saves the man; his person is accepted, though his work perish'"—ROBERTSON. "Yet he will be saved 'so as by fire.' Surely the 'smell of fire' may be said to pass on him who sees all those works which he so honestly believed to be for God vanishing as worthless stubble in the searching trial which will 'purge away all the dross' of our human doings, and leave only what is of real value in God's sight"—C. B.

16. Ye—"all Christians—are the temple of God — the most noble kind of building (ver. 9)"—WESLEY.

"God is especially present in the hearts of His people, by His Holy Spirit, and indeed the hearts of holy men are temples in the truth of things, and in type and shadow they are heaven itself. For God reigns in the hearts of His servants; there is His kingdom. The power of His grace has subdued all His enemies; there is His power. They serve Him night and day, and give Him thanks and praise; that is His glory. This is the religion and worship of God in the temple. The temple itself is the heart of man"—JEREMY TAYLOR. "Ye are the temple of God—not God's building only (as ver. 9), but His temple. A mud wall may be made up of anything, not so the walls of a temple or palace—that must have other materials. And the Spirit of God dwelleth in you—next to the love of Christ indwelling in our nature, we may wonder at the love of the Holy Ghost, that will dwell in our defiled souls. The Holy Ghost will dwell in a poor, so it be a pure, house"—TRAPP.

17. If any man destroy the temple of God—"destroy a real Christian, by schisms or doctrines fundamentally wrong — him shall God destroy—he shall not be saved at all—not even as 'through the fire'"—WESLEY.

"This clause looks very like a citation from Old Testament. Temporal death was the penalty for damaging the material temple (Ex. 28. 43), and so analogously spiritual death is the result of damaging the spiritual temple" —EVANS. "The case of the individual is precisely the same as with the entire temple of God. What is addressed to the latter is also valid for the former. To injure the temple of God stands parallel with building in wood and stubble; and it refers as much externally to mistaken labours of others, as internally to the false working in and for one's self. He who errs in one respect will not fail to do so in the other"—OLSHAUSEN.

18. Let him become a fool in this world—"such as the world accounts so—that he may become wise—in God's account"—WESLEY.

"The meaning is this: 'If any individual whatever, Corinthian or other, while preaching the gospel in your assemblies, assumes the part of the wise man and the reputation of a profound thinker (ch. 4. 10), let him assure himself that he will not attain to true wisdom till he has passed through a crisis in which that wisdom of his with which he is puffed up will perish, and after which only he will receive the wisdom which is from above.' This crisis of death to false wisdom is what the apostle characterises by the words, let him become a fool"—GODET.

19. "For all the boasted wisdom of the world is mere foolishness in the sight of God,

He taketh the wise in their own craftiness—not only while they think they are acting wisely, but by their very wisdom, which itself is their snare, and the occasion of their destruction"—WESLEY.

"Reason why such wisdom is folly with God, shown from Scripture. The connection seems to be, as ALFORD, 'If God uses the craftiness of the wise as a net to catch them in, such wisdom is in His sight folly, since He turns it to their own confusion.' For it is written—by two passages, one from Job and the other from the Psalms. S. Paul proves the truth of his previous assertion regarding God's estimate of mere 'worldly wisdom.' It may be noticed that with the exception of the reference in Jas. 5. 11 to the 'proverbial patience' of Job, of which the writer says, 'ye have heard' (not read), this is the only allusion to the book of Job or to Job in the New Testament"—ELLICOTT.

20. That they are but vain—"empty, foolish; they and all their thoughts"—WESLEY.

This verse is taken out of Psalm 94. 11, and quoted literally according to the translation of the LXX. The three following verses contain the direction which it remains to him to give to the church itself as to its conduct towards God's true ministers. They are therefore the conclusion of the passage begun, ch. 2. 5.

21. Therefore—"upon the whole—let none glory in men—so as to divide into parties on their account. For all things are yours—and we in particular. We are not your lords, but rather your servants"—WESLEY.

"To glory in a person can only mean: to boast of one's relation to him, to take honour from belonging to him, as a servant or a disciple takes glory from the name of an illustrious master. It is an allusion to the formulas: '1 am of Paul, . . . Apollos,' etc. Far from its being believers who belong to their teachers, it is much rather these who belong to them; and not only their teachers, but all things. The contents of this 'all things' are detailed in the following enumeration, which has been called, not without reason, 'the inventory of the possessions of the child of God,' and in which death itself figures"—GODET.

22. Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas. "We are all equally yours, to serve you for Christ's sake. Or the world. This leap from S. Peter to 'the world' greatly enlarges the thought, and argues a kind of impatience of enumerating the rest. S. Peter and everyone in the whole world, however excellent in gifts or grace or office, are also your servants for Christ's sake. Or life, or death—these, with all their various circumstances, are disposed as will be most for your advantage. Or things present—on earth. Or things to come—in heaven. Contend, therefore, no more about these little things; but be ye united in love as ye are in blessedness"—WESLEY.

"No one is so truly master and lord of this world as the man to whom the world is crucified in Christ; no one, other things being equal, has so true and exquisite an enjoyment of the beauties of nature and the bounties of Providence as the man who in his heart gives up all for Christ. When the soul is yielded up to God, and pervaded with His love, its chords vibrate in sweet harmony with the breathing, swelling chorus of nature, providence, and grace"—L. H. WISEMAN. "All things are yours—suggests to S. Paul the whole wealth of the Christian, for whom exist not only all those who have striven to unfold the significance of the Christian revelation, but all things else, whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come. As it is true of all teachers, of however commanding genius, that the Church does not exist for them that they may have a field for their genius, and followers to applaud and represent them; but they exist for the Church, their genius being used for the advancement of the spiritual life of this and that unknown and hidden soul; so is it true of all things—of life and all its laws, of death and all it leads to—that these are ordained of God to minister to the growth of His children. This was the regal attitude which S. Paul himself assumed and maintained towards all events and the whole world of created things. The same inheritance belongs to every one who has faith to take it"—DODS.

23. "And ye are Christ's—His property, His subjects, His members—and Christ is God's—as Mediator; He refers all His services to His Father's glory"—WESLEY.

"All things serve your highest good, and are bringing you on towards your eternal joy, more certainly than the things you select and buy or win and cherish as your own. You are free men, supreme over all created things, for 'ye are Christ's'; you belong to Him who rules all, and loves you as His own; and above Christ and His rule there is no adverse will that can rob you of any good, for as ye are Christ's, cherished by Him, so is Christ God's, and the supreme will that governs all, governs all in the interests of Christ"—DODS. "It is not restrictions we have here, but strong affirmations; the thought is not limited, it rises. 'All things are the Church's, because it belongs itself to Christ, and depends on Him.' It is not merely a few presumptuous people, puffed up with conceit of their own wisdom, who can say, 'And as for me, I am Christ's'; this is the privilege of the whole Church. And, as if to put the last stroke to the annihilation of all human glory, S. Paul denies it even in the person of that Lord in whom all mankind might legitimately glory. And Christ is God's. As the Church possesses all things because it depends on Christ, Christ possesses all things because He depends on God. (Comp. ch. 11. 3.) God in Christ, such then for man is the one subject of glorying (ch. 1. 31)"—GODET.

CHAPTER IV.

Vers. 1–7. THE TRUE ESTIMATION OF CHRIST'S MINISTERS AND THE TEST OF THEIR WORK.—1. Let a man account us as servants of Christ. "The original word properly signifies such servants as laboured at the oar in rowing vessels; and, accordingly, intimates the pains which every faithful minister takes in his Lord's work. O God, where are these ministers to be found? Lord, Thou knowest. And stewards of the mysteries of God—dispensers of the mysterious truths of the gospel"—WESLEY.

Ministers are stewards, and what a steward's office is we learn from Matt. 24. 45. They are to teach the truth of God to others, and to be qualified for so doing by their own knowledge of it, and by their personal experience of its power and blessedness. This knowledge and experience is revealed only to the spiritual. (See ch. 2. 10–16.) "A minister of Christ—that is, a person deputed by the command, and invested with the authority, of Christ, to administer in holy things, to preach the word, administer the sacraments, execute Church censures; being in all things an example to the flock. And the people are to account the office and work of the ministry as a Divine institution and appointment of Christ in His Church"—BURKITT.

2. Found faithful—to his Lord, and to his Lord's people. Maintaining his purity of motive in work, as well as his devotion, and ever remembering that he must give an account of his stewardship before the just and impartial God.

3. Yea, I judge not myself—"my final state is not to be determined by my own judgment"—WESLEY.

This does not mean that we should be unconcerned about, or regardless of, human opinion. Every true man must be careful to maintain his reputation by an unvarying devotion to God, and the consequent consistency of life. The apostle altogether declines to admit the right of any human tribunal to institute an inquiry into his motives, and just as definitively does he refuse to be his own judge. There is only One to whom deception is impossible. He will finally judge every man.

4. I am not conscious to myself of anything evil; yet am I not hereby justified—"I depend not on this, as a sufficient justification of myself in God's account. But He that judgeth me is the Lord—by His sentence I am to stand or fall"—WESLEY.

"For I know nothing against myself (R.V.). S. Paul, as in Acts 23. 1, gives the Corinthians to understand that he is not aware of any wilful dereliction of duty on his part. (See 2 Cor. 1. 12.) We can hardly suppose that one who was so conscious of his many infirmities (see ch. 9. 27; 15. 9; Eph. 3. 8; 1 Tim 1. 13, 15) supposed himself to be altogether free from faults. The next verse implies the contrary, and we read in an Epistle written long afterwards (Phil. 3. 13) that he did not consider himself 'already perfect,' but as pushing on towards his only ideal of perfection, the character of his Master, Jesus Christ"—LIAS. "S. Paul, a chosen vessel, but yet an earthen vessel, knew well that he had his cracks and his flaws, which God could easily find out"—TRAPP.

5. Therefore judge nothing before the time—"appointed for judging all men—until the Lord come, who, in order to pass a righteous judgment, which otherwise would be impossible, will both bring to light the things which are now covered with impenetrable darkness, and manifest the most secret springs of action, the principles and intentions of every heart. And then shall everyone—every faithful steward—have praise of God"—WESLEY.

"The metaphor of light, compared with 'fire' in ch. 3. 13, suggests the ease and suddenness and completeness with which the great day will make all things known; just as the daylight reveals things unknown in the night. The hidden things suggests how much that is needful for a correct estimate of men's conduct now lies under an impenetrable veil. The counsels, etc., the purposes, now hidden in men's hearts, which move them to activity and which will determine their reward. A solemn warning to many at Corinth. All judgments on Christian workers before the Lord comes are before the right time (same word as 'season'—see ch. 7. 5), for not till then will all the facts be known. From God—rising as usual from the Son, whose coming will bring to light all the facts of the case, to the Father, who is the original source of the praise which, through the lips of Christ, will be given to each faithful servant"—BEET. "Learn not to judge, for we do not know the secrets of the heart. We judge men by gifts, or by a correspondence with our own peculiarities, but God judges by fidelity"—ROBERTSON.

6. These things—"mentioned, ch. 1. 10, etc.—I have by a very obvious figure transferred to myself, and Apollos—and Cephas, instead of naming those particular preachers at Corinth, to whom ye are so fondly attached. That ye may learn by us—from what has been said concerning us, who, however eminent we are, are mere instruments in God's hand. Not to think of any man above what is here written—or above what Scripture warrants"—WESLEY.

"Things which are written—in the Old Testament, according to S. Paul's constant and frequent use of this phrase. These words remind the readers that a careful study of the Scriptures would have corrected these errors. An interesting coincidence with S. Paul's habit, of referring to the Old Testament. Not to go beyond, etc.—not to exceed, in their estimate of themselves and others, the descriptions of human nature given in the Old Testament. Of these descriptions we have specimens in ch. 3. 19 f. That in us you may learn, etc.—i.e. by considering S. Paul's description of the position of himself and Apollos, as garden labourers, paid for their work, house-stewards, etc. Puffed up—become large in your own esteem. This word is a marked feature of S. Paul's description of the Corinthian Christians (vers. 18, 19; 8. 1; 13. 4; Col. 2. 18.) Its use here implies that their self-conceit was the source of their party spirit. They set themselves on the side of one man and against another, because of something in the one which seemed to flatter, and something in the other which did not flatter, their vanity"—BEET.

7. Who maketh thee to differ—"either in gifts or graces. As if thou hadst not received it—as if thou hadst it originally from thyself"—WESLEY.

All good gifts are of God—a fact which should exclude all boasting or self-satisfaction. Right views of ourselves will show that all we have of gifts or grace is not the result of personal merit, but through the boundless mercy of God. (See John 3. 27; Jas. 1. 17.) "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." "Remember, therefore, that though thou be a vessel of mercy, it is the fountain that filleth thee, and not thyself. Whenever thou gloriest in thy graces, do it but as the beggar glorieth in his alms, that ascribes all to the giver; or as the patient glorieth in his cure, that ascribeth all to God and the physician; or as a condemned rebel doth glory in a pardon, which he ascribeth to the mercy of his prince"—BAXTER.

Vers. 8-16. CONTRAST BETWEEN THE CORINTHIAN TEACHERS AND S. PAUL.—8. Now ye are full. "The Corinthians abounded with spiritual gifts; and so did the apostles; but the apostles, by continual want and sufferings, were kept from self-complacency. The Corinthians suffering nothing, and having plenty of all things, were pleased with and applauded themselves; and they were like children who, being raised in the world, disregard their poor parents. Now ye are full, says the apostle, in a beautiful gradation, ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings—a proverbial expression, denoting the most splendid and plentiful circumstances. Without any thought of us. And I would ye did reign—in the best sense; I would ye had attained the height of holiness. That we might reign with you—having no more sorrow on your account, but sharing in your happiness"—WESLEY.

"Here we have one of the sudden turns of feeling so remarkable in the apostle's style. Abruptly breaking off at the word 'boast,' he dashes off into an animated and ironical apostrophe. 'I may well say boast,' for boasting is your crying sin, but it is boasting in yourselves, not in God. All your wants, spiritual and temporal, now are satisfied; you have become rich; you are reigning like kings. But in your self-satisfaction you give not a thought to those whose labours have made you what you are. Would that it were really with you as you imagine it to be! Then we might hope for some remission of our trials, distresses, humiliations. But at present all the sorrow, suffering, shame is ours, while either in fact or in fancy you are enjoying all the good things given to Christians — immunity from suffering, quiet of conscience (Rom. 8. 1), wisdom, honour, inward satisfaction. The word translated full has the sense of being satiated with good things. Without us. Though S. Paul had admitted the Corinthians into the same blessings as he enjoyed himself, he had no share in their blessings. And I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. The apostle does not regard the persecutions and distresses he underwent as desirable for their own sake, but only as means to an end. The empire of evil is not to be destroyed without a conflict, and the sufferings endured by Christ's servants are the evidences that it is going on. But the best of those who are thus contending for the truth may lawfully wish that the conflict were over and the reign of the saints begun. Such a wish, in fact, appears to be expressed by the words, 'Thy kingdom come'"—LIAS.

8. God hath set forth us last, as appointed to death—"alluding to the Roman custom of bringing forth those persons last on the stage, either to fight with each other, or with wild beasts, who were devoted to death; so that, if they escaped one day, they were brought out again and again, till they were killed"—WESLEY.

"An abundant reason for the wish just expressed, viz. S. Paul's present position. I think—S. Paul's view of himself, in contrast to his readers' self-estimate. Us the apostles (see Rom. 1. 1; 2 Cor. 8. 23) seems to imply that other apostles endured hardships similar, though probably not equal, to those of S. Paul. But it does not imply that Apollos was an apostle. For S. Paul is now dealing, not with the factions, but with self-conceit generally. And this he puts to shame by the hardships of those who hold the first rank in the Church"—BEET. A spectacle to the world, to angels, and to men. "By the angels, to whom the apostles were made a spectacle, some understand the evil angels, who may be supposed to delight in the blood of the martyrs. Others understand the good angels, to whom the faith and constancy of the apostles gave great joy. Probably both were intended. For it must have animated the apostles, in combating with their persecutors, to think that they were disappointing the malice of evil spirits, while they were making the angels in heaven and good men on earth happy, by the faith and patience and fortitude which they were exerting in so noble a cause"—MACKNIGHT.

10. We are fools—"in the account of the world—for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ. Though ye are Christians, ye think yourselves wise; and ye have found means to make the world think you so too. We are weak—in presence, in infirmities, in sufferings—but ye are strong—in just opposite circumstances"—WESLEY.

Ye have glory, but we have dishonour (R.V.). This verse is charged with irony. Our connection with Christ, as His apostles and preachers, may make us fools; you are, on the contrary, "wise Christians; we are weak Christians, ye strong; ye are glorified, made leaders of factions and churches, we are despised"—ELLICOTT. "These words are addressed especially to the principal men of the church, but at the same time to all its members who share in the pretensions of these proud party leaders. As to teaching, the apostles had to face the reputation of foolishness which the gospel brings on them, while at Corinth there is found a way of preaching Christ so as to procure a name for wisdom, the reputation of refined philosophers and men of most reliable judgment. As a rabbin he might have become as eminent a savant as Hillel, as celebrated as Gamaliel; for Christ he has consented to pass as a fool. The Corinthians know better how to manage; they make the teaching even of the gospel a means of gaining celebrity for their lofty wisdom"—GODET.

11. And are naked. "Who can imagine a more glorious triumph of the truth than that which is gained in these circumstances; when S. Paul, with an impediment in his speech and a person rather contemptible than graceful, appeared in a mean, perhaps tattered, dress before persons of the highest distinction, and yet commanded such attention and made such deep impressions upon them"—WESLEY.

The words, even to this present hour, reproduce the thought of the whole passage: "As for us, up to this hour, we are little aware that the dispensation of triumph has already begun." The apostle would point out to his converts the true glory of the Christian minister. Labour and suffering for Christ's sake are the marks of the servants of God, not self-conceit and self-praise. "We both hunger. From the strong irony of the last verse the apostle here passes, in the pathetic and sad description which occupies vers. 11–13, to show how intensely true that last word 'despised' was, as expressing his own position, not only in time past, but at the very hour of his writing. Here still there is an implied contrast between their condition ('full, rich, kings,' of ver. 8) and that of S. Paul himself. Are naked. The better reading is, 'We are in need of sufficient clothing' (as 2 Cor. 11. 27). Are buffeted—i.e. are treated like slaves, and not like 'kings,' as you are. Have no certain dwelling-place. To be without a fixed home was a peculiar sign of want and degradation. (See Matt. 8. 20; 10. 23)"—ELLICOTT.

12. We bless—suffer it—entreat. "We do not return revilings, persecution, defamations; nothing but blessing"—WESLEY.

"We bless—speak smoothly, as in Rom. 16. 18. (See Rom 1. 25.) We endure it—not repelling the attack of our enemies. We entreat, or 'exhort' as in ch. 10: stronger than 'we bless.' 'We beg a favour from those who speak hurtfully of us, as though utterly at their mercy.' To return smooth words for rough ones; to submit to, instead of resisting, the attacks of enemies; to ask favours from, instead of spurning, those who revile us, arises usually from the absolute helplessness of men who dare not defend themselves. And S. Paul's forbearance would be thus interpreted. It was, therefore, a mark of humiliation of his position"—BEET.

13. We are made as the filth of the world, and offscouring of all things. "Such were those poor wretches among the heathens, who were taken from the dregs of the people, to be offered as expiatory sacrifices to the infernal gods. They were loaded with curses, affronts, and injuries, all the way they went to the altars; and when the ashes of those unhappy men were thrown into the sea, these very names were given them in the ceremony"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul does not assert that he is such an expiatory sacrifice, but that he is like one, because by his sorrows and sufferings many souls are brought to Christ. He represents himself as becoming the refuse of mankind, in order that by this means he may bring blessings innumerable within their reach"—LIAS. "A piece of plate may become battered and scratched, so that its beauty is hopelessly gone, but it loses not its real worth; put it into the scale, and its weight and not its fashion shall be the estimate of its preciousness; throw it into the melting-pot, and its purity will show its actual value. So with a Christian. God's unerring balance and crucible are not guided by appearances. How content may we be to be vile in the sight of men if we are accepted of the Lord"—SPURGEON. Being defamed, we entreat. Though Luther call me devil, saith Calvin, yet I will honour him as a servant of God.

14. I do not write these things to shame you, but as my beloved children I warn you. "It is with admirable prudence and sweetness the apostle adds this, to prevent any unkind construction of his words"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul has now completed his discussion of the church parties, by uncovering their source, viz. an inflated self-estimate and this he has sought to annihilate by the example of his own self-forgetfulness. So severe is the contrast thus presented that S. Paul's courteous tact and tender heart move him to soften it. 'To put you to shame is not my purpose, and therefore not the meaning of my words.' Admonish (Rom. 15. 14; Col. 1. 28)—reproof with a view to improvement. S. Paul looks upon them as children, even his own children, and exercises towards them the discipline of intelligent paternal love"—BEET. "The apostle no doubt spoke to them in a humiliating way; but his object was quite different from that of causing them shame; he wished to lead them with a firm hand into another way"—GODET.

15. I have begotten you. "This excludes not only Apollos, his successor, but also Silas and Timothy, his companions; and the relation between a spiritual father and his children brings with it an inexpressible nearness and affection"—WESLEY.

It is God who saves men from sin, and this adopting grace which makes them His sons, but He saves them by human instrumentality. Saul was stricken by the light from heaven, and answered by the Lord Himself; but the man Ananias was the medium through which the rich and abiding gifts of grace came to him. And to-day there are many of whom the Lord says to His Church, "Ministers by whom ye believed" (2 Thess. 2. 14). "While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell on all them that heard the word."

16. Be ye followers of me—"in that spirit and behaviour which I have so largely declared"—WESLEY.

We are examples as well as teachers of holy living. The conduct and conversation must be in harmony with the preaching and the doctrine of the gospel; and when a man's conscience tells him he has honestly striven to be faithful to God, he may adopt this language with as much humility as gratitude. ROBERTSON says: "It might sound as if S. Paul were inviting them to become his followers instead of following Cephas or Apollos. But that would be to forget the whole argument. To say that, would have been to have fallen into the very error that he blamed, and to have opposed and contradicted his own depreciation of himself; to have denied every principle he had been establishing. S. Paul is not speaking of doctrine, but of life. He says that the life he had just described was the one for them to follow. In this be ye followers of me—he declares the life of suffering, of hardship in the cause of duty, to be higher than the life of popularity and self-indulgence."

17. My beloved son. "Elsewhere he styles him 'brother' (2 Cor. 1. 1); but here paternal affection takes place. As I teach—no less by example than precept"—WESLEY.

S. Paul's love for Timothy is evident in every allusion to him. (See Phil. 2. 19, 20, 22; 1 Thess. 3. 2; 1 Tim. 1. 23; 2 Tim. 3. 10.) Here he implies that Timothy owed his conversion to him, as also in 1 Tim. 1. 2, 18; 2 Tim. 1. 2. No man would be so likely to win the confidence of the church at Corinth, and so put an end to the existing contentions among them, as this trusted and beloved representative of the apostle, who had been their spiritual father.

18. Now some are puffed up. "S. Paul saw, by a Divine light, the thoughts which would arise in their hearts. As if I would not come — because I send Timothy"—WESLEY.

"There were those at Corinth who depreciated S. Paul's authority. Such persons persuaded themselves that they had so undermined his reputation that he would not dare to come again to Corinth, and they grew more self-asserting in consequence. But though S. Paul submitted to contempt and insult from without he demands the respect due to his office from those within. He bore the reproach of the infidel and scoffer; among his own people he acts upon the precept, 'Let no man despise thee.' Paley remarks on the undersigned coincidence between this passage and 2 Cor. 1. 15-17; 2. 1. It appears that there had been some uncertainty about the apostle's visit. It was this which had led some of his opponents to assert that he would never show his face at Corinth again"—C. B.

19. I will know. "He here shows his fatherly authority—not the big, empty, speech of these vain boasters, but how much of the power of God attends them"—WESLEY.

"If the Lord will. See Jas. 4. 13-15, who justly derides that rashness among men, in that they plan what they shall do ten years hence, when they are not certain that they shall live another hour"—CALVIN. "S. Paul contrasts the word, here the fine discourses, the profound deductions which called forth the plaudits of the hearers, with the power; by which he designates the effectual virtue of the Divine Spirit which brings back souls to themselves, makes them contrite, leads them to Christ, and begets them to a new life. S. Paul will find out whether, with this abundance of talk which makes itself heard in the assemblies (ch. 14), there is found or there is lacking the creative breath of the Spirit"—GODET.

20. For the kingdom of God—"real religion does not consist in words, but in the power of God ruling the heart"—WESLEY.

"Of what the apostle meant by power, we are scarcely fit judges. We have been too familiar with them from childhood to be able to comprehend what 'power' the apostles' words must have had upon the hearts and lives of those who heard them. We may gain some slight idea by comparing them with the best passages of the earliest Christian writers after the apostles; and still more by comparing them with the utterances of the Greek sophists and dialecticians of the time. The kingdom of God, S. Paul would remind his hearers, i.e. His sovereignty over the human heart, is not simply an affair of the intellect, but of the spirit. It does not consist in the acceptance or establishment of certain propositions, but in influence over the life and conscience"—LIAS.

21. With a rod—"that is, with severity"—WESLEY.

"What will ye? I give you a choice. I am coming to you as a father in any case. But shall I come as a father comes with a rod (Isa. 11. 4), and going to inflict punishment with it; or as a father would come when no faults on the child's part need interfere with the perfect and unrestricted outflowing of his gentleness and love? His love would be no love if, without any change on their part, it led him to show no displeasure where correction was for their sake absolutely needed. This is a great and striking example of S. Paul having the 'mind of God.' He treats the Corinthians as God ever treats His children"—ELLICOTT. "The first part of the Epistle is closed. The divisions which had arisen revealed to S. Paul the deep corruption which the gospel had undergone in this church. He understood it: teachers are not changed into the heads of schools, except because the gospel has been changed into a system. To ascend, then, to the true notion of Christianity, in order to deduce from it that of the Christian ministry, and to restore the normal relation between this office and the whole Church, such was his first task. The flock once gathered under the shepherd's crook, he may with hope of success attack the particular vices which had crept into it. These first four chapters are thus the foundation of the whole Epistle"—GODET.

CHAPTER V.

SECTION III.—Vers. 1–5. DISCIPLINE. THE CASE OF THE INCESTUOUS PERSON.—1. Fornication. "The original word implies criminal conversation of any kind whatever. His father's wife—while his father was alive"—WESLEY.

These Corinthians were not a pattern of Christian morality, and they needed to be taught the most simple rudiments of decency and duty. They had been depraved heathens, and dreadful crimes lingered among them. Plain words of reproof must therefore be spoken to them.

2. "Are ye puffed up? Should ye not rather have mourned — have solemnly humbled yourselves, and at that time of solemn mourning have expelled that notorious sinner from your communion?"—WESLEY.

Sad indeed was their condition when so great a scandal could exist, and the church remain unconcerned. They had not censured the offender, when they ought to have promptly put him away from them, and have mourned for the sin and its disgrace. No church can be healthy if it is not pure. Israel may fight, but cannot conquer, so long as the deceitful Achan remains unrepentant or unpunished.

3. I verily, as present in spirit—"having a full (it seems a miraculous) view of the whole fact—have already, as if I were actually present, judged him who hath so scandalously done this"—WESLEY.

"I verily, as absent in body. (Comp. Col. 2. 5; 1 Thess. 2. 17.) Here we have the method of excommunication pursued in the apostolic Church. It is important to observe it narrowly: First, It is to be remarked that the apostle is acting not only as the president, but as the founder of the Corinthian church. Next, we remark that the whole church at Corinth was associated with him in the work. When ye are gathered together, and my spirit. Hence it came to pass that in primitive times it was usual for such acts of discipline to be carried out in the presence of the church or congregation in which the offender was accustomed to worship. Thirdly, It is observable that such excommunication was pronounced 'in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ,' that is, with His authority and in accordance with His Divine law of purity and love, whereby, while hating the sin, He desired to convert the offender"—C. B.

4. And my spirit—"present with you—with the power of the Lord Jesus Christ—to confirm my sentence"—WESLEY.

"The tribunal is formed of the Christians of Corinth assembled in S. Paul's spiritual presence; his competency is the name of Jesus Christ, under whose authority the sentence is given; his ability to execute is the power of Jesus Christ"—GODET. "The opening words are probably the form used in all public acts of the Church as a body, and the power of our Lord Jesus refers to that continual presence which Christ has promised His Church, and particular power which He had delegated to the apostles to punish"—ELLICOTT. (Matt. 16. 19; 18. 19, 20; 28. 20.)

5. To deliver such an one. "This was the highest degree of punishment in the Christian Church; and we may observe, the passing this sentence was the act of the apostle, not of the Corinthians. To Satan—who was usually permitted, in such cases, to inflict pain or sickness on the offender—for the destruction—though slowly and gradually—of the flesh—unless prevented by speedy repentance"—WESLEY.

"The object of this punishment was the destruction of the flesh, and the salvation of the man"—ELLICOTT. "This surrender to the power of Satan evidently includes, but means much more, than expulsion (vers. 2, 13) from the church. A man already by his sin a captive (2 Tim. 2. 26) of the devil, is to be given up to his power in some further sense. This can only refer, as in Job 2. 6 (comp. Luke 13. 16), to the infliction of bodily injury by the agency of Satan, and by the permission and design of God. (Comp. Acts 5. 5; 13. 11.) The grossness of the present offence called for a like terrible penalty. Such would manifest the power of the Lord Jesus, and the apostolic authority of S. Paul, who was present in his spirit. It was not immediate death; for it was designed (comp. 1 Tim. 1. 20) to lead the sufferer by repentance to final salvation. That it was a work of Satan increases its terror and marks its connection with man's sin. All sin is self-surrender (Eph. 4. 19) to the power of evil; and the surrender reaches further than the sinner thinks"—BEET.

6. Your glorying—"either in your gifts or prosperity, at such a time as this—is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven—one sin or one sinner—leaveneth the whole lump—diffuses guilt and affection through the whole congregation"—WESLEY.

Still writing of the unexpelled immoral man, the apostle again reminds them how little cause they had for self-glorification. As long as they permitted such an offender to defile the church, they were partakers of sin. Not only so, but the defilement would extend. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. The ailment of the finger may fill the whole body with disease. The decay of the branch may mean death to the tree. Unreproved sin deteriorates the whole Church, as surely as it defiles the individual conscience. JOHN ANGELL JAMES said: "No one becomes vicious all at once. The way of a transgressor is like that of a stone down-hill, which, when it is once set going, moves at every revolution with accelerated speed." What is true of the individual is true of the community.

7. Purge out therefore the old leaven—"both of sinners and of sin—that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened—that is, that being unleavened ye may be a new lump, holy unto the Lord. For our Passover is slain for us. The Jewish Passover, about the time of which this Epistle was written (ch. 5. 11), was only a type of this. What exquisite skill both here and everywhere conducts the zeal of the inspired writer! How surprising a transition is here, and yet how perfectly natural! The apostle, speaking of the incestuous criminal, slides into his darling topic—a crucified Saviour. Who would have expected it on such an occasion? Yet, when it is thus brought in, who does not see and admire both the propriety of the subject, and the delicacy of its introduction?"—WESLEY.

"The language here is Hebraical. Before the Passover, the Jews cleared their houses of leaven, and lived for seven days on biscuit-bread, made simply of flour and water. Christ, the Paschal Lamb, being sacrificed for us, Christians are called to put away from their hearts the leaven of malice and wickedness, and be consecrated to the Lord. Our old man is crucified with Christ, that the body of sin might be destroyed"—SUTCLIFFE. "Purge out therefore the old leaven. Reference is here made to the Jewish custom of searching for leaven, which is mentioned in the Talmud, and which probably existed in the apostles' time. Because Scripture speaks of 'searching Jerusalem with candles' (Zeph. 1. 12), they used to carry out this custom of searching for leaven with great strictness, taking a candle and 'prying into every mouse-hole and cranny,' as S. Chrysostom says, so as to collect even the smallest crumb of leavened bread, which was to be placed in a box, or some place where a mouse could not get at it. This ceremony, as Lightfoot tells us (Temple Service, ch. 12. sec. 1), was prefaced by the prayer, 'Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, the King Everlasting, who has sanctified us by Thy commandments, and has enjoined the putting away of leaven.' The custom exists among the Jews to this day. The scrupulous care in removing the smallest particle of the bitter substance adds force to S. Paul's injunction. Not the slightest trace of bitterness and vice and wickedness was to be left among Christians, since they kept continual feast upon the flesh and blood of the Paschal Lamb, even Jesus Christ. See the discourse in S. John 6, itself delivered before a Passover. That ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened—'as ye are (called to be) unleavened,' i.e. purged free from 'vice and wickedness' (ver. 8), 'so be also in fact.' The Christian community was to be a 'new lump,' because it was placed among men as a new society—a society, the object and aim of which was to keep itself free from the defilements of the rest of the world. The word translated 'lump' signifies properly a mass of dough, from a verb signifying 'to mix, knead'"—LIAS.

8. Therefore let us keep the feast. "Let us feed on Him by faith. Here is a plain allusion to the Lord's Supper, which was instituted in the room of the Passover—not with the old leaven—of heathenism or Judaism. Malignity is stubbornness in evil. Sincerity and truth seem to be put here for the whole of true, inward religion"—WESLEY.

"Keep the feast—(rather, 'keep festival')—referring to the perpetual feast the Christian Church keeps on the flesh and blood of her Lord. Not 'the feast,' as in our version, which would imply some particular festival. Malice and wickedness—(rather, perhaps, 'vice and wickedness'). Comp. ch. 14. 20. Sincerity and truth. The word here translated 'sincerity' is derived either (1) from a word signifying to revolve, as though rejecting by its rapid revolution all extraneous matter, or (2) by most etymologists as from the rays of the sun, which by their searching character would immediately reveal the presence of any impurity. It would therefore seem to mean transparent honesty of purpose and character"—C. B. "The exhortation of vers. 6–8 rests upon two great truths, viz. that sin, like leaven, communicates its nature to all it touches; and that the death of Christ lays upon us an obligation to cast away all sin. Of these, the former attests itself to the conscience and experience and observation of everyone. Even the least thing which God hates, if clung to, darkens our spiritual intelligence, weakens our spiritual efforts, and pollutes our entire being. Therefore sin may justly be compared to leaven. That Christ is our Passover follows by direct inference from the fact that salvation comes through the death of the Son of God, and that God designs us to be, by union with Christ, sharers of the life of Christ, or life devoted to God"—BEET.

9. "I wrote to you in a former epistle—and doubtless both S. Paul and the other apostles wrote many things which are not extant now. Not to converse—familiarly; not to contract any intimacy or acquaintance with them more than is absolutely necessary" —WESLEY.

There had certainly been a correspondence between S. Paul and the church before this Epistle (ch. 7. 1); and in 2 Cor. 7. 8 he refers to a previous letter. "I wrote to you in an epistle not to company with fornicators. From the particular case, and the reflections it suggested, we now come to general rules of conduct on this subject. The apostle would not have his converts flee from the world, as so many did in later ages, but remain in it and leaven it. This course must bring them into contact with many ungodly men, whose evil example they must not follow, but whom they cannot altogether avoid, unless they would retire altogether from the active business of life. But if any member of the Church bring dishonour on the Christian name by such sins as those which are named, the Christian is bound to show his sense of such flagrant inconsistency and hypocrisy, by refusing even to sit down to a meal with him. It is not difficult to follow the spirit of such an exhortation now, though it may be impossible to observe its letter. We cannot help meeting men of depraved morals and irreligious lives in business or in general society; we can, nay, we must refrain from making such persons our associates and intimates"—LIAS.

10. "But I did not mean that you should altogether refrain from conversing with heathens, though they are guilty in some of these respects. Covetous, rapacious, idolaters—sinners against themselves, their neighbour, God. For then ye must go out of the world —then all civil commerce must cease. So that going out of the world, which some account a perfection, S. Paul accounts an utter absurdity" —WESLEY.

There must be no unnecessary society and intercourse with evil men. "Be ye separate." Good men must live in the wicked world but never extend their friendships and fellowships with it beyond that which the duties of life absolutely require. "We should go to evil men, as the physician enters the infected chambers of the sick; but never forget that 'evil communications corrupt good manners'; and that an undue familiarity with them is far more likely to weaken the spirituality of our own minds than to generate a holy disposition in theirs"—SIMEON.

11. Who is named a brother—"that is, a Christian; especially if a member of the same congregation. Rapacious—guilty of oppression, extortion, or any open injustice. No, not to eat with him—which is the lowest degree of familiarity"—WESLEY.

"The emphasis is on the words, who is called a brother. As S. Paul goes on to say, in ver. 12, he has not to exercise discipline on those who do not profess the faith, but when a man parades the title of Christian, exhibits this profession side by side with vice, the Church is bound to protest against this lying union, and with this view, so far depends on it, to break off all relations with such a man. This is the way to tear from him the mask with which he covers himself, to the shame of the Church and of Christ Himself"—GODET.

12. "I speak of Christians only. For what have I to do to judge heathens? But ye, as well as I, judge those of your own community" —WESLEY.

"The argument of the whole is, I wrote to you in my former letter not to associate with immoral persons, of course I meant with immoral members of the Church; this natural limitation you should have perceived, because you yourselves apply the same principle of exclusive judgment, not to the outside heathen, but to those only who are within the pale"—EVANS. "We must not stand in fear of men, though they be never so great and mighty. The censures of the Church must be administered indifferently, without respect of persons" —ATTERSOL.

13. Them that are without God will judge. "The passing sentence on these He hath reserved to Himself. And ye will take away that wicked person—this properly belongs to you"—WESLEY.

"God is Judge of the whole earth; we are to leave the heathen world in His hands. Therefore put away. The apostle in this passage adopts the form of pronouncing sentence on great criminals, with which the Jewish converts would be familiar. (Deut. 13. 5; 17. 7; 24. 7)"—ELLICOTT. Take away, etc. Almost word for word from Deut. 17. 7; 21. 21, which refer to the punishment of death for idolatry and for disobedience to parents. Thus the wicked Israelite was removed from the people. The terrible meaning of these words in the Old Testament gives great weight to them when used for the lighter sentence here enjoined; and clothes this sentence with Old Testament authority. From among your selves: emphatic contrast to 'those outside,' reminding the readers that the evil to be removed was in their own midst"—BEET.

CHAPTER VI.

SECTION IV.—Vers. 1-11. LAWSUITS. HOW TO SETTLE DISPUTES IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—1. "The unjust—the heathens. A Christian could expect no justice from these. The saints—who might easily decide these smaller differences in a private and friendly manner"—WESLEY.

"The principle is here laid down which is to guide Christians in their lawsuits. Disputes about property are treated by the apostle as matters of the most trifling import. To call in the unbelievers to settle the disputes of Christian brethren was an act of audacity almost beyond the belief of the apostle (ver. 1), and in marked contrast to the feeling prevalent in the Christian Church at its first foundation. (Acts 4. 32.) It were far better for a Christian to suffer the utmost wrong than to bring such a reproach upon the name of Christ (ver. 7). The disputes of Christians were, therefore, settled by private arbitration, a custom which continued until Christianity was formally established as the religion of the Roman empire. The principle of this passage should guide us still, of regarding mutual love as of more importance than 'the things that pertain to this life,' of preferring rather to suffer wrong than to appeal to the law, unless some more important matter is at stake than our individual loss or inconvenience"—C. B.

2. Know ye not. "This expression occurs six times in this single chapter, and that with a peculiar force; for the Corinthians knew and gloried in it, but they did not practise. That the saints—after having been judged themselves—shall judge the world—shall be assessors with Christ in the judgment wherein He shall condemn all the wicked, as well angels as men. (Matt. 19. 28; Rev. 20. 4)"—WESLEY.

"In the great day the saints intelligently and cordially approve and endorse the sentence pronounced by Christ on the millions of earth. It may be that the final sentence cannot, according to the principles of the Divine government of the universe, be pronounced upon the lost without the concurrence of the saved—i.e. without a revelation of the justice of the sentence so clear as to secure the full approbation of the saved. If so, the concurrence of the saved is an essential element in the final judgment; and they may truly be said to judge both men and angels. . . . The light of eternity, which will enable us to estimate with infallible justice all actions done on earth, and to approve and endorse the sentence of Christ, already shines in the hearts of those in whom the Spirit dwells. For His presence imparts (ch. 2. 15) the wisdom of Christ. Therefore, in proportion as we are influenced by the Spirit, we are able to estimate conduct so far as the facts are known to us—i.e. spiritual men are, other things being equal, most fit to decide the differences of their brethren"—BEET. "The apostle here claims for all Christians the glorious prerogative which Christ had Himself promised to His immediate personal followers (Matt. 19. 28; Luke 22. 30)"—ELLICOTT.

3. Know ye not that we shall judge angels? "The good angels are not hereafter to be judged, but they will form a part of Christ's glorious retinue when He comes to judgment"—WORDSWORTH. We may regard this passage as a climax arising out of the apostle's intense realisation of the unity of Christ and His Church triumphant—a point which seems ever present to the mind of S. Paul when he speaks of the dignity of Christianity. In this sense, redeemed humanity will be superior to, and judges of, the spiritual world"—ELLICOTT.

4. Them who are of no esteem in the Church — that is, heathens, who, as such, could be in no esteem with the Christians"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul asks with bitter irony, 'Is it because your matters of dispute are so small, as belonging merely to the present life, compared with the tremendous sentence yourselves will share in pronouncing,—is it for this reason that you submit them to men on whom you look down with contempt as aliens from the kingdom of God and exposed to the condemnation of the great day, to men worthy to decide only these trifling temporal matters?"—BEET.

5. "Is there not one among you, who are such admirers of wisdom, that is wise enough to decide such causes?"—WESLEY.

"I speak to your shame. You are not to suppose me in earnest. I only say this to shame you for the undue value you set on the things of this life. Such matters might fitly be left to the decision of the most insignificant member of your community. But there is no necessity for that. Surely there are plenty of persons among you who are competent to settle such questions, and thus save you the scandal of carrying your disputes before the heathen, when you have pledged yourself to lead a life above such considerations"—C. B.

6. "But brother goeth to law with brother. It would almost seem as if it were not so. Your dragging these disputes before tribunals of the heathen would imply that it is not possible to find a Christian friend whom you can trust to settle these trivial disputes. Thus the apostle answers his question of the previous verse"—ELLICOTT. "But brother goeth to law. It is not a question between ecclesiastical and civil courts, but between law and equity, litigation and arbitration. . . . The remedy is not more elaborate law, nor cheaper law, nor greater facility of law, but more Christianity"—ROBERTSON. (Comp. Note on ver. 1.) "And that before the unbelievers—rather, 'before unbelievers,' the fact of appearing before unbelievers at all on such matters being the point to which attention is directed. Beside the scandal of such a proceeding, as exposing their internal differences to the eyes of the heathen, there were certain formularies to be gone through in the heathen law courts, such as adjurations by heathen deities, which would involve them in idolatrous practices"—WORDSWORTH. "To us, the argument of vers. 1-6 is modified by the fact that our public courts are, for the more part, presided over by excellent Christian men. But the injury inflicted upon a church by lawsuits between members, and the spirit of unscrupulous grasping in one or both parties, which lies at the root of nearly all lawsuits, are the same in all ages"—BEET.

7. "Indeed there is a fault, that ye quarrel with each other at all, whether ye go to law or no. Why do ye not rather suffer wrong? All men cannot or will not receive this saying. Many aim only at this, 'I will neither do wrong, nor suffer it.' These are honest heathens, but no Christians"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul does not say that a Christian should do nothing to secure himself against injustice. But if it must come to a lawsuit, he advises rather to bear the wrong. Is he alluding to the precepts of Jesus in His Sermon on the Mount? (Matt. 5. 39-42.) It seems very probable. The thought which Jesus undoubtedly meant to express in these paradoxical forms is this: Love, infinite as God, is ready, so far as itself is concerned, to bear everything. If, therefore, in practice it sets limits to this absolute patience, it is not from regard to itself, as if its endurance were at an end; but it is for the good of that very being with whom it has to do, so that it is in this case its own limit—in other words, it has no limit outside of itself"—GODET. "The world has no remedy for its miseries but the cure of its selfishness. The cross of Christ, the spirit of that Sacrifice, can alone be the regeneration of the world"—ROBERTSON. "To go to law for revenge we are simply forbidden, that is, to return evil for evil; and therefore all those suits which are for vindictive sentences, not for reparative, are directly criminal"—JEREMY TAYLOR.

8. Nay, ye do wrong—"openly—and defraud—privately. Oh, how powerfully did the mystery of iniquity already work!"—WESLEY.

"Not only are you not willing to suffer injury, but you inflict it, and you inflict it upon those with whom you are conjoined in relations as affectionate as the ties of blood. 'One is your Master upon earth, and all ye are brethren.' And this was not to be a convention or a sentiment, but a fact; witnessed to by the affectionate name 'the brethren,' by which everywhere Christians were known"—LIAS.

9. "Idolatry is here placed between fornication and adultery, because they generally accompanied it. Nor the effeminate—who live in an easy, indolent way; taking up no cross, enduring no hardship. But how is this? These good-natured, harmless people are ranked with idolaters and sodomites! We may learn hence, that we are never secure from the greatest sins, till we guard against those which are thought the least; nor, indeed, till we think no sin is little, since everyone is a step toward hell"—WESLEY.

"Do you not know? This conduct, like all sin, arose from ignorance. Unrighteous, or 'unjust,' refers specifically to ver. 8; but includes the sin of ver. 1 and all other sin. For against all sin equally this solemn warning is valid"—BEET. "The Corinthians seemed to imagine that their religious knowledge and Christian talk would suffice to open heaven to them, whatever their conduct otherwise might be. But how do they fail to understand that by falling back into sin, from which faith had rescued them, they themselves destroy the effect of their transition from heathenism to the gospel?"—GODET.

11. And such were some of you: but ye are washed—"from those gross abominations; nay, and ye are inwardly sanctified; not before, but in consequence of, your being justified in the name—that is, by the merits—of the Lord Jesus, through which your sins are forgiven. And by the Spirit of our God—by whom ye are thus washed and sanctified"—WESLEY.

No man should boast about his former sinful life, but he may sometimes profitably think of it. The "new song" is not the result of the "horrible pit and the miry clay," but of the gracious deliverance from such sad uncleanness. "In the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. The name of Christ stands for His power. The original has 'in the Spirit,' not by the Spirit of our God. Therefore something more is probably conveyed than a mere instrumental agency. A comparison of this passage with others in which the indwelling of the Spirit is implied, as in ver. 19 and Rom. 8. 11, teaches us that the Holy Spirit is the instrument of our sanctification and justification, by virtue of our dwelling in Him and He in us, making Christ's death to sin and His life in righteousness an accomplished fact in our hearts and lives. (See also John 3. 6)"—C. B. Calvin remarks that we have here a prohibition of polygamy.

SECTION V.—Vers. 12-20. IMPURITY.—12. All things—"which are lawful for you—are lawful for me, but all things are not always expedient—particularly when anything would offend my weak brother; or when it would enslave my own soul. For though all things are lawful for me, yet I will not be brought under the power of any—so as to be uneasy when I abstain from it; if so, then I am under the power of it"—WESLEY.

"The great principle of Christian liberty. All things are lawful for me. S. Paul now sees he must guard against abuse by adding,

But all things are not expedient. The Law and its modifications are fully explained in ch. 8. 10, 23, etc. All things are in my power. Yes, but for that very reason I will not be brought under the power of any. The reasonable use of my liberty cannot go to the length of involving my own loss of it"—GODET. I am free from the Law; I will not on that account become the slave of indulgence. As CARLYLE puts it, "Enjoying things which are pleasant—that is not the evil; it is the reducing of our moral self to slavery by them that is. Let a man assert withal that he is king over his habitudes; that he could and would shake them off on cause shown: this is an excellent law." "Christ lays down the general rule (John 16. 13), the apostles apply it to particular emergencies"—STANLEY. "This verse is a good guide of conduct in matters not expressly forbidden. By experience and observation, guided by the Spirit of wisdom and love, we must discover the effect of various actions upon our own inner life, and through us on those influenced by our example, and act accordingly. For no intelligent man will do a thing without considering its results, merely because it is lawful. A beautiful development of this principle is found in ch. 10. 23–33; 8. 9–13; Rom. 14. 13–21"—BEET.

13. "As if he had said, I speak this chiefly with regard to meats (and would to God all Christians would consider it!), particularly with regard to those offered to idols, and those forbidden in the Mosaic Law. These, I grant, are all indifferent, and have their use, though it is only for a time; then meats, and the organs which receive them, will together moulder into dust. But the case is quite otherwise with fornication. This is not indifferent, but at all times evil. For the body is for the Lord—designed only for His service. And the Lord, in an important sense, for the body—being the Saviour of this, as well as of the soul; in proof of which God hath already raised Him from the dead"—WESLEY.

Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats. This is a matter of comparatively trifling importance. Meat is a necessity for our present undeveloped life; in the world where hunger and thirst will be no more, it will no longer be so. And therefore, both it, and the organs formed to digest it, will be no longer wanted. Now the body is not for fornication. S. Paul is led, by the importance he attaches to this point, to treat it first. The abominable licentiousness of heathen cities in general, and of Corinth in particular (see Dean Stanley's Note on ver. 12), had led to a general conviction that the body was for fornication. S. Paul contradicts this, and most emphatically proclaims that what was always permitted among heathens, and even in some cases enjoined as a religious rite, was distinctly in itself an unlawful act, not excusable on the plea of necessity, which he had admitted in the case of meats, nor, like them, a question of "nicely calculated less or more," but contrary to the laws laid down by God for man, and calculated to deprive men of the blessings of the resurrection. But for the Lord—i.e. Jesus Christ. The body is not formed to serve a purely material end, but is the instrument of the Spirit, and its end the glory of God, through Christ. And the Lord for the body. Because from our point of view Christ came that we might serve and honour Him in our bodies. This sentence answers to meats for the belly, and the belly for meats, above.

14. And will also raise up us. Unlike the belly, whose functions shall cease, the body, through its Lord, is destined to an enduring life. We are taught in Rom. 8. 11, in ch. 15, and by that much neglected article in the Creed, "The Resurrection of the Body," that Christ came to save, sanctify, and raise again, not our souls only, but our bodies. By His own power. Our version has rendered definite here what in the original is indefinite. It is impossible to say for certain whether the word 'His' refers to the Father or to Christ; but the analogy of John 5. 21, 25, 28; 11. 25, and especially 2 Cor. 4. 14, would lead us to the conclusion that Christ is here meant. But see Eph. 1. 19, 20. There seems to be a distinction implied in the Greek of this verse between the raising of Christ, who saw no corruption, and the raising us from our state of corruption and almost annihilation, through the power of Christ.

15. "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? This solemn truth, that by our calling as Christians we are so closely united to Christ as to be 'members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones' (Eph. 5. 30), is employed here to remind us of the restrictions placed upon our Christian liberty. Our body is Christ's—nay, it is, in a sense, 'a part of Christ Himself.' It may not be used in violation of the laws imposed upon it from the beginning by God. Nor may it be used to the detriment of others, who equally, with ourselves, belong to Christ. And the sin here reproved leads to all kinds of misery and wretchedness, and that because (ver. 18) it is a violation of the eternal law of God impressed upon the human body"—C. B.

16. "A truth which the readers ought to know, justifying the foregoing words"—BEET.

17. But he that is joined to the Lord—"by faith—is one spirit with Him—and shall he make himself one flesh with an harlot?"—WESLEY.

"Union with the Lord—personal union—is the precious secret and deep foundation of all our fellowship. He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit. The spirit common to Him and to His people makes them partakers of Christ, and of all His interests; even as Christ becomes a partaker with us and all that is ours. The Christian is no longer his own; he has come out of himself; he has a new life, breathes in a new world, the sun and the air and the nourishment and the life and end of which is the Lord. He is a man still, but a man in Christ"—POPE. "Christianity interferes indirectly, not directly, with existing institutions"—ROBERTSON.

18. Flee fornication—"all unlawful commerce with women, with speed, with abhorrence, with all your might. Every sin that a man commits against his neighbour terminates upon an object out of himself, and does not so immediately pollute his body, though it does his soul. But he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body—pollutes, dishonours, and degrades it to a level with brute beasts"—WESLEY.

"That is, every other sinful act which affects the body approaches it from without and affects particular members. But this sin takes the body itself as a whole and makes it an instrument of sin. For it is a violation of the fundamental law impressed upon man from the beginning, whereby it is decreed that a man shall cleave to his wife, and to her alone, and they twain shall be, or rather, become one flesh. (Gen. 2. 24.) This view is confirmed by the fact that the word here translated sinneth, means 'to go astray,' 'to miss the mark'; so that the words sinneth against his own body imply the running counter to the objects for which the body is created. If this be the correct interpretation of the passage, the practice of polygamy is here condemned. (Rom. 1. 24)"—C. B.

19. "And even your body is not, strictly speaking, your own—even this is the temple of the Holy Ghost—dedicated to Him, and inhabited by Him. What the apostle calls elsewhere 'the temple of God' (ch. 3. 16, 17), and 'the temple of the living God' (2 Cor. 6. 16), he here styles the temple of the Holy Ghost; plainly showing that the Holy Ghost is the living God"—WESLEY.

"Nothing can be more effectual than the thought of such an inhabitation, as being the result of our Christian calling, to restrain us from the sin here mentioned. Ye are not your own. (Ch. 7. 22; Rom. 6. 18, 22; John 8. 36; also Rom. 14. 8.) The Scriptures frequently remind us that we have passed from slavery to sin into slavery to Christ, the latter slavery, however, being the true freedom of man, enabling him to fulfil the law of his being"—LIAS. "God is especially present in the hearts of His people, by His Holy Spirit; and, indeed, the hearts of holy men are temples in the truth of things, and, in type and shadow, they are heaven itself. For God reigns in the hearts of His servants; there is His kingdom. The power of grace has subdued all His enemies; there is His power"—JEREMY TAYLOR.

20. Glorify God with your body and your spirit—"yield your bodies and all their members, as well as your souls and all their faculties, as instruments of righteousness to God. Devote and employ all ye have, and all ye are, entirely, unreservedly, and for ever, to His glory"—WESLEY.

In the R.V. the words "and in your spirit, which are God's," are omitted. "He that made you, and has fed you as His children, has every claim of grateful obedience. Nay, more; the Redeemer who ransomed your life with His own requires that you should henceforth be the temples of the living God. What grace is this to sinners of the Gentiles, that they should now be as holy as they had been polluted and profane! This is the only way in which those trophies of mercy can glorify God in body and mind"—SUTCLIFFE. "Ye are (lit. 'were') bought with a price—the 'one sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction made for the sins of the whole world' by the death and passion of our Saviour Christ. (Comp. Acts 20. 28; 1 Pet. 1. 19; 2 Pet. 2. 1; Rev. 5. 9, etc.) And in your spirit, which are God's. These words are not found in many of the best MSS. and versions, and they somewhat weaken the force of the argument, which is intended to assert the dignity of the body. They were perhaps inserted by some who, missing the point of the apostle's argument, thought that the worship of the spirit was unduly passed over"—C. B. "It appears from this teaching that contempt of the body goes side by side with abuse of the body, while respect for the body will always be the best means of ruling it. And so the whole of Scripture, from the first page of Genesis to the last of Revelation, pays homage to the dignity of the human body"—GODET.

CHAPTER VII.

SECTION VI. — Vers. 1–40. CONCERNING MARRIAGE AND CELIBACY.—1. It is good for a man—"who is master of himself—not to touch a woman—that is, not to marry. So great and many are the advantages of a single life"—WESLEY.

"The newly-converted Corinthians had evidently found themselves in a difficulty concerning marriage. The Jews, in general, set a high value upon it; while the best of the heathen philosophers were inclined to depreciate it, and certain sayings of our Lord (see Matt. 19. 5-12) seemed to support their view. The apostle's advice may be thus summarised: that though the unmarried were, from their freedom from all entangling ties, most at liberty to serve God in any way that He might put before them, and though in the present season of temptation and persecution (vers. 26, 28) the unmarried would be spared much trial and anguish which would fall heavily upon married persons, yet that it was the duty of those who, in an unmarried state, were in danger of offending against that solemn law of Christian purity which he had just laid down, to 'marry, and so keep themselves undefiled members of Christ's body'"—C. B.

2. "Yet, when it is needful, in order to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife. His own—for Christianity allows no polygamy"—WESLEY.

But, because of fornication (R.V.). Meyer explains that we must not suppose we have here the whole of the apostle's view of marriage, but simply that which connects itself with the question that has been asked him. To understand the doctrine of marriage, as generally delivered in the Christian Scriptures, we must compare John 2; Eph. 5. 23-30; 1 Tim. 5. 14; Heb. 13. 4; 1 Pet. 3. 1-7. "These are questions of casuistry, which depend upon the particular case, from which word the term casuistry is derived"—ROBERTSON.

3. "Let not married persons fancy that there is any perfection in living with each other as if they were unmarried. The debt—this ancient reading seems far more natural than the common one"—WESLEY.

"Due benevolence (R.V. 'Her due'). The emphatic repetition, and in like manner also, gives to husband and wife exactly equal marriage rights, which the other is bound to pay. This equal right is made very prominent by the repetitions of vers. 2-4"—BEET. "In this verse the apostle answers the scruples of those who already were married and who doubted whether they should continue so"—ELLICOTT.

4. The wife: the husband. "Let no one forget this, on pretence of greater purity"—WESLEY.

"We here are reminded of the valuable principle, that in everything connected with the duties of married life, each should consult the comfort, well-being, and happiness of the other before their own, and should be especially careful that they do not, by any selfishness on their part, 'cause their brother to offend'"—LIAS. "This verse justifies the direction given in the preceding. By the conjugal bond, each spouse acquires a right over the person of the other. Consequently each alienates a portion of personal independence"—GODET.

5. Unless it be by consent for a time—"that on those special and solemn occasions ye may entirely give yourselves up to the exercises of devotion. Lest—if ye should long remain separate—Satan tempt you—to unclean thoughts, if not actions too"—WESLEY.

"In this verse there is reproduced the directions given in ver. 3, but in a negative form. Defraud not—to exclude expressly the contrary opinion, and at the same time to limit this prohibition, nevertheless under certain conditions fitted to remove the danger of restriction. The interruption of the conjugal relations authorised by the apostle may take place on three conditions—(1) mutual consent, (2) temporary duration, (3) the aim of securing spiritual meditation"—GODET. "Have leisure for prayer—suggests the excellent custom of occasionally setting apart a period of some days for special devotional exercises. During such periods, for unremitting attention to the spiritual matters, separation may perhaps be desirable"—BEET.

6. But I say this—"concerning your separating for a time and coming together again. Perhaps he refers also to ver. 2"—WESLEY.

"As this passage is given in our English version, it might seem as if the apostle implied that he had no actual command, but only a permission to write this, which is not at all his meaning. What he does say is, that the foregoing instructions are not to be considered as absolute commands from him, but as general permissive instruction, to be applied by each individual according to circumstances. It has been much discussed as to what part of the previous passage the word 'this' refers. It is perhaps best to take it as referring to the leading thought of the whole passage, which is that marriage is allowable, expressed especially in ver. 2"—ELLICOTT.

7. For I would that all men were herein even as I. "I would that all believers who are now unmarried would remain 'eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake.' S. Paul, having tasted the sweetness of this liberty, wished others to enjoy it as well as himself. But everyone hath his proper gift from God—according to our Lord's declaration, 'All men cannot receive this saying, save they,' the happy few, 'to whom it is given' (Matt. 19. 11)"—WESLEY.

"These words do not mean that the apostle wished that everyone was unmarried, but that everyone had the same grace of continence which he himself was endowed with, so that they might, without risk of sin, remain unmarried (see ver. 26). Yet, he adds, there are many gifts, and God has given to each man his own gift, so that, though you may not have the particular gift of continence which I have, you have some other. One has one kind of gift; another has another kind"—ELLICOTT. "Like myself—endowed with complete self-control. This would make these counsels needless. But each one, etc.—a modest softening down of the apparent assumption, in ver. 7*a*, of superior piety. 'Gift of grace,' as in ch. 1. 7; Rom. 1. 11; 12. 4. S. Paul remembers that his own self-control was the gift to him of God's undeserved favour; that each believer has a gift, i.e. some kind of spiritual excellence wrought in him by God; that in some the favour of God shows itself in this way, i.e. by giving self-control, in others in some other gift, perhaps equally valuable. Therefore S. Paul's possession of this one gift is no proof of superiority on the whole. (Comp. Rom. 12. 3-6.) This principle ought to control all our comparisons of ourselves with others"—BEET.

8. It is good for them if they remain even as I. "That S. Paul was then single is certain; and from Acts 7. 58, compared with the following parts of the history, it seems probable that he always was so. It does not appear that this declaration, any more than ver. 1, hath any reference at all to a state of persecution"—WESLEY.

"After expressing a wish that all men had the self-control which by God's grace he has, and prompted by this mention of himself, S. Paul now says a word to those who, like himself, are unmarried, i.e. without wives, including (comp. ver. 11) widowers. And the widows—included in 'the unmarried,' but added because of them (comp. ver. 40), these words apply specially. (Comp. 'and Peter,' Mark 16. 7.) It is good, etc.—restates the principle of ver. 1. Remain as I also am—continue unmarried, in contrast to let them marry. The words if they remain imply that S. Paul refers here to his outward position, not as in ver. 7, to his inner self-control. And this proves that he had no wife when he wrote; but gives no hint whether he once had"—BEET.

10. Not I—"only. But the Lord—Christ; by His express command (Matt. v. 32)"—WESLEY.

"A distinction has sometimes been drawn with reference to this verse, and other parts of this chapter, between that which the apostle speaks by inspiration, and what he speaks as a man uninspired. The distinction, however, is an altogether false one, and beside the question. The real distinction is not between inspired and uninspired, but between a decision in matters of Christian duty, and advice in matters of Christian prudence"—ROBERTSON. "No question here of apostolic inspiration. Nothing is clearer than that S. Paul wrote in general under inspiration; he declares this, as far as a man may do so about himself, in ver. 40. There were times indeed when he was pre-eminently inspired; when his spirit swelled and teemed with superabounding revelations, not all of which his pen was permitted to transcribe. In this verse he simply cited the weightier testimony of the Divine Master; for he knew by the living voice of tradition what command Christ had given concerning divorce (Matt. 19. 3–9; Mark 10. 2–12)"—EVANS.

11. But if she depart—"contrary to this express prohibition. And let not the husband put away his wife—except for the cause of adultery"—WESLEY.

"Lit. 'be separated.' There were great facilities for divorce, both under the law of Greece and Rome, in S. Paul's day, but the facilities were greater for the husband than for the wife. At Athens the husband could dismiss his wife at will. So, in Roman law, the husband had originally the full disposal of the wife's person and liberty, but this harsh regulation was resented by the wives, and in the days of the empire the wife also obtained the power of divorce. The Jewish law of divorce was also very loose. (See Matt. 5. 31, 32; Deut. 24. 1)"—Smith's Dictionary.

12, 13. To the rest—"who are married to unbelievers—speak I—by revelation from God, though our Lord hath not left any commandment concerning it. Let him not put her away. The Jews, indeed, were obliged of old to put away their idolatrous wives (Ezra 10. 3); but their case was quite different. They were absolutely forbidden to marry idolatrous women; but the persons here spoken of were married while they were both in a state of heathenism"—WESLEY.

"Not the Lord implies that Matt. 19. 6 does not apply to them. The intimate connection of heathenism with the details of social life made the position of Christians married to heathens so peculiar that it could not be dealt with on the ground of words spoken by Christ to those only who were worshippers of the true God. Therefore, having no command of Christ to quote, S. Paul himself speaks. (Comp. ver. 25.) Has a wife, an unbeliever—whom he has already married, before or since his conversion. To marry such is, in ver. 39, expressly forbidden. Agrees to live with him implies that both husband and wife are willing"—BEET. "When the Jews returned from Babylon, Ezra the priest obliged them to dismiss their idolatrous wives, as polluters of their blood, and as dangerous to their religion (Ezra 9. 10). This was difficult to do, and it occasioned great anguish of mind. But the Jews could then marry other wives, instead of those they had dismissed, and what then could the converted Gentiles do in such a case? One great part of the mystery of godliness was, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs with the believing Jews of the grace of life, and equally participate in all their privileges. But in the Jewish case, as well as in the Christian, marrying with unbelievers is forbidden by a permanent law of the Church. The Christian widow, as in ver. 39, cannot marry, except in the Lord, or to one regenerate and born again. (Rom. 8. 1; 16. 17)"—SUTCLIFFE.

14. "For the unbelieving husband hath, in many instances, been sanctified by the wife. Else your children would have been brought up heathens; whereas now they are Christians. As if he had said, 'Ye see the proof of it before your eyes'"—WESLEY.

"From this verse, Neander, Meyer, Stanley, and others, have inferred that infant baptism was not usual when it was written, on the ground that, if the children of believers had been baptized, the difference between them and the unbaptized husband would bar all argument from one to the other. Whether or not the children were baptized, and whether they were infants or adults, they had an indisputable claim to the care of a Christian parent. Therefore, to give them such care, could in no case defile. Consequently, baptism had no bearing at all on the case. And this is sufficient reason for S. Paul's silence about it, even though the rite had been administered to some of the children"—BEET.

15. A brother or a sister—"a Christian man or woman—is not enslaved—is at full liberty—in such cases: but God hath called us to peace—to live peaceably with them, if it be possible"—WESLEY.

"Let him separate himself refers probably to simple separation, as opposed to 'live with him' (ver. 12); but doubtless includes divorce. 'If the unbeliever wishes to go, do not prevent him.' To be obliged to force oneself on a reluctant heathen husband or wife would be a bondage inconsistent with Christian liberty. Moreover, in peace, etc.—additional reason for letting him go. The gospel came proclaiming 'peace' (Eph. 2. 14, 17), in contrast to the bondage, and therefore confusion, which would follow an attempt to force oneself on an unbeliever. The peacefulness of Christianity forbids this"—BEET.

16. "The very power of saving belongs to this relationship of marriage. And, on the other hand, there is no earthly relationship which has so much power to wreck and ruin the soul"—ROBERTSON.

17. "But as God hath distributed the various stations of life, and various relations, to everyone, let him take care to discharge his duty therein. The gospel disannuls none of these. And thus I ordain in all the churches—as a point of the highest concern"—WESLEY.

"A general and universal principle, viz., 'Be not eager to change,' which limits the foregoing counsel. As the Lord Christ, the Ruler of the Church and the world, who divides among men the various circumstances, and has thus allotted to each one his position. But this allotment does not include positions of sin. These are always self-chosen"—BEET. "The believer is never to cause or promote a separation, for he is to be guided by the great principle that we are to continue to walk in those social and political relations by which we were bound when God called us. Christianity does not destroy them, but purifies and exalts them, and thus makes them more binding on us than before. According as the Lord has divided to each man his position in life, and as God has called each man, so in that condition let him walk as a Christian"—ELLICOTT. "It is not externals that make a Christian; and if God's grace has found a man in unlikely circumstances, that is the best evidence he can have that he will find opportunity of serving God in those circumstances, if there be no sin in them. It throws great light on the relation which we as Christians hold to the institutions of our country, and generally to outward things, when we understand that Christianity does not begin by making external changes, but begins within and gradually finds its way outwards, modifying and rectifying all it meets"—DODS.

19. Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing—"will neither promote nor obstruct our salvation. The one point is, keeping the commandments of God—'faith working by love'"—WESLEY.

Often those who regard some ceremony as unimportant magnify the very disregard of it into a necessary virtue. The apostle carefully guards against that by expressing the nothingness of both circumcision and uncircumcision. (Rom. 2. 25; Gal. 5. 6; 6. 15.) The teaching here is, practically, "To obey is better than sacrifice."

20. In the calling—"the outward state—wherein he is—when God calls him. Let him not seek to change this without a clear direction from Providence"—WESLEY.

This is an emphatic repetition of the principle on which the previous practical instruction is based. Calling must not here be regarded in the modern sense of profession or condition in life; it is nowhere so used in the New Testament, but always signifies God's calling of us. (See Rom. 11. 29; Eph. 1. 18.) Continue to be Christians of the kind which God's call to Christianity made you. If you were not circumcised—and so God's call into the Christian Church made you a circumcised Christian — continue so; don't do anything which would seem to imply that some other change, in addition to your 'call,' was necessary to complete your admission to the Church"—ELLICOTT.

21. Care not for it—"do not anxiously seek liberty. But if thou canst be free, use it rather — embrace the opportunity"—WESLEY.

Here in this domain is the extreme case which can be conceived. Few situations could appear so incompatible with Christian holiness, dignity, and freedom as that of a slave. But a multitude of evidences proves that Christianity had quite specially found access to persons of this class. But, abnormal as this position may appear, it will not remain beyond the victorious influence of the gospel. The spiritual elevation which faith communicates places the believer above even this contrast: slaves, free. There is something heroic in the word of the apostle, care not for it. "Do not let this position weigh either on thy conscience or on thy heart."

22. Is the Lord's freeman—"is free in this respect. The Greek word implies one that was a slave, but now is free. Is the bondman of Christ—not free in this respect; not at liberty to do his own will"—WESLEY.

"In the light of this verse all human distinctions vanish. We are all servants, doing what seems good, not to ourselves but to our Lord. We are all free; for we accept with joy, and with the full consent of all that is noblest within us, the position in His household which our Maste has allotted to each"—BEET.

23. Ye are bought with a price — "ye belong to God; therefore, where it can be avoided, do not become the bondslaves of men—which may expose you to many temptations"—WESLEY.

"Christ died that we may be His servants, and His only. Therefore, the blood shed on Calvary, which has made us free, forbids us to bow to the yoke of bondage"—BEET. With a great price—even the blood of Christ—they have been purchased by Him as freedmen; therefore do not become slaves of men—do not yield to their views by seeking to change the condition of your calling.

24. Therein abide with God—"doing all things as unto God, and as in His immediate presence. They who thus 'abide with God' preserve an holy indifference with regard to outward things"—WESLEY.

"This is the principle. Christianity was not to interfere with existing relationships; Christian men were to remain in those relationships in which they were when called, and in them to develop the inward spirituality of the Christian life. We should say, 'All our existing institutions are those under which God has placed us, under which we are to mould our lives according to His will.' It is our duty to vitalise our forms, to throw into them a holier, deeper meaning"—ROBERTSON. "By these words, abiding in that state, and that before God, S. Paul reminds his readers of the moral act which has the power of sanctifying and ennobling every external position: the eye fixed on God, walking in His presence. This is what preserves the believer from the temptations arising from the situation in which he is; this is what raises the humblest duties you can impose on him to the supreme dignity of acts of worship. In fact, this principle has been of incalculable importance in the development of the Church. It is by means of it that Christianity has been able to become a moral power at once sufficiently firm and sufficiently elastic to adapt itself to all human situations, personal, domestic, national, and social"—GODET.

Vers. 25–38. GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS CONCERNING THE MARRIAGE OF VIRGINS. — 25. Now concerning virgins—"of either sex—I have no commandment from the Lord—by a particular revelation. Nor was it necessary he should; for the apostles wrote nothing which was not divinely inspired; but with this difference—sometimes they had a particular revelation and a special commandment; at other times they wrote from the Divine light which abode with them, the standing treasure of the Spirit of God. And this, also, was not their private opinion, but a Divine rule of faith and practice. As one whom God hath made faithful in my apostolic office; who therefore faithfully deliver what I receive from Him"—WESLEY.

"I have no infallible direction, coming from the Lord, to give you. But through the grace shown to me, I find myself in a position to give you a good advice. (Comp. ver. 40.) Hence it follows that S. Paul does not give the counsel immediately to be mentioned in virtue of his apostolic authority, but as a simple Christian"—GODET. "Virgins—i.e. 'unmarried women.' S. Paul now returns to the question of marriage. But before he enters upon the question of the marriage of virgins he treats, according to his usual rule, of the general principle of which theirs is a particular case. The time is short, and he would have all as free from care as possible"—C. B. "The contrast here is not between S. Paul inspired by the Lord and S. Paul not inspired, but, as in ver. 12, between S. Paul quoting the words of Christ and S. Paul himself instructing as an inspired apostle"—ELLICOTT.

26, 27. This is good for the present distress—"while any church is under persecution—for a man to continue as he is—whether married or unmarried. S. Paul does not here urge 'the present distress' as a reason for celibacy, any more than for marriage; but for a man's not seeking to alter his state, whatever it be, but making the best of it"—WESLEY.

"The construction of this verse proposed by DE WETTE is: 'I think therefore that this (the state of virginity) is good on account of the present difficulties, seeing that in itself it is good for man so to be.' The idea is this: 'If, in general, celibacy is a state good for man (man or woman), now is the time for applying this principle, especially in regard to virgins, on account of the difficulties of the present time'"—GODET. It is most important to remember how much stress S. Paul lays upon this point as the ground of his preference for celibacy. As the reason for the preference has ceased to exist, so the advice, so far as it springs from that cause, is no longer of binding obligation. (See vers. 29–31.)

28. Such will have trouble in the flesh—"many outward troubles. But I spare you—I speak as little and as tenderly as possible"—WESLEY.

"What the affliction is, S. Paul leaves us to infer. And this is not difficult. A man with wife and family presents more points of attack in days of persecution, and is therefore more exposed to troubles, and even bodily privation, than the unmarried man. Hence the 'anxiety' of ver. 32. Am sparing you—from this bodily privation, by advising you to remain unmarried. An appeal appropriate to men over whom (ch. 3. 1–3) the bodily life had great sway. And doubtless S. Paul wished to save them, not merely from bodily privation, but from the peril of apostasy to which such privation would expose them"—BEET. "In all that precedes, S. Paul has not yet gone to the root of the matter. What is of importance is not, marrying or not marrying, but a habit of soul in keeping with the situation indicated above. And as in vers. 17-24, he had generalised the question, so as better to justify his counsel to remain in their present state, so in vers. 29-31 he explains, while applying it to various analogous cases, his true view in regard to celibacy and marriage in present circumstances" —GODET.

29. But this I say, brethren—"with great confidence — the time of our abode here is short. It plainly follows, that even they who have wives be as serious, zealous, active, dead to the world, as devoted to God, as holy in all manner of conversation, as if they had none; by so easy a transition does the apostle slide from everything else to the one thing needful, and, forgetting whatever is temporal, is swallowed up in eternity"—WESLEY.

"The conclusion of the whole matter. The time is short, the world is passing away. In whatever condition a man is, let him live in a constant state of readiness to abandon it at the bidding of God. Let him keep his soul unfettered by the ties, the enjoyments, and above all, the cares of this life. The time is short —not time in the general sense. The word here signifies a definite space of time. The word translated 'short' is rather 'shortened' -- 'compressed'" — ROBERTSON. "Living many years in one"—STANLEY. "Time is short—in relation to opportunities; lit. these words mean, 'the opportunity is compressed, narrowed'—that is, every season has its own opportunity, which never comes back. A chance once gone is lost for ever. The autumn sun shines as brightly as that of spring, but the seed of spring cannot be sown in autumn. The work of boyhood cannot be done in manhood. Let but a man possess his soul with this idea of time, and then unworldliness will be the native atmosphere he breathes"—ROBERTSON.

30. "And they that weep, as if they wept not—'though sorrowful, yet always rejoicing.' They that rejoice, as if they rejoiced not—tempering their joy with godly fear. They that buy, as if they possessed not—knowing themselves to be only stewards, not proprietors"—WESLEY.

"Here is depicted the spiritual detachment in its application to the various situations of life. As nothing in this world has more than a waiting character, the afflicted believer will not be swayed by his pains; he will say to himself, It is no more worth the trouble. The man who is visited by joy will not be intoxicated by it; he will say to himself, It is but for a moment"—GODET. "Look round this beautiful world of God's; ocean dimpled into myriad smiles; the sky a trembling, quivering mass of blue, thrilling heart with ecstasy; every tint, every form, replete with beauty. God says, 'Be glad.' Do not force young, happy hearts to an unnatural solemnity, as if to be happy were a crime. Let us hear their loud, merry, ringing laugh, even if sterner hearts can be glad no longer; to see innocent mirth and joy does the heart good. But now, observe, everlasting considerations are to come in, not to sadden joy but to calm it. We are to be calm, cheerful, self-possessed, to sit loose to all these sources of enjoyment, masters of ourselves" — ROBERTSON. EDWARDS says: "Excess is prevented, not by the diminution of the joy or of the grief, but by the harmony of both. Joy and grief becoming more profound harmonise in a sadness full of joy and a joy full of sadness."

31. "And they that use this world, as not abusing it—not seeking happiness in it, but in God: using every thing therein only in such a manner and degree as most tends to the knowledge and love of God. For the whole scheme and fashion of this world—this marrying, weeping, rejoicing, and all the rest, not only will pass, but now passeth away—is this moment flying off like a shadow"—WESLEY.

"A solemn warning to all who lay up wealth. The world—the whole realm of things around us. (See ch. 1. 20.) Using to the full—eagerly using up all opportunities of gain or pleasure, as though these were the end of life"—BEET. "We are to despise nothing, as if the being transient or physical were a reason for contempt. We are to treasure all things—only we are to measure their value by their relation to our higher nature"—BEECHER. "All the danger is when the world gets into the heart. The water is useful for the sailing of the ship; all the danger is when the water gets into the ship; so the fear is when the world gets into the heart. 'Thou shalt not covet'"—WATSON. "This poor fleeting world deserves not that we should build our hopes and joys upon it as though they could last us long. We must treat it as a treacherous soil, and build but lightly on it, and we shall be wise. Queen Elizabeth once said to a courtier, 'They pass best over the world who trip over it quickly; for it is but a bog; if we stop, we sink'"—SPURGEON. "The fashion of this world passeth away—the forms in which human life is now moulded, the kind of business we are now engaged in, the pleasures we enjoy, even the relationships we hold to one another pass away. There are no doubt relationships which time cannot dissolve, affections so pure and clinging that if the future does not renew them, it loses a large part of its charm for us. But whatever is temporary in our relation to the present world it is foolish so to set our heart on, that death may seem to end all our joy and all our usefulness. It is the thought of our great future which alone gives us sufficient courage and wisdom to deal with present things intensely and in earnest. The very intensity of our interests and affections reminds us that we cannot root ourselves in this present life, but need a larger room"—DODS.

32. "Now I would have you—for this flying moment—without carefulness—without any encumbrance of our thought. The unmarried man—if he understand and use the advantage he enjoys—careth only for the things of the Lord, how he may please the Lord"—WESLEY.

But I would have you to be free from cares (R.V.). The apostle returns to the subject immediately under consideration, and shows here what he has been saying bears upon it. This element of anxious care must be borne in mind in considering the desirability or otherwise of marriage. The whole force of the passage is, that married persons have, in the fulfilment of their obligations to each other, an additional interest and concern from which the unmarried are free. It must ever be distinctly borne in mind that this advice was given solely under the impression that the end of all earthly things was impending, and that the great trial and desolation was beginning to darken over the world.

33. "But the married careth for the things of the world—and it is his duty so to do, so far as becomes a Christian. How he may please his wife—and provide all things needful for her and his family"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul throws no blame on marriage; it is a fact which he states to justify the greater difficulty a married man experiences in realising in this state entire fidelity to the Lord. The unmarried man has only one question to put to himself—how shall I act to please the Lord? The married man is obliged to take into account another will than that of the Lord and his own, a will which he should consult and which must be gained for his plans"—GODET.

34. There is a difference also between a wife and a virgin—"whether the Church be under persecution or not. The unmarried woman—if she know and use her privilege—careth only for the things of the Lord—all her time, care, and thoughts centre in this, how she may be holy both in body and spirit. This is the standing advantage of a single life, in all ages and nations. But who makes a suitable use of it?"—WESLEY.

35. Not that I may cast a snare upon you—"who are not able to receive this saying. But for your profit—who are able. That ye may resolutely and perseveringly wait upon the Lord. The word translated 'wait' signifies 'sitting close' by a person, in a 'good' posture to hear. So Mary sat at the feet of Jesus. (Luke 10. 39.) Without distraction—without having the mind drawn any way from its centre, from its close attention to God, by any person or thing or care or encumbrance whatsoever"—WESLEY.

"The figure of throwing the net over them contains this idea: 'I do not claim to make slaves of you, to hamper your liberty by forcing you to live to my taste, and according to my personal sympathies; but this is what I have in view.' And he then expounds the ideal of Christian celibacy in the elevated and pure light in which he contemplates it—that is to say, as a state of supreme comeliness through the consecration of body and spirit to the Lord. Natural innocence raised to heavenly saintship through union with Christ—such, in the eyes of the apostle, is the incomparable adornment of the virgin"—GODET.

36. "But if any parent think he should otherwise act indecently—unbecoming his character—towards his virgin daughter, if she be above age (or of full age), and need so require (ver. 9), let them marry—her suitor and she"—WESLEY.

"Here the writer turns to the duty of parents, and there is a further explanation to such that the previous expressions are not binding commandments, but apostolic advice. If the case arises that a parent thinks he would be acting unfairly towards his unmarried daughter (i.e. exposing her to temptation) by withholding his permission for her marriage, he ought to do as he feels inclined—i.e. let the lover and his daughter marry. Let him do what he will. This sentence does not—as it may at first sight in the English appear to do—imply that he may consent or not, and whichever course he adopts he does right. It is implied in the earlier part of the sentence, that he thinks he ought to give his consent, and therefore that is what he wishes to do. Let him do that which he so wills, says S. Paul, and he need not in doing so fear that he does wrong"—SHORE.

37. Having no necessity—"where there is no such need—but having power over his own will—which would incline him to desire the increase of his family, and the strengthening it by new relations"—WESLEY.

Having no necessity. This might be the case either (1) if the maiden be not specially desirous for the married life, or (2) if her hand be not sought in marriage, or (3) if, when sought, she be unwilling to accept the proposal. The language of the apostle embraces all three suppositions. But hath power over his own will. The legitimate authority of the parent is great, but he has no right to treat his children as mere chattels. He can only be said to have "power over his own will" when he can act without selfishly thwarting the reasonable wishes of those whom God has committed to his care. And hath so decreed in his heart. "If in other lighter actions nothing is permitted to children without the authority of their parents, much less it is desirable that freedom should be given them in contracting matrimony"—CALVIN.

38. Doeth better—"if there be no necessity"—WESLEY.

"This passage clearly shows how S. Paul has not been contrasting right and wrong, but comparative degrees of what is expedient"—SHORE.

39. Only in the Lord—"that is, only let Christians marry Christians; a standing direction, and one of the utmost importance"—WESLEY.

It is supremely necessary that the precepts and principles of religion should enter into all the relationships of life, but never more so than in those of marriage. SUTCLIFFE says: "The injunction to the widow to marry only in the Lord applies with equal force to young people, and to all pious parents in the disposal of their children. Shall lands or riches or family connections be preferred to piety? What then must the Church think of the religion of those who act against the commandment, and how are such marriages likely to operate on children?"

40. I also—as well as any of you—have the Spirit of God—teaching me all things. "This does not imply any doubt; but the strongest certainty of it, together with a reproof of them for calling it in question. Whoever, therefore, would conclude from hence that S. Paul was not certain he had the Spirit of Christ neither understands the true import of the words, nor considers how expressly he lays claim to the Spirit, both in this Epistle (ch. 2. 16; 14. 37) and the other (ch. 13. 3). Indeed, it may be doubted whether the word here and elsewhere translated think does not always imply the fullest and strongest assurance. (See ch. 10. 12)"—WESLEY.

"This is no expression of doubt as to whether he had the Spirit of God, but an assurance of his confidence that he, as well as other teachers (who perhaps boast more about it) had the Spirit of God to guide him in cases where no direct command had been given by Christ"—SHORE. "By the word happier the apostle sums up the two reasons, the one general, the other particular, whereby from ver. 25 he had justified his preference given to celibacy for the Christian virgin. There is, therefore, no question of a superior holiness in this world, or a more glorious position in the next, attributed to this state"—GODET. "Happier—because unmarried and so standing aloof from domestic trials that will become sharper as the advent draws nearer, she will be in a better position for devout preparation to meet her Lord. Happier, according to my judgment—which you may not value much. 'Yet' (another corrective) 'I think that I too, as well as Apollos and other teachers, have the Spirit of God.' A truly modest way of saying, 'Under the guidance, if not of a special revelation at least of general inspiration, I have been stating my own views'"—EVANS.

CHAPTER VIII.

SECTION VII.—Chaps. 8–10. THE USE OF MEATS OFFERED TO IDOLS, AND PARTICIPATION IN THE SACRIFICIAL MEATS.—1. "Now concerning the next question you proposed. All of us have knowledge—a gentle reproof of their self-conceit. Knowledge without love always puffeth up. Love alone edifies—builds us up in holiness"—WESLEY.

"Charity (R.V. 'Love'). The sudden and matter-of-fact transition to this subject without any reason given, and in a form similar to ch. 7. 1, suggests that it was mentioned in the letter to S. Paul. He deals with it by first laying down, as usual, a great general principle, viz. that love is better than knowledge (vers. 1–3), and then looks at the matter in the light (vers. 4–6) of knowledge and (vers. 7–13) of love. Love, by its own nature, prompts us to use our powers for the good of others, and especially for their highest good"—BEET. "Love alone can produce in him who knows, and through him, in his brethren, serious moral progress. Love alone draws from God the real knowledge of Divine things, and teaches him who receives it to adapt it to the wants of his brethren"—GODET.

2. If any man think he knoweth any thing—"aright, unless so far as he is taught by God—he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know—seeing there is no true knowledge without Divine love"—WESLEY.

"There must be a moral as well as a merely intellectual element in knowledge, if it is to be true knowledge. Without love to guide us in its use it is not an operative knowledge, and so does not fulfil the true end of knowledge"—SHORE.

3. He is known—"that is, approved—by Him. (Ps. 1. 6)"—WESLEY.

This explains the nature of the love which edifies. Love to God, and therefore love to man, builds up the whole Christian communion. "The knowledge of God presupposes the being known of Him; the soul will not vivify with life from above until God has drawn nigh"—OLSHAUSEN.

4. We know that an idol is nothing—"a mere nominal God, having no divinity, virtue, or power"—WESLEY.

"It is nothing in itself but a piece of wood or metal; and it really represents nothing, for we know that there is 'no God but one'"—SHORE. "Idol—not here a mere image, but, by an inevitable transition of thought, the deity worshipped in the image. S. Paul says that Zeus, Apollo, etc., have no existence. If you search everywhere in the world, you will find no reality corresponding to the images"—BEET.

5. For though there be that are called gods—"by the heathens, both celestial (as they style them), terrestrial, and infernal deities"—WESLEY.

So-called gods—"conceptions to which the name 'god' is given. The fancy of the Greeks peopled with deities the heaven, visible and invisible, and the mountains, wood, and rivers of the earth. In the thought and lips and life of the heathen, the gods many and lords many were and are a terrible reality"—BEET.

6. Yet to us—"Christians, there is but one God. This is exclusive, not of the one Lord as if He were an inferior deity, but only of the idols to which the 'one God' is opposed. From whom are all things—by creation, providence, and grace. And we for Him—the end of all we are, have, and do. And one Lord—equally the object of Divine worship. By whom are all things—created, sustained, and governed. And we by Him—have access to the Father, and all spiritual blessings"—WESLEY.

"For us Christians there exists but one God the Father, from whom alone every created thing has come, and for (not 'in') whom alone we exist; and one Lord Jesus Christ, through whom all things are created (John 1. 3), and we Christians created spiritually by Him. All creation is of the Father through the Son. All creation is for the Father and likewise for the Son. (See Col. 1. 16.) The words we by Him must not be regarded as a repetition of part of the thought of the previous sentence; but as the words by whom are all things express the fact of physical creation, so the words we by Him attribute our spiritual re-creation as Christians to the same source. (See Gal. 6. 15; Eph. 2. 10.) This sixth verse then sweeps away completely any pantheistic conception which might have been thought to be in the previous words. Even granting, for argument sake, that such gods or lords do exist, we have one God, one Lord"—ELLICOTT.

7. Some eat, with consciousness of the idol—"that is, fancying it is something, and that it makes the meat unlawful to be eaten. And their conscience, being weak—not rightly informed—is defiled—contracts guilt by doing it"—WESLEY.

"Knowledge or enlightenment in moral truth was not universal. Conscience (see Rom. 2. 15) being weak: the inward faculty which contemplates the secrets of man's own heart not having mental and spiritual strength to grasp the truth that an idol is but an empty name. Consequently in his heart of hearts he is conscious of defilement, i.e. of that which lessens his respect for himself, and which he would hide from others. By speaking of this as something actually going on, S. Paul makes it more easy for us to realise and contemplate the process of defilement"—BEET. Conscience is a man's inward knowledge of his relation to God. It is an inborn faculty. Chrysostom calls it a natural or constitutional faculty, of knowing with one's own self, with the responsible self—knowing what or about what? A certain Divine law written in the heart. If the man act upon the early impulses in direction of what is lawful and right, these acts grow into a habit; this innate faculty is called, that which it is, "a good conscience" (Acts 23. 1), or "pure" (1 Tim. 3. 9), or "void of offence" (Acts 24. 16). If a man resist or repress the first promptings, and do what he suspects or believes to be wrong, his conscience is in precisely corresponding degrees spotted, sullied, defiled (as here, ver. 9).

8. But meat commendeth us not to God—"neither by eating, nor refraining from it; eating and not eating are in themselves things merely different"—WESLEY. (See 2 Cor. 4. 14; Col. 1. 22, 28.)

It is not Christ's creature, doomed to perish, but Christ Himself that shall present us to God. The use of meats, like that of all outward things (Col. 2. 22), is a matter of absolute insignificance in itself. The question of real importance is, What effect will our conduct have on others?

9. "To them that are weak—uninformed in the truth, or unsettled as to their knowledge of it"—BENSON. "This liberty of yours—rather 'right.' Under ordinary circumstances we have a right to act upon our rational convictions. But this right has its limits (see ch. 6. 12, and note). We are bound to respect the scruples of the conscientious though perhaps unenlightened man. In this particular case there are those who conscientiously regard an idol as having a real existence, and anything offered in sacrifice to it as its property, and therefore as unfit to be partaken of by Christians. The perceptions of such persons may be far from clear, but their motives are pure and worthy of respect. We may be wiser than they; but we must be careful that we do not by our wisdom betray them into sin. Become a stumblingblock to them that are weak. What reality is there in your religion if you look at men struggling in darkness, and are content to congratulate yourselves that you are in the light? Slaves—idolaters—superstitious—alas! is that all that we have to say?"—ROBERTSON.

10. For if anyone see thee who hast knowledge—"whom he believes to have more knowledge than himself, and who really has this knowledge, that an idol is nothing—sitting down to an entertainment in an idol-temple. The heathens frequently made entertainments in their temples, on what had been sacrificed to their idols. Will not the conscience of him that is weak—scrupulous—be encouraged—by thy example—to eat—though with a doubting conscience?"—WESLEY.

"It suffices to call to mind that the more advanced believer should, by his superior knowledge, have edified the other by enlightening his conscience, and emancipating him from his false scruples, whereas by his imprudence he leads him to trample upon his conscience, and thus substitutes false edification for the true: he enlightens and strengthens him to his loss! Fine edification! It may appear surprising that S. Paul here lets the conduct of the strong Christian pass without calling his attention to the evil which he may do himself by taking part in such a banquet in such a place. But the apostle never wanders from his subject. His subject here is the self-denial imposed by love to our neighbour. He will afterwards (ch. 10. 15-21) treat the other side of the question, that concerning the danger to which the strong believer exposes himself"—GODET.

11. And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?—"and for whom thou wilt not lose a meal's meat, so far from dying for him! We see, Christ died even for them that perish"—WESLEY.

For through thy knowledge he that is weak perisheth, the brother for whose sake Christ died (R.V.). The apostle is thinking of the immediate effect: "He is from that moment in the way of perdition." An unfaithfulness, however small it may appear, separates the believer from his Lord; by interposing between the branch and the stock, it interrupts the communication of life which ought to take place from one to the other. From that moment spiritual death commences; and if this state continues and becomes aggravated, as is inevitable in such a case, eternal perdition is the end of it. (Comp. Rom. 14. 15.) Every word of this verse has a force of its own. Cause to perish—what success! A weak brother—what magnanimity! Through knowledge, which ought to have been used for his advancement—what fidelity in the grace received! A brother over whom thou shouldest have watched as over the apple of thine eye—what love! A man for love of whom Christ gave Himself to die—what gratitude!

12. Ye sin against Christ—"whose members they are"—WESLEY.

And thus, sinning against the brethren, and wounding their conscience when it is weak, ye sin against Christ (R.V.). (Comp. Matt. 25. 40, 45.) For the reason of this comp. John 17 throughout, as also such passages as Rom. 12. 5; Eph. 1. 23; 3. 17; 4. 15, 16; Col. 2. 19; and ch. 10. 17; 12. 27, of this Epistle, where the indwelling of Christ in the individual believer is taught. It is this sin against Christ which S. Paul more especially emphasises as the gravest of all.

13. If meat—"of any kind. Who will follow this example? What preacher or private Christian will abstain from anything lawful in itself, when it offends a weak brother?"—WESLEY.

(See Matt. 18. 6; Mark 9. 42; Luke 17. 1, 2.) "This abridgment of their liberty is a duty more especially incumbent on all who are possessed of influence"—ROBERTSON. "S. Paul in his ardour for the conversion of souls was ready, not only to abstain from meats offered to idols, but from meat altogether, rather than be a stumblingblock in another's way"—ESTIUS. "It is not enough that we avoid what is sinful ourselves; Christian love will teach us even to abridge ourselves of our liberty in lawful things for others' good"—COKE. "S Paul's law is that liberty must be tempered by love; that the individual must consider the society of which he forms a part; and that, after his own conscience is satisfied regarding the legitimacy of certain actions, he must further consider how the conscience of his neighbour will be affected if he uses his liberty and does these actions. He must endeavour to keep step with the Christian community of which he forms a part, and must beware of giving offence to less enlightened persons by his freer conduct. He must consider, not only whether he himself can do this or that with a good conscience, but also how the conscience of those who know what he does will be affected by it"—DODS. HOLSTEN well sums up the idea of this chapter thus: "The strong sought the solution of the question from the standpoint of knowledge and its rights; the apostle finds it from the standpoint of love and its obligations." And GODET adds: "The last words of this chapter evidently form the transition to the following passage, in which S. Paul continues to present to the Corinthians his own example, by reminding them of the great and constant voluntary sacrifice with which he accompanies the exercise of his apostleship. To the contingent sacrifice of ver. 13 he adds, as a still more convincing example, the sacrifice which he has already made, and which he renews daily, his renunciation of all recompence from the churches founded by him."

CHAPTER IX.

Vers. 1-14. S. PAUL'S DEFENCE OF HIS APOSTOLIC AUTHORITY.—1. Am I not free? am I not an apostle—"that is, have not I the liberty of a common Christian—yea, that of an apostle? He vindicates his apostleship (vers. 1-3), his apostolical liberty (vers. 4-19). Have I not seen Jesus Christ? Without this he could not have been one of those first grand witnesses. Are not ye my work in the Lord—a full evidence that God has sent me? And yet some, it seems, objected to his being an apostle, because he had not asserted his privilege in demanding and receiving such maintenance from the churches as was due to that office"—WESLEY.

"In ch. 8, S. Paul has been exhorting the Corinthians to sacrifice their own personal predilections for the benefit of others. In ver. 13 he declares himself to be ready to act upon this principle to the uttermost. But some may say, 'Fine doctrine this, but does the apostle practise what he preaches?'"—ROBERTSON. He is about to give proof of his sincerity by referring to his sacrifice of self for the good of others, when he anticipates the reply, You have no power to do otherwise; you are not an apostle at all; and he replies to each of these statements, by asking of each of them, Is it really then true? The argument is summarised by Bishop WORDSWORTH thus: "Am I not free? am I not an apostle? am I not your apostle?" "A Christian man is the most free lord of all, and subject to none; a Christian man is the most dutiful servant of all, and subject to every one"—LUTHER.

2. Ye are the seal of my apostleship—"who have received not only faith by my mouth, but all the gifts of the Spirit by my hands"—WESLEY.

"Others may doubt my claims; you cannot. The church at Corinth, being evidently God's work, was a conspicuous and Divine attestation of S. Paul's often-repeated claim that by the immediate voice of Christ he had been called to be an apostle. For no impostor or fanatic could produce the abiding and blessed results which had followed S. Paul's preaching"—BEET. "For the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord. If any church had less right than another to question his apostolic authority, it was the church of Corinth, which he had founded (ch. 4. 15), and on which so many spiritual gifts had been poured forth (ch. 1. 5, 7; ch. 14). The Corinthians at least needed no other proof of the genuineness of his mission. 'If anyone wishes to know whether I am an apostle, I will show him yourselves; among whom are manifest and indubitable signs and proofs of my apostolate: first the faith of Christ, which you have received at my preaching; then many and various gifts of the Holy Ghost' (ESTIUS). For the word 'seal' see John 3. 33; 6. 27; Rom. 4. 11. A seal is used as the attestation of the genuineness of any document. Thus the existence of the Corinthian church was the attestation of the genuineness of S. Paul's apostolic authority"—C. B.

3. My answer to them who examine me—"concerning my apostleship—is this—which I have now given"—WESLEY.

"Both the words 'answer' and 'examine' are in the Greek the technical terms for a legal defence and examination before a tribunal"—ELLICOTT.

4. Have we not power—"I and my fellow-labourers—to eat and to drink—at the expense of those among whom we labour"—WESLEY.

"After proving his apostleship, S. Paul now begins to prove (vers. 4–14) his claim to be supported by the church. He thus introduces the specific matter of ch. 9. Eat and drink—at the cost of the church. For God to give S. Paul a work which so occupied him that he could not earn (2 Cor. 11. 8) sufficient food, and yet to forbid him to be supported by his converts, would be practically to forbid him to 'eat and drink.' (Contrast Luke 10. 7)"—BEET.

5. Have we not power to lead about with us a sister, a wife—"and to demand sustenance for her also—as well as the other apostles—who, therefore, it is plain, did this—and Peter? Hence we learn (1) that S. Peter continued to live with his wife after he became an apostle; (2) That he had no rights as an apostle which were not common to S. Paul"—WESLEY.

"The ordinary interpretation of this passage is that S. Paul here asserts his right, if he pleased, to take with him a wife who was a member of the Christian body, and to have her maintained at the expense of the community. The word sister, like the words 'brother,' 'brethren,' is equivalent to 'a member of the Christian Church' (Rom. 16. 1; Jas. 2. 15; 2 John 13 (perhaps), and ch. 7. 15 of this Epistle). The privilege was claimed by the other apostles with a view, as Stanley suggests, of obtaining access to the women, who in the East usually dwelt apart. The brethren of the Lord. These have been regarded (1) as the children of Joseph and Mary, (2) the children of Joseph by a former wife, (3) as the kinsmen of our Lord, the word 'brother' having been used in Hebrew to denote any near relation. (See Gen. 13. 8; 29. 12; Lev. 10. 4.) The question has been hotly debated. (1) or (2) seem more natural; but in support of (3) we find from Scripture and ecclesiastical history that the names of our Lord's brethren, James and Joses and Simon and Judas, were also the names of the sons of Alphæus, who were our Lord's cousins. (See Matt. 13. 55; 27. 56; Luke 24. 10; John 19. 25. Also Matt. 10. 3; Mark 3. 18; Luke 6. 16; and Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. III. 11, 32. See Professor Lightfoot on the Epistle to the Galatians. Also Professor Plumptre on the Epistle of James)"—C. B.

6. To forbear working—"with our hands"—WESLEY.

For Barnabas, see Acts 4. 36; 11. 22, 25, 29; 12. 1, 2, 50; 14. 12; 15. 2, 12, 37; Gal. 2. 1, 9, 13.

7. "What soldier ever serveth at his own charges? (R.V.). S. Paul's imagery from nature and country life are on the practical rather than the poetic side; whereas his images from military, political, and social life have the vivid reality which we should expect from one whose life was spent chiefly in towns"—ELLICOTT.

8. Do I speak as a man—"barely on the authority of human reason? Does not God also say, in effect, the same thing? The ox that treadeth out the corn. This was the custom in Judea, and many Eastern nations. In several of them it is retained still. And at this day, horses tread out the corn in some parts of Germany"—WESLEY.

"God had commanded the Jews (Deut. 25. 4), that when harvest came, the ox, while treading the corn which it had contributed to produce by the painful labour of plowing, should not be muzzled, and thereby prevented from enjoying, conjointly with man, the fruit of its toil. Among the heathen no scruple was felt about acting differently, and hence God expressly forbids this practice to His people. God's object in acting thus was evidently to cultivate in the hearts of His people feelings of justice and equity. This moral object appears not only from the prohibition in itself, but also from all the other injunctions which accompany it in chaps. 24 and 25 of Deuteronomy; the command to restore to the poor man his garment, taken as a pledge, immediately after sunset (Deut. 24. 10–13), to pay to the poor labourer his wages on the same evening (vers. 14, 15), not to put the child to death with the guilty father (vers. 16–18), always to leave, when gathering the harvest, a gleaning for widows and strangers, etc. By calling on the Israelites to exercise gentleness and gratitude, even towards a poor animal, it is clear that God desired to inculcate on them, with stronger reason, the same way of acting towards the human workman whose help they engaged in their labour. It was the duties of moral beings to one another, that God wished to impress by this precept (ver. 9)"—GODET.

9. Doth God—"in this direction—take care for oxen—only? Hath He not a further meaning? And so undoubtedly He hath in all the other Mosaic laws of this kind"—WESLEY.

"The pointed and emphatic mention of the Law of Moses would give the words great weight with Jewish opponents. On a space of hard ground called a threshing-floor the oxen were driven to and fro over the corn collected there, and thus the separation of the grain from the husk was accomplished. Doth God take care for oxen? The good which such a provision as the Law achieved for the oxen was nothing compared to the good which it accomplished for man. God would teach us men humanity"—ELLICOTT.

10. He who ploweth ought to plow in hope—"of reaping. This seems to be a proverbial expression. And he that thresheth in hope ought not to be disappointed, ought to eat the fruit of his labours. And so ought they who labour in God's husbandry"—WESLEY.

And he that thresheth, to thresh in hope of partaking (R.V.). "For our sakes, no doubt, this is written. Not to oblige us to obey those laws, but to teach us to exercise humanity and equity towards those we employ or deal with. This precept, concerning oxen, being introduced in the Law, immediately after precepts enjoining justice and mercy in punishments, was certainly intended to impress the Israelites with a sense of the obligations of justice and humanity towards rational creatures, as the apostle here affirms"—BENSON. "This passage expresses the sanction given by God in the legal provision previously mentioned to the Divine principle which unites earthly labour and reward; and the argument, of course, is that this principle applies to the higher work of a spiritual nature; and this application is brought out clearly in the next verse"—ELLICOTT.

11. Is it a great matter if we shall reap as much of your carnal things—"as is needful for our sustenance? Do you give us things of greater value than those you receive from us?"—WESLEY.

"The word preached by S. Paul at Corinth was a seed (Luke 8. 11) from which his hearers had reaped a spiritual harvest. Was it then a great recompense if he received from them things needful for the body, which were a far less valuable product of their bodily labour? Sow: reap—keeping up the metaphor of ver. 10, and specially appropriate for results corresponding to the organic laws of bodily and spiritual life. (Comp. 2 Cor. 9. 6; Gal. 5. 22)"—BEET.

12. If others—"whether true or false apostles—partake of this power—have a right to be maintained. Do not we rather—on account of our having laboured so much more? Lest we should give any hindrance to the gospel—by giving an occasion of cavil or reproach"—WESLEY.

You do recognise this principle in regard to other teachers, and they actually partake of this right to be supported by you; we, your first teachers, have a stronger right. S. Paul had been literally their "planter" (ch. 3. 6). But suffer all things—i.e. we endure all kinds of hard work and privation rather than use a power which I have demonstrated we possess, and which others actually avail themselves of, lest our doing so might, in a way, hinder the progress of Christ's gospel by giving enemies any even apparent reason for attributing our zeal to unworthy motives.

13. "Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things. The Jewish priests are maintained by the sacrifices of the worshippers. (See Lev. 6. 17; Num. 5. 8–10, and especially 18. 8–20; so also Deut. 10. 9, 18. 1.) This was an argument of which, in dealing with Jews, it would not have been well to lose sight. Whether an apostle or not, S. Paul was at least occupied with sacred things, and so had a claim to live, or rather eat, the literal translation (see margin, 'feed') by means of the work he was doing. Partakers with the altar. The sacrifices were apportioned out according to rule. Part was consumed on the altar, part was given to the priest, part was consumed by the worshipper"—C. B. "The first part of this verse refers to the general principle that the priests who were engaged in the Temple service were supported from the various offerings which were brought there, and the second clause more definitely alludes to the particular fact that, when a sacrifice was offered on the altar, the sacrificing priests, as well as the altar, had a share of the animal"—ELLICOTT.

14. "Even so did the Lord ordain that they which proclaim the gospel should live of the gospel (R.V.). In this way also—not only adds to the ordinances of Moses an ordinance of Christ, but strengthens the authority of each by showing that they embody the same principle. The Lord—Master of His Church—ordained (in Mark 10. 9 f.; Luke 10. 7)—another mark of agreement of our Gospels with the words of Christ as reported to S. Paul. (Comp. 7. 10.) Live from the gospel—obtain by preaching it the things needful for bodily life"—BEET.

15. It were better for me to die than—"to give occasion to them that seek occasion against me (2 Cor. 11. 12)"—WESLEY.

"Here again we come upon the sound judgment and honest heart that are never biassed by his own personal circumstances, or insist that what is fit for him is fit for everyone. How apt are self-denying men to spoil their self-denial by dropping a sneer at the weaker souls that cannot follow their heroic example. Not so S. Paul. He first fights the battle of the weak for them, and then disclaims all participation in the spoils"—DODS.

17. Willingly. "He seems to mean, without receiving anything. S. Paul here speaks in a manner peculiar to himself. Another might have preached willingly, and yet have received a maintenance from the Corinthians. But if he had received anything from them, he would have termed it preaching unwillingly. And so, in the next verse, another might have used that power without abusing it. But his own using it at all, he would have termed abusing it. A dispensation is intrusted to me—therefore I dare not refrain"—WESLEY.

(See R.V.) We may read: "For if by choice I make a business of this, like other teachers, what then? I have a recompense like them. God rewards volunteers in His own cause; if, however, not of choice—if not on the wing of I will, but on the spur of I must; if in the shade of overhanging necessity, I am doing this evangel work—what then? A stewardship I hold in trust; an administrator am I in the household of God, and as such strictly accountable. You may fairly ask, if I have no sure and certain hope of recompense in the future, as other apostles have, who cheerfully obeyed an ordinary call from their Master, and if I do not choose to accept such maintenance in the present as they do, what then is that recompense of mine?" He seems to answer (as in ver. 19), "It is this increased opportunity: free access to men of all classes and races and opinions, the probability of my gaining and saving more than if by using my privilege I should narrow my sphere of influence." M. HENRY notes: "It is the glory of a minister to prefer the success of his ministry to his interests, and deny himself that he may serve Christ, and save souls. It is what God will approve and commend, what a man may value himself for and take comfort in, though he cannot make a merit of it before God."

18. What then is my reward—"that circumstance in my conduct for which I expect a peculiar reward from my great Master? That I abuse not—make not an unseasonable use of my power which I have in preaching the gospel"—WESLEY.

"We have here a feeling of exquisite delicacy, and, if one may so speak, of transcendent modesty, which is far from being always understood. S. Paul wishes at any price to pass from the servile state to that of a freeman acting from gratitude. There is, perhaps, no passage in the apostle's letters where there are more admirably revealed at once the nobility, delicacy, profound humility, dignity, and legitimate pride of his Christian character. Serving Christ cannot give him matter of joy except in so far as he has the consciousness of doing so in a condition of freedom"—GODET. 'What is my reward then?—lit. 'wages.' Either (1) as in our person, the preaching the gospel without charge, and the consciousness of having served God faithfully thus obtained; or (2), as some would interpret, suspending the construction until the end of ver. 19, the satisfaction of having made more converts than anyone else. But this involves (1) a harsh construction, and (2) a motive which appears foreign to the Christian character. For though S. Paul in ch. 15. 10 says, 'I laboured more abundantly than they all,' it is in no spirit of vain-glorious boasting. The translation 'reward' somewhat obscures the meaning. Christ had said, 'The labourer is worthy of his hire,' or wages. S. Paul refers to this in ver. 17. In this verse he asks what his wages are, and replies that they are the preaching the gospel without charge. Without charge. This was S. Paul's usual ground of boasting. We find it in his earliest Epistle (1 Thess. 2. 9; comp. 2 Thess. 3. 8). It formed part of his appeal to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20. 33, 34), and in the fervid defence of himself which we find in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians it occupies a prominent place. (See 2 Cor. 11. 7-12)"—C. B.

19. I made myself the servant of all—"I acted with as self-denying a regard to their interest, and as much caution not to offend them, as if I had been literally their servant or slave. Where is the preacher of the gospel who treads in the same steps?"—WESLEY.

"He asserts his liberty. Though I be free from all men. He was freeborn, a citizen of Rome. He was in bondage to none, nor depended upon any for his subsistence; yet he made himself a servant to all, that he might gain the more. He carried it as a servant; he laboured for their good as a servant; he was careful to please as a servant his Master. He acted in many cases as if he had no privileges; and this that he might make the more converts to Christianity. He made himself a servant, that they might be made free"—M. HENRY. "The reward S. Paul chose was that he should have none—none in the ordinary sense, but really the deepest and most abiding of all; the satisfaction of knowing that, having freely received he had freely given, and had lifted the gospel into a region quite undimmed by the suspicion of self-seeking or any mists of worldliness"—DODS.

20. To the Jews I became as a Jew—"conforming myself in all things to their manner of thinking and living, as far as I could, with innocence. To them that are under the Law—who apprehend themselves to be still bound by the Mosaic Law—as under the Law—observing it myself, while I am among them. Not that he declared this to be necessary, or refused to converse with those who did not observe it. This was the very thing which he condemned in S. Peter. (Gal. 2. 14)"—WESLEY.

"In declining pecuniary remuneration, S. Paul was acting on his general principle of making himself the servant of all, and of living entirely and exclusively for the good of others. His independence of all men was assumed and maintained for the very purpose of making himself the more effectually the servant of all. To the few and to those under the Law he became as a few, observing the seventh day, circumcising Timothy, abstaining from blood, accommodating himself to all their scruples. To those who had been brought up in Greece, he also conformed himself, freely entering into their innocent customs, calling no meats unclean; appealing, not to the Law of Moses, but to conscience, to common sense, to their own poets—a course which none but a man of wide sympathy and charity, clear intellect, and thorough integrity can adopt"—DODS. "He would transgress no laws of Christ to please or humour any man, but he would accommodate himself to all men where he might do it lawfully to gain some"—M. HENRY.

21. To them that are without the Law—"the heathens—as without the Law—neglecting its ceremonies. Being not without the Law to God—but as much as ever under its moral precepts. Under the Law to Christ—and in this sense all Christians will be under the Law for ever"—WESLEY.

"The parenthesis explains in what sense only S. Paul was 'without' the Law, so as to prevent the possibility of this statement being used as a justification of lawlessness. As being one with Christ, he was indeed under the Law of God as revealed in the person, work, and teaching of the Lord. (See Gal. 6. 2)"—ELLICOTT. "Let us beware of identifying religion with a rigid conformity in outward things, and not with an inward spirit of love and goodness. Human nature is an infinitely various thing, and often there is the truest regard for what is holy and Divine disguised under a violent departure from all ordinary ways of manifesting reverence and piety. Put yourself in the place of the inquiring, perplexed, embittered soul, find out the good that is in it, patiently accommodate yourself to its ways so far as you legitimately may, and you will be rewarded by 'gaining some'"—DODS.

22. I became as weak—"as if I had been scrupulous too. I became all things to all men—accommodating myself to all, so far as I could consistent with truth and sincerity"—WESLEY.

"This was a course which none but a man of wide sympathy and charity, clear intellect, and thorough integrity could adopt. S. Paul was no mere latitudinarian. While accommodating himself to the practice of those around him in all matters of mere outward observance, and which did not touch the essentials of morality and faith, he at the same time held very definite opinions of the chief articles of the Christian creed"—DODS.

23. "He here assigns his reasons for his conduct: This I do for the gospel's sake, i.e. for the honour of Christ, whose the gospel is, and for the salvation of souls, for which it was designed; and that he and they might communicate in the privileges of it, or partake together of them. A heart warmed with zeal for God, and breathing after the salvation of men, will not plead and insist upon rights and privileges in bar to this design. They manifestly abuse their power in the gospel who employ it not to edification but destruction, and therefore breathe nothing of its spirit"—M. HENRY.

24. Know ye not that—"in those famous games which are kept at the isthmus, near your city— they who run in the foot race all run, though but one receiveth the prize—how much greater encouragement have you to run; since ye may all receive the prize of your high calling"—WESLEY.

"In endeavouring to warn Christians against resting in a mere profession of faith in Christ, he cites two great classes of instances which prove that there is often ultimate failure even where there has been considerable promise of success. First, he cites their own world-renowned Isthmian games, in which contests, as they all well knew, not everyone who entered for the prize was successful. All run, but one receiveth the prize. S. Paul does not mean that salvation goes by competition; but he means that as in a race not all who run run so as to obtain the prize for which they run, so in Christian life not all who enter it put out sufficient energy to bring them to a happy issue. The mere fact of recognising that the prize is worth winning and even entering for it is not enough"—DODS. STANLEY says of the place in which men struggled for the prizes here spoken of: "It was not a mere resort for public amusement, but an almost sacred edifice, under the tutelage of the patron deity of the Ionian tribes, and surrounded by the most solemn recollection of Greece; its white marble seats rising like a temple in the glassy slope, where its outlines may still be traced, under the shadow of the huge Corinthian citadel, which guards the entrance to the Peloponnesus, and overlooking the blue waters of the Saronic Gulf, with Athens glittering in the distance." "The apostle, to divert the Corinthians from disputations, sets before them the warm affections and excitements of the heathen in their public games and sports. Christians have also a race to run, and a brighter crown to win, a crown that fadeth not away. Let us then fairly keep our course, and fight lawfully; for heaven is worthy of a race, and the crown demands a fight. And in a little while, when the blaze of life is over, we shall be found wiser than our neighbours who look only at the things of the present world"—SUTCLIFFE.

25. And everyone that there contendeth is temperate in all things—"to an almost incredible degree: using the most rigorous self-denial in food, sleep, and every other sensual indulgence. A corruptible crown—a garland of leaves, which must soon wither. The moderns only have discovered that it is 'legal' to do all this and more for an eternal crown than they did for a corruptible"—WESLEY.

"Better, Everyone that enters into the contest. The Greek word is identical with the English 'agonise.' Hence the use in devotional works of the phrase 'to agonise in prayer,' etc. Such a man fulfils not only some, but all the necessary preliminary conditions. He indulges self in no way"—ELLICOTT. "Temperate in all things. The temperance maintained by the athlete must be outdone by the Christian if he is to be successful. There are many things in which men who have no thought of the incorruptible prize may engage, but from which the Christian must refrain. All that lowers the tone and slackens the energies must be abandoned. If the Christian indulges in the pleasures of life as freely as other men, if he is unconscious of any severity of self-restraint, if he denies himself nothing which others enjoy—he proves that he has no higher aim than they—and of course wins no higher prize. The temperance here enjoined, and which the Christian practises, not because it is enjoined but because a higher aim truly cherished compels him to practise it, is a habitual sober-mindedness and detachment from what is worldly in the world. It is that temper of spirit and that sustained attitude towards life which enables a man to rule his own desires, to endure hardness, and find pleasure in so doing. No spasmodic, occasional efforts and partial abstinences will ever bring a man victorious to the goal. Temperance to be effectual must be complete, and also continuous. Beware, then, of giving place to the world or the flesh at any point. Measure the invitations of life by their fitness or unfitness to develop within you true spiritual energy"—DODS.

26. I so run, not as uncertainly—"I look straight to the goal; I run straight toward it. I cast away every weight, regard not any that stand by. I fight, not as one that beateth the air. This is a proverbial expression for a man's missing his blow, and spending his strength, not on his enemy, but on empty air"—WESLEY.

"I then—who am an exemplar—do so run, not as one who runs with unsteady aim—like some of you, with a roving side-glance at an idol's temple"—CHRYSOSTOM. "So fight I. The Christian career is not merely a race, but a conflict, and a conflict not only with others but with oneself. S. Paul had to contend with the fleshly lusts of the body, the love especially of ease, the indisposition to hardship and toil so natural to humanity. (See Rom. 7. 23; and for the life of pain and endurance to which he had enslaved himself, ch. 4 of this Epistle, vers. 9-13, and 2 Cor. 11. 23-28.) Not as one that beateth the air—that is, not as one who struck out at random, but as one who delivered his blows with effect"—C. B. "He who keeps within the limits prescribed, and keeps on in his race, will never miss his crown"—M. HENRY.

27. But I keep under my body—"by all kinds of self-denial. And bring it into subjection—to my spirit and to God. The words are strongly figurative, and signify the mortification of the 'body of sin,' by an allusion to the natural bodies of those who were bruised or subdued in combat. Lest by any means after having preached — the Greek word means, 'after having discharged the office of an herald' (still carrying on the allusion), whose office it was to proclaim the conditions, and to display the prizes—I myself should become a reprobate — disapproved by the Judge, and so falling short of the prize. This single text may give us a just notion of the scriptural doctrine of election and reprobation; and clearly shows us, that particular persons are not in Holy Writ represented as elected absolutely and unconditionally to eternal death; but that believers in general are elected to enjoy the Christian privileges on earth; which if they abuse, those very elect persons will become reprobate. S. Paul was certainly an elect person, if ever there was one; and yet he declares it was possible he himself might 'become a reprobate.' Nay, he actually would have become such, if he had not thus kept his body under, even though he had been so long an elect person, a Christian, and an apostle"—WESLEY.

"But I buffet my body, and bring it into bondage (R.V.). Every man's body is his enemy when, instead of being his servant, it becomes his master. The proper function of the body is to serve the will, to bring the inner man into contact with the outer world, and enable him to influence it. When the body mutinies and refuses to obey the will, when it usurps authority and compels the man to do its bidding, it becomes his most dangerous enemy. When S. Paul's body presumed to dictate to his spirit, and demanded comforts and indulgences, and shrank from hardship, he beat it down. The word he uses is an exceptionally strong one—'I keep under'; it is a technical term of the games, and means to strike full in the face. It was the word used of the most damaging blow one boxer could give to another. This unmerciful, overpowering blow S. Paul dealt to his body, resisting its assaults and making it helpless to tempt him. He thus brought it into subjection, made it his slave, as the winner in some of the games had a right to carry the vanquished far into slavery. With the boxer in the games it was grim earnest. He did not need anyone to tell him that his life depended on his ability to defend himself against his trained antagonist. Every faculty must be on the alert. No dreamer has here a chance. What we need is something of the same sense of reality—that it is a life-and-death contest we are engaged in, and that he that treats sin as a weak or pretended antagonist will shortly be dragged a mangled disgrace out of the arena"—DODS.

Let no man think that he has prayed heartily against sin who does not use his utmost diligence to undermine and weaken his inclination to that sin. To water an ill plant every day, and to pray against the power of it would be preposterous. S. Paul complained of "a body of death," and "a thorn in the flesh," and he prayed heartily against it. But was that all? No; he also kept under his body, and brought it into subjection, being well assured that unless the soul keeps under the body the body will quickly get above the soul. If you would destroy a well-entrenched enemy, cut off his provisions; and if you starve him in his strongholds, you conquer him as effectually as if you beat him in the field.

CHAPTER X.

SECTION VIII.—Vers. 1-33. THE EXAMPLE OF ISRAEL A WARNING TO CHRISTIANS.—The apostle returns from the digression of ch. 9 to the subject of idol-service. He reminds the Corinthians what befell their fathers in the wilderness. They all came out of Egypt. They all underwent baptism unto Moses, and all ate the same spiritual food. Yet, not responding to God's "purpose of grace," the greater part of them fell by some evil lustfulness. Beware, O Corinthians, of a similar fall! Take warning, and take courage.

1. Now—"that ye may not become reprobates, consider how highly favoured your fathers were, who were God's elect and peculiar people, and nevertheless were rejected by Him. They were all under the cloud—that eminent token of God's gracious presence, which screened them from the heat of the sun by day, and gave them light by night. And all passed through the sea—God opening a way through the midst of the waters"—WESLEY.

"I would not that ye should be ignorant—a characteristic expression of S. Paul. (Comp. ch. 12. 1 and Rom. 1. 13; 11. 25; 2 Cor. 1. 8; 1 Thess. 4. 13.) All our fathers. The emphasis on 'all' here—it is repeated five times—serves to point out the moral that though all, without exception, received the privileges, the greater number were very far from using them aright. The lesson is still more closely driven home in vers. 11, 12. The Israelites were as much the people of God as we, yet most of them fell. Why should we think, then, that we have less need for watchfulness than they? Some have thought that the expression 'our fathers' implies that S. Paul was here speaking to Jews only. But this is not necessary. (See Rom. 4. 16; 9. 5)"—C. B. "From the expression, our fathers, Meyer has concluded that S. Paul is speaking as a Jew, and in the name of the Jewish Christians. But by the address brethren, he has just comprehended the whole Church in one and the same body. He therefore sees in the Christian Church the outgrowth of the ancient Israelitish community"—GODET.

2. And were all, as it were, baptized unto Moses—"initiated into the religion which he taught them—in the cloud and in the sea—perhaps sprinkled here and there with drops of water from the sea or the cloud, to which baptism might be the more evidently signified"—WESLEY.

"Baptism is the solemn profession of our Christianity; and the passing through the Red Sea was the Israelites' profession of discipleship to Moses; then they passed the Rubicon, the die was cast, and thenceforward there was no return for them. One solemn step had severed them for ever from Egypt; and the cloud guidance which then began kept the memory of this act before them by a constant witness in all their journeyings. So far, then, this is equivalent to baptism, which is discipleship; a sacrament or oath of obedience, the force of which is kept up and recalled by an outward sign"—ROBERTSON. "Moses was God's representative under the Law, and so they were baptized unto him in their voluntarily joining with that 'Church' of God which marched beneath the shadow of the cloud, and passed through the waters of the sea, as Christians are baptized into Jesus Christ,—He being (in a higher sense both in kind and in degree) God's Representative in the new dispensation. The cloud and the sea refer to the cloud that overshadowed the Israelites (Ex. 13. 21, and see Num. 14. 14) and the passage through the Red Sea (Ex. 14. 32; Num. 35. 8)"—ELLICOTT.

3. "And all ate the same manna, termed spiritual meat, as it was typical (1) of Christ and His spiritual benefits, (2) of the sacred bread which we eat at His table"—WESLEY.

"Spiritual meat. The manna (Ex. 16. 13) was not natural food, for it was not produced in the natural way, but it was supplied by the Spirit and power of God. Bread from earth would be natural bread, but this was bread from heaven. (John 6. 31.) Our Lord (John 6. 50) had already made the Christian Church familiar with the 'true bread,' of which that food had been the typical forecast"—ELLICOTT. The sacraments of the Old Testament are made by S. Paul to foreshadow the substance of two sacraments in the New, of two and no more.

4. And all drank the same spiritual drink—"typical of Christ, and of that cup which we drink. For they drank out of the spiritual or mysterious rock, the wonderful streams of which followed them in their several journeyings, for many years, through the wilderness. And that rock was a manifest type of Christ—the ROCK OF ETERNITY, from whom His people derive those streams of blessing which follow them through all this wilderness"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul's point is, that in the wilderness the food and drink of the Israelites were 'spiritual,' or, as we should more naturally say, sacramental; that is to say, their sustenance continually spoke to them of God's nearness, and reminded them that they were His people. And as Christ Himself, when He lifted the bread at the Last Supper, said, 'This is My body,' so does S. Paul use analogous language and say, that rock was Christ—an expression which gives us considerable insight into the significance of the Israelitish types of Christ, and helps to rid our minds of some erroneous impressions we are apt to cherish regarding them. The manna and the water from the rock were given to sustain the Israelites and carry them towards their Promised Land, but they were so given as to quicken faith in God. They were types of Christ, serving for Israel in the wilderness the purpose which Christ serves for us, enabling them to believe in a heavenly Father who cared for them, and accomplishing the same spiritual union with the unseen God which Christ accomplishes for us"—DODS. "And that rock was Christ. Christ was the true source of all their nourishment, and He went with them whithersoever they went. He, the Angel of the Covenant (Ex. 23. 20, 21, 23; 32. 34; Josh. 5. 13), was their guide and their support. (Comp. John 4. 10, 14; 7. 37, 38. For the term Rock, as applied to God, see Deut. 32. 4, 15, 18, 30, 31, 37; Ps. 18. 1, and many other passages in the Psalms too numerous to quote.) We can hardly dismiss this passage without quoting BENGEL's remark, 'Had there been more than two sacraments, S. Paul would have pointed out some spiritual resemblances to them'"—C. B.

5. Yet—"although they had so many tokens of the Divine presence—they were overthrown—with the most terrible marks of His displeasure"—WESLEY.

God had the most gracious design for them all, viz. that they should enter the Promised Land. He nourished and guided them in the desert, and showed them His unceasing care, but the intended good was frustrated by their murmurings and other sins. GODET says: "What a spectacle is that which is called up by the apostle before the eyes of the self-satisfied Corinthians: all those bodies, sated with miraculous food and drink, strewing the soil of the desert." And Ellicott explains the verse to introduce the point from which the apostle seeks to draw the great lesson of self-distrust.

6. Now these things were our examples—"showing what we are to expect if, enjoying the like benefits, we commit the like sins. The benefits are set down in the same order as by Moses in Exodus; the sins and punishments in a different order—evil desire first, as being the foundation of all; next, idolatry (vers. 7, 14); then fornication, which usually accompanied it (ver. 8); the tempting and murmuring against God, in the following verses. As they desired—flesh, in contempt of manna"—WESLEY.

"God would have men learn from such history to follow the tracks of obedience and mercies, and to avoid the footprints of rebellion and judgments"—EVANS. "These things—this rejection, this curse after such blessings. Examples for us—strictly, 'examples of us,' that is to say, of what will happen to ourselves if we follow their example. By evil things are to be understood the enjoyments which God does not grant, either because they are evil in themselves, or because, perfectly legitimate as they are, God requires them to be sacrificed in the service of love, or for the sake of watchfulness. These 'examples' are four in number—two refer to pleasures which God refuses (vers. 7, 8), two to the feelings of irritation and rebellion excited by this refusal (vers. 8, 9)"—GODET.

7. Neither be ye idolaters—"and so, 'neither murmur ye' (ver. 10). The other cautions are given in the first person, but these in the second. And with what exquisite propriety does he vary the person! It would have been improper to say, neither let us be idolaters; for he was himself in no danger of idolatry, nor probably of murmuring against Christ, or the Divine providence. To play—that is, to dance, in honour of their idol"—WESLEY.

"The neither connects this proposition closely with the preceding; we pass from lust to the acts in which it seeks satisfaction. The example quoted in the worship of the golden calf, and of the profane feast which followed it (Ex. 32). To play, is specially used of dancing"—GODET. "The idolatry and eating and drinking and committing fornication all refer to kinds of sin which the Corinthians were liable to commit if they did not keep themselves perfectly distinct from the heathen. (See ch. 6. 12)"—ELLICOTT. "Neither become ye idolaters, as the Israelites did, when they sat down at the idol-feast of the golden calf in Horeb. Beware, O Corinthians, even to partake of idol-meats is an implication in idol-service"—EVANS.

8. And fell in one day three and twenty thousand — "beside the princes who were afterwards hanged, and those whom the judges slew; so that there died in all four and twenty thousand"—WESLEY.

In Num. 25. 9, we find twenty-four thousand. The actual number would, no doubt, be between the two, so that both here and in the Book of Numbers only round numbers are given. "Our apostle saith not definitely three and twenty thousand perished, but three and twenty thousand at the least"—LIGHTFOOT.

9. Neither let us tempt Christ—"by our unbelief. S. Paul enumerates five benefits (vers. 1-4), of which the fourth and fifth were closely connected together; and five sins, the fourth and fifth of which were likewise closely connected. In speaking of the fifth benefit, he expressly mentions Christ; and, in speaking of the fourth sin, he shows it was committed against Christ. As some of them tempted Him. This sin of the people was peculiarly against Christ; for when they had so long drank of that rock, yet they murmured for want of water"—WESLEY.

"The real meaning of the passage is evident. The Israelites had, by their longing after the things left behind in Egypt, tried God so that God had asserted Himself in visiting them with punishment; and so Christians must be on their guard, with such a warning before them, not to tempt their Lord by hankering after those worldly and physical pleasures from which He by His death has delivered them. (See Num. 21)"—SHORE. "Application: be ye not also discontented, but accept the Christian's position of a pure and sober life, nor look back with longing upon what you have renounced for ever, those pleasures of Corinth which are as the flesh-pots of Egypt" —EVANS.

10. The destroyer—"the destroying angel" —WESLEY.

S. Paul attributes the death of the people to the destroyer, i.e. God's messenger sent to destroy—while in Numbers they are said to have perished by the plague. Every pestilence that swept over nations to purify them was a messenger from God. Thus, in Ps. 78. 50, God is said to give their life over to the pestilence, which, in Ex. 12. 23, is spoken of as the destroyer.

11. On whom the ends of the ages are come. "The expression has great force. All things meet together, and come to a crisis, under the last, the gospel dispensation; both benefits and dangers, punishments and rewards. It remains, that Christ come as an Avenger and Judge. And even these 'ends' include various periods, succeeding each other" —WESLEY.

"They were written for the admonition of Christians who had entered into the obligations of the new dispensation. For this purpose they were recorded; by this act of God they were made types in the highest sense; and could not become types in the sense of mere figurative illustrations, which would have been contingent upon this rhetorical use being made of them by some subsequent writer"—WATSON. "This verse is the summary of all the foregoing examples. The apostle does not mean that these facts did not really happen, as has been insinuated, but that they had a bearing beyond their immediate signification. The Scripture compilation of the facts of sacred history has the same end as the history itself" —GODET.

12. "The common translations runs: Let him that thinketh he standeth; but the word translated 'thinketh' most certainly strengthens, rather than weakens, the sense" —WESLEY.

Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. "A warning against the over-confidence too common among the Corinthians. (See ch. 1 throughout; ch. 3. 18; 4. 8.) It is not sufficient to have been admitted into the Christian covenant; we need watchfulness, in order to use our privileges aright. (Comp. Rom. 11. 20)"—C. B. "In this life we are never beyond the reach of temptation. And these temptations, to which all of us are exposed, are real; they do sufficiently test character and show what it actually is. 'Heedlessness,' taking things for granted, failure to sift matters thoroughly out, an indolent unwillingness to probe our spiritual condition to the quick—this is what has betrayed multitudes of Christians. Whoever takes it for granted that things are well with him, whoever thinketh he standeth—he is the man who has special and urgent need to take heed lest he fall"—DODS.

13. Common to man—"or, as the Greek word imports, proportioned to human strength. God is faithful—in giving the help which He hath promised. And He will with the temptation — provide for your deliverance" — WESLEY.

"A consolation, as the last verse was a warning. These words were intended to meet an objection that it was impossible to walk warily enough—impossible to adjust aright the boundaries of our own freedom and our brother's need. Every temptation as it comes, S. Paul says, will have the way of escape provided from it by God. All that a Christian has to do is to live in humble dependence upon Him, neither perplexed in the present nor anxious for the future. (Comp. 2 Pet. 2. 9)" — LIAS. "Encouragement after warning. Temptation—whatever, painful or pleasant, tends to lead us to sin, and thus tests our loyalty to Christ. (Comp. Matt. 4. 1-10.) Human — within the limits of the spiritual powers God has given to men. We can conceive higher intelligences to be attacked by severer temptations. Faithful (ch. 1. 9)—to what has been (ver. 13*a*) in the past, S. Paul adds, what 'will' be in the future. Will not let—for each temptation attacks us under His eye and restraint"—BEET.

14. Flee from idolatry—"and from all approaches to it"—WESLEY.

Idolatry is a deadly sin, and so also is whatever tends to promote it. Flee from it. Do not be trying how near you can get to this (or to any other sin), but rather how far you can get from it.

16. The cup which we bless—"by setting it apart to a sacred use, and solemnly invoking the blessing of God upon it—is it not the communion of the blood of Christ — the means of our partaking of those invaluable benefits, which are the purchase of 'the blood of Christ'? The communion of the body of Christ—the means of our partaking of those benefits which were purchased by 'the body of Christ'—offered for us"—WESLEY.

"We have here the first reason against taking part in an idol-feast. We communicate together in the body and blood of Christ, and we are thereby debarred from communion with any beings alien to Him; a communion into which, by the analogy of all sacrificial rites, we enter with the beings to whom such sacrifices are offered. (See ver. 20.) The term cup of blessing is a Hebraism for the cup over which a blessing is to be pronounced, whose characteristic it is to be blessed. It was the name given to the cup over which thanks were given at the Passover"—LIGHTFOOT. "Communion with the body and blood of Christ is established and asserted in this partaking of the bread and of the cup"—ELLICOTT. The words spoken over the cup evidently set forth the goodness of God; as in Luke 1. 64; 2. 28. Hence they were equivalent to "thanksgiving." (Comp. 14. 16; 1 Sam. 9. 13; Matt. 14. 19; Luke 9. 16, with John 6. 11; Mark 8. 6, with ver. 7; Matt 26. 26, with ver. 27.) So CHRYSOSTOM: "A cup of blessing He called it; since, holding it in our hands, in this way we sing praise to Him." Our first thought as we behold the symbols of the death of Christ is gratitude to God. Hence the term "Eucharist," i.e. thanksgiving. And the cup which recalls the death of Christ is made here (comp. Mark 8. 7; Luke 9. 16) the object or matter of our blessing. The gratitude evoked by sight of the cup is made very prominent by the addition which we bless.

17. "For—it is this communion which makes us all one—we being many are yet, as it were, but different parts of one and the same broken bread, which we receive to unite us in one body"—WESLEY.

"What does S. Paul wish to prove by appealing here to the analogy of the Holy Supper? He wishes to demonstrate, by the salutary influence which the communion exercises over the believer's heart, that demons exercise a pernicious one over him who takes part in the heathen sacrificial feasts. The Holy Supper is not, therefore, according to the apostle's view, a simple act of profession and thanksgiving on the believer's part. It is, at the same time, a real partaking of the grace purchased by Christ, and which He communicates to the devout soul of the communicant"—GODET. "As one loaf is made up of many grains, and one body is composed of many members, so the Church of Christ is joined together of many faithful ones, united in the bonds of charity"—AUGUSTINE. "So Chrysostom and Theodoret, and our English bishops Andrews and Hall"—C. B. (Comp. ch. 12. 12; Gal. 3. 28; Eph. 4. 4; Col. 3. 15.)

18. Consider Israel after the flesh. "Christians are the spiritual 'Israel of God.' Are not they who eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar? Is not this an act of communion with that God to whom they are offered? And is not the case the same with those who eat of the sacrifices which have been offered to idols?"—WESLEY.

"Behold Israel after the flesh—second reason (see ver. 16). As the Christian sacrificial feasts, so are those of the Jews. Are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar?—'in a strict and peculiar sense—the altar having part of the animal, the partaker another part'"—ALFORD. "The word here translated partakers is not the same as in the last verse. It is, like the word translated 'communion,' and implies that the altar and the worshipper share together in the victim. BENGEL remarks that 'he to whom anything is offered, the things which are offered, the altar on which they are offered,' and he might have added those who offer them, 'have communion with each other.' If, therefore, any one knowingly partake of an idol-sacrifice, as such (it would seem that some went so far as to contend that Christians might do so), he makes himself responsible for the worship of the idol, and all the evils with which that worship is connected"—C. B. "The Levitical sacrifices were outward acts for maintaining membership in the commonwealth of Israel in the sphere of the flesh, i.e. natural and earthly life consecrated to God"—DELITZSCH.

19. What say I then? "Do I in saying this allow that an idol is anything Divine? I aver, on the contrary, that what the heathens sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils. Such in reality are the gods of the heathens; and with such only can you hold communion in those sacrifices"—WESLEY.

It might have been argued from the preceding verse that the apostle admitted the heathen offerings, and the idols to which they were offered, to be as real as were the offerings and being to whom the altar was erected by Israel, whereas in ch. 8. 4 he had asserted the contrary.

20. "Fellowship with devils. The words of the apostle do not imply the idea that every false god worshipped by the heathen corresponds to a particular demon; they signify merely that heathen religions emanate from those malignant spirits, and that consequently the man who takes part in such worship puts himself under their influence. 'How was it possible,' says HEINRICI, 'to sit at such a feast, to be sprinkled with the holy water, to obey the prescription of sacred silence, to take part in the joy of the hymns and dances which filled the interval between the sacrifice and the banquet, and finally to be given up to the joy of the feast which crowned the festive day to the glory of the false god, without acting as a worshipper of the heathen divinity?' Now I would not. This authoritative form is accounted for by the solicitude of love. A father cannot allow his children to deliver themselves into bad hands"—GODET.

21. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils—"ye cannot have communion with both"—WESLEY.

It is morally impossible for you to drink the cup that brings into communion with the Lord, i.e. Christ, and to drink the cup that brings into fellowship with demons. BEET says: "Christ claims our sole allegiance, and will tolerate no rival. Therefore, to indulge in the pleasures offered by idolatry is to forego the salvation which comes through the shed blood of Christ, which is solemnly set forth in the Christian feast, and makes the sacramental cup to be a cup of praise to God."

22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy—"by thus caressing His rivals? Are we stronger than He—are we able to resist or to bear His wrath?"—WESLEY.

Dreadful alternative! Are we just doing what Israel did of old in the desert, embittering the Lord to jealousy? (See Deut. 32. 21.) Are we stronger than He? Nay, but shall call forth the jealous and terrible anger of our Master, Christ.

23. Supposing this were lawful in itself, yet it is not expedient, it is not edifying to my neighbour"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul repeats here the great principle of Christian liberty. 'All things are lawful for me' (see ch. 6. 12), but insists, as before, that its application must be limited by a regard (1) to the effect which each action has upon ourselves, and (2) its influence on the Church at large. 'Does this act tend to my own spiritual profit? Does it tend to build up others?' should be the practical rules of Christian life"—ELLICOTT.

24. "His own only, but another's welfare also"—WESLEY.

"Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth—rather, 'the profit of his neighbour.' (Comp. Rom. 15. 1-3; Phil. 2. 4.) The conclusion is moral, not positive. No rule is laid down about eating or not eating any kind of food as a matter of importance in itself. With such things the gospel has no concern. What S. Paul does prescribe relates to the effect of our conduct upon others. (See Rom. 14 throughout.) It will thus happen in our case, as in that of the apostle, that what may be quite wrong under one set of circumstances may be quite right in another, as in Gal. 2. 3 and Acts 16. 1"—C. B.

25. "The apostle now applies this principle to the point in question. Asking no questions—whether it has been sacrificed or not"—WESLEY.

"A Christian might, without knowing it, eat an idol-sacrifice either (ver. 27) in the house of a heathen, or, as ver. 25 implies, by purchase in the market. S. Paul bids his readers not trouble themselves about this possibility. Whatever evil there is about any created material comes from its associations. But the fear which S. Paul here declares to be needless rests upon a belief that meat offered to idols is in itself defiling"—BEET.

26. "For God, who is the Creator, Proprietor, and Disposer of the earth and all that is therein, hath given the produce of it to the children of men, to be used without scruple"—WESLEY.

All food that earth brings forth or nourishes is God's gift, and therefore good. It was merely when regarded as an actual sacrifice that any meat could be considered that "of devils." This great truth, recognised in the Old Testament as well as in the New, is the reason of the previous statement that conscience need not come into the matter at all.

27. "There is much delicacy in the and ye be disposed. . . . S. Paul does not forbid acceptance of the invitation; for family bonds ought to be respected; they may even become, in the case of the believer, a means of advancing God's kingdom. But, while speaking as he does, and expressly referring the decision to the Christian's conscience, he yet makes him feel the need of reflection; for many dangers might accompany such invitations to heathen houses, even in a private dwelling, where the meal was always accompanied with certain religious ceremonies"—GODET.

28. For his sake that showed thee, and for conscience sake—"that is, for the sake of his weak conscience, lest it should be wounded"—WESLEY.

ELLICOTT says this verse teaches a lesson in controversy: "Don't conceal your conscientious convictions, but don't express them in language unnecessarily painful to your opponent."

29. Conscience I say, not thy own—"I speak of his conscience, not thine. For why is my liberty judged by another's conscience?—another's conscience is not the standard of mine, nor is another's persuasion the measure of my liberty"—WESLEY.

"This and the following verse are a little obscure, but the sense appears to be that no man has a right to interfere with the liberty enjoyed by another, save so far as his own conduct and conscientious convictions are likely to be affected thereby. In fact, the apostle's words in vers. 28, 29, 30, may be thus paraphrased: 'For conscience sake. Not that you are to feel conscience-stricken, as though you had yourself been doing something wrong, and given your neighbours a right to blame you. No man has any such right. You were doing no harm. You had a perfect right to eat what was set before you with gratitude to God for what He had given. No, it is not of your own, but of your neighbour's conscience that I was speaking. To him you would be doing harm incalculable, if you allowed him to suppose that there was no sin in worshipping idols'"—C. B.

30. If I by grace am a partaker—"if I thankfully use the common blessings of God"—WESLEY.

"Such a question might be asked by some who object to the restriction on their liberty which the advice just given implies. To the querulous objector the apostle gives no definitely limited reply. He lays down in the following verses the great principles which should guide all Christian life, and by which therefore every detail of it should be regulated"—ELLICOTT.

31. Therefore—"to close the present point with a general rule, applicable not only in this, but in all cases—whatsoever ye do—in all things whatsoever, whether of a religious or civil nature, in all the common, as well as sacred, actions of life, keep the glory of God in view, and steadily pursue in all this one end of your being, the planting or advancing the vital knowledge and love of God, first in your own soul, then in all mankind"—WESLEY.

"Therefore—an inference of the general from the particular—or whatever ye do. Surely this is not only a correct but also a happy rendering. Whether therefore ye eat, or drink—the glory of God, that is to be the end of all your actions. In themselves, eating and drinking are things indifferent, but there are circumstances in which they may be matters of the highest importance"—C. B. To the glory of God—using His gifts aright, consulting the true welfare of others, now eating, now not eating, according to the social context. All Christian conduct redounds to His glory. GODET says: "In questions which are not in themselves questions of good or evil, and which may remain undecided for the Christian conscience, the believer ought to ask himself, not, What will be most agreeable to me, or what best suit my interest? but, What will contribute most to promote God's glory and the salvation of my brethren? The question for the Christian is, therefore, translated into this: What will best make my brethren understand the love and holiness of my heavenly Father?"

32. Give no offence—"if, and as far as, it is possible"—WESLEY.

Lit. Behave without offence given to . . . i.e. "so as to place no moral obstacle before. Give none offence—a practical test of whether any course of conduct is to the glory of God. If it cause any human being to offend, then it is not to God's glory. Heretofore S. Paul had spoken only of the edification of the Christian Church, and the avoidance of any offence to a Christian brother"—SHORE.

33. Even as I—"as much as lieth in me—please all men"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul's own example, as in ch. 8. 13, supporting his advice. This example received irresistible force in ch. 9, which expounded and justified the principle which found expression in ch. 8. 13. He wishes to save them; and in view of so worthy and so serious an object, he gives up all thought of personal advantage, and seeks only their good"—BEET.

CHAPTER XI.

SECTION IX.—Vers. 3-16. THE DEMEANOUR OF WOMEN IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.—"At this point of the Epistle, S. Paul passes from the topics regarding which the Corinthians had requested him to inform them, to make some remarks on the manner in which, as he had heard, they were conducting their meetings for public worship. The next four chapters are occupied with instructions as to what constitutes seemliness and propriety in such meetings"—DODS.

1. As I am of Christ—"Christ is the highest Exemplar. Christ alone is the perfect Model; each believer is a model to his brethren, only in so far as he is a copy in relation to Christ. What S. Paul here asks of the church is, that it allows itself to be guided by the spirit of self-denial which animates himself, as he is guided by the spirit of self-sacrifice which was the soul of Christ's life"—GODET.

2. I praise you—"the greater part of you"—WESLEY.

"Large principles, when taken up by ardent and enthusiastic minds, without the modifications learnt by experience, are almost sure to run into extravagance, and hence the spirit of law is by degrees reduced to rules, and guarded by customs"—ROBERTSON.

3. I would have you know. "He does not seem to have given them any order before concerning this. The head of every man—particularly every believer—is Christ, and the head of Christ is God. Christ, as He is Mediator, acts in all things subordinately to His Father. But we can no more infer that they are not of the same Divine nature, because God is said to be 'the Head of Christ,' than that man and woman are not of the same human nature, because the man is said to be the head of the woman"—WESLEY.

"The movement of the Corinthian women towards independence, on the ground that all are one in Christ Jesus, S. Paul meets by reminding them that personal equality is perfectly consistent with social subordination. It was quite true, as S. Paul himself had taught them, that, so far as their connection with Christ went, there was no distinction of sex. To the woman, as to the man, the offer of salvation was made directly. There is but one Christ for all, rich and poor, high and low, male and female; and all are received by Him on the same footing, no distinction being made. While then, in things civil and social, the husband represents the wife, he cannot do so in matters of religion. Here each person must act for himself or herself. And the woman must not confound these two spheres in which she moves, or argue that, because she is independent of her husband in the greater, she must also be independent of him in the less. Equality in the one sphere is not inconsistent with subordination in the other"—DODS. "The head. In the idea of this word dominion is especially expressed. As in the human organisation the exercise of dominion over all the members proceeds from the head; so in the family, from man; in the Church, from Christ; in the universe, from God"—OLSHAUSEN. "The head of the woman is the man. (Comp. Eph. 5. 23.) It appears that the Christian women at Corinth claimed for themselves equality with the male sex, to which the doctrine of Christian freedom and the removal of the distinction of sex in Christ (Gal 3. 28) gave occasion. Christianity had indisputably done much for the emancipation of women, who in the East and among the Ionic Greeks (it was otherwise among the Dorians and the Romans) were in a position of unworthy dependence. But this was done in a quiet, not an over-hasty manner. In Corinth, on the contrary, they had apparently taken up the matter in a fashion somewhat too animated. The women overstepped due bounds by coming forward to pray and prophesy in the assemblies with uncovered head"—DE WETTE.

4. Every man praying or prophesying—"speaking by the immediate power of God—with his head—and face—covered—either with a veil or with long hair—dishonoureth his head. S. Paul seems to mean, as in these Eastern nations veiling the head is a badge of subjection, so a man who prays or prophesies with a veil on his head reflects a dishonour on Christ, whose representative he is"—WESLEY.

"Before he warns women not to seek to escape, even in the matter of dress, from the subordinate position of their sex, S. Paul reminds them that order and subordination are a law of the kingdom of God; that the husband is himself under the direction of Christ; and that even within the Divine Trinity the Son is, in accordance with the law of His being, obedient to the Father. Prophesy (see ch. 12. 10). Puts to shame, etc.—proved in ver. 7*a*. He forsakes his place of honour in the race, which a correct instinct has ever marked by a distinction of dress; and thus does himself dishonour. And this dishonour is visible and conspicuous in his treatment of his own head"—BEET. "It was the custom of the Jews that they prayed not, unless first their head were veiled, and that for this reason—that by this rite they might show themselves reverent and ashamed before God, and unworthy with an open face to behold Him"—LIGHTFOOT.

5. But every woman—"who, under an immediate impulse of the Spirit (for then only was a woman suffered to speak in the church), prays or prophesies without a veil on her face, as it were disclaims subjection, and reflects dishonour on man, her head. For it is the same, in effect, as if she cut her hair short, and wore it in the distinguishing form of the men. In those ages men wore their hair exceeding short, as appears from the ancient statues and pictures"—WESLEY.

"With her head uncovered—i.e. without the peplum or shawl, which (see art. in Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities and Dean Stanley's Note) used ordinarily as a covering for the body, was on public occasions thrown over the head also. In Oriental countries, however, the women wore and still wear a veil. Dishonoureth her head. As the man honours his head by proclaiming his liberty, so the woman by acknowledging her subjection"—CALVIN. (Comp. Num. 5. 18.) "For that is even all one as if she were shaven—i.e. she might just as well be shaven, as appear in the public assemblies with her face entirely uncovered"—C. B.

6. Therefore if a woman is not covered—"if she will throw off the badge of subjection, let her appear with her hair cut like a man's. But if it be shameful for a woman to appear thus in public, especially in a religious assembly, let her, for the same reason, keep on her veil"—WESLEY.

"It is as if the apostle said, If a woman insists on her right to pray and speak in an assembly with uncovered head, let her carry out this principle to its logical result; let her insist on her right to have her hair cut short, so as to show her equality with man—and what would be thought of her then!"—ELLICOTT. "A shameful thing. What is the ground of this sense of shame? A universal and correct sentiment that the distinction of sex ought to be seen very conspicuously in a person's dress"—BEET.

7. A man indeed ought not to veil his head, because he is the image of God—"in the dominion he bears over the creation, representing the supreme dominion of God, which is his glory. But the woman is only matter of glory to the man, who has a becoming dominion over her. Therefore, she ought not to appear, but with her head veiled, as a tacit acknowledgment of it"—WESLEY.

"A man shows his manliness by a true

reverence for all women, by a clear recognition of the high service appointed to them by God, and by a tender sympathy with them in all the various endurance their nature and their position demand"—DODS. "A woman's influence embraces the whole of life. A wife, a mother—two magical words, comprising the sweetest sources of man's felicity! Theirs is the reign of beauty, of love, of reason, always a reign. A man takes counsel with his wife; he obeys his mother; he obeys her long after she has ceased to live, and the ideas he has received from her become principles even stronger than his passions"—LANDELS.

8. The man is not—"in the first production of nature"—WESLEY.

"The spiritual equality of man and wife does not upset this relationship, and therefore an attempt to destroy the outward expression of it is to be condemned, as it would soon lead to an obliteration of the fact itself"—ELLICOTT.

10. "For this cause also a woman ought to be veiled in the public assemblies, because of the angels—who attend there, and before whom they should be careful not to do anything indecent or irregular"—WESLEY.

"Because of the angels. This passage has also been explained in various ways. It is best on the whole to regard it as an intimation that the angels, though invisible, were fellow-worshippers with men in the Christian assemblies, and were therefore 'spectators of the indecency,' and liable to be offended thereat. 'When, therefore, the woman usurps the symbol of dominion, against what is right and lawful, she makes her shameful conduct conspicuous' in the eyes of the messengers of God: thus CALVIN. ERASMUS paraphrases it well: 'If a woman has arrived at that pitch of shamelessness that she does not fear the eyes of men, let her at least cover her head on account of the angels, who are present at your assemblies'"—C. B.

11. Nevertheless in the Lord Jesus, there is neither male nor female—"neither is excluded; neither is preferred before the other in His kingdom"—WESLEY.

MEYER says: "S. Paul's teaching from ver. 7 onward might possibly be misinterpreted by the men so as to lead them to underrate their own position." This certainly was not his intention. GODET explains: "The subordination of the wife to her husband is tempered in Christ by the oneness of spiritual life which they both draw from the Lord. The one is not without the other, and that evidently as believers; there is community of prayer between them, the constant exchange of spiritual aid and active co-operation."

12. "And as the woman was at first taken out of the man, so also the man is now, in the ordinary course of nature, by the woman; but all things are of God—the man, the woman, and their dependence on each other"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul here proves his previous statement, from the original bodily relation of the sexes. He assumes that with this the spiritual life must accord. (Comp. ver. 3.) It may, therefore, be quoted in proof of the relations of the sexes in the spiritual life. And the differences noted are not so great as might appear. For man and woman and all else have alike sprung from God. Thus, as in ver. 3, S. Paul concludes his argument in the presence of the Supreme"—BEET.

13. Judge of yourselves—"for what need of more arguments in so plain a case?—Is it decent for a woman to pray to God—the Most High, with that bold and undaunted air which she must have, when, contrary to universal custom, she appears in public with her head uncovered?"—WESLEY.

"Our version follows Tyndale here, and is equivalent in our modern language to, Is it proper? Is it becoming? 'It is impossible,' remarks ROBERTSON, 'to decide how much of our public morality and private purity is owing to the spirit which refuses to overstep the smallest bound of ordinary decorum.' And, again, 'Whatever contradicts feelings which are universally received,' that is, 'in questions of morality, propriety, and decency,' 'is questionable, to say the least'"—C. B. "Judge of yourselves! These words appeal to the instinct of truth which ought to exist in his readers themselves. For the very reason that she is speaking to God, she ought in this sacred act to veil her figure from the eyes of men"—GODET.

14. For a man to have long hair—"carefully adjusted, is such a mark of effeminacy as is a disgrace to him"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul is speaking of the natural sense of what is fitting in those whom he addressed. In early times the Greeks and the Romans wore long hair, and the Gauls and Germans did so in S. Paul's own time. So Homer continually speaks of the 'long-haired Greeks.' S. Chrysostom remarks that those who addicted themselves to philosophy in his day wore their hair long. But this was mere affectation. The general verdict of society has been that appealed to by the apostle. This instinctive consciousness of propriety on this point had been established by custom, and had become nature"—MEYER.

15. Given her—"originally, before the arts of dress were in being"—WESLEY.

"It is a glory to her. The true glory of every creature of God is to fulfil the law of its being. Whatever helps woman to discharge the duties of modesty and submissiveness assigned to her by God is a glory to her"—LIAS.

16. "We have no such custom here, nor any of the other churches of God. The several churches that were in the apostles' time had different customs in things that were not essential; and that under one and the same apostle, as circumstances, in different places, made it convenient. And in all things merely indifferent the custom of each place was of sufficient weight to determine prudent and peaceable men. Yet even this cannot overrule a scrupulous conscience, which really doubts whether the thing be indifferent or no. But those who are referred to here by the apostle were contentious, not conscientious persons"—WESLEY.

"This warning suggests that, from a boasted love of strife, some defended the women who rejected the head-dress. To such S. Paul says that in loving strife they stand alone among the churches"—BEET. "The argument and the appeal to their own good sense having been completed, the apostle now adds that if, after all, some one continues to argue the matter captiously, and is not satisfied with the reason given, the answer to such an one must be simply, We, the apostles and the churches of God, have no such customs as that women should pray and teach with uncovered head"—ELLICOTT. The disorder which S. Paul has just described and combated was a small matter in comparison with that to which he now passes. The style of his language, too, becomes more severe. He begins by applying to the assemblies for worship what he said about the prevailing discussions at Corinth, in the first four chapters (vers. 17-19).

SECTION X.—Vers. 17-34. COUNSEL RESPECTING THE LORD'S SUPPER.—17. S. Paul declares that his praise of the Corinthians for their general fidelity to the ecclesiastical institutions he had transmitted to them does not extend to the matter of which he is going to speak. In commendation or in blame he shows equal fidelity.

18. In the church—"in the public assembly. I hear there are schisms among you; and I partly believe it—that is, I believe it of some of you. It is plain that by 'schisms' is not meant any separation from the church, but uncharitable divisions in it; for the Corinthians continued to be one church; and, notwithstanding all their strife and contention, there was no separation of any one party from the rest, with regard to external communion. And it is in the same sense that the word is used, ch. 1. 10; 12. 25, which are the only places in the New Testament, besides this, where church schisms are mentioned. Therefore, the indulging any temper contrary to this tender care of each other is the true scriptural schism. This is, therefore, a quite different thing from that orderly separation from corrupt churches which later ages have stigmatised as schisms, and have made a pretence for the vilest cruelties, oppressions, and murders, that have troubled the Christian world. Both heresies and schisms are here mentioned in very near the same sense, unless by schisms be meant, rather, those inward animosities which occasion heresies — that is, outward divisions or parties: so that whilst one said, 'I am of Paul,' another 'I am of Apollos,' this implied both schisms and heresy. So wonderfully have later ages distorted the words heresy and schism from their scriptural meaning. Heresy is not, in all the Bible, taken for 'an error in fundamentals,' or in anything else; nor schism for any separation made from the outward communion of others. Therefore, both heresy and schism, in the modern sense of the words, are sins that the Scripture knows nothing of; but were invented merely to deprive mankind of the benefit of private judgment and liberty of conscience"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul censures two kinds of evil attaching to their assemblies, deterioration in the Agapé or love-feasts, and misapplication of the gifts of the Spirit. He describes his belief to a certain point as applying only to a charitably supposed minority of disorderlies. The word divisions in this text does not mean schisms, as in the margin of the A.V. It should be remembered that this Epistle says nothing of separation into sects, but speaks of partitions into schools, as Pauline, Apolloite, etc.; it describes an arrogant party spirit tending indeed to a breach of outward unity, but not yet sundering the bond"—EVANS. "In some part, suggests S. Paul's hope that, though he cannot doubt that the report is true in the main, it may be exaggerated. Notice the courtesy, mingled with seriousness, of these words"—BEET.

19. There must be heresies—"divisions—among you—in the ordinary course of things; and God permits them, that it may appear who among you are, and who are not, upright of heart"—WESLEY.

Must denotes a necessity growing out of the Divine order and government. But this necessity is no excuse for those who create divisions; for it rests upon their foreseen and inexcusable selfishness. (Comp. Rom. 16. 17; Matt. 18. 7; Luke 17. 1.) May be made manifest. The sense is in full; there must needs be self-assertions and headstrong opinions as well as divisions, as a means of testing, in order that the approved may come to view amongst you, and the genuine be sifted from the spurious, the true metal from the base alloy, the gold from the ore.

20. Therefore—"that is, in consequence of those schisms—it is not eating the Lord's Supper—that solemn memorial of His death, but quite another thing"—WESLEY.

"The first Christians had all things in common; this custom ceasing, as it did in the time of the apostles, there came into its room a sort of offshoot or efflux of it. For though the wealthy no longer deposited their goods in a common fund, nevertheless, on stated days, they kept an open table for the Agapé. After divine service and the communion of the mysteries, the rich and the poor together feasted in kindly fellowship"—CHRYSOSTOM.

21. "For in eating—what ye call the Lord's Supper, instead of all partaking of one bread, each person brings his own supper, and eats it without staying for the rest. And hereby the poor, who cannot provide for themselves, have nothing; while the rich eat and drink to the full: just as the heathens use to do at the feasts on their sacrifices"—WESLEY.

"It is not merely that the conduct of the Corinthian Christians was inconsistent with taking part in the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, but that it was in no sense a supper of Christ's institution of which they partook. 'The question arose,' says Dean STANLEY, 'whether the majesty, the tenderness, the awe of the feast should be lost in a senseless orgy'"—C. B.

22. "Have ye not houses to eat and drink your common meals in? or do ye despise the church of God—of which the poor are both the larger and the better part. Do ye act thus in designed contempt of them?"—WESLEY.

"One feels in the lively succession of these accumulated questions the indignant emotion which fills the apostle as he calls up the scene before him. The for refers to an idea which is understood: It ought not so to be, for have you not . . .? S. Paul points out three principal sins in this conduct—first, the feast itself so celebrated, the Agapé, with the Holy Supper terminating it, is not a meal taken for support; it is a religious rite expressly instituted, and that for a religious purpose. The second rebuke refers to the want of respect to an assembly like the church; the third to the offence in particular given to a portion of its members, the poor who are humiliated"—GODET.

23. I received—"by an immediate revelation"—WESLEY.

"Lit. For I received of the Lord. Reason why S. Paul could not praise the Corinthians—their conduct was a gross profanation of a rite which had been so solemnly instituted by Christ"—C. B. "The same night in which He was betrayed. These words imply that the history of the betrayal was familiar, and they also solemnly and touchingly remind the Corinthians of the strange contrast between the events of that night, and the scenes in which they indulge now on the same night that they partake of that Supper" ELLICOTT.

24. This is My body, which is broken for you—"that is, this broken bread is the sign of My body, which is even now to be pierced and wounded for your iniquities. Take then, and eat of, this bread, in an humble, thankful, obedientiial remembrance of My dying love; of the extremity of My sufferings on your behalf, of the blessings I have thereby procured for you, and of the obligations to love and duty which I have by all this laid upon you"—WESLEY.

"What is the relation between this bread and the body of Jesus? The simplest explanation is this: Jesus takes the bread which is before Him, and, presenting it to His disciples, He gives it to them as the symbol of His body which is about to be given up to them on the cross, and to become the means of their salvation. The words, This do in remembrance of Me, are only found in S. Luke's account of the institution; they are wanting in Matthew and Mark. But these words are of great importance, for it is really on them alone that the idea of the Holy Supper, as a permanent rite, is based. Without them this act might be regarded as having been done by Jesus once for all. Evidently the apostles did not so understand it, for from the first they introduced the regular celebration of the Sacrament. (Acts 2. 42.) We do not the less on that account maintain the importance of S. Paul's independence, and of the originality of his narrative"—GODET.

25. After supper. "Therefore ye ought not to confound this with a common meal. Do this in remembrance of Me. The ancient sacrifices were in remembrance of sin: this sacrifice, once offered, is still represented in remembrance of the remission of sins"—WESLEY.

"In remembrance of Me. Some might say, We need no memorial of the Redeemer's sacrifice; it is graven on our hearts, as on the rocks, for ever. The Son of Man knew our nature far too well to trust to such a pledge, even if it could have been given. He knew that the remembrance of it would fade without perpetual repetition, and without an appeal to the senses; therefore by touch, by taste, by sight, we are reminded in the Sacrament that Christianity is not a thing of mere feeling, but a real historical actuality. It sets forth Jesus Christ evidently crucified among us. Let us draw something practical from this. Memory depends on two things—on repetition, and on the impression being a sensible one, that is, one of which the senses take cognisance. Does any man wish to forget God? Does any man wish to live in sin without being disturbed by the painful thought of judgment? We can tell him how he may ensure that—for a time at least. Let him attempt to be wiser than his Maker; let him say, I can read my Bible at home, and worship God in the open beauties of nature, as well as in a church; let him give up private prayer, and never attend the Lord's table, giving up all that is symbolical in religion. Let him do this, and we will ensure him most terrible success; for so judgment to come will be to him only a hypothesis, and God's own existence merely a perhaps"—ROBERTSON. "We are saved by remembering Christ, and by assimilating the spirit of His life and death. When He said, Do this in remembrance of Me, He meant that His people to all time should remember that He had given Himself wholly to them and for them"—DODS.

26. Ye show forth the Lord's death—"ye proclaim, as it were, and openly avow it to God, and to all the world—till He come—in glory"—WESLEY.

If Meyer be right in supposing that the word here used is never employed except in the sense of oral proclamation (see ch. 2. 1; 9. 14, of this Epistle; and Phil. 1. 16, 18; Col. 1. 28, are examples of its use by S. Paul), we have here strong grounds for affirming that the words of institution formed part of the form of celebrating the Sacrament, even in apostolic times. The word occurs ten times in the Acts of the Apostles, always in the sense of "proclaim." "The Lord's death—since this Sacrament was instituted as a memorial of Christ's death upon the cross. Till He come. As long as the Christian Church shall last, this Sacrament will continue to be celebrated for the object for which it was instituted. However widely divided on other points, Christians have agreed in carrying out this prediction for more than eighteen hundred years"—C. B. "S. Paul regarded the Lord's Supper as a rite to be often celebrated, and that in all future time, until the Lord Himself should come to judge the world. The perpetual obligation of this ordinance cannot, therefore, be reasonably disputed"—WATSON.

27. Whosoever shall eat this bread unworthily—"that is, in an unworthy, irreverent manner, without regarding either Him that appointed it, or the design of its appointment—shall be guilty of profaning that which represents the body and blood of the Lord"—WESLEY.

"Unworthily, 'not merely,' says ESTIUS, 'with a mind distracted by worldly thoughts, though that is not to be commended, but in an irreverent spirit,' in a frame of mind unsuitable to so solemn an act; without faith in, or a thankful remembrance of, the great mystery therein commemorated; and, above all, in a spirit which regarded what is essentially the Supper of the Lord as a supper of one's own, and therefore as one at which it was lawful to be selfish or intemperate, or both. Shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord—either (1) shall be punishable for 'crucifying the Son of God afresh, and putting Him to an open shame' (Heb. 6. 6), 'as though thou thyself didst shed the blood' (THEOPHYLACT); or (2) for committing an offence against the body and blood of Christ, since 'the participation presupposes a moral condition which must be in keeping with this most sacred commemoration; but if the condition of the communicant be of an opposite kind, then the holy body and blood, into communion with which we enter through such participation, can only be abused and profaned"—MEYER.

28. But let a man examine himself—"whether he know the nature and the design of the institution, and whether it be his own desire and purpose thoroughly to comply therewith"—WESLEY.

The emphasis is on examine—the metaphor from metal-testing; let him approve himself, sifting what is refuse from what is sterling, the carnal from the spiritual. And so—after such examination—let him eat. Remember graces are to be purified, as well as sins purged out. Let us see that we so come to Him, that we do not put Him to receive sins as well as sinners. For though Christ is willing to make us part of His body, yet He will not unite Himself to sin. WATERLAND says: "There can be no just bar to frequency of communion but the want of preparation, which is only such a bar as men may themselves remove if they please; and therefore it concerns them highly to take off the impediment as soon as possible, and not to trust to vain hopes of alleviating one fault by another . . . . The danger of misperforming any religious duty is an argument for fear and caution, but no excuse for neglect; God insists upon the doing of it, and the doing of it well also . . . . A man may say that he comes not to the table because he is not prepared, and so far he assigns a good reason; but if he should be further asked why he is not prepared when he may, then he can only make some trifling, insufficient excuse, or remain speechless."

29. "For he that eateth and drinketh so unworthily as those Corinthians did, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself—temporal judgments of various kinds (ver. 30)—not distinguishing the sacred tokens of the Lord's body — from his common food"—WESLEY.

"The positive counsel S. Paul gives regarding suitable preparation for participation in this Sacrament is very simple. He would have every man answer the plain question, Do you discern the Lord's body in the Sacrament? He who clearly understands that this is no common meal, but the outward symbol, by means of which God offers to us Jesus Christ, is not likely to desecrate the Sacrament. 'This is My body,' says the Lord, meaning that this bread will ever remind the communicant that his Lord freely gave His own body for the life of the world. And whoever accepts the bread and the wine, because they remind him of this, and bring him into a renewed attitude of faith, is a worthy communicant"—DODS.

30. For this cause—"which they had not observed—many sleep—in death"—WESLEY.

"In the apostolic Church, the power of God manifested itself before men's eyes both in works of mercy and in punishment. (Comp. Acts 5. 5; 13. 11, with which this verse is a coincidence.) The severity of the punishment proves how great was the sin. Whether, before receiving this letter, the Corinthian Christians knew the spiritual cause of this sickness and death, cannot now be determined"—BEET.

31. If we would judge ourselves—"as to our knowledge, and the design with which we approach the Lord's table—we should not be thus judged—that is, punished by God"—WESLEY.

"A comment on the facts of ver. 30. These penalties may be avoided; and are inflicted in mercy. Judged—the sentence which they who (ver. 29) eat and drink without recognising the body bring upon themselves, and which was followed in some cases by the penalties of ver. 30"—BEET.

32. "When we are thus judged, it is with this merciful design, that we may not be finally condemned with the world"—WESLEY.

The final judgment of the world, to which careless Christians are in danger of being relegated. (See chaps. 6 and 9.) The world here is not the Divine order of things as established by God's ordinance (as in ch. 3. 22; John 1. 10), but as thrown into disorder by man's sin. (See John 19. 17; 15. 18; 1 John 2. 15, 16.)

33, 34. The rest—"the other circumstances relating to the Lord's Supper"—WESLEY.

"The conclusion of the whole subject. Every one is to wait till a fair and orderly distribution of the food has been made; and each is to remember that this is not an ordinary meal for the purpose of satisfying hunger, but the solemn commemoration of the Lord's death. A meal for the purpose of satisfying hunger had best be taken at home, to avoid the profanation which the apostle has condemned"—C. B.

CHAPTER XII.

SECTION XI. — Chaps. 12–14. SPIRITUAL GIFTS—THEIR ORIGIN AND CHARACTER.—"We have often to remind ourselves that this Epistle was addressed to a church in a state of faction. One cause of rivalry was the merits of their respective teachers; another was the endowments of various kinds given to the members of the church"—ROBERTSON. "This and the next two chapters are concerned with the great outpouring of spiritual energy which followed the preaching of the gospel. S. Paul deals with it in his usual manner. He characteristically lays down broad principles in this and the next chapter before he proceeds to the details of ch. 14. He is specially solicitous to do so here because of the danger so often experienced in the church (see ch. 14. 32), of the belief that a condition of great spiritual exaltation absolved men from the necessity of consulting their reason. The apostle teaches that spiritual gifts are no less to be restrained in their exercise by considerations of decency, of order, of what is due to others, than gifts of a more ordinary kind. Therefore he takes occasion to show (vers. 1–11) that all gifts proceed from one source, and that miraculous powers are no more gifts of the Spirit than some others not supposed to be miraculous, and then (vers. 12–30) that neither he who possesses them has any right to despise him who does not, nor he who does not possess them to envy him who does, since 'each has his own proper gift of God.' He goes on further (ch. 13) to point out the 'more excellent way' of love, and finally, in ch. 14, proceeds to lay down the regulations necessary for the preservation of order in the Christian assemblies"—C. B. GODET says: "We have here one of the richest and most interesting parts of the Epistle. These chapters are to us like a revelation of the power of that spiritual movement which went forth from Pentecost, and of the wonderful spiritual effervescence which at the outset signalised the new creation due to the power of the gospel."

1. Now concerning spiritual gifts. "The abundance of these in the churches of Greece strongly refuted the ideal learning of the Greek philosophers. But the Corinthians did not use them wisely, which occasioned S. Paul's writing concerning them. He describes—(1) the unity of the body (vers. 1–27); (2) the variety of members and offices (vers. 27–30); (3) the way of exercising gifts rightly, namely, by love (ver. 31; ch. 13); and adds (4) a comparison of several gifts with each other, in the fourteenth chapter"—WESLEY.

"Spiritual gifts — or 'spiritual things' (Rom. 1. 11; 15. 27; ch. 2. 13; 9. 11; 10. 3 f.; 14. 1)—things pertaining to, i.e. bestowed by, the Spirit of God (ver. 31)"—BEET. "The expression, I would not have you ignorant, alludes to the mysterious side of the subject, and to its complete novelty to men recently converted"—GODET. "The Corinthians had received many gifts of the Holy Ghost, but they had not used them wisely, which occasioned the apostle's writing concerning them"—BENSON.

2. Ye were heathens—"therefore, whatever gifts ye have received, it is from the free grace of God. Carried away — by a blind credulity—after dumb idols—the blind to the dumb; idols of wood and stone, unable to speak themselves, and much more to open your mouths, as God has done. As ye were led—by the subtlety of your priests"—WESLEY.

"In your former heathen state you had no experience whatever similar to that which you now have in the church. The dumb idols, to the worship of which you let yourselves be carried, did not communicate powers similar to those which the Spirit now communicates to you. Consequently, novices as you are in this domain, you need a guiding thread to prevent you from going astray. This is why I instruct you"—GODET. "Led, led away—graphic picture of the unreasoning action and the bondage of idolaters. While frequenting the temples, and following the processions, of heathenism they were really surrendering themselves to the guidance of an unseen power operating upon them as circumstances or events may determine. Men are idolaters usually not by their own choice, but by circumstances. In Eph. 2. 2 f., we have a similar contrast of past and present"—BEET.

3. Therefore — "since the heathen idols cannot speak themselves, much less give spiritual gifts to others, these must necessarily be among Christians only. As no one speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed — that is, as none who does this (which all the Jews and heathens did) speaketh by the Spirit of God—is actuated by that Spirit, so as to speak with tongues, heal diseases, or cast out devils. So no one can say, Jesus is the Lord—none can receive Him as such; for, in the Scripture language, to say or to believe implies an experimental assurance — but by the Holy Ghost. The sum is, None have the Holy Spirit but Christians: all Christians have this Spirit"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul here lays down a broad general principle respecting spiritual inspiration. No man can say, etc. This made the broad separation between the Christian Church and the Gentile world. This, the great bond of Christians, S. Paul tells us, is far above all distinctions as to the degree of spiritual gifts or inspiration"—ROBERTSON. "Wherefore—the connection of thought is as follows. When you were heathen you were carried hither and thither by the pretended utterances of your gods, and believed whatever they might tell you. But now you must no longer be the sport of circumstances. There are certain fundamental principles by which you may try the utterances of those who would teach you. (Comp. an extremely similar passage in 1 John 4. 1–3.) This caution was very necessary in the infant Church"—LIAS. "To own the lordship of Jesus was the test of a man's Christianity. Did he acknowledge as supreme that Person who had lived and died under the name of Jesus? Did he employ his spiritual gifts for the furtherance of His kingdom, and as one who was really endeavouring to serve this unseen Master?—Then no hesitation need be shown in admitting his claim to be animated by the Spirit of God. In other words, S. Paul wishes them to understand that, after all, the only sure test of a man's Christianity is his actual submission to Christ. As to the gifts themselves, they should be no cause of discord, for they have everything in common; they have their source in God; they are for Christ's service; they are forms of the same Spirit"—DODS. (See ver. 4.)

4. There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit—"divers streams, but all from one fountain. This verse speaks of the Holy Ghost, the next of Christ, the sixth of God the Father. The apostle treats of the Spirit, ver. 7, etc.; of Christ, ver. 12, etc.; of God, ver. 28, etc."—WESLEY.

"Our Christianity is a fact far above our special and particular endowments. Not that in which we differ from other Christians, but that in which we differ from the world lying in wickedness; in that consists our distinction in the sight of God. In ver. 13 he appeals to the sacraments: Does baptism teach of a difference between Christians? does it not rather teach that all the baptized are baptized into one body? There are varieties, differences—yes, says the apostle, but they are all of the selfsame Spirit"—ROBERTSON. "Christian influence is not an external appliance that clips all men after one pattern, as trees in an avenue are clipped into one shape; but it is an inward and vital power, which causes each to grow according to his own individuality, one with the rugged irregularity of the oak, another with the orderly richness of the plane. At one in their allegiance to Christ, bound into one body by common affections, beliefs and hopes, and aiming at the advancement of one cause, Christians are yet as different as other men in faculty, in temperament, in attainment"—DODS.

5. Administrations — "offices — but the same Lord appoints them all"—WESLEY.

Administrations — rather, as margin, "ministries," i.e. services rendered to Christ and His members by His disciples.

6. Operations — "effects produced. This word is of a larger extent than either of the former. But it is the same God who worketh all these effects in all persons concerned"—WESLEY.

The apostle here is speaking of active power, not latent as in ch. 1. 8. The influences to which he now refers are actually at work, and producing results, in obedience to an impulse received from Him. (Comp. Rom. 7. 5 and Matt. 14. 2.) GODET adds: "After this general survey of the Divine unity which controls the three great forms of activity and their manifold varieties the apostle comes to the one which is most important for him to regulate in the given circumstances, viz. gifts. And before showing how rich in number they are, he reminds them of the common principle which produces them, and points to the common end which unites them — the common advantage (ver. 7). Then he states them in all their variety, each time repeating the one principle from which they proceed (vers. 8–12)."

7. The manifestation—"the gift whereby the Spirit manifests itself—is given to each—for the profit of the whole body"—WESLEY.

Each receives an aptitude from the Spirit, but not for himself; what each possesses is intended for the good of all. To profit withal —God's object is ever the well-being of man. If man is to become one spirit with God (ch. 6. 17), his object must be the same. Each has a capacity for usefulness, a gift of the Spirit, and this is given to him for the general good.

8. The word of wisdom—"a power of understanding and explaining the manifold wisdom of God in the grand scheme of gospel salvation. The word of knowledge—perhaps an extraordinary ability to understand and explain the Old Testament types and prophecies"—WESLEY.

"List of gifts, in support of ver. 7, making very prominent that all come from the One Spirit. The list is broken up, by a slight verbal change, into three series: intellectual gifts, wisdom and knowledge (ver. 8); gifts conspicuously miraculous, under the heading of 'faith' (vers. 9, 10*a*); gifts connected with 'tongues' (ver. 10*b*). 'Wisdom' and 'knowledge' found together in Rom. 11. 33; Col. 2. 3; Eccles. 1. 16, 18; 2. 21, 26; 9. 10. 'Knowledge' is mere acquaintance with things past, present, or future. 'Wisdom' is, from the Christian point of view, such a direct grasp of underlying principles and eternal realities as enables a man to choose the right goal and the best path of life"—BEET.

9. "Faith may here mean an extraordinary trust in God under the most difficult or dangerous circumstances. The gift of healing need not be wholly confined to the healing disease with a word or a touch. It may exert itself also, though in a lower degree, where natural remedies are applied; and it may often be this, not superior skill, which makes some physicians more successful than others. And thus it may be with regard to other gifts likewise. As, after the golden shields were lost, the king of Judah put brazen in their place, so, after the pure gifts were lost, the power of God exerts itself in a more covert manner, under human studies and helps; and that the more plentifully, according as there is the more room given for it"—WESLEY.

"Faith—'belief,' not of the gospel (for this is, to all Christians, the one source of all Christian life and usefulness, Rom. 12. 3), but of some special revelation not given to all"—BEET. "Faith—not the rudimentary principle which was the essential condition of all Christian life, but that higher realisation of things Divine which enables a man to remove mountains (Matt. 17. 20; ch. 13. 2). Faith is the root of Christian life, not one of its fruits. The gifts of healing—as in S. Mark 16. 18; Acts 3. 7, 8; 5. 15, 16; 9. 34; 19. 11, 12; Jas. 5. 14, 15. The gifts of healing are closely connected with faith thus understood, for they have as their basis confidence in the power of God applied to disease. Here there is not only a confident prayer; there is a command given in the consciousness of complete harmony with the will of God, such as the 'Rise and walk' of S. Peter (Acts 3. 6)"—GODET.

10. The working of other miracles. Prophecy—"foretelling things to come. The discerning—whether men be of an upright spirit or no; whether they have natural or supernatural gifts for offices in the church; and whether they who profess to speak by inspiration speak from a Divine, a natural, or a diabolical spirit"—WESLEY.

"Prophecy does not proceed from a resolution or reflection of the prophet's own, but from a power independent of him, which masters his mind and makes him speak in order to act on others"—HOFMANN. "Prophecy is a miracle in the form of speech. It proceeds from a revelation regarding the present state, course, and future of the kingdom of God. In transmitting this revelation to the Church, the prophet endeavours to stimulate it and to raise it to the height of his theme. It is in the spiritual domain an effect analogous to that which is produced on the sick man by the 'Rise and walk' pronounced by him who has the gift of healing"—GODET. Discerning of spirits—i.e. the power to distinguish between the workings of the Holy Spirit and of evil and misleading spirits. (See 1 Tim. 4. 1; 1 John 4. 1.)

11. As He willeth—"the Greek word does not so much imply arbitrary pleasure, as a determination founded on wise counsel"—WESLEY.

"That one—in opposition to the plurality of believers—the same—in opposition to the diversity of gifts. By the words, as He will, the apostle does not ascribe to the Spirit a capricious and fantastic mode of procedure. The good pleasure of God is never exercised except in perfect harmony with all the perfections of His character, His wisdom, goodness, righteousness. The words, to every man as He will, are undoubtedly intended to sweep away, from the more gifted of the Corinthians, every feeling of self-merit, and from the less favoured every tendency to discontentment"—GODET.

12. So is Christ—"that is, the body of Christ, the Church"—WESLEY.

The multiplicity of gifts, harmonised in the unity of the Giver, is illustrated by the human organism of one body in many members, and many members in one body. This illustration is immediately transferred from the natural organism of the human body to the spiritual organism of the Church, here designated by the title of its Head, the CHRIST.

13. "For by that one Spirit, which we received in baptism, we are all united in one body. Whether Jews or Gentiles—who are at the greatest distance from each other by nature. Whether slaves or freemen—who are at the greatest distance by law and custom. We have all drank of one Spirit—in that cup, received by faith, we all imbibed one Spirit, who first inspired, and still preserves the life of God in our souls"—WESLEY.

"A most blessed fellowship. To the man who experiences its safety and joy, the Holy Spirit becomes an abiding possession, guaranteed by the Christian covenant (see John 3. 3–5, as above, and 4. 14; 7. 38, 39; 14. 16, 17; 15. 26; 16. 7; and comp. Matt. 3. 11) so long as he himself is willing to be bound by the terms of that covenant. This change of relation to God, involving as it does a change of habits, dispositions, tempers—nature, in fact, is called in Scripture the new birth"—C. B. "For—here follows an illustrative proof of the former statement — the human body is composed of many members, and so also is the spiritual body of Christ, which is His Church" —ELLICOTT. "This verse does not imply that S. Paul's readers received the Spirit in the moment of their baptism. (Comp. Acts 10. 44–48.) He simply links together, as necessarily connected in all ordinary cases, the outward rite and the spiritual element which alone can give it reality"—BEET. "Into one body. Does baptism teach of a difference between Christians? Does it not rather teach that all the baptized are baptized into one body?"—ROBERTSON.

14. For the body is not one member, but many—the same leading idea is kept in view—the diversity of functions, offices, gifts, but the unity of the body. No more complete or apposite illustration could be given. The body is one thing, animated by one soul, belonging to one being, yet with an infinity of various parts, each contributing by their action to the fulfilment of one and the same purpose, the life and usefulness of the man.

15. "The foot is elegantly introduced as speaking of the hand; the ear, of the eye; each, of a part that has some resemblance to it. So among men each is apt to compare himself with those whose gifts some way resemble his own, rather than with those who are at a distance, either above or beneath him. Is it therefore not of the body? Is the inference good? Perhaps 'the foot' may represent private Christians; 'the hand,' officers in the Church; 'the eye,' teachers; 'the ear,' hearers"—WESLEY.

"The object of this exposition (vers. 15–26) is manifest. The Corinthians were disposed to exaggerate the value of certain gifts, which, from their extraordinary character, were fitted to strike the senses, in particular of the gift of speaking in tongues. From this prejudice there followed two evils. On the one hand, those who did not possess such gifts kept aloof, discontented and discouraged, and the Church was deprived of their services, which might have been very needful; on the other, those who possessed the gifts took pleasure in displaying them in the assemblies, so as to prevent the less brilliant guests from filling the place which should have been reserved for them. It is to these two defects that the apostle successively applies the figure of the part played by the members of the human body; to the former, in the passage, vers. 15-17; to the latter, in the passage, vers. 18–26. Though the application of the figures to spiritual gifts is transparent, it is nevertheless true that everything the apostle says has already literal verity in relation to the members of the human body. The foot and the ear speak here as less conspicuous and favoured members than the hand and the eye, which represent the most highly valued gift"—GODET.

17. If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? "Observe here the difference between the Christian doctrine of unity and equality, and the world's idea of levelling all to one standard. The intention of God with respect to the body is not that the rude hand should have the delicacy of the eye, or the foot have the power of the brain"—ROBERTSON. "To desire such an equality as this," says CALVIN, "would produce a confusion which would bring about immediate ruin." The duty of each is to do his work in the place in which God has set him, with a proper consideration for the rights and the needs of his brother Christians who occupy other positions in the world. "If each man," continues ROBERTSON, "had the spirit of self-surrender, the spirit of the cross, it would not matter to himself whether he were doing the work of the mainspring or of one of the inferior parts."

18. As it hath pleased Him—"with the most exquisite wisdom and goodness"—WESLEY.

Lit. "as He willed." All our talents, our gifts and graces, are of God, and we may use them for His glory. It is our duty to so employ everything which He has given to us. He who tries to make the best of all his gifts need not repine because he does not possess what he may consider greater qualifications for Christian work. We do not serve a "hard master."

19. "This expresses once more the idea of ver. 17: 'If God had acted otherwise, what would have become of the body?' Instead of this admirable organism, we should have a being endowed with a single sense, as is found, for example, in the lowest grade of animalism" —GODET.

20. But one body—"and it is a necessary consequence of this unity, that the several members need one another"—WESLEY.

"Here, no doubt, the illustration is drawn out in this particular direction to rebuke those who being themselves possessed of what were considered important spiritual gifts despised the gifts which the Spirit had bestowed upon others"—ELLICOTT.

21. Nor the head—"the highest part of all —to the foot—the very lowest"—WESLEY.

All members of the body, high and low, weak and strong, are all absolutely necessary to one another, and that for the furtherance of the individual and of the common weal. The proper use of the organs which direct, and those which execute, is ensured by their combination.

22. The members which appear to be weaker — "being of a more delicate and tender structure; perhaps the brains and bowels, or the veins, arteries, and other minute channels of the body"—WESLEY.

The more feeble parts of the body, those which are most delicate, are by no means the least valuable. The eye or the brain, for instance, are more necessary to the well-being of the body than other stronger organs. GODET says: "Hence it follows that the gifts and offices which have a modest appearance are necessary, no less than the others, to the prosperity of the whole."

23. "We surround with more abundant honour—by so carefully covering them. More abundant comeliness—by the help of dress" —WESLEY.

"The general argument of this and the following verse is that the weakest parts of the body are as necessary to the body as the strongest; and those parts which are considered less seemly are more abundantly cared for by being carefully covered with clothes, as distinguished from the face and hands, which are uncovered" — ELLICOTT. "The meanest trades are those with which we can least dispense. A nation may exist without an astronomer or philosopher, but the day-labourer is essential to the existence of man"—ROBERTSON.

24. Giving more abundant honour to that which lacked—"as being cared for and served by the noblest parts"—WESLEY.

God has made every member to have an interest in the comely and honourable appearance of all the others. Love on their part thus becomes a matter of rightly understood self-interest.

25. No schism. "The existence of differences of gifts in the church had been used by the Corinthians to cause schisms, exalting some gifts and depreciating others, when this very variety in the church ought, as was the intention of variety in the human body, to create a mutual dependence, which would promote unity" — ELLICOTT. "But the members should have the same care one for another. All wars, insurrections, conflicts between class and class, arise from forgetfulness of the fact that the interests of all mankind are identical. Nor can this forgetfulness be charged upon one nation or one class of society. The spirit and the law of the life of Christ is to be that of every member of the Church, and the law of the life of Christ is that of sympathy. How little, during the eighteen hundred years, have the hearts of men been got to beat together! Nor can we say that this is the fault of the capitalists and the masters only. It is the fault of the servants and dependants also" — ROBERTSON.

26. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it. This is a matter of the most ordinary experience in the human body. A pain in any portion, even the most remote from the seats of life, affects the whole. A glance at history will show us that it is the same with the body politic. Whatever is physically, morally, or spiritually injurious to any one portion of society, or of the Church of Christ, is sure in the long run to produce injury, moral and spiritual deterioration, to the rest. Or, one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it. S. CHRYSOSTOM eloquently remarks here: "Is the head crowned? All the man is glorified? Do the lips speak? The eyes also laugh and rejoice." This part of the verse is as true as the former. Whatever tends to exalt the character and purify the aims of any one class in society is sure, in a greater or less degree, to affect every other. If the one thought is calculated to alarm us by calling our attention to the infinite mischief which may be wrought by one act of thoughtlessness or selfishness, it is an immense encouragement to be reminded by the other that no work for good, undertaken from unselfish motives and carried out in an unselfish spirit, can possibly be without effect. On this verse CHRYSOSTOM says: "As when by chance a thorn is planted in the heel, all the body manifests a fellow-feeling."

27. "Now ye—Corinthians—are the body and members of Christ — part of them, I mean, not the whole body"—WESLEY.

"We here return to the proposition of vers. 12, 13, rendered more definite and intelligible by what has since been said. The apostle now says (1) that collectively Christians are the body of Christ, individually they are His members; (2) that of these members each has its several office (ver. 28); and (3) that none of these offices is common to the whole Christian body, but each belongs only to those to whom it has been assigned (vers. 29, 30)"—C. B. "The unity of Christians is a vital unity. The members of the body of Christ form one whole, because they partake of one common life. The same spiritual life exists in all Christians, derived from the same source, supplying them with similar energy, and prompting them to the same habits and aims"—DODS.

28. First, apostles—"who plant the gospel in the heathen nations. Secondly, prophets —who either foretell things to come, or speak by extraordinary inspiration, for the edification of the Church. Thirdly, teachers—who precede those that work miracles. Under 'prophets' and 'teachers' are comprised evangelists and pastors. (Eph. 4. 11.) Helps, governments. It does not appear that these mean distinct offices; rather, any persons might be called 'helps,' from a peculiar dexterity in helping the distressed; and 'governments,' for a peculiar talent for governing or presiding in assemblies"—WESLEY.

"These different orders held their rank by Divine appointment; and all this exterior dignity in the Church, though often followed with hunger, exile, and martyrdom, was real dignity in the eyes of heaven. We must account those that rule well worthy of double honour. If Christianity has conquered in the fight, let the princes of the congregation wear their laurel. On the other hand, the truth must be declared. If those bishops have abandoned Christ the Son of God for Jesus the Son of Mary; if revelation be substituted by philosophy, their apostolic claims are all nugatory"—SUTCLIFFE. "It is God who has set in the Church all the different gifts and offices, and who has established among them a decreasing scale of value. The apostle does not state the conclusion from this fact, which was sufficiently apparent from what had been said in regard to the members set in the body by the hand of God. The result is this: No one should consider himself as useless, or be so considered by the Church, because he is less brilliantly endowed than this or that other"—GODET. "We need, and may be enriched by even the humblest; and it is our privilege, if Christ abide in us, to be a benefit to all around"—BEET.

29, 30. "Are all apostles? Has God given the same gifts to all? By no means, for that would have been to make every member a sort of whole body, consequently to render it independent of all the rest, and so destroy the body itself. God would not have individuals possessing all the gifts, because He would not have anyone in a position to be self-sufficient; He so ordered things that the brethren should all need one another. God has given to believers a certain spiritual endowment (ver. 28), but side by side with this endowment He has left a blank in each of them, and so a want which does not allow him to separate himself from the rest. No individual ought to pose as self-sufficient. The body, as a whole, only exists on the condition that each member needs all the rest. 'All are not, however, apostles.' None of those, therefore, who are not such, will be able to dispense with the brethren whom God has made apostles. And if this is true regarding apostles and prophets, it is also true in regard to all other gifts and offices"—GODET. "Our lack of certain brilliant gifts is no proof that we do not belong to Christ. For we possess other gifts incompatible with those we lack, and needful for the highest good of the community. An allotment of various gifts to various men is by the thoughtful care of God, and is needful for the welfare of the Church. All the members have capacities of usefulness, and all need to be supplemented by others"—BEET.

31. Ye covet earnestly the best gifts—"and they are worth your pursuit, though but few of you can attain them. But there is a far more excellent gift than all these; and one which all may, yea must, attain or perish"—WESLEY.

"Lit. Be envious of, or desire eagerly. (In Gal. 1. 18.) 'Zealously affected.' The best gifts were (see ch. 14) those which were most calculated to promote the edification of the Church. But they were also precisely those (see next chapter and Gal. 5. 22) which, so far from being peculiar to the individual, were within the reach of all Christians alike"—C. B. A more excellent way—i.e. the way of love, described in the following chapter. "S. Paul shows that above all gifts and the aspirations after them, there is a higher way open to the Christian—Love"—HOLSTEN. "What was suitable to us once, should not satisfy us now. Down among the rocky hollows of the sea there are creatures that cast their shell year by year; and up among the storm-beaten cliffs of the mountain, year by year also, the moulting eagle casts her feathers—these, that they may walk in larger, stronger mail; the other, that she may soar on broader pinions, and to higher flights. At such increase we should aim: to grow more busy in God's work; to spend more time and money in His service; to perform greater acts of self-denial; to increase both in the heavenliness of our temper, and in the generosity of our gifts. Not content with being only what once we were, and doing only what once we did, let us covet earnestly the best gifts, and attempt the loftiest heights of grace"—GUTHRIE. "Covet earnestly, etc. This is the best ambition. Christians should strive to excel, and be the best of what they undertake. A more excellent way. What was that? Charity of God and men. (Ch. 13.) Graces are better than gifts. Gifts as to heaven are but the lumber of a Christian; it is grace maketh him rich toward God; and is therefore chiefly to be coveted"—TRAPP.

CHAPTER XIII.

"THE NECESSITY OF LOVE IS SHOWN (vers. 1–3); THE NATURE AND PROPERTIES (vers. 4–7); THE DURATION OF IT (vers. 8–13)"—WESLEY.

This chapter has been called a hymn. In tone, indeed, it is truly lyrical, especially in the first verses. Charity is poetically personified. HEINRICI well says, "There is here such warmth as could only proceed from the purest experience of charity. It is as if LOVE itself stood before us, filled with its holy peace and profound sympathy."

1. Though I speak with all the tongues—"which are upon earth, and with the eloquence of an angel—and have not love—the love of God, and of all mankind for His sake, I am no better before God than the sounding instruments of brass, used in the worship of some of the heathen gods. Or a tinkling cymbal.

This was made of two pieces of hollow brass, which, being struck together, made a tinkling, but very little variety of sound"—WESLEY.

"The tongues of men—i.e. the languages of mankind—and of angels. The rabbis speak of the languages of angels. It is possible that S. Paul may be referring to this notion. But he himself also speaks (2 Cor. 12. 4) of hearing 'unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter,' when he was 'caught up to the third heaven.' And have not charity—Tyndale (who is followed by Cranmer and the Geneva Bible)—LOVE. The force of this eloquent panegyric on love is impaired, and the agreement between the various writers of the New Testament much obscured, by the rendering 'charity,' instead of 'love.' The aim no doubt of the Vulgate translators was to avoid the sensuous associations which the Latin word amor suggested. But the English word 'charity' has never risen to the height of the apostle's argument. At best it does but signify a kindly interest in and forbearance towards others. It is far from suggesting the ardent, active, energetic principle which the apostle had in view. And though the English word 'love' includes the affection which springs up between persons of different sexes, it is generally understood to denote only the higher and nobler forms of that affection, the lower being stigmatised under the name of passion"—C. B. "And have not charity. If I do not love the Lord supremely, with a love emanating from a pure heart, a good conscience, and faith unfeigned, I am become as sounding brass"—SUTCLIFFE. "The two terms brass and cymbal, which denote, the one a piece of unwrought metal struck to produce sound, the other a concave plate, used so frequently in the East as a musical instrument, perfectly describe the inflation of an exalted imagination, and an over-excited sensibility. Religious language is then no longer the natural overflowing of a heart filled with love; it resembles the resonant sound of a dead and hollow instrument"—GODET.

2. And though I have the gift of prophecy—"of foretelling future events—and understand all the mysteries—both of God's word and providence—and all knowledge—of things Divine and human, that ever any mortal attained to;—and though I have the highest degree of miracle-working faith, and have not this love—I am nothing"—WESLEY.

"All faith—in the sense of ch. 12. 9—so that I could remove mountains. A quotation of words recorded in Matt. 17. 20; 21. 21. Whether S. Matthew's Gospel were already written or not, those words had reached S. Paul, and this must be regarded as a confirmation of the truth of the Gospel narrative. It is remarkable that they appear in a different form in Luke 17. 6. I am nothing. The apostle does not say that it is possible for a man to have all these gifts without love. He only says that if it were possible, it would be useless. But real faith, in the Scripture sense, without love, is an impossibility. (Comp. Gal. 5. 6; Eph. 3. 17, 19; 4. 13–16; Jas. 2. 18–26.) True Christian faith unites us to Christ, who is Love"—LIAS. "All these gifts are less excellent than charity. They are not the perfection of our nature. He who treads the brilliant road of the highest accomplishments is, as a man, inferior to him who treads the path of love. For in the spiritual world a man is measured, not by his genius, but by his likeness to God. Intellect is not Divine; love is the most essential of all the attributes of God. Thus, to the apostle's mind, there was emptiness in eloquence, nothingness in knowledge and even in faith, unless in liberality and sacrifice, where love was not"—ROBERTSON.

3. And though I—"deliberately, piece by piece—give all my goods to feed the poor, yea, though I deliver up my body to be burned—rather than I would renounce my religion—and have not the love—hereafter described;—it profiteth me nothing. Without this, whatever I speak, whatever I have, whatever I know, whatever I do, whatever I suffer, is nothing"—WESLEY.

"There are two Christian actions which might seem to be beyond question as evidence of a sound spiritual condition—almsgiving and martyrdom. The young man who sought guidance from Christ lacked but one thing: to sell his property and give to the poor. But, says S. Paul, though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing. It is only too possible to do great acts of charity from a love of display, or from an uneasy sense of duty which parts reluctantly and grudgingly with what it bestows. That is understood. Common-sense tells every one but the abjectly superstitious man himself that it is as impossible to buy spiritual health on a bed of death as it is to buy the cure of his mortal disease. But martyrdom? Can a man give any stronger proof of his faith than to give his body to be burned? A willingness to suffer for one's opinion or one's faith is not in every case a guarantee of the existence of a heart transformed from selfishness to love. Love must be spontaneous, from the soul's self, not produced by considerations or the requirements of a position we wish to reach or to maintain. It is the result of God entering and possessing the soul. He that loveth is born of God. That is the only account to be given of the matter. And therefore it is that where love is absent all is absent"—DODS. "Love accepts only what is inspired by love. The most eminent gifts, the most heroic acts, avail nothing the instant they are not inspired by it. The absolute worth of charity also appears from the opposite consideration; while without it all is nothing, it produces all of itself. It is the mother of all virtues, 'the bond of perfection,' as S. Paul himself says (Col. 3. 14)" —GODET.

4. "The love of God, and of our neighbour for God's sake, is patient towards all men. It suffers all the weakness, ignorance, errors, and infirmities of the children of God; all the malice and wickedness of the children of the world; and all this, not only for a time, but to the end. And in every step toward overcoming evil with good, it is kind, soft, mild, benign. It inspires the sufferer at once with the most amiable sweetness, and the most fervent and tender affection. Love acteth not rashly — does not hastily condemn anyone; never passes a severe sentence on a slight or sudden view of things. Nor does it ever act or behave in a violent, headstrong, or precipitate manner. Is not puffed up—yea, humbles the soul to the dust"—WESLEY.

"The grace of charity is described in this and the three following verses. This description is needed, because no single word in any language will express the fulness of the Christian grace here spoken of. Therefore S. Paul gives this exquisite description of what he means by the word, distinguishing it from almsgiving, passion, sentiment, philanthropy, while something of them all is contained within it" — ROBERTSON. "This is not a picture drawn at random. It is a mirror in which the church is called to contemplate the humiliating image of what it has become, while it beholds the state which it is called to endeavour to attain. While tracing it, the apostle has two things constantly before his eyes—on the one hand, the figure of Him who realised on earth the ideal of a life of charity; on the other, the remembered sins against charity to which the Corinthians had given way in the exercise of the fair gifts bestowed on their church, because the use of them had not been subordinated to this cardinal virtue. Charity suffereth long—in regard to wrongs, even repeated, from our neighbour; here is victory over a just resentment. Kind—full of goodness, animated by the constant need to make oneself useful; it is the victory over idle selfishness and comfortable self-pleasure"—GODET.

5. It doth not behave indecently—"is not rude or willingly offensive, to any. It renders to all their due—suitable to time, person, and all other circumstances. Seeketh not her own — ease, pleasure, honour, or temporal advantage. Nay, sometimes the lover of mankind seeketh not, in some sense, even his own spiritual advantage; does not think of himself, so long as a zeal for the glory of God and the souls of men swallows him up. But, though he is all on fire for these ends, yet he is not provoked to sharpness or unkindness toward anyone. Outward provocations indeed will frequently occur; but he triumphs over all. Love thinketh no evil—indeed, it cannot but see and hear evil things, and know that they are so; but it does not willingly think evil of any; neither infer evil where it does not appear. It tears up, root and branch, all imagining of what we have no proof. It casts out all jealousies, all evil surmises, all readiness to believe evil"—WESLEY.

"How the inner man gives expression to the outer. (Rom. 14. 10.) Seeketh not her own —acts and speaks from disinterested motives; the germ of this conduct is the rare quality of unselfishness. Is not easily provoked—ever keeps the temper under control. Thinketh no evil—does not even mentally register an evil done to itself, but allows it to glance off unrecorded. This is the cardinal virtue of forgiveness of injuries. Is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly. Love saves a man from making a fool of himself by consequential conduct, and by thrusting himself into positions which betray his incompetence, and by immodest, irreverent, and eccentric actions. It balances a man, and gives him sense by bringing him into right relations with his fellows, and prompting him to esteem their gifts more highly than his own. Is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil—it is not fired with resentment at every little slight, and does not make a mental note and lay up in its memory the contempt shown by one, the indifference shown by another, the intention to wound betrayed by a third. Love is too little occupied with itself to feel these exhibitions of malice very keenly. Its eye is on the advantage to be gained by the needy, and not on itself" —DODS. Thinketh no evil—bears no malice. S. CHRYSOSTOM explains it by "is not suspicious." WATSON says: "Charity excludes all censoriousness or evil-speaking. When the end is not the correction of the offender, or when a declaration of the truth as to one person is not required by our love and duty to another; for whenever the end is merely to lower a person in the estimation of others, it is resolvable solely into an immoral feeling. This charity is an efficient affection, excluding all ill-will, and all injury."

6. Rejoiceth not in iniquity—"yea, weeps at either the sin or folly of even an enemy; takes no pleasure in hearing or in repeating it, but desires it may be forgotten for ever. But rejoiceth in the truth — bringing forth its proper fruit, holiness of heart and life. Good in general is its glory and joy, wherever diffused in all the world"—WESLEY.

Does not exult in any wrongdoing of others, but rejoices with a holy joy in the triumph of the truth of God, and especially as seen in the actions of good men. It has no pleasure in calumny or suspicions, but is thrilled with gladness where goodness is triumphant. "Rejoiceth not in iniquity. (Comp. Ps. 5. 4, 5, 'Thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness; Thou hatest all workers of ini quity'; and Hos. 7. 3; Rom. 1. 32; 2 Thess. 2. 12.) But rejoiceth in the truth—better as margin, and Vulgate, 'with the truth.' Love rejoiceth with the victory of truth in the world, and at the consequent decline of unrighteousness, which is the opposite of truth. (Comp. 2 Thess. 2. 10; 2 John 4)"—LIAS.

7. Love covereth all things—"whatever evil the lover of mankind sees, hears, or knows of anyone, he mentions it to none; it never goes out of his lips, unless where absolute duty constrains to speak. Believeth all things—puts the most favourable construction on everything, and is ever ready to believe whatever may tend to the advantage of anyone's character. And when it can no longer believe well, it hopes whatever may excuse or extenuate the fault which cannot be denied. Where it cannot even excuse, it hopes God will at length give 'repentance unto life.' Meantime it endureth all things—whatever the injustice, the malice, the cruelty of men can inflict. He cannot only do, but likewise suffer, all things, through Christ who strengtheneth him"—WESLEY.

Beareth all things—is proof against all such things as provocations. Believeth all things—not the weakness of credulity, but the guilelessness of a simple and unsuspecting mind, which is itself based upon an unblemished life. Endureth all things—manifests the virtue of fortitude, the cheerful and loyal sense of duty. In no other way can we vanquish our foes, but by this steady and determined resistance and invincible courage. Beareth all things—"suffers," Vulgate, and so Wyclif and Tyndale. Here it means to endure patiently indignities and affronts, save of course where the wellbeing of others requires that they should be repelled. "Believeth all things—'not that a Christian should knowingly and willingly suffer himself to be imposed upon; not that he should deprive himself of prudence and judgment, so that he may be the more easily deceived; but that he should esteem it better to be deceived by his kindness and gentleness of heart than to injure his brother by needless suspicion'"—CALVIN. "It is always ready to think the best; to put the most favourable construction on anything; is glad to make all the allowance for human weakness which can be done without betraying the truth of God"—Dr. COKE. Hopeth all things—(1) of man, of whom love will ever hope the best, and deem reformation possible in the most hardened offenders; and (2) of God, that He will bring good out of evil, and that all the evils of this life will issue ultimately in the triumph of good. Endureth all things—sustains to the end, with unshaken confidence in the goodness of God, all the persecutions and afflictions of this life.

8. Love never faileth. "It accompanies to, and adorns us in, eternity; it prepares us for, and constitutes, heaven. But whether there be prophecies, they shall fail—when all things are fulfilled, and God is all in all. Whether there be tongues, they shall cease—one language shall prevail among all the inhabitants of heaven, and the low and imperfect languages of earth be forgotten. The knowledge likewise which we now so eagerly pursue, shall then vanish away—as starlight is lost in that of the mid-day sun, so our present knowledge in the light of eternity"—WESLEY.

"Charity never faileth. The Vulgate and some MSS. read 'falleth.' Tyndale renders, 'falleth never awaye.' In the LXX. (as in Job 15. 33, and Isa. 28. 1, 4) the word is used as a fading flower. In Rom. 9. 6 it is applied to the word of God. Whether there be prophecies, they shall fail. Another word is here used in the original for the word translated 'fail.' It should rather be rendered 'be brought to an end,' lit. 'be worked out.' It is translated 'brought to nought' in ch. 1. 28, while in ver. 10 it is rendered 'done away,' in ver. 11 'put away,' and in the latter part of this very verse 'vanish away.' The utterances of the inspired man (see ch. 14. 1) are, we are here told, no longer of any value to us when we are face to face with the facts of which he was wont to speak"—LIAS. "Never faileth. Love is imperishable; it grows from less to more; there never comes a time when it gives place to some higher quality of soul, or when it is unimportant whether a man has it or no, or when it is no longer the criterion of the whole moral state. The most surprising spiritual gifts can make no such claim. Prophecies, tongues, knowledge! These gifts were for the temporary benefit of the Church. S. Paul was prepared for their disappearance. Love never faileth!"—DODS.

9. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. "The wisest of men have here but short, narrow, imperfect conceptions, even of the things round about them, and much more of the deep things of God. And even the prophecies which men deliver from God are far from taking in the whole of future events, or of that wisdom and knowledge of God which is treasured up in the Scripture revelation"—WESLEY.

"We know in part. Knowledge and preaching are incomplete; therefore, when this dispensation ends, and the complete dispensation is brought in, these imperfect gifts shall cease. Gifts are but the implements of the Divine husbandry; graces are the seeds themselves. When the great harvest-time comes, the instruments, however useful, will be cast aside altogether; the seeds will, by the very process of death, be transformed into blossoms and fruits, and in that perfected form remain for ever"—ELLICOTT. "Shall be done away. The apostle wishes to explain why this doing away shall take place. Prophecy lifts on each occasion only a corner of the veil which covers the plan of God and its final accomplishment. Similarly, the isolated acts of spiritual knowledge grasp the truth of salvation only in fragments, and consequently every particular point of the great fact. Even to possess the complete knowledge of one point, the whole would require to be known distinctly. Now this full and only true knowledge is not granted us in the present economy. As to tongues, the apostle does not think it necessary to justify their disappearance. The reason for it is too evident: it is their ecstatic character. The only ground for ecstatic transport is that we are not yet living fully in the reality of the Divine. When we live in God we are in Him without going out of ourselves"—GODET.

10. But when that which is perfect is come—"at death and in the last day—that which is in part shall vanish away—both that poor, low, imperfect, glimmering light, which is all the knowledge we now can attain to; and these slow and unsatisfactory methods of attaining, as well as of imparting it to others"—WESLEY.

"This verse states a universal principle, but refers specially to ver. 9. It proves 'will come to nought' in ver. 8. Knowledge and prophecy are but torches giving amid general darkness a partial light. Therefore, when dawns the eternal day they will become useless. They who now know most and speak most fluently will then have no advantage over others"—BEET.

11. "In our present state we are mere infants in point of knowledge, compared to what we shall be hereafter. I put away childish things—of my own accord, willingly, without trouble"—WESLEY.

"Our human existence is progressive; and just what childhood is to manhood the most advanced manhood is to our heavenly being. We put away childish things in manhood; we shall put away even manly or human things entirely in the spiritual state"—ROBERTSON. "I thought—formed conceptions; I reckoned—drew inferences. The child first speaks, then gives evidence of observation, and then of reasoning. When I became—or 'now that I am become,' 'have set aside.' I made as nought—as in vers. 8, 10; laid aside as useless the toys or school-books which once I prized and used. This comparison is an argument from the greater to the less. For the things of eternity are much more completely above and beyond our present thought than are the things of manhood to a child. Yet the mature knowledge of manhood makes school-books, etc., quite useless"—BEET.

12. Now we see—"even the things that surround us. But by means of a glass—or mirror, which reflects only their imperfect forms, in a dim, faint, obscure manner; so that our thoughts about them are puzzling and intricate, and everything is a kind of riddle to us. But then—we shall see, not a faint reflection, but the objects themselves—face to face—distinctly. Now I know in part—even when God Himself reveals things to me, great part of them is still kept under the veil. But then I shall know even as also I am known—in a clear, full, comprehensive manner; in some measure like God, who penetrates the centre of every object, and sees at one glance through my soul and all things"—WESLEY.

Lit. "by means of a mirror." Meyer reminds us that we are to think rather of the mirrors of polished metal used in ancient times, the reflection of which would often be obscure and imperfect, than of our modern looking-glasses. And GODET says: "The object of to see, is here God Himself, with His plan of grace and glory toward us. The mirrors of the ancients were of metal; those made at Corinth were famous. The image which they presented could never be perfectly distinct. We perceive Divine things, says the apostle, only by means of their image in a mirror. This figure signifies two things: knowledge of mediate character, and for that very reason always more or less confused." BEET adds: "From ver. 12 it is quite clear that the light which will supersede the gifts of knowledge and prophecy is that of eternity. Consequently, ver. 8 refers, not to the cessation of extraordinary gifts in the later ages of the Church, but to the end of the present life, either at death or at the coming of Christ. But it would be unfair to infer from this that S. Paul expected these gifts to continue till Christ comes. For about this he says nothing, but declares only that sooner or later, to the individual and to the race, these gifts will pass away."

13. Faith, hope, love—"are the sum of perfection on earth; love alone is the sum of perfection in heaven"—WESLEY.

"You may have strong, eagle-eyed faith: well—you will probably be enabled to do great things in life, to work wonders, to trample on impossibilities. You may have sanguine hope: well—your life will pass brightly, not gloomily. But the vision of God as He is, to see the King in His beauty, is vouchsafed, not to science, nor to talent, but only to purity and love"—ROBERTSON. "This is S. Paul's crowning testimony to the worth of love. He does not mean that love abides while faith becomes sight and hope fruition. Rather he indicates that faith and hope are also imperishable, and hereby distinguished from the spiritual gifts of which he has been speaking. Both in this life and in that which is to come, faith, hope, and love abide. Faith and hope are really permanent elements of human life, faith being the confidence we have in God, and hope the ever-renewed expectancy of future good. But while faith maintains us in connection with God, love is the enjoyment of God and the partaking of His nature; and while hope renews our energy and guides our aims, it can bring us to no better thing than love. This is the root of all good, the beginning of all blessedness, because the germ of all likeness to God who Himself is love"—DODS.

CHAPTER XIV.

1. Follow after love—"with zeal, vigour, courage, patience; else you can neither attain nor keep it. And—in their place, as subservient to this—desire spiritual gifts; but especially that ye may prophesy. The word here does not mean foretelling things to come, but rather opening and applying the Scripture"—WESLEY.

God's best gifts are placed within the reach of all, but they must be sought by prayer and devotion, and special gifts may be asked of Him. (See ver. 13, and Jas. 1. 5.) "But rather that ye may prophesy. The gift of prophecy, as is abundantly evident from the whole of this section, was not confined to the prediction of future events. As KINGSLEY remarks, the prophet was 'not only a fore-teller but a forth-teller,' one who communicates the moral and spiritual truths which he has received by direct revelation from God"—C. B. "The general rule is this: Every one should seek, above all, the gifts most fitted to contribute to the common good. Such is the principle S. Paul applies first of all to the valuation of the two gifts which seem at that time to have played the most considerable part in the life of the church of Corinth, speaking in tongues, and prophecy. His thought is, strictly speaking, this: "Seek states of inspiration, and that especially with the view of attaining to the possession of the best of gifts, prophecy'"—GODET.

2. "He that speaketh in an unknown tongue speaks, in effect, not to men, but to God—who alone understands him"—WESLEY.

"For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue. The word 'unknown' is not in the original. The word translated 'tongue' signifies a human language in ch. 13. 1. (Comp. Rev. 13. 7; 14. 6; 17. 15.) Speaketh not unto men, but unto God. Because the language is not the language of those to whom he is speaking, and therefore what he says is hidden from them. For mysteries, see ch. 4. 1"—C. B.

3. "Edification, and exhortation, and comfort. They communed with God by the speaking with tongues; they communed with the brethren by prophecy—building up, stirring up, cheering up, as each required"—ELLICOTT.

4. Edifieth himself—"only, on the most favourable supposition. The church—the whole congregation"—WESLEY.

"He that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself—not necessarily because he understands what he is saying, but because his spirit, stirred up by the Spirit of God, is led by the experience of the inward emotion to praise God"—ESTIUS. (See ver. 14.) But he that prophesieth edifieth the church. The profit of the brethren is ever S. Paul's object. (Comp. vers. 6, 12; ch. 6. 12, etc.) Prophecy is to be preferred to the gift of tongues because it is more directly useful. (See note, ch. 12. 28.)

5. Greater—"that is, more useful. By this alone are we to estimate all our gifts and talents"—WESLEY.

Except he interpret. This passage clearly implies that a man might speak in another language without himself knowing what he was saying. (See ver. 14.) Some, however, regard the speaking with tongues as ecstatic utterances in no human language, such as took place among the Montanists in ancient and the Irvingites in modern times.

6. Revelation—"of some gospel mystery. Knowledge—explaining the ancient types and prophecies. Prophecy—foretelling some future event. Doctrine—to regulate your tempers and lives. Perhaps this may be the sense of these obscure words"—WESLEY.

"By revelation—that which comes directly to the spirit from on high. By knowledge—that which is gained by observation and study. (See ch. 12. 8.) By doctrine—or rather, 'teaching,' the outward expression of knowledge. (See the distinction between the prophet and the teacher in ch. 12. 28)"—C. B.

7. How shall it be known what is piped or harped—"what music can be made, or what end answered?"—WESLEY.

"The effect of a melody depends entirely upon the distinction of its musical intervals. The effect of speech in like manner is dependent upon its being the communication of definite ideas"—LIAS. "The point here is not, as the English seems to suggest, that there must be a difference in tune, so as to know what is being piped or harped—that illustration comes in the next verse—but that each instrument has its own peculiar sound"—ELLICOTT.

8. Who will prepare himself for the battle—"unless he understand what the trumpet sounds? suppose a retreat or a march"—WESLEY.

"An uncertain sound—an 'indistinct' sound, that which conveys no clear impression to the mind. The muster, the charge, the rally, the retreat, are each indicated by a definite order of musical intervals upon the trumpet, or they would be useless for the purpose of calling soldiers together. So words are useless to mankind unless they represent things"—C. B. "Not only has each instrument its own sound, but in each instrument there is a distinction of notes. If a trumpet does not clearly sound the advance when it is intended, or the retreat when it is meant, the trumpet is useless, the soldiers not knowing what to do"—ELLICOTT.

9. Unless ye utter by the tongue—"which is miraculously given you—words easy to be understood—by your hearers—ye will speak to the air—a proverbial expression, will utterly lose your labour"—WESLEY.

"As inanimate instruments must give forth distinct sounds if their music is to be understood. So ye also. As men, you ought to speak distinctly, if you wish to be understood by your fellows." If a man does not use words that those spoken to understand, it is useless to utter them.

10. Many kinds of voices. And yet no word in any language can be without meaning, but must correspond to some thought—for the thought exists first, and the word is invented as the expression of it.

11. I shall be a barbarian to him—"shall seem to talk unintelligible gibberish"—WESLEY.

"Language is useless unless we know what meaning is attached to each word uttered. The hearer is a foreigner (or barbarian), then, in the estimation of the speaker, and the speaker a foreigner in the estimation of the hearer"—ELLICOTT.

12. Spiritual gifts (in margin, "spirits")—obviously meaning here the gifts of the Spirit. Excel—i.e. "abound." Wyclif translates the word, "be plenteous"; and Tyndale, "have plenty."

13. That he may be able to interpret—"which was a distinct gift"—WESLEY.

Pray that he may interpret. (Comp. vers. 1, 5.) This passage may mean (1) pray that he may receive the faculty of interpretation, or (2) pray in such a language as he has the power of interpreting.

14. If I pray in an unknown tongue. "The apostle, as he did at the sixth verse, transfers it to himself. My spirit prayeth—by the power of the Spirit I understand the words myself—but my understanding is unfruitful—the knowledge I have is no benefit to others"—WESLEY.

My spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful. "The afflatus of the Spirit suggests the words of prayer to the possessor of the gift. He is conscious that he is fervently addressing the Giver of all good in a spirit of supplication. But his consciousness goes no further. He does not know what he is saying"—LIAS. "The apostle is here speaking of public worship (see ver. 16), and not of private devotion; and the word unfruitful (better 'fruitless') implies the result, or rather the absence of result, as regards others"—ELLICOTT.

15. "I will pray with the Spirit, but I will pray with the understanding also. I will use my own understanding, as well as the power of the Spirit. I will not act so absurdly, as to utter in a congregation what can edify none but myself"—WESLEY.

"What is it then?—what is the purport of what I have been saying? That it is desirable that the spirit and understanding should combine in all the public utterances of a teacher"—C. B. "What is it then? The apostle, in answering this question—viz. 'What, then, is the conclusion of the whole matter?'—still speaks in the first person, quoting his own conduct and resolution. He will not let his public ministrations, as regards prayer and praise, evaporate into mere enthusiasm; nor will he, on the other hand, allow a cold intellectual creed to chill and freeze the warm emotions of the spirit"—ELLICOTT.

16. Otherwise how shall he that filleth the place of a private person—"that is, any private hearer—say Amen—assenting and confirming your words, as it was even then usual for the whole congregation to do"—WESLEY.

"Else when thou shalt bless—a further argument. Even your prayers and thanksgivings are useless, for none can respond to them. Some commentators, e.g. Dean Stanley, have supposed the Eucharistic blessing to be meant. (Ch. 10. 16.) This, though probable, is by no means certain. That it was some well-known form of blessing or thanksgiving is however clear from what follows. With the spirit—i.e. in an unknown tongue. He that occupieth the room of the unlearned. 'Room' as in Matt. 23. 6; Luke 14. 7, 8, etc., stands for 'place.' Wyclif renders it here by 'place.' (Comp. 'office and roome' in Hollinshead's Scotland.) The word rendered here 'unlearned' signifies (1) a 'private person, layman,' one who holds no office. Hence (2) it comes to signify a man who has no special or technical knowledge of any particular art or science, as in Acts 4. 13; 2 Cor. 11. 6; just as a lawyer calls those 'laymen' who are not versed in law. Therefore the meaning here most probably is (with Meyer and Bishop Wordsworth), 'those who have no special gift such as that of prophecy or tongues.' Some would render 'the layman's place,' and regard it as referring to the seats set apart for the laity in the assembly. But the majority of commentators would render 'he who fills the situation of the not specially endowed.' Amen—lit. the Amen, the well-known response, either optative, 'So be it,' or affirmative, 'So it is,' as common in the synagogue as in the Christian Church to any prayer or thanksgiving. (See Neh. 5. 13; Rev. 5. 14.) Justin Martyr (circa 150) uses the same language concerning the response to the Eucharistic prayer in his day"—C. B.

17. "The expression the other denotes all the members of the congregation taken individually. The apostle, in ver. 6, put his own case to prove the uselessness of tongues without prophecy; here he alleges it again in proof of the uselessness of tongues unaccompanied with interpretation"—GODET.

18. "I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than you all. S. Paul, no doubt, had the gift of interpretation. Yet he apparently did not often exercise in public, whatever he may have done in private, the gift of speaking with tongues unknown to his hearers. (See next verse)"—C. B.

19. With my understanding—"in a rational manner; so as not only to understand myself, but to be understood by others"—WESLEY.

"Yet in the church—whatever I may do in private, I should desire my public ministrations to be for the instruction and edification of the flock, and not for my own individual glorification. Teach—the word in the original is that from which our word 'catechise' is derived. The same word is used in Luke 1. 4; Acts 18. 25; 21. 21, 24; Rom. 2. 18, and twice in Gal. 6. 6. It signifies to make, to resound thoroughly in one's ears. The importance of sermons and catechetical teaching in public worship is thus indicated, as well as their proper object, the instruction and edification of the flock. (See ver. 24)"—LIAS. "It is better to be useful than brilliant. Gifts that are showy, and gifts that please—before these the world yields her homage, while the lowly teachers of the poor and the ignorant are forgotten and unnoticed. Only remember that, in the sight of the everlasting Eye, the one is creating sounds which perish with the hour that gave them birth, the other a work that is for ever—building and forming for the eternal world an immortal spirit"—ROBERTSON.

20. Be not children in understanding. "This is an admirable stroke of true oratory! to bring down the height of their spirits, by representing that wherein they prided themselves most, as mere folly and childishness. In wickedness be ye infants—have all the innocence of that tender age. But in understanding be ye grown men—knowing religion was not designed to destroy any of our natural faculties, but to exalt and improve them, our reason in particular"—WESLEY.

"Howbeit in malice be ye children. This is subjoined lest the apostle should be charged with contradicting his Master. There is a sense in which all Christians must be children. What is it the apostle tells us? They were to be children in malice, or rather perhaps vice. (Comp. on the one hand Matt. 11. 25; 18. 3; 19. 14; 1 Pet. 2. 2; on the other, ch. 3. 1; Eph. 14. 14, and Heb. 5. 12.) See also Matt. 10. 16; Rom. 16. 19)"—LIAS. SUTCLIFFE says: "This verse is a masterly reproof to teachers agitating minor questions and irregular forms of worship, while the powerful eloquence of the heart was in danger of being overlooked. S. Paul certainly disapproves of the burdensome forms of Jewish worship being forced on the Christian Church. Prayer, reading, expositions of the reading or exhortation, with singing, were the four ancient recognised forms of worship."

21. It is written in the Law. "The word here, as frequently, means the Old Testament. In foreign tongues will I speak to this people. And so He did. He spake terribly to them by the Babylonians, when they had set at nought what He had spoken by the prophets, who used their own language. These words received a further accomplishment on the day of Pentecost"—WESLEY.

In the Law it is written. The Law here stands for the whole Old Testament, as we might naturally expect from S. Paul's habit of regarding the whole of the Mosaic dispensation as a progressive order of things having its completion in Christ. (See Rom. 3. 19; Gal. 3. 23, 24; 4. 5; Heb. 9. 8, 10.) S. John uses the word in the same manner (ch. 10. 34; 12. 34; 15. 25.) The passage is from Isa. 28. 11, 12.

22. Tongues are intended for a sign to unbelievers—"to engage their attention, and convince them the message is of God. Whereas prophecy is not so much for unbelievers, as for the confirmation of them that already believe"—WESLEY.

"The passage here quoted has been regarded as a prophecy either (1) of the day of Pentecost, or (2) of the Babylonish captivity. The latter is more probable, and in that case it becomes not an argument but an illustration. The occupation of Judea by the Assyrian and Babylonian troops had been a sign to God's people of their unbelief and its punishment, and the unwonted speech that they had been doomed to hear was to them a call to repentance, especially when viewed in the light of the prophecy of Moses in Deut. 28. 49"—C. B. "Tongues should not be exalted in estimation above prophecy—inasmuch as the function of the latter is really grander than that of the former. Tongues were useful to arrest the attention of unbelievers, and, if rightly used, to arouse their convictions; but prophecy is in the highest sense useful for believers"—ELLICOTT. The apostle now supposes two cases fitted to impress, by way of extreme examples, the truth of the Law which he has just stated.

23. Yet. "Sometimes prophecy is of more use, even to unbelievers, than speaking with tongues. For instance, if the whole church be met together—on some extraordinary occasion. It is probable, in so large a city, they ordinarily met in several places. And there come in ignorant persons—men of learning might have understood the tongues in which they spoke. It is observable, S. Paul says here, 'ignorant persons' or 'unbelievers'; but in the next verse, an unbeliever or an ignorant person. Several bad men met together hinder each other by evil discourse. Single persons are more easily gained"—WESLEY.

"One place—the place of assembly, as in ch. 11. 20; Acts 2. 1. However well calculated the gift of tongues might be to arrest and compel attention when used properly, it is clear, says the apostle, that its introduction at the public assemblies of the church was not a proper use of it, unless (ver. 27) it were restricted in its use by wise rules. If not so restricted, so far from its being a sign to unbelievers, it would give them, as well as the great body of the Christian laity, occasion of complaint, and even ridicule. All—not necessarily all together, as some have supposed, but that no other means of communication was adopted by any but the unknown tongue"—MEYER. "Feeling is a precious gift; but when men parade it, exhibit it, and give way to it, it is weakness instead of strength"—ROBERTSON.

24. He is convicted by all—"who speak in their turns, and speak to the heart of the hearers. He is judged by all—every one says something to which his conscience bears witness"—WESLEY.

"But if all prophesy—there is no danger of exaggeration regarding this gift. Each one uttering prophecy, telling forth the gospel truth and revealing the mind of God, will have a message that will be useful to the unbeliever. As one after another they utter the words of Divine truth, they each send something that pierces into his soul. By all of them he is convicted in his own conscience of some sin. He is condemned in his own eyes, a searching light is turned upon his heart. The secrets of his heart are made manifest, and he makes terrible discoveries of his guilt. (Heb. 4. 12, 13)"—ELLICOTT.

25. The secrets of his heart are made manifest—"laid open, clearly described; in a manner which to him is most astonishing and utterly unaccountable. How many instances of it are seen at this day! So does God still point His word"—WESLEY.

"That God is in you of a truth—lit. that God is 'really' in you (or 'among' you). This description of the effect of prophecy upon the unbeliever is in no way contrary to the assertion in ver. 22. There the apostle is speaking of a sign to attract the attention of the unbeliever; here his attention is already attracted. He has come to the Christian assembly, and is listening to the words spoken there in the name of Jesus Christ. Unless his conscience is 'seared with a hot iron' there will be no further need of signs to induce him to give his attention to what is spoken"—LIAS.

SECTION XII.—26-40. REGULATIONS TO ENSURE DECENCY AND ORDER.—26. What a thing is it, brethren. "This was another disorder among them. Every one hath a psalm—that is, at the same time one begins to sing a psalm; another to deliver a doctrine; another to speak in an unknown tongue; another to declare what has been revealed to him; another to interpret what the former is speaking; every one probably gathering a little company about him, just as they did in the schools of the philosophers. Let all be done to edification—so as to profit the hearers"—WESLEY.

"Hath a psalm. The apostle here reproves another fault. Not only are the Corinthians ambitious rather of the gifts which attract attention than of those which do good to others, but in their exercise of those gifts they are utterly neglectful of church order. Each member of the teaching body (ch. 12. 29 forbids us to include the whole church) had his own special subject to bring before the church; some hymn of praise, unpremeditated or otherwise, some point of Christian doctrine to enforce, some hidden mystery to reveal, some utterance in a foreign tongue, or some interpretation peculiar to himself of such utterance. This he desired to deliver just when the impulse seized him to do so, and all with a view of asserting himself, rather than of promoting the common welfare. The consequence was an amount of disorder which prevented the striking picture of the true effects of Christian prophecy in the last verse from being ever realised. For the various gifts mentioned in this verse, see vers. 2, 6, 13, and notes. The word psalm must be understood of a song of praise addressed to God, such as the Psalms of David, though it is by no means to be confined to them. (Comp. Eph. 5. 19.) Let all things be done unto edifying. (See ch. 6. 12; 8. 1; 10. 23; 12. 7; 2 Cor. 12. 19; 13. 10.) The apostle corrects two errors in this section—(1) the disorderly manner in which the services of the church were carried on, (2) the practice of women speaking in the public assembly"—C. B. "Let all things be done unto edifying—let each use his gift for the good of the congregation. Keep the great end of your meetings in view, and you need no formal rubrics. Make no boast of your æsthetic worship, your irreproachable liturgy, your melting music, if these things do not result in a more loyal service of Christ. Do not pique yourselves on your puritanic simplicity of worship, and the absence of all that is not spiritual, if this bareness and simplicity do not bring you more directly into the presence of your Lord. It matters little whether the vehicle in which we travel be highly decorated or plain, so long as it brings us safely to our destination. Are we the better for our services? Is it our chief aim in them to receive and promote an earnest religious spirit and a sincere service of Christ?"—DODS.

27. By two or three at most. "Let not above two or three speak at one meeting. And that by course—that is, one after another. And let one interpret—either himself (ver. 13); or, if he have not the gift, some other, into the vulgar tongue. It seems 'the gift of tongues' was an instantaneous knowledge of a tongue till then unknown, which he that received it could afterwards speak when he thought fit, without any new miracle"—WESLEY.

Here is the practical application of the general rule just laid down to the exercise of the gift of tongues. Those who had that gift were not all to speak together, and so cause confusion; only two, or at the most three, were to speak in each assembly, and each of such group was to speak in turn, one at a time. There was to be with each group one who had the gift of interpretation, and he was to interpret to the listeners.

28. Let him speak—"that tongue, if he find it profitable to himself in his private devotions"—WESLEY.

In the church. Those words imply that the utterance was to be reserved until the speaker found himself in private, since in the church it could only serve for an opportunity of useless display.

29. Let two or three of the prophets—"not more at one meeting—speak—one after another, expounding the Scripture"—WESLEY.

"The same rule was to hold good of preaching. Those who felt that they had something to communicate must, notwithstanding, be governed by the desire to edify their brethren. The church was not to be wearied out by an endless succession of discourses, good indeed in themselves, but addressed to men who were not in a condition to profit by them. It would seem that two or three short discourses took the place in apostolic times of the modern sermon"—C. B.

30, 31. "All—who have that gift—that all may learn—both by speaking and by hearing"—WESLEY.

"Here we have a rule relating to order—If, while a prophet is speaking, another received a revelation, both should not speak simultaneously; the first should keep silence. For you must all have it in your power to fill the prophet's function one after another (of course, those who have the gift of prophecy)"—GODET.

32. For the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. "But what enthusiast considers this? The impulses of the Holy Spirit, even in men really inspired, so suit themselves to their rational faculties, as not to divest them of the government of themselves, like the heathen priests under their diabolical possession. Evil spirits threw their prophets into such ungovernable ecstasies, as forced them to speak and act like madmen. But the Spirit of God left His prophets the clear use of their judgment, when, and how long, it was fit for them to speak, and never hurried them into any improprieties either as to the matter, manner, or time of their speaking"—WESLEY.

"And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. The possession of a special gift from on high has, from Montanus in the second century, down to our own times, been supposed to confer on its possessor an immunity from all control, whether exercised by himself or others, and to entitle him to immediate attention, to the exclusion of every other consideration whatsoever. S. Paul, on the contrary, lays down the rule that spiritual, like all other gifts, are to be under the dominion of the reason, and may, like all other gifts, be easily misused. A holy self-restraint, even in the use of the highest gifts, must characterise the Christian. If a man comes into the assembly inspired to speak in an unknown tongue, the impulse is to be steadily repressed, unless there is a certainty that what is said can be interpreted, so that those present may understand it. If he comes into the assembly possessed with some over-mastering idea, he must keep it resolutely back until such time as he can give it vent without prejudice to Christian order, without injury to that which must be absolutely the first consideration in all public addresses—the edification of the flock. ESTIUS justly remarks that the difference between God's prophets and those inspired by evil spirits is to be found in the fact that the latter are rapt by madness beyond their own control, and are unable to be silent if they will. And ROBERTSON illustrates by a reference to modern forms of fanaticism the truth that 'uncontrolled religious feeling' is apt to 'overpower both reason and sense'"—C. B.

34. Let your women be silent in the churches—"unless they are under an extraordinary impulse of the Spirit. For, in other cases, it is not permitted them to speak—by way of teaching in public assemblies. But to be in subjection—to the man whose proper office it is to lead and to instruct the congregation"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul sees in the public speaking of women a mode of acting contrary to the attitude enjoined on her both by nature and the command of the Creator. (Comp. ch. 11. 1-16.) He does not say criminal, immoral; it is a question of propriety or modesty"—GODET.

"It may be questioned whether S. Paul's absolute prohibition to women to speak in a church meeting is binding now. . . . But this prohibition in no way touches the ministrations of women to women; and the gift in S. Paul's day of the prophetic spirit to women proved plainly that there was evangelical work for them to do. And there is abundance of such work now"—BEET.

35. And even if they desire to learn anything. "Still they are not to speak in public, but to ask their own husbands at home—that is the place, and those the persons to inquire of"—WESLEY.

"At home—emphatic. It is not wrong to wish to ask; but they must ask in the right place, and so as not to set aside the authority of the man to whom they are socially subject. A woman's position of subordination is her place of honour. To desert it is therefore a disgrace. This was probably a rebuke to some who gloried in their public speaking"—BEET.

36. "Are ye of Corinth either the first or the only Christian?—If not, conform herein to the custom of all the churches"—WESLEY.

The self-assertion of the Corinthians was so great that they needed to be reminded that they had received the doctrine of Christ through the ministry of S. Paul, and that they owed a duty, not only to those who had preached the gospel to them, but to other churches, whose example could not be safely neglected. It is often needful to bring down presumption, and usually difficult to do so.

37. Or spiritual—"endowed with any extraordinary gift of the Spirit. Let him—prove it, by acknowledging that I now write by the Spirit"—WESLEY.

"If any man think himself to be a prophet. Since there were many appointed teachers (see ch. 12. 28, 29) who were not prophets, the test of the prophetic character was not ordination, but the possession of the prophetic gift. If any man fancied he possessed that gift, he was required to submit himself to the test of his willingness to obey God's appointed founder and ruler of the church"—C. B. "S. Paul claims here, as in other places, a deference to his doctrine as a Divine revelation. And he knew the difference between the thoughts of his own heart and the dictates of the Holy Ghost"—SUTCLIFFE.

38. Let him be ignorant—"be it at his own peril"—WESLEY.

"After all he has said, the apostle no longer seeks to convince those who think themselves wiser than he is; he abandons them at once to their inexperience and responsibility"—GODET.

39. Therefore—"to sum up the whole"—WESLEY.

The practical summing up of the whole matter. Seek earnestly to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues.

40. Decently—"by every individual. In order—by the whole church"—WESLEY.

"For decently, see Rom. 13. 13, where the same word is translated 'honestly.' Also 1 Thess. 4. 12, and ch. 12. 23, where a word of similar derivation occurs, and is translated 'comeliness.' The Christian assembly should be a reflection of the universe, where form and order reign supreme"—LIAS. Let all things be done decently and in order. "This advice was greatly needed in a church in which the public services were sometimes turned into tumultuous exhibitions of rival gifts, each man trying to make himself heard above the din of voices, one speaking with tongues, another singing a hymn. He says, therefore, conduct your meetings in a seemly fashion"—DODS.

CHAPTER XV.

Vers. 1-58. THE DOCTRINE OF THE RESURRECTION. — "S. Paul having now settled the minor questions of order in public worship, marriage, intercourse with the heathen, and other various difficulties which were distracting the Christian Church, turns at last to a matter of prime importance and perennial interest—the resurrection of the body. This great subject he handles not in the abstract, but with a view to the particular attitude and beliefs of the Corinthians. Some of them said broadly, 'There is no resurrection of the dead,' although apparently they had no intention of denying that Christ had risen. Accordingly S. Paul proceeds to show them that the resurrection of Christ and that of His followers hang together, that the resurrection of Christ is essential to the Christian creed, that it is amply attested, and that although great difficulties surround the subject, making it impossible to conceive what the risen body will be, yet the resurrection of the body is to be looked forward to with confident hope"—DODS.

1. Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you. This gospel was indeed good tidings. Besides the fact that Christ had been offered for our sins (ver. 3) S. Paul as well as the rest of the apostles (ver. 11) taught that He had risen again in order to communicate to us that new and Divine life whereby our own resurrection should be assured; a life which should make the human body, though laid in the grave, a seed from whence, in God's good time, a new and more glorious body should arise. This chapter is one of the deepest and most mysterious in the Bible. It is the one exception to the statement in ch. 3, that S. Paul was unable to feed the Corinthians with meat; for it ranks with the profound exposition of the principles of justification in the Epistle to the Romans, and the weighty but most difficult enunciation of the doctrine of God's foreknowledge and man's call in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians.

2. Ye are saved, if ye hold fast. "Your salvation is begun, and will be perfected if ye continue in the faith. Unless ye have believed in vain—unless indeed your faith was only a delusion"—WESLEY.

"The idea includes safety from sin as well as from its punishment. (See Matt. 1. 22.) S. Paul now sets himself to expound the whole doctrine of the resurrection which he had declared, and he begins by showing (vers. 3-11) that whole series of irrefutable testimonies on which faith in the resurrection of the Lord Jesus rests, the fact which forms the foundation of that which he wished to develop"—GODET.

3. I received—"from Christ Himself. It was not a fiction of my own"—WESLEY.

"For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received. The close resemblance of this passage to the Apostles' Creed shows that this summary of the doctrines of our faith is actually what it professes to be, a short compendium of apostolic teaching. Irenæus, a writer in the second century and a careful observer of apostolic tradition, gives a very similar summary in his treatise against heresies, bk. iii. ch. 4. Dean Stanley calls attention to the fact that this bold affirmation of the truth of the resurrection, possibly the earliest we have (see above, ch. 11. 23), was written barely twenty-five years after the event. S. Paul does not state here from whom he received his doctrine, but he must have acquired some elementary instruction in the first principles of the Christian faith from his intercourse with the disciples (Acts 9. 19), and even at his admission into the Christian body. And what he had received from others he tested by examination of the Scriptures, by prayer and silent communing with God, till it became his own, by revelation, and by that inward conviction which none but God can give"—C. B.

4. According to the Scriptures—"he proves it first from Scripture, then from the testimony of a cloud of witnesses"—WESLEY.

"Lit. was buried and 'hath risen' again, the aorist referring to the single act, the perfect to Christ's continued life after His resurrection"—C. B. The dead body laid in the sepulchre disappeared. What became of it? No explanation other than the fact itself of the resurrection has ever been able to account for this mystery. This date of the third day was not accidental; for, as Hoffman observes, it is precisely then that dissolution ordinarily begins to appear.

5. By the Twelve. "This was their standing appellation; but their full number was not then present"—WESLEY.

"Of Cephas. (See Luke 24. 34.) S. Paul and S. John alone use the Aramaic form of the apostle's surname, the former only in this Epistle and once in the Epistle to the Galatians. This, coupled with the fact that S. John only uses the Aramaic form in the narrative in ch. 1. 42, is one of those minute touches which speak strongly for the genuineness of his Gospel"—C. B. The apostle here maintains the truth of an historical fact. He appeals solely to historical proof, and accumulates a mass of historical testimony, such as in any matter of history, if produced so shortly after the occurrence, would be deemed overwhelming.

6. Above five hundred—"probably in Galilee. A glorious and incontestable proof! The greater part remain—alive"—WESLEY.

Seen—on "a mountain of Galilee" (Matt. 28. 16-18), "where Jesus had appointed." There were a cloud of witnesses to assure and comfort the Church. BEET says: "That after the lapse of about twenty-five years the more part were still living, seems to imply that Christ chose young men chiefly to be witnesses of His resurrection, who might live long to testify it to others. That S. Paul knew that the majority were still alive, proves that those who had actually seen the risen Lord were marked men in the Early Church. (Comp. Josh. 24. 31, 'The elders that overlived Joshua.')"

7. Then by all the apostles. "The Twelve were mentioned (ver. 5). This title here, therefore, seems to include the Seventy, if not all those likewise, whom God afterwards sent to plant the gospel in heathen nations"—WESLEY.

"Notice S. Paul's accuracy in stating even the order of these appearances. The exact details were evidently known to him. Of the appearances mentioned, the first (Luke 24. 34) was to S. Peter; the second (ver. 36) to the assembled apostles; the third, to a gathering of five hundred persons; the fourth, to His brother James; and the fifth (perhaps John 20. 26), to the entire apostolic band. To all these well-known persons S. Paul appeals as witnesses that Christ has risen"—BEET. "Then by all the apostles. Finally, S. Paul mentions the fact which closed the series of the appearances of the Risen One, and which was separated from all the preceding by a much greater interval than those which had separated these from one another"—GODET.

8. An untimely birth. "It was impossible to abase himself more than he does by this single appellation. As 'an abortion' is not worthy the name of a man, so he affirms himself to be not worthy the name of an apostle"—WESLEY.

"The apostle here distinctly states that he saw the Lord at the time of his conversion as really as S. Peter and others had seen Him, though with touching pathos and strongly-marked emphasis he adds that it was not at the same time as the 'first-born had seen Him, but only as an untimely born one'"—ELLICOTT. "At the time of the above-mentioned appearances S. Paul was an enemy. But that he might take rank equal with the rest, long after appearing to the others, Christ 'appeared also' to him. The untimely one—in LXX. (Num. 12. 12; Job 3. 16; Eccles. 6. 3), an abortive offspring born at the wrong time, and not reckoned among the children. With deep humility S. Paul says that among the apostles he was the untimely birth: not that his apostolic birth was a failure, but abnormal in its circumstances"—BEET.

9. I persecuted the church. "True believers are humbled all their lives, even for the sins they committed before they believed"—WESLEY.

S. Paul, having just stated what he conceives that the Lord must have thought of him, now proceeds to state what he thinks of himself. TRAPP says on this verse: "True humility, as true balm, ever sinks to the bottom of the water, when pride, like oil, ever swims on the top."

10. I laboured more than they all—"that is, more than any of them, from a deep sense of the peculiar love God had shown me. Yet, to speak more properly, it is not I, but the grace of God that is with me. This it is which at first qualified me for the work, and still excites me to zeal and diligence in it"—WESLEY.

"But by the grace of God I am what I am. S. Paul is willing to admit his personal inferiority to the other apostles, but such willingness does not lead him to make a similar admission regarding his work. For that was God's doing, not his, or only his so far as God's grace or favour enabled him to perform it. (See ch. 1. 30; 3. 6, 9; and comp. Matt. 10. 20; 2 Cor. 3. 5; Eph. 3. 7; Phil. 2. 12, 13.) I laboured more abundantly than they all. S. Paul does not hesitate to place his labours for the gospel's sake on a par with or even above those of the Twelve. The work of an apostle of the Gentiles must necessarily have been more arduous than that of an apostle of the Jews"—C. B. "How far his own labours surpassed those of others, S. Paul leaves his readers to judge. The grace of God with me. Although the results were wrought altogether by God, in undeserved favour, yet they were wrought through the instrumentality and 'with' the concurrence of S. Paul. Now, what a man has done determines his spiritual stature. Therefore, since all that S. Paul had done had been wrought in and through him by the favour of God, he could say, By the grace of God I am what I am"—BEET.

11. Whether I or they, so we preach—"all of us speak the same thing"—WESLEY.

"By his earnestness in saying this, the apostle testifies to the immense value and importance of historical Christianity"—ROBERTSON. "This declaration proves that it was matter of notoriety in the Church that the gospel of S. Peter and of the Twelve rested on the same foundations as that of S. Paul, on the facts of Christ's death and resurrection regarded as having effected the salvation of the sinful world 'for our sins' (ver. 3), 'and that according to the Scriptures' (vers. 3, 4). This verse, while summing up the foregoing passage, forms the transition to the following section"—GODET.

12. How say some—"who probably had been heathen philosophers"—WESLEY.

"The objector is to be understood, not as inquiring as to the process, but as to the possibility"—WATSON. "There were three different schools of thought among those outside the Christian Church which denied the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead. The first was the materialistic school, represented by the Epicureans among the heathen, and by the Sadducees among the Jews. They thought that man would entirely cease to exist after death, and that any other idea was only the result of man's vanity and his insatiable longing after existence. The second, in which the Stoics were the most prominent body, taught, what amounted to the same thing, the Pantheistic doctrine of the ultimate reabsorption of the soul into the Divinity from which it had sprung, and therefore the final extinction of the individual personality. The third school, of which the disciples of Plato were the chief representatives, while maintaining the eternal personality and immortality of the soul, regarded matter as the cause of all evil, the only barrier between the soul and the Absolute Good, a thing, in fact, essentially and eternally alien to the Divine, and therefore could not conceive of immortality except through the entire freedom of the soul from so malignant and corrupting an influence. Hence the doctrine of the resurrection of the body was the principal stumbling-block in the way of an early reception of Christianity. It aroused the antagonism of an influential section among the Jews (Acts 4. 1, 2; 5. 17; 23. 6–9), and was considered by heathen philosophers inadmissible and absurd. (Acts 17. 32.) This doctrine for many centuries has proved the principal hindrance to the progress of Christianity"—C. B.

13. If there be no resurrection—"if it be a thing flatly impossible"—WESLEY.

"If a resurrection from the dead be impossible, then the resurrection of Christ Himself becomes either a mistake or an imposture. And since, on the apostle's principle, there is no hope of a future life but through Him, we are driven to the conclusion that the answer to His prayer, 'Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit,' was Annihilation! that He who had made His life one perpetual act of consecration to His Father's service received for His reward the same fate as attended the blaspheming malefactor"—ROBERTSON.

14. Then is our preaching—"from a commission supposed to be given after the resurrection—vain—without any real foundation"—WESLEY.

"You have a vain faith if you believe in a dead man. He might be a true man, though He remained in death. But it concerns you to believe that He was the Son of God too. And He was 'declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead' (Rom. 1. 4)"—DONNE. "The resurrection created the Church, the risen Christ made Christianity, and even now the Christian faith stands or falls with Him. . . . If it be true that no living Christ ever issued from the tomb of Joseph, then that tomb becomes the grave, not of a man, but of a religion, with all the hopes built on it, and all the splendid enthusiasms it has inspired"—FAIRBAIRN. "Never was there any imposture put upon the world as Christianity, if Christ be yet in the grave"—TRAPP. "From the first S. Paul had put the resurrection of Christ forward as an essential and fundamental part of the gospel he had received, and which he was accustomed to deliver"—DODS.

15. If the dead rise not. "If the very notion of a resurrection be, as they say, absurd and impossible"—WESLEY.

Dean STANLEY reminds us that this Epistle was written within twenty-five years of the event to which it refers with such unhesitating confidence: "Yet that event is not merely affirmed, but is actually made the foundation of the apostle's whole argument." "There is a certain instinct within us generally which enables us to detect when a man is speaking the truth. . . . Truth, so to speak, has a certain ring by which it may be known. Now, this chapter rings with truth"—ROBERTSON. It certainly has not the appearance of having been written by a man who was endeavouring to persuade others of what he did not believe himself.

16. "If there be no resurrection, then is Christ not risen. Remark the severe, rigorous logic of S. Paul; he refuses to place the human race in one category and Jesus Christ in another. If Jesus rose, then the human race shall also rise; but if there be no resurrection for man, then the apostle, holding to his logic, says Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is not risen"—ROBERTSON.

17. Ye are still in your sins—"that is, under the guilt of them. So that there needed something more than reformation (which was plainly wrought) in order to their being delivered from the guilt of sin, even that atonement, the sufficiency of which God attested by raising our great Surety from the grave"—WESLEY.

"Your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Christ came, not only to make reconciliation for sin, but to free us from it. (Comp. Rom. 6. 11–23; 8. 2.) And this He did by proclaiming a life. He first conquered sin Himself. Then He offered the acceptable sacrifice of His pure and unpolluted life to God in the place of our corrupt and sinful lives. And then, having at once vindicated the righteousness of God's law and fulfilled it, He arose from the dead. Having thus led sin and death captive, He redeemed us from the power of both by imparting His own life to all who would enter into covenant with Him. Thus the resurrection of Christ was the triumph of humanity (see ver. 21) over sin and death; the reversal of the sentence, 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die.' Had He not risen from the dead, humanity had not triumphed, the sentence had not been reversed, man had not been delivered from the yoke of sin, and therefore those who had 'fallen asleep' could never wake again. 'None of these things would have taken place, had He not emerged victor from the conflict by rising again' (CALVIN)"—C. B.

18. They who sleep in Christ—"who have died for Him or believing in Him—are perished—have lost their life and being together"—WESLEY.

"Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ. (See note on ch. 7. 39.) The word does not apply to the soul, for that does not sleep (Luke 16. 22, 23; 23. 43), but it describes the state of the bodies of those who sleep in Jesus"—WORDSWORTH. "Are perished. You are required to believe that those who died in the field of battle, bravely giving up their lives for others, died even as the false and coward dies. You are required to believe that when there arose a great cry at midnight, and the wreck went down, they who passed out of the world with the oath of blasphemy or the shriek of despair shared the same fate with those who calmly resigned their departing spirits into the Father's hand; in short, that those whose affections were so pure and good that they seemed to tell you of an eternity, perished as utterly as the selfish and impure. If from this you shrink as from a thing derogatory to God, then there remains but that conclusion to which S. Paul conducts us, 'Now is Christ risen from the dead'"—ROBERTSON.

19. If in this life only we have hope—"if we look for nothing beyond the grave. But if we have a Divine evidence of things not seen, if we have 'a hope full of immortality,' if we now taste of 'the powers of the world to come,' and see 'the crown that fadeth not away,' then, notwithstanding all our present trials, we are more happy than all men"—WESLEY.

S. Paul's meaning is plain. By the hope of a life beyond he had been induced to undergo the greatest privations in this life. He had been exposed to countless dangers and indignities. Although a Roman citizen, he had been cast into the arena to contend with wild beasts; there was no risk he had not run, no hardship he had not endured. But in all he was sustained by the assurance that there remained for him a rest and an inheritance in a future life. Remove this assurance and you remove the assumption on which his conduct is wholly built. If there is no future life either to win or to lose, then the Epicurean motto may take the place of Christ's promises, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."

20. But now—"S. Paul declares that Christians 'have hope,' not 'in this life only.' His proof of the resurrection lies in a narrow compass (vers. 12–19). Almost all the rest of the chapter is taken up in illustrating, vindicating, and applying it. The proof is short, but solid and convincing—that which arose from Christ's resurrection. Now this not only proved a resurrection possible, but, as it proved Him to be a Divine Teacher, proved the certainty of a general resurrection, which He so expressly taught. The first-fruits of them that slept—the earnest, pledge, and insurance of their resurrection who slept in Him: even of all the righteous. It is of the resurrection of these and these only that the apostle speaks throughout the chapter"—WESLEY.

A new phase in this chapter now presents itself. The style changes. The logician becomes prophet, and discloses revelations which had been made to him. "But now is Christ risen from the dead. S. Paul considers it needless to argue the point further. He appeals not so much to the reason—on points like this (see ch. 2. 14), it is likely to deceive us—as to the moral instincts of every human being. Of course a man has power to stifle them, but they tell him plainly enough that love of purity and truth, desire of immortality, belief in the love and justice of God, are no vain dreams, as they would be if the 'wise man died as the fool' (Eccles. 2. 16). Accordingly, the apostle now (vers. 20–28) proceeds to unfold the laws of God's spiritual kingdom as facts which cannot be gainsaid. He may appeal (as in vers. 29–32) to his own practice and that of others as a confirmation of what he says. But from henceforth he speaks with authority. He wastes no more time in discussion. And become the first-fruits of them that slept. The first-fruits (Lev. 23. 10) were the 'first ripe corn,' under the Law, solemnly offered to God, a fit type of Him who first presented our ripened humanity before the throne of God, an earnest of the mighty harvest hereafter to be gathered"—C. B. "Christ's resurrection is the sample and pledge of ours. When the farmer pulls the first ripe ears of wheat and carries them home, it is not for their own sake he values them, but because they are a specimen and sample of the whole crop; and when God raised Christ from the dead, the glory of the event consisted in its being a pledge and specimen of the triumph of mankind over death"—DODS. "The spiritual resurrection is but the mere foretaste and pledge of the literal. Let us seek to rise with Christ above this world and our own selves, for every act tells on that eternity, every thought and every word reap an everlasting harvest"—ROBERTSON.

21. "For since by man came death, etc. Adam was not the only man who died, but the first-fruits of a rich harvest; and so, Christ is not alone in resurrection, but is become the first-fruits of them that sleep. According to S. Paul's theology, the conduct of a man, the sin of Adam, carried in it disastrous consequences to all connected with him; but equally fruitful in consequences was the human life, death, and resurrection of Christ. The death of Adam was the first stroke of that funeral knell that has ceaselessly sounded through all generations; but the resurrection of Christ was equally the pledge and earnest that the same experience would be enjoyed by all 'that are Christ's'"—DODS.

22. "As through Adam all, even the righteous die, so through Christ all these shall be made alive. He does not say, 'shall revive' (as naturally as they die), but shall be made alive, by a power not their own"—WESLEY.

The abstract ideas of the previous verse now reappear in concrete form; man becomes the Adam, man again the Christ: death becomes all men dead, resurrection becomes all men made alive. In the Christ all men without exception, both believers and unbelievers, shall be "made alive."

23. Afterward—"the whole harvest. At the same time the wicked shall rise also. But they are not here taken into the account"—WESLEY.

"Christ the first-fruits. (Comp. Acts 26. 23; Col. 1. 18; Rev. 1. 5; also John 14. 19.) How should He be overcome by corruption who gave to many others the power of living again? Hence He is called 'the first-born from the dead,' 'the first-fruits of them that slept'"—CYRIL.

24. "Then—after the resurrection and the general judgment—cometh the end—of the world; the grand period of all those wonderful scenes that have appeared for so many succeeding generations. When He shall have delivered up the kingdom to the Father, and He (the Father) shall have abolished all adverse rule, authority, and power. Not that the Father will then begin to reign without the Son, nor will the Son then cease to reign. For the Divine reign both of the Father and Son is from everlasting to everlasting. But this is spoken of the Son's mediatorial kingdom, which will then be delivered up, and of the immediate kingdom or reign of the Father, which will then commence. Till then the Son transacts the business which the Father hath given Him, for those who are His, and by them as well as by the angels, with the Father, and against their enemies. So far as the Father gave the kingdom to the Son, the Son shall deliver it up to the Father. (John 13. 3.) Nor does the Father cease to reign when He gives it to the Son; neither the Son, when He delivers it to the Father; but the glory which He had before the world began (John 17. 5; Heb. 1. 8) will remain even after this is delivered up. Nor will He cease to be a King even in His human nature (Luke 1. 33). If the citizens of the 'New Jerusalem' shall 'reign for ever' (Rev. 22. 5), how much more shall He?"—WESLEY.

"Then cometh the end—the end, the completion, that is, of the present order of things, when sin and death cease to be, and 'the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ' (Rev. 11. 15). When He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father. The passage suggests to us the idea of a prince, the heir-apparent of the kingdom, going out to war, and bringing the spoils and trophies of his conquest to his father's feet. Such an idea must have recurred with fresh vividness to the minds of the early Christians a few years afterwards, when they saw Titus bring the spoils of the holy city of the old covenant, the 'figure of the true,' to his father Vespasian, and must have led them to look forward with eager expectation to the time when types and shadows should have their end, and the kingdom be the Lord's, and He the Governor among the people. At the last day, Christ as man shall receive the submission of all God's enemies, and then lay them, all His triumphs, all those whom He has delivered captive from the hand of the enemy, at His Father's feet. 'Not,' says ESTIUS, 'that Christ shall cease to reign,' for 'of His kingdom there shall be no end' (Luke 1. 33; comp. Dan. 7. 14; Heb. 1. 8; 2. 8), but that He will, by laying all His conquests at His Father's feet, proclaim Him as the source of all authority and power" — LIAS. "All rule, and all authority and power—not only hostile rule and authority and power, but all intermediate rule of any sort, good and bad. The direct government by God of all creatures is to be at last attained. All the interventions of authority and power, which the fall of man rendered necessary, will be needless when the complete triumph of Christ comes in. Thus humanity, having for ages shared the condition of fallen Adam, will be finally restored to the state of unfallen Adam. Man will see God, and be ruled by God face to face"—ELLICOTT.

25. He must reign — "because so it is written—till He—the Father—hath put all His enemies under His feet"—WESLEY.

S. Paul cites the well-known words of Ps. 110. 1. The Divine necessity expressed by He must follows from this promise of Jehovah to the Messiah. According to this Divine declaration, the reign of the Messiah on the throne of the Father must last till there be no longer any enemy left capable of separating God and man. Then this reign shall cease. Christ's victory, to be complete, must reach to the last enemy, and that even in the external and bodily domain.

26. The last enemy that is destroyed is death—"namely, after Satan (Heb. 2. 14) and sin (ch. 15. 56) are destroyed. In the same order they prevailed. Satan brought in sin, and sin brought forth death. And Christ, when He of old engaged with these enemies, first conquered Satan, then sin, in His death; and, lastly, death, in His resurrection. In the same order He delivers all the faithful from them, yea, and destroys these enemies themselves. Death He so destroys that it shall be no more; sin and Satan, so that they shall no more hurt His people"—WESLEY.

"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. (Comp. Rev. 20. 14.) Death shall be the last of all, because (Rom. 6. 23) it is the 'wages of sin,' and must continue to exist until sin has come to an end. Then what we know as death, the separation of soul and body, the dissolution of the complex nature of man into its constituent elements, shall henceforth cease to be"—C. B. "When this last enemy is destroyed, all Christ's followers being now gathered in, and having entered on their eternal condition, the work of Christ, so far as this world is concerned, is over; and one idea conspicuous in this brief and pregnant passage is, that Christ came to subdue all the enemies of mankind, and that He will continue His work until His purpose is accomplished. One needs to be reminded that to see this victory accomplished, and to have had no share in it, will be the sorest humiliation and the most painful reflection to every generous mind. However slight be our power, let us strike such a blow as we can at the common enemies which must be destroyed ere the great consummation is reached"—DODS.

27. Under Him — "under the Son"—WESLEY.

"'All things are put under His feet,' says CYRIL of Alexandria, 'because He made all things.' (John 1. 3, 10; Eph. 3. 9; Col. 1. 16; Heb. 1. 2.) It is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him. This passage ought to be compared with the analogous one in Heb. 2. 7–9. Each of these supplies what is wanting in the other. In the one we have the Son, the manifestation of the Father's glory and love, bringing everything in this lower world, which the Father has put under Him, into the most complete subjection to, and the most entire union with, His heavenly Father. In the other we see the Eternal Father, while permitting, for His own wise purposes, the humiliation and suffering of Christ, doing so in order that all things should finally be put in subjection to 'His Beloved Son, in whom He was well pleased'"—C. B.

28. The Son also shall be subject—"shall deliver up the mediatorial kingdom. That the Three-One God may be all in all—all things consequently, all persons without any interruption, without the intervention of any creature, without the opposition of any enemy, shall be subordinate to God. All shall say, 'My God, and my all.' This is the end. Even an inspired apostle can see nothing beyond this"—WESLEY.

And when all things shall be subdued unto Him. If everything is put under Christ, it is in order that there may be no divided empire. "I and My Father are one," He said (John 10. 30). (Comp. John 17. 11, 22, as well as ch. 3. 23; 11. 3, of this Epistle.) BEET says: "In view of the mysterious words of vers. 24, 28, touching the relation of the Eternal Son to the Eternal Father, rather than speak, the expositor would prefer to bow in silent adoration. But what God has spoken we cannot forbear to re-echo. These verses teach the absolute and eternal submission of the Son to the Father. And, even when receiving the homage of the Son, the Father is spoken of by S. Paul, not as we should say God the Father as distinguished from God the Son, but simply as God. And to Him the Son bows with the express purpose that thus the Father may be everything in the eyes and thoughts of all His servants."

29. Who are baptized for the dead—"perhaps baptized in hope of blessings to be received after they are numbered with the dead. Or, 'baptized in the room of the dead'—of them that are just fallen in the cause of Christ; like soldiers who advance in the room of their companions that fell just before their face"—WESLEY.

The practice known as baptism for the dead was absurd if there be no resurrection. To practise it and to deny the doctrine of the resurrection was illogical. What shall they do? i.e. what explanation shall they give of their conduct? asks the apostle. There have been numerous and ingenious conjectures as to the meaning of this passage. The only tenable interpretation is that there existed amongst some of the Christians at Corinth a practice of baptizing a living person in the stead of some dead convert who had died before that sacrament had been administered to him. The idea evidently was that whatever benefit flowed from baptism might be thus vicariously secured for the deceased Christian. Does S. Paul then, by what he says, sanction the superstitious practice? Certainly not. He carefully separates himself and the Corinthians, to whom he immediately addresses himself, from those who adopted this custom. He says, Those who do that, and disbelieve a resurrection, refute themselves.

30. Why are we—"the apostles—also in danger every hour? It is plain we can expect no amends in this life"—WESLEY.

"And why stand we in jeopardy every hour? Not only those who were daily being baptized for the dead witnessed to the universal belief among Christians in a resurrection, but the lives of daily peril in which S. Paul and the other missionaries of the gospel lived were sufficient evidence that they did not conceive all their hopes to be summed up in this life"—C. B. If there is no resurrection, he says, my whole life is a folly. No day passes but I am in danger of death at the hands either of an infuriated mob or a mistaken magistrate. I am in constant jeopardy, but I gladly encounter all dangers because I believe in the resurrection. S. Paul's meaning is plain. By the hope of a life beyond he had been induced to undergo the greatest privations in this life. But in all he was sustained by the assurance that there remained for him a rest and an inheritance in a future life. Remove this assurance and you remove the assumption on which his conduct is wholly built.

31. I protest by your rejoicing, which I have—"which love makes my own—I die daily. I am daily in the very jaws of death. Beside that I live, as it were, in a daily martyrdom"—WESLEY.

"I protest by your rejoicing. The word here rendered 'rejoicing' is translated 'boasting' in Rom. 3. 27, and less correctly 'whereof I may glory' in Rom. 15. 17. It may mean either (1) that S. Paul boasted of the fruits of faith in his Corinthian converts, or better (2) that their boasting in Christ was also his by reason of their common indwelling in Jesus Christ, whom he had been permitted to minister to them. (Comp. 2 Cor. 1. 14; 3. 3.) He makes this asseveration, because it was to that daily death of his (ch. 4. 9–13) that they owed their conversion. I die daily. (Comp. Rom. 6. 3, 4, 11; 7. 24; 8. 13, 36; 2 Cor. 1. 9; 4. 10–12; Gal. 2. 20; 5. 24; 6. 14; Col. 2. 20; 3. 3, 5.) The death of Christ was a death to sin, a death which must be imitated in His disciples by their putting all the sinful affections of their bodies to a lingering death. But such a task they would never be likely to undertake, but for the prospect of a resurrection"—C. B.

32. If to speak after the manner of men—"that is, to use a proverbial phrase, expressive of the most imminent danger—I have fought with wild beasts at Ephesus—with the savage fury of a lawless multitude (Acts 19. 29, etc.). This seems to have been but just before. Let us eat, etc. We might on that supposition, as well say, with the Epicureans, Let us make the best of this short life, seeing we have no other portion"—WESLEY.

"If after the manner of men—'after man' Wyclif. Either (1), as margin, 'to speak after the manner of men,' or (2) 'for purely human and temporal objects,' like those of men in general. (See for this expression ch. 3. 3, and Rom. 3. 5; Gal. 1. 11; 3. 15.) I have fought with beasts at Ephesus. It must have been a metaphorical, not a literal, fighting with beasts of which the apostle spoke. His Roman citizenship (Acts 16. 37; 22. 25) protected him from being thrown to the lions in the arena. And it is generally believed that he eventually died by the sword, as a Roman citizen. He means to say that he contended with men who had the passions of beasts (as in Acts 19. 29, 34, though it is not certain that this particular event had yet occurred). What advantageth it me—i.e. as we should say, 'Where is the use of it?' Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die. 'With our hopes of immortality gone, the value of humanity ceases,' and life becomes not worth living. Go, then, to the sensualist. Tell him that the pleasure of doing right is a sublimer existence than that of self-indulgence. He will answer you, 'The victory is uncertain, present enjoyment is sure.' Do you think you can arrest that with some fine sentiment about nobler and baser being? Why, you have made him out to be as base yourself. He dies, you tell him, like a dog. Why should he live like an angel? The instincts of the animal will be more than a match for all the transcendental reasonings of the philosophers"—ROBERTSON. "Convince men that this life is all, that death is final extinction, and they will eagerly drain this life of all the pleasure it can yield. Make men feel that they are immortal beings; that this life, so far from being all, is the mere entrance and first step to existence; make men feel that there is open to them an endless moral progress, and you give them some encouragement to lay the foundations of this progress in a self-denying and virtuous life in this world"—DODS.

33. Be not deceived—"by such pernicious counsel as this. Evil communications corrupt good manners. He opposes to the Epicurean saying, a well-known verse of the poet Menander. Evil communications—discourse contrary to faith, hope, or love, naturally tends to destroy all holiness"—WESLEY.

"Apparently the Corinthians themselves had argued that morality was quite independent of a belief in immortality. For S. Paul goes on, Be not deceived—you cannot, however much you may think so, you cannot hear such theories without having your moral convictions undermined and your tone lowered. The beginnings of conduct are so hidden from our observation, our lives are formed by influences so imperceptible, what we hear sinks so insidiously into the mind and mingles so insensibly with our motives, that we can never say what we have heard without moral contamination"—DODS. "Evil words are not wind, as most imagine, but the devil's drivel, that leaves a foul stain upon the speaker, and oft sets the like upon the hearer. Shun unsavoury speeches, thou losest so much of thine honesty and piety as thou admittest evil into thy tongue"—TRAPP.

34. Awake—"an exclamation full of apostolical majesty. Shake off your lethargy! To righteousness—which flows from the true knowledge of God, and implies that your whole soul be broad awake. And sin not—that is, and ye will not sin. Sin supposes drowsiness of soul. There is need to press this. For some among you have not the knowledge of God. With all their boasted knowledge, they are totally ignorant of what it most concerns them to know. I speak this to your shame—for nothing is more shameful, than sleepy ignorance of God, and of the word and works of God; in these especially, considering the advantages they had enjoyed"—WESLEY.

"With this earnest call to arouse from the sleep of indulgence and of death, the apostle completes this section of the chapter, and the direct proofs of the doctrine of the resurrection. The exhortation is needed, for there are some who call themselves Christians and still have an ignorance regarding God. To their shame the apostle speaks this, not only the last words but the whole preceding argument. It was a shame that to Christians the apostle should have to vindicate the very fundamental truth of the faith"—ELLICOTT. GODET says: "This severe tone is intended to throw them back on themselves, and so to make humiliation succeed to pride, and the feeling of their fall to that of the superiority which they think they possess over all the other churches."

35. "But some one possibly will say, How are the dead raised up, after their whole frame is dissolved? And with what kind of bodies do they come again, after these are mouldered into dust?"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul answers these questions by arguments from analogy. As the seed dies before it can be quickened, as there is one glory of the sun and another glory of the moon, as the imperfect precedes the perfect, as our natural life is earlier than our spiritual—so is the resurrection of the dead"—ROBERTSON. In Matt. 22. 23 ff., we have a similar objection to the fact of the resurrection, based on the same crude notion, common even in Christian ages, that the raised bodies will be exactly the same as those laid in the grave. Our Saviour, like S. Paul, meets it by proving that there is a life beyond the grave, assuming that this implies a resurrection of the dead; and by showing how incorrect are the common ideas about the life of the risen ones"—BEET.

36. "To the inquiry concerning the manner of rising, and the quality of the bodies that rise, the apostle answers first by a similitude (vers. 36–42), and then plainly and directly (vers. 42, 43). That which thou sowest is not quickened into new life and verdure except it die—undergo a dissolution of its parts, a change analogous to death. Thus S. Paul inverts the objection; as if he had said, Death is so far from hindering life, that it necessarily goes before it"—WESLEY.

Every living seed contains within itself a germ of life. Underground this germ begins to grow at the expense of the seed; soon the bulk of the seed is gone, and nothing remains of it but the dead, shrivelled husk. Every higher form of life presupposes the loss of that which precedes it. This is a law of nature. "That which thou sowest—the word 'thou' is emphatic. 'Thou who art mortal and perishing' (CHRYSOSTOM). The force or emphasis may be gathered thus. If God doth give a body unto that seed which 'thou' sowest for thine own use and benefit, much more will the same God give a body unto the seed which He Himself doth sow"—Dr. J. JACKSON. "Is not quickened, except it die—'thus what they made a sure sign of our not rising again he makes a proof of our rising' (CHRYSOSTOM). (Comp. John 12. 24.) It is the law of the spiritual as well as the natural world that decay is the parent of life. From the Fall came corruption, from 'the likeness of sinful flesh' a new and higher life. Humanity died to sin in Christ; it arose again to righteousness in Him"—C. B. "Thou fool—a hard knot must have a hard wedge, a dead heart a rousing reproof. He confutes atheists from the course of nature to which they ascribe so much"—TRAPP.

37. Thou sowest not the body that shall be—"produced from the seed committed to the ground, but a bare, naked grain, widely different from that which will afterward rise out of the earth"—WESLEY.

"And that which thou sowest. There are two parts in this similitude—first, that it is not wonderful that bodies should arise again from corruption, since the same thing happens in the case of the seed; and next that it is not contrary to nature that our bodies should be endowed with new qualities, when from naked grain God produces so many ears clothed with a wonderful workmanship"—CALVIN. TYNDALE renders, "And what sowest thou?" "Thou sowest not that body that shall be. The same, yet not the same. The same, because the essence is the same; but not the same, because the latter is the more excellent (CHRYSOSTOM). The identity of the body does not depend upon its material particles, because physicists tell us that these are in a continual flux, and that in the course of seven years every material particle in the body has been changed. Personal identity depends upon the principle of continuity. The risen body arises out of that which has seen corruption, in the same way as the plant out of its germ. The length of time that elapses is nothing to Him to whom 'a thousand years are but as one day.' But as the seed is to all appearance very different to the plant which arises from it, although science tells us that it contains that whole plant in miniature, as the body of Jesus after His resurrection was endowed with many strange and new qualities (John 20. 19, 26), so as often to be unrecognisable by His disciples (Luke 24. 16, 31, 37; John 20. 14; 21. 4), though yet it was the same body (Luke 24. 39, 40; John 20. 20, 27); so we learn that the body we sow in the grave is 'not that body that shall be,' but the resurrection body,—the spiritual body,—while it exhibits visible and unequivocal signs of its connection with the body out of which it has arisen, will be possessed of many wondrous faculties which are denied to us here"—C. B.

38. But God—"not thou, O man, not the grain itself—giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him, from the time He distinguished the various species of beings; and to each of the seeds, not only of the fruits, but animals also (to which the apostle rises in the following verse) its own body; not only peculiar to that species, but proper to that individual, and arising out of the substance of that very grain"—WESLEY.

God's omnipotence is the efficient cause, as corruption is the necessary condition, of a seed's reproduction in a new and nobler form of life. And if God gives to every sown grain a plant-body corresponding in kind to its new state, shall He not in like manner give to every buried man a proper resurrection body? "But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him—lit. as He willed. (Comp. ch. 12. 11, where, however, the word is not the same as in the Greek.) Life even in its lowest form has the power of assimilating to itself atoms"—ROBERTSON. And these are arranged and developed according to the law that God has impressed on each seed. And to every seed his own body. "That body with which it is raised may be called its own body, and yet it is a new body. It is raised anew with stem and leaves and fruit, and yet all the while we know that it is no new corn; it is the old life in the seed reappearing, developed in a higher form"—ROBERTSON.

39. All flesh—"as if he had said, Even earthy bodies differ from earthy, and heavenly bodies from heavenly. What wonder, then, if heavenly bodies differ from earthy? or the bodies which rise from those that lay in the grave?"—WESLEY.

"All flesh is not the same flesh. The same principle is now applied to animate which has been applied to inanimate nature. There are different varieties and forms of bodily life. The apostle in this and the two following verses lays down the doctrine (see note on ver. 42) that the life hereafter will depend in every way upon the life here; that the body raised will correspond to the body sown; that the character impressed upon it during this life will remain with it throughout eternity. And this not merely in the broad general distinction between good and bad (see Gal. 6. 7, 8), but in the minuter shades of individual character. Recent editors, following the best MSS. and versions, place fishes in their proper place, last in the text, as in zoological order"—C. B. "S. Paul now develops a thought suggested by 'each of the seeds,' viz. the immense variety, and variety of kinds, of living bodies"—BEET. "In this series of examples, man is placed at the head; for, while belonging by his body to the animal kingdom, he alone of all living beings possesses the capacity of reaching a higher existence. S. Paul is about to contrast terrestrial beings with 'celestial bodies.' These latter differ from the former both in substance and splendour"—GODET.

40. There are also heavenly bodies—"as the sun, moon, and stars; and there are earthy—as vegetables and animals. But the brightest lustre which the latter can have is widely different from that of the former"—WESLEY.

"The word bodies puts in comparison the objects which live and move on earth with those brilliant objects which move or seem to move above our heads and infinitely beyond our reach. S. Paul thus reminds us that not only is there an infinite variety of material and living forms around us, but that far above us there are other bodies, and then goes on to say that these heavenly bodies are of altogether another kind, differing entirely from every one of the endless varieties of earthly bodies"—BEET.

41. "Yea, and the heavenly bodies themselves differ from each other"—WESLEY.

"They attest the infinite riches of God's work and the illimitable range of His power. Open your eyes, then, the apostle means to say, and as you see so many different glories shining in the heavens, you will cease to ask, as if God's power were limited, 'With what body shall they come?' You will understand how infinite are the resources of Divine power"—GODET.

42. So also is the resurrection of the dead—"so great is the difference between the body which fell, and that which rises. It is sown—a beautiful word; committed, as seed, to the ground. In corruption—just ready to putrefy, and, by various degrees of corruption and decay, to return to the dust from whence it came. It is raised in incorruption—utterly incapable of either dissolution or decay"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul does not attempt to describe the future body, but contents himself with pointing out one or two of its characteristics by which it is distinguished from the body we now wear. In this body there is decay, humiliation, weakness, a life that is merely temporary; in the body that is to be, decay gives place to incorruptibility, humiliation to glory, weakness to power, animal life to spiritual"—DODS. "Whether there are degrees of glory, as it seems probable, so we shall certainly know when we come to heaven. Three glimpses of the body's glory were seen—in Moses' face, in Christ's transfiguration, and in S. Stephen's countenance"—TRAPP.

43. It is sown in dishonour—"shocking to those who loved it best: human nature in disgrace! It is raised in glory—clothed with robes of light, fit for those whom the King of Heaven delights to honour. It is sown in weakness—deprived even of that feeble strength which it once enjoyed. It is raised in power—endued with vigour, strength, and activity, such as we cannot now conceive"—WESLEY.

"Dishonour—as if of no value. It was a technical term, in the days of free Athens, for a kind of outlawry involving loss of the rights of citizenship and of State protection. And this meaning would doubtless occur to S. Paul's readers, and was perhaps designed by him. Funeral pomp is but a mask hiding the truth that the body carried to the grave has lost the rights of humanity. Instead of the kind attentions rendered to it a few days ago, it is left alone in the dark and silent grave, as the meanest living body would not be. In absolute contrast to this is the splendour, exciting universal admiration, in which Christ's people will rise from the dead. In glory (see Col. 3. 4). In power—the wonderful and various capacity of the resurrection body"—BEET. What the weakness is we scarcely need to inquire. Decay of strength and vitality, ending in the absolute powerlessness of death, is the destiny of the body which is to be laid in the grave. But when it is raised, not only can it never be subject to the same weakness again, but it will be endowed with new faculties, as superior to those of the former body as those of the plant are to those of the seed.

44. "It is sown in this world a merely animal body—maintained by food, sleep, and air, like the bodies of brutes; but it is raised of a more refined contexture, needing none of these animal refreshments, and endued with qualities of a spiritual nature, like the angels of God"—WESLEY.

"It is not impossible, nor even improbable, that the death of our present body may set free a new and far more perfectly equipped body. The fact that we cannot conceive the nature of this body need not trouble us. S. Paul does not attempt to describe the future body, but contents himself with pointing out one or two of its characteristics by which it is distinguished from the body we now wear"—DODS. "These are simple foreshadowings of the glory of a resurrection body. We cannot go further; a spiritual body is one of those things 'which eye hath not seen, which have not entered into the mind of man, and which God reserves for them whom He loves"—GODET.

45. The first Adam was made a living soul. "God gave him such life as other animals enjoy; but the last Adam, CHRIST, is a quickening Spirit. As He 'hath life in Himself, so He quickeneth whom He will'; giving a more refined life to their very bodies at the resurrection"—WESLEY.

"Adam was a living soul—that is, a natural man—a man with intelligence, perception, and a moral sense, with power to form a society and to subdue nature to himself. He was that, and that only. The last Adam—the spiritual Man, whose prerogative it was, not as the first Adam, to live in Eden for himself, but to die on Calvary for others—was the Lord from heaven, who came to confer life"—ROBERTSON. "He does not call the second Adam a living Spirit, but a 'life-living' one; for He ministers the eternal life to all"—THEODORET. "The word quickening means 'that which gives life,' as we speak of the 'quick and the dead' in the Creed. The idea of activity to which the word 'quick' and its derivatives is now confined, comes from its original idea of life. We use the word 'lively' in a similar manner"—C. B.

46. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual. "The law of God's universe is progress"—ROBERTSON. "His whole lecture on this passage will repay study. He shows how the Fall was an illustration of this law, a necessary consequence of a state of mere natural life; a 'step onward,' if for the time 'downward.' He traces it in the history of nature and of nations, and finally applies it to individuals, and shows how our natural feelings and affections are the sources of our spiritual ones; how the moral life, the fulfilment, that is, of the law of our being as discerned by natural religion, the living up to the light we have (comp. Rom. 2. 14), leads up to the spiritual life, and how temptation and sorrow, themselves the fruit of a state of things undeveloped and incomplete, are necessary elements in the formation of the perfect, the spiritual man. (Comp. Heb. 2. 10)"—C. B. "We see this law ruling the history of creation and the history of man. The spiritual is the culminating point towards which all the process of nature tends. The gradual development of what is spiritual,—of will, of love, of moral excellence,—this, so far as man can see, is the end toward which all nature constantly and steadily is working"—DODS.

47. The first man was from the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven. "'The first man,' being from the earth, is subject to corruption and dissolution, like the earth from which he came. 'The Second Man'—S. Paul could not so well say, 'is from heaven, heavenly': because, though man owes it to the earth that he is earthy, yet the LORD does not owe His glory to heaven. He himself made the heavens, and by descending from thence showed Himself to us as the Lord. Christ was not 'the second man' in order of time; but in this respect, that as Adam was a public person, who acted in the stead of all mankind, so was Christ. As Adam was the first general representative of men, Christ was the second and the last. And what they severally did, terminated not in themselves, but affected all whom they represented"—WESLEY.

"The first man was earthy; his body was fitted to the region of his abode; but the second man is the Lord from heaven. (John 6. 33; 3. 13.) If the first Adam could communicate to us our natural and animal bodies, cannot the Second Adam make our bodies spiritual ones? The dead in Christ shall not only rise, but shall rise thus gloriously changed"—M. HENRY. "The first representative man was from the earth, the second representative man was from heaven; and as was the first earthly Adam, so are we in our merely physical condition; and as is the second heavenly Adam, so shall we be in our heavenly state"—ELLICOTT.

48. They that are earthy—"who continue without any higher principle. They that are heavenly — who receive a Divine principle from heaven"—WESLEY.

"What Adam was, a man of dust, they are who live a life inherited from him. And what Christ is, such are they who partake His life. This comparison pertains only to those elements which come from the heads of the race. Because Adam's body was soul-governed, so are ours. Christ's glorified body, which will some day return to earth, is purely spirit-governed. And since He, equally with Adam, is Head of the race, we shall have bodies like His"—BEET.

49. The image of the heavenly—"holiness and glory"—WESLEY.

The image or "likeness." In this present life we are like Adam; in the next we shall be like Christ. (Comp. Rom. 8. 29; 2 Cor. 3. 18; Phil. 3. 21; Col. 3. 10.) Many MSS. read let us also bear in this passage. But S. Paul is not exhorting here, but teaching. And, moreover, the exhortation would seem a little out of place, since "regeneration cannot be obtained by striving or even by faith itself, it is an act of positive grace'—OLSHAUSEN. Tertullian, however, remarks expressly that S. Paul says let us bear, speaking in exhortation, not in doctrine. So Chrysostom, whom—with the Vulgate—Wyclif follows, translating bere we also; while Theodoret, on the contrary, says that S. Paul here was not speaking hortatively, but prophetically.

50. "But first we must be entirely changed; for such flesh and blood as we are clothed with now cannot enter into that kingdom which is wholly spiritual; neither doth this corruptible body inherit that incorruptible kingdom"—WESLEY.

"Now this I say, brethren. We enter here upon a new phase of the argument. The apostle now tells us how this great result shall be accomplished. We cannot inherit eternity as we are; a change is necessary. And this change will in the end be a sudden one, but will consist rather in the modification of the external conditions of the body than in any destruction of its essential properties. That flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God—it is not the material particles of our body which endure for ever. They are subject to corruption and dissolution. It is the spiritual principle of life which abides, and, like the seed, attracts to itself such material particles as shall serve it for a suitable habitation. The early heretics mentioned above (ver. 12) caught eagerly at this verse as disposing of the idea of a material resurrection. But the early Fathers of the Church showed conclusively that it was not to be so understood. They cited Luke 24. 39 to prove that Jesus Christ had 'flesh and bones' after His resurrection. And we may observe, moreover, that in S. Paul's language 'flesh and blood' stood for our ordinary humanity, as distinguished from everything of a spiritual nature. (See Rom. 8. 1-10; Gal. 1. 16; Eph. 6. 12.) Neither doth corruption inherit incorruption — an additional proof of what has just been stated. Our ordinary flesh and blood is by its very nature destined to corruption. It is not with such flesh and blood that we can become partakers of the incorruptible life"—C. B. "Flesh and blood. The body as it is corruptible, cannot enter heaven, but must be changed; we shall appear with Him in glory. The vile body of Moses, that was hid in the valley of Moab, was brought forth glorious in the hill of Tabor. (Matt. 17. 3)"—TRAPP.

51. A mystery — "a truth hitherto unknown; and not yet fully known to any of the sons of men. We—Christians. The apostle considers them all as one in their succeeding generations. Shall not all die — suffer a separation of soul and body. But we shall all — who do not die—be changed — so that this animal body shall become spiritual"—WESLEY.

"A mystery means something which up to this time has been kept concealed, but is now made manifest. (Rom. 11. 25; Eph. 3. 3–5.) We shall not all sleep, etc. The apostle believed that the end of the world might come in the lifetime of some then living. We shall not all, he says, necessarily sleep, but we shall all be changed. The change from the earthly to the spiritual body is absolutely necessary. To some it will come through the ordinary process of death; to those who are alive at Christ's advent it will come suddenly, and in a moment. The dead shall be raised, but we (the living) shall be changed"—ELLICOTT.

52. In a moment—"amazing work of omnipotence! And cannot the same power now change us into saints in a moment? The trumpet shall sound — to awaken all that sleep in the dust of the earth"—WESLEY.

The dead in Christ shall rise. "In the same moment the yet mortal living are changed, and the whole redeemed host invested with glory and immortality; ascend to meet the Lord in the air, and so, after their public justification, and the condemnation of the wicked, shall be for ever with the Lord"—WATSON. "The last trump. The trumpet was used to summon an assembly (Ex. 20. 18; Ps. 81. 3; Isa. 18. 3; 27. 13), or to sound a warning. The last trumpet is the one which concludes a series which have already been sounding at intervals in notes of warning to the nations. (Ps. 47. 5; Isa. 27. 13; Jer. 51. 27.) This verse states with reiterated emphasis that this change shall not be a protracted process, but a sudden and momentary alteration in the condition of our bodies"—ELLICOTT.

53. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. (Comp. 2 Cor. 5. 4.) The apostle has just said that 'flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God.' He now explains in what sense these words are to be taken. The mortal body is not destroyed entirely and created again. 'Change,' says TERTULLIAN, 'must be dissociated from all idea of destruction. For change is one thing, destruction another.' It receives an addition of qualities which it did not possess before. It is 'clothed upon' with immortality. That which was corruptible is now freed from that liability ('sanctified and cleared from all impurity') (IRENÆUS). That which is mortal is swallowed up, and disappears in the vastness of life that knows no end"—C. B.

54. Death is swallowed up in victory—"that is, totally conquered, abolished for ever"—WESLEY.

These words, originally referring to the Jewish people (Isa. 25. 8), are naturally applied here to the human race, of which they were the chosen type.

55. O death, where is thy sting?—"which once was full of hellish poison. O Hades, the receptacle of separate souls, where is thy victory? Thou art now robbed of all thy spoil; all thy captives are set at liberty. 'Hades' lit. means the invisible world, and relates to the soul; death to the body. The Greek words are found in the LXX. translation of Hos. 13. 14"—WESLEY.

"O death, where is thy sting? This quotation follows neither the LXX. nor the Hebrew of Hos. 13. 14. The former is, 'Where is thy penalty, O death? where is thy sting, O Hades?' following, most probably, a different reading from the present Hebrew text, which runs thus: 'I will be thy plagues, O death; I will be thy pestilence, O grave' (or 'Hades,' for the Hebrew word has both significations). (See next note.) O grave, where is thy victory?—In the Greek, 'O Hades.' The Vulgate (which is followed by Tyndale), as well as most of the best MSS., reads 'death' here for Hades. So do Irenæus and Tertullian, writing in the second century. But the ancient Syriac version reads 'Hades.' Bishop Wordsworth suggests that the text was altered from a fear lest the passage should give any countenance to the idea of a god of the shades below, known to the Greeks by the name of 'Hades.' But in later Greek and in the LXX. its use to denominate the place of departed spirits was well established"—C. B. "A pardoned soul needs not fear death. He may look on death with joy, who can look on forgiveness with faith. To a pardoned soul death has lost his sting. Death to a pardoned sinner is like the arresting a man after the debt is paid"—WATSON.

56. The sting of death is sin—"without which it could have no power. But this sting none can resist by his own strength. And the strength of sin is the Law—as is largely declared. (Rom. 7. 7, etc.)"—WESLEY.

"Everywhere S. Paul teaches that it was sin which brought death upon man, that man would have broken through the law of death which reigns in the physical world, had he not by sin brought himself under the power of things physical. And this poisonous fang was pressed in by the Law. The strength of sin is the Law. It is positive disobedience, the preference of known evil to known good, the violation of law whether written in the conscience or in spoken commandments, which gives sin its moral character. The choice of the evil in the presence of the good, it is that which constitutes sin"—DODS.

57. But thanks be to God, who hath given us the victory—"over sin, death, and Hades" —WESLEY.

"The victory, by the atoning sacrifice of Christ for sin; by the joys of remission, which removes the sting of death, and substitutes the hope of glory; by uniting us to Himself, the everlasting Head of His body the Church; by making His own resurrection the pledge and earnest of ours. We have only to follow the Captain, and take the victory. And if this be the grace, what should be the song?"—SUTCLIFFE. The completeness and the glory of this change, and the complete victory over death, which it implies, force from the apostle a shout of victory. But this gives place at once to practical exhortations to do, unmoved by doubt or contradiction, the work of Christ" —BEET.

58. Be ye steadfast—"in yourselves. Unmoveable—by others; continually increasing in the work of faith and labour of love. Knowing your labour is not in vain in the Lord—whatever ye do for His sake shall have its full reward in that day. Let us also endeavour, by cultivating holiness in all its branches, to maintain this hope in its full energy; longing for that glorious day, when, in the utmost extent of the expression, death shall be swallowed up for ever, and millions of voices, after the long silence of the grave, shall burst out at once into that triumphant song, O death, where is thy sting? O Hades, where is thy victory?"—WESLEY.

"Therefore, my beloved brethren. The aim of S. Paul is always practical. Even this magnificent passage comes to what from a merely oratorical point of view is a somewhat tame conclusion, a conclusion however which, regarded from the point of view of Christian edification, is full of beauty. 'Be not weary in well-doing,' the apostle would say. 'Labour on in faith and courage till life comes to an end. For your life is hid with Christ in God; and therefore your efforts and struggles here are not thrown away. Not one of them shall be lost sight of before the Eternal Throne'"—C. B. "Beyond our horizon there awaits us an endless enlarging world. Death, which seems to bound our view, is really but our real birth to a fuller, and eternal and true life. Therefore, be ye steadfast. The promptings of conscience do not delude you; your instinctive hopes will not be put to shame; your faith is reasonable; there is a life beyond. And no effort you now put forth will prove vain; no prayer, no earnest desire, no struggle towards what is spiritual, will fail of its effect. All that is spiritual is destined to live; it belongs to the eternal world: and all that you do in the spirit, all mastery of self and the world and the flesh, all devoted fellowship with God,—all is giving you a surer place and a more abundant entrance into the spiritual world, for your labour is not in vain in the Lord"—DODS.

CHAPTER XVI.

1. The saints—"a more solemn and a more affecting word, than if he had said, the poor" —WESLEY.

The same subject is mentioned in chaps. 8 and 9 of the Second Epistle. The disorganised state of Judea at this time, as described in the pages of Josephus, may account for the systematic efforts which were then being made throughout the Gentile churches for their aid. This collection is mentioned in Rom. 15. 26, written after the apostle's arrival at Corinth. Another reason for this Gentile liberality is given there. Jerusalem was the source whence all the blessings of the gospel had flowed. It was fitting that some recompense, however inadequate, should be made. (Comp. ch. 9. 11.)

2. Let every one—"not the rich only; let him also that hath little, gladly give of that little. According as he hath been prospered—increasing his alms as God increases his substance. According to this lowest rule of Christian prudence, if a man when he has or gains one pound gives a tenth to God, when he has or gains an hundred he will give the tenth of this also. And yet I show unto you a more excellent way. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. Stint yourself to no proportion at all. But lend to God all you can"—WESLEY.

This verse, Acts 20. 7, and Rev. 1. 10, are the only passages in Scripture which notice the practice instituted from the very first among Christians of observing the day of the Lord's resurrection with especial reverence. But though it is clear enough, from the universal consent of Christians, that they were accustomed to meet together for worship on the Lord's Day, we cannot infer it from this passage. Lay by him—i.e. at home, not in the assembly, as is generally supposed. "He does not say, 'bring it at once,' lest the giver should be ashamed of the smallness of his contribution; but first lay it up by thyself, and when it is worthy of collecting, then bring it" —CHRYSOSTOM. He speaks of a custom in his time of placing a small box by the bedside into which an offering was to be put whenever prayer was made. WATSON explains: "An appeal is made to man's gratitude for the blessings of Providence to himself, and he is enjoined to give 'as the Lord hath prospered him.' Our fellow-creatures are constantly presented to us under tender relations, as our 'brethren,' or, more particularly, as 'of the household of faith.'" ROBERTSON sums up the teaching of this verse with the advice, "Systematise your charity. Save, by surrendering superfluities first. Tell that there is a sacred fund, which will be made less by every unnecessary expense. Let us learn Christian economy first. Next we shall, by God's grace, learn Christian self-denial. For the Macedonians gave not out of their abundance, but out of their deep poverty."

4. They shall go with me—"to remove any possible suspicion"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul would not take charge of the money himself; and, moreover, it was fitting that members of the Corinthian church should have the pleasure, as well as the credit, of presenting their bounty in person to those who were to be the recipients of it"—C. B.

5, 6. I pass through Macedonia—"I purpose going that way"—WESLEY.

"Bring me on my journey—lit. 'send me forward.' The recognised word for helping forward on a journey or a mission"—STANLEY. (See Acts 15. 3; 20. 38; 21. 5; Rom. 15. 24.)

7. I will not see you now—"not till I have been in Macedonia"—WESLEY.

"From 2 Cor. 1. 15–23 we learn that S. Paul's original purpose was to come first to Corinth, then go to Macedonia and back to Corinth; and the reason of the change—viz. to avoid the severity with which, if he came at once, he would be compelled to act towards some of the Corinthians,—to avoid this he wrote the letter before us. Ch. 4. 18 suggests that this change of plan was already known and misunderstood"—BEET.

8. I will stay at Ephesus—"where he was at this time"—WESLEY.

"At Ephesus, indicates that there he wrote this letter. 'A door great and effective' (2 Cor. 2. 12; Col. 4. 3; Acts 14. 27; Rev. 3. 8), opportunities for great usefulness, already fruitful in results. An important coincidence with Acts 19. 10"—BEET.

9. A great door—"as to the number of hearers — and effectual — as to the effects wrought upon them. And there are many adversaries—as there must always be where Satan's kingdom shakes. This was another reason for his staying there"—WESLEY.

"The use of door in the sense of 'opportunity' in the New Testament is remarkable. It is a favourite word with S. Paul. (See 2 Cor. 2. 12; Col. 4. 3.) This verse strikingly corroborates the narrative in the Acts. (Comp. Acts 19. 19, 20)"—LIAS. "For he worketh. So doth every faithful minister, though of meaner parts; the vine is the weakest of trees, but full of fruit. A little boat may do best in a low river. Philadelphia had but a little strength (Rev. 3. 8), and yet it served the turn, and did the deed"—TRAPP.

10. Without fear—"of anyone's despising him for his youth. For he worketh the work of the Lord—the true ground of reverence to pastors. Those who do so, none ought to despise"—WESLEY.

The apostle was evidently anxious to know how Timothy would be received by the Corinthians. He was young in years. He was young also in the faith. He had probably a constitutionally weak and timid nature (see 1 Tim. 3. 15, 23; 2 Tim. 1. 4), and he was of course officially very subordinate to S. Paul. In a church, therefore, some of whose members had gone so far as to question, if not actually to repudiate the authority even of the apostle himself, there was considerable danger for one like Timothy.

11. I look for him with the brethren—"that accompany him"—WESLEY.

Timothy and Erastus (Acts 19. 22) had been sent through Macedonia to Corinth some time before this Epistle was written, and when S. Paul heard how bad was the condition of the Corinthian church, he sends not only his Epistle, but with it Titus and two other brethren. (See 2 Cor. 8. 18, 22, 23.)

12. I besought him much—"to come to you —with the brethren—who were then going to Corinth. Yet he was by no means willing to come now—perhaps lest his coming should increase the divisions among them"—WESLEY.

"As touching our brother Apollos. S. Paul, free from the smallest spark of personal jealousy, had wished that Apollos, whose name had been used as the designation of a faction in opposition to the apostle himself, should go with this letter to Corinth. S. Paul had planted, Apollos had watered the church, and in the absence of the planter, Apollos would have been the most likely person to exercise authority there"—ELLICOTT.

13. "To conclude. Watch ye—against all your seen and unseen enemies. Stand fast in the faith—seeing and trusting Him that is invisible. Acquit yourselves like men—with courage and patience. Be strong—to do and suffer all His will"—WESLEY.

They were indolent and unstable and troubled by dissensions, and therefore he exhorts, Watch, stand, quit you like men. There is never a time when any church can afford not to observe these duties. "If you think Christianity a feeble, soft thing, ill adapted to call out the manlier features of character, read here"—ROBERTSON.

14. "Let all that ye do be done in love (R.V.). Love is the saint's livery. (John 13. 35.) Love began to grow cold among these Corinthians. Hence this sweet and savoury counsel. It were to be wished that this apostolical precept were well practised"—TRAPP.

15. The first-fruits of Achaia—"the first converts in that province"—WESLEY.

The Corinthian church had enjoyed the teaching of devoted men, and the apostle would have the teachers encouraged by the sympathy of a people so blessed.

16. That ye also—"in your turn—submit to such—so repaying their free service. And to everyone that worketh with us and laboureth—that labours in the gospel, either with or without a fellow-labourer"—WESLEY.

"That ye submit yourselves. (See Eph. 5. 21; 1 Pet. 5. 5.) Helpeth with us. There is no 'us' in the original. A general assistance in the work of the church seems to be what is meant by the apostle. Some would connect it with such,' and regard it as a direction to be willing to submit to the authority of all who were willing to work with the household of Stephanas. And laboureth. The Greek word implies 'toil,' i.e. the exertion which labour entails"—LIAS. "To every toiler for Christ we must give the deference due to his work"—BEET.

17. I rejoice at the coming of Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus—"who were now returned to Corinth; but the joy which their arrival had occasioned remained still in his heart. They have supplied what was wanting on your part—they have performed the offices of love, which you could not, by reason of your absence"—WESLEY.

"Fortunatus and Achaicus. Fortunatus is referred to by Clement as the bearer of his Epistle. Nothing is known of Achaicus. That which was lacking on your part—i.e. 'the void occasioned by your absence,' not the 'pecuniary need' of the apostle, as in 2 Cor. 11. 9 (comp. Phil. 2. 30). For the apostle there says that it is his boast, of which no man shall deprive him, that he has never cast any of the burden of his maintenance upon the Corinthian church"—LIAS. "S. Paul entertained great regard for the churches, and for the bodies of men, but he did not on this account ignore the individuals composing them. It is common enough to be zealous about a cause, about some scheme of social good, and yet to be careless respecting individual welfare. God's love provides for the universe, and yet spends an infinity of care on the fibre of a leaf"—ROBERTSON.

18. For they have refreshed my spirit and yours—"inasmuch as you share in my comfort. Such therefore acknowledge—with suitable love and respect"—WESLEY.

"This is a concise expression of the same consciousness of identity of feelings and interests which expresses itself so strongly in 2 Cor. 1. 3–7"—STANLEY. "These Corinthians are reinvigorated, through a perfect interchange of sympathy, by the joy that is imparted to S. Paul by the presence of one of their number"—LIAS.

19. Aquila and Priscilla had formerly made some abode at Corinth, and there S. Paul's acquaintance with them began (Acts 18. 1, 2)"—WESLEY.

S. Paul's fast friends and constant companions. Probably by the church in their house is meant a group of foreigners then resident in Ephesus, and accustomed to meet there for worship, as distinct from those who had been converted in Ephesus.

20. With a holy kiss—"not hollow, as Joab and Judas"—TRAPP. The word holy is added to guard against misconception in an impure age.

21. With my own hand—"what precedes having been written by an amanuensis"—WESLEY.

It was the apostle's habit to dictate his Epistles, but to add a few words at the end in his own handwriting. (See 2 Thess. 3. 17.) The concluding verses here are accordingly S. Paul's autograph. The earlier portions had been written by Sosthenes. (See ch. 1. 1.)

22. If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ—"if any be an enemy to His person, offices, doctrines, or commands—let him be Anathema Maran-atha. 'Anathema' signifies a thing devoted to destruction. It seems to have been customary with the Jews of that age, when they had pronounced any man an 'Anathema,' to add the Syriac expression, 'Maran-atha,' that is, 'The Lord cometh,' namely, to execute vengeance upon him. This weighty sentence the apostle chose to write with his own hand; and to insert it between his salutation and solemn benediction, that it might be the more attentively regarded"—WESLEY.

"Not to love Christ is a positive and fatal sin"—CUYLER. "There is no love so true, or so great, as that which Christ inspires"—THOMAS. From all the arguments and controversy which form the main portion of the Epistle, the apostle with his own hand brings back the thoughts of the Corinthians to the true test of their Christianity. Do they love the Lord Jesus? The word here used for love signifies not merely affectionate regard, but personal devotion. "Let him be Anathema Maran-atha. There is no connection between these two words. 'Anathema' signifies 'accursed.' The absence of love to Christ is condemnation. The word 'Maran-atha' is a Syriac expression—'the Lord is at hand,' or 'the Lord is come,' probably the former. The uncertainty of the moment when the Lord may come is the most solemn thought with which to remind them of the importance of being one with Christ"—ELLICOTT.

24. My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen. "This affectionate commendation of the Corinthians to the favour of Christ, coupled with the assurance of his own unchanging affection, must have sounded very striking in the ears of a community accustomed to Gentile modes of thought. Compare the curt and cold 'Farewell' at the end of Claudius Lysias' letter in Acts 23. 30. Much of the beauty and significance of this conclusion is lost to us by over-familiarity. It is worthy of note that the Epistle begins and ends with Jesus Christ"—C. B.

Canon FARRAR says: "So ends the longest and, in some respects, the grandest, and most characteristic of S. Paul's Epistles. He had suppressed, indeed, all signs of the deep emotion with which it had been written; but when it was despatched he dreaded the result it might produce—dreaded whether he should have said too much; dreaded the possible alienation by any over-severity of those whom he had only desired to win. His own soul was all quivering with its half-stifled thunder, and he was afraid lest the flash which he had sent forth should scathe too deeply the souls at which it had been hurled. He would even have given much to recall it (2 Cor. 7. 8), and awaited with trembling anxiety the earliest tidings of the manner in which it would be received. But God overruled all for good; and, indeed, the very writings which spring most naturally and spontaneously from a noble and sincere emotion, are often those that produce the deepest impression upon the world, and are less likely to be resented—at any rate, are more likely to be useful—than the tutored and polished utterances which are carefully tamed down into the limits of correct conventionality. Not only the church of Corinth, but the whole world has gained from the intensity of the apostle's feelings, and the impetuous spontaneity of the language in which they were expressed."

S. PAUL'S SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

"IN this Epistle, written from Macedonia, within a year after the former, S. Paul beautifully displays his tender affection toward the Corinthians, who were greatly moved by the seasonable severity of the former, and repeats several of the admonitions he had there given them. In that he had written concerning the affairs of the Corinthians; in this he writes chiefly concerning his own, but in such a manner as to direct all he mentions of himself to their spiritual profit. The thread and connection of the whole Epistle is historical; other things are interwoven only by way of digression.

CHAPTER I.

SECTION I. — Ver. 1. THANKSGIVING TO GOD.—1. Timotheus our brother. "S. Paul writing to Timotheus styled him his 'son'; writing of him, his 'brother'"—WESLEY.

With these same words the apostle commenced his First Epistle. (1 Cor. 1. 1.) Timothy, however, takes the place of Sosthenes. Saints —men consecrated to God, and living a life of devotion to Him. Achaia. We are to understand by this Hellas and the Peloponnesus, which, with Macedonia, made up the whole of Greece. Macedonia, however, was scarcely recognised by the Greeks in their best days as forming a part of their land. See articles "Achaia" and "Hellas" in Smith's Dictionary of Geography.

2. Grace be to you—"the peculiar favour of God. Peace—the blessedness which such favour brings."

3. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ—"a solemn and beautiful introduction, highly suitable to the apostolical spirit. The Father of mercies and God of all comfort. Mercies are the fountain of comfort; comfort is the outward expression of mercy. God shows mercy in the affliction itself. He gives comfort both in and after the affliction. Therefore is He termed, 'the God of all comfort.' Blessed be this God!"—WESLEY.

"The opening words are spoken out of the fulness of the apostle's heart. He has had a comfort which he recognises as having come from God. The nature of that comfort, as of the previous sorrow, is not stated definitely till we come to chaps. 2. 13; 7. 6, 7"—ELLICOTT. Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Two feelings rise at once in the apostle's mind. The first is an overwhelming gratitude for his deliverance from his distress, the second the keen sense of his entire unity of heart and soul with the Corinthian church, and his desire to impart to them whatever blessings he had received from God. Our version follows Wyclif here, substituting, however, even for and. The other English versions have "God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," save the Rhemish, which renders accurately by the "God and Father," etc. (See John 20. 17; 1 Pet. 1. 3.)

4. Who comforteth us in all our affliction, that we may be able to comfort them who are in any affliction. "He that has experienced one kind of affliction is able to comfort others in that affliction. He that has experienced all kinds of affliction is able to comfort them in all"—WESLEY.

"That God is rightly blessed under these designations is illustrated by what the apostle has recently gone through, and by the use to which God intends him to apply his experiences. Whatever may be the form or weight of his affliction, God furnishes the appropriate comfort, to the end that he may be able to administer the comfort which he has himself so received to other sufferers, whatever may be the form or weight of their affliction. That we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble. S. Paul represents affliction (1) as a school of sympathy, (2) as a school of comfort (or rather encouragement, ver. 5), (3) as a school of assurance (ver. 10)"—ROBERTSON. By the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. "We may observe here, as elsewhere in Scripture, that no gift is bestowed upon anyone to keep to himself. If S. Paul is encouraged by God, it is not only for his own sake, but that he may be able to impart to others the encouragement which he has received. (Comp. John 15. 1–17; Rom. 14; 1 Cor. 3. 9; 4. 7; Eph. 4. 16; Col. 2. 19)"—C. B.

5. For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us—"the sufferings endured on His account. So our comfort also aboundeth through Christ. The sufferings were many, the comfort one; and yet not only equal to, but overbalancing, them all"—WESLEY.

The word translated abound means to "exceed, be over and above" (Matt. 5. 20; 14. 20). Thus the meaning of the passage is that the sufferings of Christ overflow to us, and that thus we are made partakers of them. (See Matt. 20. 22; Mark 10. 38; Gal. 2. 20; Heb. 13. 13.) For (see Notes on ch. 4. 11, 12) our sufferings for Christ's sake arise from the same cause as His, namely, the opposition of darkness to light, of death to the life that is imparted by Him to His members. Such passages as ch. 4. 10, Col. 1. 24, carry the idea a step further, and represent Christ as suffering in His members by virtue of His union with them. So also Matt. 25. 40, 45; Acts 9. 4; Gal. 6. 17; Phil. 3. 10. We have here the principle upon which comfort is obtained, the connecting link between the sufferings and the comfort is Christ.

6. And whether we are afflicted, it is for your comfort and salvation — "for your present comfort, your present and future salvation. Or whether we are comforted, it is for your comfort—that we may be the better able to comfort you. Which is effectual in the patient enduring the same sufferings which we also suffer—through the efficacy of which ye patiently endure the same kind of sufferings with us"—WESLEY.

"And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation. The same may be said of every kind of suffering endured for the cause of God and of truth. It is not merely, as in Heb. 12. 6 (comp. Deut. 8. 5), that 'whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth' for his own sake, but that the sufferings one man endures for a good cause are the source of profit to others. (Comp. ch. 4. 15, 16; Eph. 3. 13; 2 Tim. 2. 10)"—LIAS. "There are some who are Christians, but, notwithstanding, are rough, hard, and rude; you cannot go to them for sympathy. You cannot confide the more delicate difficulties of the soul to them. Theirs is the rude health which knows not of infirmities. They have not suffered. But tenderness is got by suffering, both physical and mental. This was Christ's own qualification for sympathy (Heb. 4. 15)"—ROBERTSON. "It is assumed that the sufferings of all Christians have much in common. All have anxieties, sorrows, disappointments, which bring a keener pain than the ills that threaten the spoiling of goods or even life itself"—ELLICOTT.

7. And our hope concerning you—"grounded on your patience in suffering for Christ's sake—is steadfast"—WESLEY.

His hope for them, for their salvation in the fullest sense of the word, had never been stronger than it was at that moment, and he did not doubt that they were at that very time sharers in the comfort as well as in the sufferings.

8. We would not have you ignorant, brethren, of the trouble which befel us in Asia—"probably the same which is described in the nineteenth chapter of the Acts. The Corinthians knew before that he had been in trouble: he now declares the greatness and the fruit of it. We were exceedingly pressed, above our strength — above the ordinary strength even of an apostle"—WESLEY.

"This is recorded in Acts 19. 24, when the silversmiths and the populace of Ephesus rushed into the theatre to occupy good seats, the better to see us devoured by the lions, not doubting of our condemnation, being charged with saying that Diana was no goddess. What displays of Providence in S. Paul's deliverance at this and at other times! (Ch. 11. 33)"—SUTCLIFFE. "S. Paul now accounts for his excellent praise, and for the mention of his affliction, by telling of a deadly peril from which he has been lately rescued, and it is to sympathising brothers that he tells the story"—BEET.

9. Yea we had the sentence of death in ourselves—"we ourselves expected nothing but death"—WESLEY.

"God often bringeth His people into great straits that they may apprehend their own insufficiency to help themselves, and may be induced to place their trust and hope in His all-sufficiency. He can do all things, and is to be trusted in at all times. Abraham's faith fastened upon this instance of the Divine power"—M. HENRY.

10. We trust that He will still deliver—"that we may at length be able to come to you"—WESLEY.

"Past experiences are great encouragements to faith and hope, and they lay great obligations to trust in God for time to come. We reproach our experiences if we distrust God in future straits, who hath delivered us in former troubles. David, even when a young man and had but a small stock of experiences, argued after this manner. (1 Sam. 17. 37)"—M. HENRY.

11. You likewise — "as well as other churches. Helping with us by prayer, that for the gift—namely, my deliverance — bestowed upon us by means of many persons —praying for it—thanks may be given by many"—WESLEY.

"For the right understanding of this Epistle, the identity of feeling between the apostle and his converts must be borne in mind throughout. It is the liveliest instance of the real community of feeling introduced by Christianity into the world"—STANLEY. "The best people may have benefit by the prayers of the meanest"—TRAPP.

12. "For I am the more emboldened to look for this, because I am conscious of my integrity; seeing this is our rejoicing—even in the deepest adversity. The testimony of our conscience — whatever others think of us. That in simplicity—having one end in view, aiming singly at the glory of God. And godly sincerity—without any tincture of guile, dissimulation, or disguise. Not with carnal wisdom, but by the grace of God—not by natural but Divine wisdom. We have had our conversation in the world—in the whole world; in every circumstance"—WESLEY.

"Rejoicing (R.V. 'glorying'). Simplicity and godly sincerity (R.V. 'Holiness and sincerity of God'). "For our rejoicing is this—'it is this,' says the apostle, 'which causes such a perennial flow of joy and consolation into my heart amid all my anxieties and distresses. I can feel in my conscience that what knits us together in sympathy is a Divine and not a human bond. On my part there is the inspiration from above, on yours the verifying faculty which enables you to recognise the truth of what I deliver to you.' This seems to be the connection of thought in this and the two following verses. The connection with what precedes appears to be the conviction of the apostle that the honesty and genuineness of his efforts to minister Christ to the Corinthians have fairly entitled him to hope for a share in their prayers. The testimony of our conscience. (Comp. 1 Cor. 4. 4; also Acts 23. 1; 24. 16; Rom. 9. 1; 1 John 3. 21.) That in simplicity and godly sincerity. For 'simplicity,' the best MSS. and editors read 'holiness'; but 'simplicity,' i.e. 'singleness of purpose,' seems to suit the context best. The word translated sincerity ('clenness' Wyclif, 'pureness' Tyndale), originally signifies that which is 'tested by the sun's rays,' and is therefore entirely transparent. (See note on 1 Cor. 5. 8; see also ch. 2. 7; Phil. 1. 10; 2 Pet. 3. 1.) The word 'sincerity' was adopted by our translators from the Rhemish version. The words translated 'godly sincerity' are, in the original, 'sincerity of God,' i.e either—(1) 'that which is His gift, comes from Him,' or (2) 'that which is befitting His service,' as in the A.V. Not with fleshly wisdom—lit. 'in.' (Comp. 1 Cor. 1. 17; 2. 1, 4, 13.) These passages show that there existed among the Corinthians a tendency to exalt the wisdom of this world, i.e. acquirements such as those of dialectic skill and rhetoric, above the spiritual enlightenment obtained by the submission of the intellect and will to the direction of God"—C. B. "He was merry under his load, because his heart was upright. The sincere will stand under great pressures, because they are sound"—TRAPP. "We have had our conversation—better, 'we conducted ourselves.' In its fullest sense, the apostle can say that he had striven to live everywhere so as to avoid giving grounds for suspicion. Nowhere had he been more careful so to live than at Corinth, where men were suspicious in proportion to their own viciousness"—ELLICOTT.

14. Ye have acknowledged us in part—"though not so fully as ye will do—that we are your rejoicing—that ye rejoice in having known us. As ye also are ours—as we also rejoice in the success of our labours among you; and we trust shall rejoice therein in the day of the Lord Jesus"—WESLEY.

"As also—S. Paul connects 'the future for which he hopes, with the past of which he knows'"—MEYER. In part. It is here delicately hinted that the whole Corinthian church did not acknowledge S. Paul. We are your rejoicing—rather "ground of rejoicing." The word here rendered "rejoicing" is rendered indifferently "boasting," "glorying," "rejoicing," "whereof to glory," in the A.V. (See Rom. 4. 2; 1 Cor. 5. 6; ch. 9. 3.) Even as ye also are ours. It was, moreover, the special object of the apostle to remind the Corinthians of the identity of their interests before he proceeded to vindicate himself or to rebuke them. Some of them, he says, already recognised this truth. (See also next verse.) Chrysostom remarks on the humility of the apostle in thus placing himself on a level with his converts. "They who save a soul from death lay up for themselves joy in that day when the light of eternity will reveal the value of a soul. And the same light will reveal the true grandeur of the heroes of the Church, and thus increase the joy of those who have been associated with them on earth. S. Paul declares that, just as he already possessed in his readers that which would be a joy to him in the day of Christ, so they regarded him"—BEET.

15. In this confidence—"that is, being confident of this"—WESLEY.

By the second benefit is meant the effects of the visit which the apostle hoped to have paid to the Corinthians after his return from Macedonia. It has been explained (1) of the favour of the apostle's presence, (2) of the outpouring of God's grace or favour which S. Paul, as an apostle of Christ, had the privilege of imparting. (See Rom. 1. 11.) Tyndale, who is followed by Cranmer and the Geneva Version, renders "one pleasure more."

17. Did I use levity—"did I lightly change my purpose? Do I purpose according to the flesh—are my purposes grounded on carnal or worldly considerations? So that there should be with me yea and nay—sometimes one, sometimes the other; that is, variableness and inconstancy"—WESLEY.

"Did I use lightness? (R.V. 'Did I show fickleness?') One of the special features of this Epistle, according to Robertson, is its exhibition of 'the way in which a Christian may defend himself when maligned or misrepresented. . . . An uncontradicted slander is believed readily, and often for long, and meanwhile influence is crippled or lost. Conceive what might have ensued, had S. Paul not met the slander against his character with denial at once! For few persons take the trouble to sift a charge which is not denied." "According to the flesh—i.e. 'Are they the decisions of my human will, which is subject to change through caprice, or are they decisions made according to the promptings of God's Spirit, and, as such, removed out of the region of human inconstancy of purpose? That with me there should be yea, yea, and nay, nay. Some have rendered this (1) 'that with me the yea should be yea and the nay nay,' as though in this last member of the sentence S. Paul was showing how impossible it was for him to be obstinate and to refuse to change his purpose for a reasonable cause. But the context is against this. Chrysostom, who adopts this view, lays the stress upon the words 'with me,' as though S. Paul's private and individual will were contrasted with the dictates of the Spirit, which he was bound to follow, whether they laid him open to the charge of inconsistency or not. But the best way is (2) to interpret the passage in the usual manner, and to regard the apostle as denying that he was infirm of purpose, and as reminding the Corinthians that he had but one definite end in view, which he was resolutely bent upon attaining, namely, the ministering to them the Spirit of Jesus Christ. To this one purpose all minor plans and resolutions must give way"—C. B.

18. Our word to you—"the whole tenor of our doctrine—hath not been yea and nay—wavering and uncertain"—WESLEY.

A solemn answer to the foregoing questions, followed by proof, is given in this and the two following verses.

19. For Jesus Christ who was preached by us—"that is, our preaching concerning Him—was not yea and nay—was not variable and inconsistent with itself—but was yea in Him—always one and the same, centring in Him"—WESLEY.

"Silvanus—called Silas in the Acts. He was sent with S. Paul and S. Barnabas, as 'a chief man among the brethren,' to guarantee the authenticity of the apostolic letter which the former brought back with them from Jerusalem to Antioch after the discussion recorded in Acts (ch. 15), since, had S. Paul and S. Barnabas returned alone, their opponents might not improbably have disputed its genuineness. (See Acts 15. 22, 25, 27.) He was a prophet, Acts 15. 32 (see 1 Cor. ch. 14), and was chosen by S. Paul, after his dispute with S. Barnabas, as his fellow-traveller, by the advice of the churches. Some have thought that he was the brother mentioned in ch. 8. 18; 12. 18. He is mentioned by S. Paul with himself in the opening of each of the Epistles to the Thessalonians. He was with the apostle at Philippi (Acts 16. 19–40), at Thessalonica (ch. 17. 1, 4, 10), at Berea (ch. 17. 10), at Corinth (not at Athens, ch. 17. 15; 18. 5). He is not mentioned again in Scripture save by Peter in his First Epistle (ch. 5. 12), in which he speaks of him as one with whom he has little personal acquaintance, but much confidence"—LIAS. "It was infinitely unlikely that one who preached Christ, the absolutely true Christ, who enforced every precept with the emphatic 'Amen, Amen' (the word occurs thirty-one times in Matthew, fourteen times in Mark, seven times in Luke, and in its reduplicated form twenty-five times in John, 'Verily, verily),' should afterwards be shamelessly untruthful, and use words that paltered with a double sense"—ELLICOTT.

20. For all the promises of God are yea and Amen in Him—"are surely established in and through Him. They are 'yea,' with respect to God promising; 'Amen,' with respect to men believing; 'yea,' with respect to the apostles; 'Amen,' with respect to their hearers"—WESLEY.

"Promises are prizes in the hand of God to stimulate the soul's activities. They have been fulfilled and ratified in Christ. In Him is the yes. Christ incarnate was a solemn and costly declaration by God that He will fulfil every one of the ancient promises, a declaration not admitting denial or doubt. The Amen (Rom. 1. 25), the expression of man's faith that the promise will be fulfilled. Since in Christ, God reasserts the old promises, also through Christ men believe them, and shout Amen. Through us—by whose preaching the 'Amen' has risen from the lips of many who never spoke it before. And this has been in order that glory may come to God, i.e. that His grandeur may shine forth and thus elicit admiration from men. (Comp. Rom. 15. 7, 9)"—BEET.

21. "I say, to the glory of God—for it is God alone that is able to fulfil these promises. That establisheth us—apostles and teachers. With you—all true believers. In the faith of Christ; and hath anointed us—with the oil of gladness, with joy in the Holy Ghost, thereby giving us strength both to do and suffer His will"—WESLEY.

"Now He which establisheth thus with you in Christ—rather, 'and He,' etc., as explaining the words 'by us.' 'Not as though we had any power in ourselves, to do anything of ourselves (comp. ch. 3. 5), but it is God who stablisheth us and who anointed us for our great work.' The meaning of the Greek word translated 'stablisheth,' as of the English one by which it is rendered, is to 'make firm, immovable.' For 'in Christ,' the original has 'unto' or 'upon' Christ, i.e. by the faith and hope in Him which are 'as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast.' (Heb. 6. 19; comp. 1 Cor. 3. 11; also Matt. 15. 18; Eph. 2. 20)"—LIAS. In the insertion of with you we note S. Paul's characteristic anxiety to avoid the appearance of claiming for himself what others might not claim with equal right. He repeats the confident hope which he had expressed in 1 Cor. 1. 8.

22. Who also hath sealed us—"stamping His image on our hearts, thus marking and sealing us as His own property. And given us the earnest of His Spirit. There is a difference between an earnest and a pledge. A pledge is to be restored when the debt is paid; but an earnest is not taken away, but completed. Such an earnest is the Spirit. The first-fruits of it we have (Rom. 8. 23), and we wait for all the fulness"—WESLEY.

"The God of all grace has given to His people all the perfection of heaven to be their heritage for ever, and the earnest of His Spirit is to them the blessed token that all things are theirs. The Spirit's work of comfort and sanctification is a part of heaven's covenant blessing"—SPURGEON. "They were not to think that their past spiritual experience had any character of finality. It was rather but the pledge of yet greater gifts to come, even of that knowledge of God which is eternal life. (John 17. 3)"—ELLICOTT.

23. I call God for a record upon my soul. "Was not S. Paul now speaking by the Spirit? And can a more solemn oath be conceived? Who then can imagine that Christ ever designed to forbid all swearing? That to spare you I came not yet to Corinth—lest I should be obliged to use severity. He says elegantly 'to Corinth,' not 'to you,' when he is intimating his power to punish"—WESLEY.

"The word here translated call for a record is not used in Scripture in a bad sense. It signifies (1) to surname, as in Matt. 10. 3; (2) to appeal, as in Acts 25. 11; and (3) to call upon, as in Acts 22. 16; 1 Cor. 1. 2, etc. S. Augustine and other commentators have remarked that it is lawful for a Christian to take an oath upon a proper occasion. (Comp. Matt. 26. 63.) That to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth. Though S. Paul could 'use sharpness' if need so required, he desired, as the minister of the God of love, rather to come in the 'spirit of meekness'"—LIAS. "The solemn earnestness of the appeal implies that on the ground of his delay in coming to Corinth a serious charge had been brought against the apostle. (Comp. 1. 17; 1 Cor. 4. 18.) Upon my soul—as in Rom. 2. 9. Laying open the seat of life to be smitten if he speaks falsely. S. Paul appeals to God. In delaying his visit he was sparing them the punishment which, had he come, he would have been compelled to inflict. (Comp. 1 Cor. 4. 21.) Instead of punishing, he wrote (ch. 2. 3) the First Epistle"—BEET.

24. Not that we have dominion over your faith—"this is the prerogative of God alone. But are helpers of your joy—and faith from which it springs. For by faith ye have stood—to this day. We see the light in which ministers should always consider themselves, and in which they are to be considered by others. 'Not as having dominion over the faith' of their people, and having a right to dictate by their own authority what they shall believe, or what they shall do; but as 'helpers of their joy,' by helping them forward in faith and holiness. In this view, how amiable does their office appear! and how friendly to the happiness of mankind! How far, then, are they from true benevolence, who would expose it to ridicule and contempt?"—WESLEY.

The apostle would teach that he wishes not to domineer, but to be a fellow-worker with their "joy and peace in believing" (Rom. 15. 13). He has asserted his authority, and declared his fidelity in the most solemn manner; but he will not claim too much. They do not stand in him, but in their faith in Christ, and he longs to confirm and strengthen that faith. He here defines accurately his relation to his converts. What power he had—and it was considerable (see 1 Cor. 4. 21; ch. 2. 9; 7. 15; 10. 6; 13. 2, 10)—was simply ministerial, to assist the free growth of the Christian life within them, one of whose foremost fruits (Gal. 5. 22) was joy, the joy of the man redeemed and sanctified in Christ, a joy which could not be possessed by those who "hold the truth in unrighteousness" (Rom. 1. 18). He had no right to place himself between their souls and God, as a necessary channel in all cases of the Divine life." By faith ye stand—he does not say, by patience, or by hope, or the like. They are all drawn from faith. Strengthen that, and strengthen all other that are infused from it. As a tree, we cast not water on the branches, but on the root. So strengthen faith. We strengthen love and hope, and all, if we strengthen faith and assurance of God's love in Christ"—SIBBES. For by faith ye stand. "If they are enabled to stand firm against the overrunning flood of ungodliness, it is not in dependence upon any human being, however great and noble his mission (see vers. 21, 22; Matt. 10. 40; John 13. 20; 20. 21; 1 Cor. 7. 25, 40; 1 Thess. 4. 8), but by faith in a living Lord (comp. Rom. 11. 20; 1 Cor. 15. 1), who is able to save and to destroy"—C. B. "What the anchor and cable are to ship, when anchored off reef or rocky shore, the faith by which man makes God's strength his own is to believers in their times of trial"—GUTHRIE.

CHAPTER II.

1. In grief—"either on account of the particular offender, or of the church in general"—WESLEY.

In heaviness (R.V. "With sorrow"). S. Paul now further vindicates his consistency. Not only did he stay away from Corinth to spare the Corinthians the sharp rebukes which his immediate presence would have necessitated, but he hoped, by means of the Epistle, to work so salutary a reformation as to make his visit to Corinth a time of the deepest spiritual joy. S. Paul's great anxiety was not to visit the Corinthian church in such a frame of mind. It falls in best with the context to explain, "I determined that my second visit should not be paid while under the influence of painful feelings." Olshausen remarks that the "heaviness" here spoken of belongs as much to the Corinthians as to the apostle.

2. For if I grieve you, who is he that cheereth me but he that is grieved by me?—"that is, I cannot be comforted myself till his grief is removed"—WESLEY.

"For if I make you sorry—so all the principal English translators. But the rendering gives a false impression to a modern ear. The best equivalent in modern English is 'if I pain you.' The idea of sorrow for the sin does not appear to have been introduced as yet. The 'I' in this passage is emphatic: 'if I, whose sole delight is to see you happy, inflict pain, it is with the object of bringing about happiness in the end.' The connection of this verse with the preceding implied in the word 'for' seems to be as follows: 'I wrote to cause pain, it is true, but it was in order that such pain should be removed before I came.' (Comp. ch. 7. 8.) Who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me? The apparent selfishness of this passage, in which S. Paul appears to think that the grief he has caused is amply compensated for by the pleasure he receives from that grief, is explained by the words in the next verse, 'having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.' The meaning would seem to be that S. Paul wished not to come to Corinth in sorrow, but in joy, and that this end was attained by the result of the rebukes of his Epistle, which produced pain, and pain reformation, and reformation a pure and heavenly joy on the part of all—of S. Paul, of the Corinthian community, and of the offender himself, conditions obviously the most favourable to an apostolic visit"—LIAS.

3. And I wrote thus to you—"I wrote to you before in this determination, not to come to you in grief"—WESLEY.

"To rejoice in his converts was to S. Paul an absolute necessity (comp. 1 Thess. 3. 8), 'we live if you stand in the Lord'"—BEET.

"Nothing strikes a man more than the unkindness of a friend, than expectation of love dashed and disappointed. All evils, as elements, are most troublesome, when out of their proper place, as impiety in professors"—TRAPP.

4. "From much anguish I wrote to you, not so much that ye might be grieved, as that ye might know by my faithful admonition my abundant love toward you"—WESLEY.

"The heart always makes the best apology"—SUTCLIFFE. "It is the truest mark of affection not to cloak the sins of those who are entrusted to your care, to rebuke them openly and plainly, even at the risk of causing considerable distress"—ESTIUS. With many tears—"which in case of a brave and high-spirited man, are a token of intense grief"—CALVIN.

5. He hath grieved me but in part—"who still rejoice over the greater part of you. Otherwise I might burden you all"—WESLEY.

"Perhaps there is a slight reproof here, implying, as in 1 Cor. 5. 2, that the Corinthians had not sufficiently felt the disgrace brought on them all by such a crime. (Comp. ch. 1. 14.) The apostle thus, with no less adroitness than simple honesty, places the personal aspect of the question in the background, and deals with it as a matter of public principle, with which every member of the church is as intimately concerned as himself. The whole passage refers to the offender mentioned in 1 Cor. 5"—C. B. "The strong words of 1 Cor. 5. 1–5 might lead some to suppose that S. Paul looked upon the offence as a special sin against himself. He reminds them that the real injury was inflicted not upon himself, but upon those who tolerated the crime. That he needs, in mercy to the guilty man, to modify these words reveals how great was the injury inflicted by this one man upon the whole church"—BEET.

6. Sufficient for such an one. "With what a remarkable tenderness does S. Paul treat this offender! He never once mentions his name. Nor does he here so much as mention his crime. By many—not only by the rulers of the church; the whole congregation acquiesced in the sentence"—WESLEY.

The discipline of the apostolic Church, which had as its main object the restoration of the offender, was content when this object was attained. As soon as the offender renounced his sin, the end of the discipline was reached, and there was no further need of punishment. It was no desire of the Church in the apostle's times, however much that important principle may have been lost sight of afterwards, that the offender should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow. "A plan diligently to be observed, for it teaches with what equity and clemency the discipline of the Church should be tempered, lest its vigour should exceed proper bounds"—CALVIN. "It was not only the dignity of the Corinthian church that S. Paul thought of; he thought also of the fallen, guilty state of his spirit who had degraded that church. He punished him that his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus"—ROBERTSON.

7. "Such a one. S. Paul has saved this offender from public disgrace by not mentioning his name. Swallowed up. Some commentators have supposed that S. Paul here meant apostasy or suicide. But he designedly leaves the result indefinite. It is impossible to foresee what will become of a man overwhelmed with excessive sorrow. With overmuch sorrow—lit. 'by the excess' of sorrow. 'Nothing is more dangerous than to give Satan a handle whereby he may harass a sinner into despair' (CALVIN). (Comp. also Gal. 6. 1, and Eccles. 8. 5)"—C. B.

8. That ye would confirm your love. The word for 'confirm' (better, perhaps, 'ratify'; comp. Gal. 3. 15) suggests the thought of an act as formal and public as the rebuke had been. The excommunicated man was to be readmitted to fellowship by a collective act of the church"—ELLICOTT.

9. The apostle renounces lordship over their faith, yet he requires compliance with all apostolic directions. He suggests that, having shown obedience in punishing, they should show it also in forgiving. "Ready to forgive" is a Christian duty, and should be also a Christian joy.

10. To whom ye forgive—"he makes no question of their complying with his direction—anything—so mildly does he speak even of that heinous sin, after it was repented of—in the person of Christ—by the authority wherewith He has invested me"—WESLEY.

He is not speaking of any private forgiveness of a personal injury, but of the public absolution of an offender lying under the censure of the Church. (See 1 Cor. 5. 4, 5.) We may observe (1) that S. Paul acts upon the report of the Corinthian church, properly authenticated by Titus, his representative there (ch. 7. 6–14), and (2) that he gives his official sanction to their act. ANDREW FULLER said: "If S. Paul could address the Corinthians, concerning one of their excluded members, who had been brought to repentance, To whom ye forgive anything, I also, much more would the friends of righteousness say, in their addresses to the Great Supreme, concerning an excluded member from the moral system, 'To whom Thou forgivest anything, we also.' Hence angels acknowledge Christians as brethren, and become ministering spirits to them while inhabitants of the present world."

11. Lest Satan—"to whom he had been delivered, and who sought to destroy not only his flesh, but his soul also—get an advantage over us—for the loss of one soul is a common loss"—WESLEY.

Devices. The word properly means "mental processes," "the product of mind" (MEYER).

It is translated "minds" in ch. 3. 14; 4. 4; 11. 3; Phil. 4. 7; "thought" in ch. 10. 5. In reference to Satan, all whose thoughts are evil, it may legitimately be translated devices, i.e. things which he "devised." (Luke 22. 31; 1 Cor. 7. 5; comp. 1 Pet. 5. 8; Rev. 12. 12.) S. Paul's meaning here is that to refuse forgiveness, when the time for it had come, would be only to give Satan an advantage, The offender had been delivered over to him. Not to release him from the bondage when he was truly repentant would be to afford the enemy of souls an opportunity of which he would not be slow to avail himself. Nothing is so likely to plunge a man into every kind of crime as despair.

12. Now when I came to Troas—"it seems in that passage from Asia to Macedonia, of which a short account is given (Acts 20. 1, 2), even though a door was opened to me—that is, there was free liberty to speak, and many were willing to hear"—WESLEY.

"Titus (see ch. 8. 6; 12. 18) had been sent by the apostle to superintend the 'collection for the saints' at Corinth (1 Cor. 16. 1). He was most probably the bearer of the former Epistle, and was anxiously expected by the apostle (ch. 7. 6) to bring information regarding the effect it had had upon the Corinthian church. Though Titus is not mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, he possessed in a high degree the confidence of the apostle (ch. 8. 16), as is shown by his taking the chief place—he seems even to have held a position of greater prominence than 'the brother whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches' (ch. 8. 18)—in this important mission. Before this he, as a Gentile, had been the subject of some discussion between S. Paul and the Judaising party at Jerusalem. The latter maintained that Titus ought to be circumcised, the former that he ought not; but S. Paul carried his point. His character seems to have been one of deep earnestness and zeal (ch. 7. 13, 15; 8. 16, 17), calculated to win the confidence of the great apostle. He was afterwards placed in charge of the church in Crete, and in this capacity received from S. Paul a letter of instruction known as the Epistle to Titus"—LIAS. "A door was opened—an opportunity offered. Where the Master sets up a light, there is some work to be done; where He sends forth His labourers, there is some harvest to be gotten in"—TRAPP.

13. I had no rest in my spirit—"from an earnest desire to know how my letter had been received. Because I did not find Titus—in his return from you. So I went forth into Macedonia—where, being much nearer, I might more easily be informed concerning you. The apostle resumes the thread of his discourse (ch. 7. 2), interposing an admirable digression concerning what he had done and suffered elsewhere, the profit of which he by this means derives to the Corinthians also; and this as a prelude to his apology against the false apostles"—WESLEY.

"Notice the vivid picture, in vers. 12, 13, of S. Paul's deep anxiety about his readers' spiritual welfare. He has come to the important city of Troas to proclaim there the good news about Christ, and finds a way open to do so. But he cannot preach. For his spirit is ill at ease, waiting for tidings about his beloved children at Corinth. Drawn by this intense desire, he bids adieu to some at Troas who would gladly keep him, and once more crosses the blue Ægean to Europe. This anxiety suggests the greater importance, recognised by all true evangelists, of securing old converts than making new ones"—BEET.

14. "To triumph, implies not only victory, but an open manifestation of it. And as in triumphal processions, especially in the East, incense and perfumes were burned near the conqueror, the apostle beautifully alludes to this circumstance in the following verse; as likewise to the different effects which strong perfumes have upon different persons; some of whom they revive, while they throw others into the most violent disorders"—WESLEY.

"There is not any exaggeration here. The apostle was endowed with the prophetic spirit. He knew to what ends the work he had begun was tending; he had, in no inconsiderable degree, triumphed in every place where he had ministered; and he had planted those principles which he knew would accomplish a moral conquest yet more extensive and more glorious. Truth triumphs over error. The gospel triumphs over the vices of men, and is their full salvation"—WATSON. "Now thanks be unto God. This passage is an instance of the abrupt digressions peculiar to S. Paul's style. 'As soon as S. Paul came to the word Macedonia, memory presented to him what had greeted him there,' i.e. the favourable intelligence brought by Titus (ch. 7. 6, 7), 'and in his rapid way—thoughts succeeding each other like lightning—he says, without going through the form of explaining why he says it, 'Now thanks be to God'"—ROBERTSON.

15. For we—"the preachers of the gospel—are to God a sweet odour of Christ. God is well-pleased with this perfume diffused by us, both in them that believe and are saved—treated of in ch. 3. 1; 4. 2—and in them that obstinately disbelieve and, consequently, perish—treated of in ch. 4. 3–6"—WESLEY.

"The imagery of the triumphal procession is still before the apostle. Some of those who took part in it were destined to rewards and honours, others were doomed to perpetual imprisonment or death. Christ and His servants are a savour of life unto them who are in the way of salvation, because through conformity to the spirit of Christ's sacrifice arises conformity to His life; a savour of death unto those who are not in the way of salvation, because a deliverance refused does but make destruction inevitable. (Comp. Matt. 21. 44; Luke 2. 34; John 3. 18–20; 9. 39; 12. 48; 15. 22)"—Lias. "If we believe this Epistle to have been written from Philippi, it is interesting to note the recurrence of the same imagery of a sweet savour in the Epistle to that church. (Phil. 4. 18.) Here the mind of the writer turns to the sterner, sadder side of the Roman triumph. Some who appeared in that triumph were on their way to deliverance, some on their way to perish, and this also has its analogue in the triumph of Christ. He does not shrink from the thought. In his belief in the righteousness and mercy of Christ, he is content to leave the souls of all men to His judgment. He will not the less do his work as incense-bearer, and let the sweet savour of the knowledge of God be wafted through the words which it has been given him to utter. All things are for His glory, for His righteousness will be seen to have been working through all"—Ellicott.

16. And who is sufficient for these things?—"no man living, but by the power of God's Spirit"—Wesley.

To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. The reading accepted by most recent editors is "a savour arising from death and resulting in death," and "a savour arising from life and resulting in life," according to a construction common to S. Paul, of which the most remarkable instance, perhaps, is Rom. 1. 17. The gospel is a savour arising from death, because it proclaims the death of Christ as the foundation of all reconciliation. (Comp. John 9. 39; 1 Cor. 1. 23, 24; 15. 14–18; 1 Pet. 2. 7, 8.) To those only who believe in a risen, ascended, living Christ, is the gospel a savour arising from and tending to life. Dr. Plumptre remarks, on the way in which the figure of the triumphal procession is kept before the reader, "To some of those who were being led in procession, the odour of the incense would seem as a breath from Paradise, giving life and health; to others its sweetness would seem sickly and pestilential, coming as from a charnel-house." Maclaren says: "On the cross this process went on in two men, alike in necessity, alike in criminality; alike in this, that death's icy finger was just being laid upon their hearts, to stop all the flow of its wild blood and passion, but different in this, that the one of them turned himself, by God's grace, and laid hold of the gospel that was offered to him, and the other turned himself away, and derided, and died."

17. For we are not as many, who adulterate the word of God—"like those vintners (so the Greek word implies) who mix their wines with baser liquors. But as of sincerity—without any mixture—but as from God. This rises higher still; transmitting His pure word, not our own. In the sight of God—whom we regard as always present, and noting every word of our tongue—speak we. The tongue is ours, but the power is God's. In Christ—words which He gives, approves, and blesses"—Wesley.

"A question suggested by the solemnity of the position just described, before S. Paul passes to God's commendation of his work by the conversion of the Corinthians; and a reason for this question, viz. that S. Paul is very far from looking upon the gospel as mere merchandise for self-enrichment. Before God, etc., completes the inward picture of S. Paul's preaching. His words spring not from selfish, but from genuine purposes, and from God; and are such words as men speak when sincere and when moved by God"—Beet.

The following chapter is one long digression, and arose out of the necessity of explaining the apparent self-sufficiency and boasting of the 17th verse of this chapter. It is not till the beginning of ch. 4. that the subject of ch. 2. is taken up again.

CHAPTER III.

1. Do we begin again to recommend ourselves—"is it needful? Have I nothing but my own word to recommend me? S. Paul chiefly here intends himself; though not excluding Timotheus, Titus, and Silvanus. Unless we need—as if he had said, Do I indeed want such recommendation?"—Wesley.

"S. Paul now proceeds to recall plain proof (in vers. 2, 3) of the dignity claimed by him in ch. 2. 14 f. But he remembers that his words above may be thrown in his teeth by opponents, and anticipates it by the first question in ver. 1, and overthrows it by a second question, which compels his opponents to admit that he has no need to commend himself. Then, as an answer to his second question, he gives proof of his Divine mission. Commendatory letters—containing credentials needful for those who go among strangers. Such letters Apollos brought (Acts 18. 27) to Corinth"—Beet. "Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth" (Prov. 27. 2).

2. "Ye are our recommendatory letter—more convincing than bare words could be. Written on our hearts—deeply engraven there, and plainly legible to all around us"—Wesley.

Written on our hearts. "Others bear their letters of commendation in their hands, we in our consciences, being fully aware that the existence of the church of Corinth, due, under God, to us, is a sufficient authentication of the genuineness of our ministry." (See 1 Cor. 9. 2.) Olshausen, however, regards the words as referring to S. Paul's intercession for the Corinthians, just as the high priest (Ex. 28. 15–30) bore the names of the tribes of Israel on his breast when he went into the holy place to intercede with God. "The regenerate," he adds, "are linked to the heart of their spiritual father by a spiritual bond." "The fruitfulness of the people is the preacher's testimonial; as the profiting of the scholar is the teacher's commendation"—TRAPP. "The Epistles of S. Paul were not those which were written then on parchment, or printed since in ink, but those which were written by God as truth on human hearts: Ye are our epistle"—ROBERTSON.

3. Manifestly declared to be the letter of Christ—"which He has formed and published to the world. Ministered by us—whom He has used herein as His instruments, therefore ye are our letter also. Written not in tables of stone—like the ten commandments—but in the tender, living tables of their hearts—God having taken away the hearts of stone, and given them hearts of flesh"—WESLEY.

"Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared. The Corinthians 'fell short in no gift,' but were 'enriched by Christ in all utterance and in all knowledge' (1 Cor. 1. 7). These were notorious facts that could not be gainsaid, capable of being 'known of all men.' To be the epistle of Christ ministered by us—i.e. brought into existence through our instrumentality. It can hardly be said that S. Paul has varied the figure of speech here. The Corinthians are an epistle. Of that epistle Christ is the Author; the thoughts and sentiments are His. S. Paul (comp. 1 Cor. 3. 5, 7, 9; 4. 1; ch. 6. 1) is the instrument by which the epistle was written. Its characters were preserved by no visible or perishable medium, but by the invisible operation of the Spirit. It was graven, not on stone, but on human hearts. And it was recognised wherever S. Paul went as the attestation of his claim to be regarded as a true minister of Christ, and this equally in his own consciousness (see last verse) and in that of all churches which he visited. Dean Stanley remarks on the number and variety of the similes with which the chapter is crowded. Dr. DALE appeals to Christian men, saying: 'I ask you to remember, at home, in the shop, and in the counting-house, that you are epistles of Christ; and that in your spirit, habits, and character, His very thoughts are to be translated into forms which common men can read and understand.' Ink—a black pigment of some kind was used by the ancients for all writings of any length. For shorter writings recourse was frequently had to waxen tablets. (See Jer. 36. 18; 2 John 12; 3 John 13, and articles 'Atramentum,' 'Tabulæ,' 'Stilus,' 'Liber,' in Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities.) The Spirit of the living God. S. Paul never seems to lose sight of the fact that Christianity is a communication of life—the life of Him who alone is the fountain of life (comp. also John 1. 4; 5. 26, 40; 14. 6; 2 Tim. 1. 10; 1 Pet. 2. 5)"—C. B. "Tables of stone. Dean Stanley refers us to Ezek. 31. 19; 36. 26, 27, and also suggests that the form of the expression, tables of the heart, may be derived from Prov. 3. 3, and 7. 3, not, however, from the LXX., which there has a different translation of the Hebrew word"—C. B.

4. Such trust have we in God—"that is, we trust in God that this is so"—WESLEY.

The words carry us back to the expressions of vers. 2 and 3, perhaps, also, to the assertion of his own sincerity and sufficiency implied in ch. 2. 16, 17. He has this confidence, but it is through Christ, who strengthens him. (Col. 1. 11.)

5. Not that we are sufficient of ourselves—"so much as to think one good thought, much less to convert sinners"—WESLEY.

"All our power for sacred performances is wholly from another. To think, we suppose, is an easy thing; but, unless God help, it is too hard for us. God must give us fresh supplies of His Spirit in every duty, or they cannot be rightly performed. The greatest fulness of a Christian is not the fulness of a fountain, but of a vessel, which, because always letting out, must always be taking in"—SWINNOCK. "A good thought is the least and lowest act of grace, and yet that we cannot do of ourselves; good thoughts and desires are as buds or blossoms upon a tree, which show themselves before the fruits; now if trees cannot bud of themselves, how much less can they bring forth fruits?"—AUSTEN.

6. Who also hath made us able ministers of the new covenant—"of the new, evangelical dispensation. Not of the Law, fitly called the letter, from God's literally writing it on the two tables. But of the Spirit—of the gospel dispensation, which is written on the tables of our hearts by the Spirit. For the letter—the Law, the Mosaic dispensation—killeth—seals in death those who still cleave to it. But the Spirit—the gospel conveying the Spirit to those who receive it—giveth life—both spiritual and eternal; yea, if we adhere to the literal sense even of the Moral Law, if we regard only the precept and the sanction as they stand in themselves, not as they lead us to Christ, they are doubtless a killing ordinance, and bind us down under the sentence of death"—WESLEY.

"Ministers of a new covenant—whose work it is to make known and carry out a new agreement of God with men. Notice the infinite superiority which S. Paul claims for the new covenant. It brings life, whereas the old covenant brought death. This contrast is not obscured by the truth that the death brought by the Law is designed by God to be the way to life. For, had not the Law been followed by the gospel, it could not, even directly, have led to life. And that the old covenant was preparatory to, and receives its entire value from, the new, which gives life at once to all who accept it, proves the infinite superiority of the latter"—BEET. "Not of the letter, but of the Spirit. (See Jer. 31. 31–34, and Ezek. 11. 19.) There is an obvious reference to these passages in the text. The difference between the old covenant and the new was that the former prescribed, the latter inspired; the former gave written precepts, the latter the power to fulfil them; the former laid down the rules, the latter brought man's heart into the condition in which such rules became a part of his nature. The old form was superseded by the principle. Instead of saying, 'Thou shalt not say Fool or Raca,' Christ gave the principle of Love"—ROBERTSON. "The words of the letter, and of the Spirit, however, depend not on the word covenant, but on the word ministers. (See also Rom. 1. 16; 1 Cor. 1. 18, 24 and notes); also, for the expression (Rom. 2. 27; 7. 6), 'What then, was not that Law spiritual? How then did he say, We know that the Law is spiritual? Spiritual indeed, for it came from God, but it bestowed not a spirit"—CHRYSOSTOM. "For the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life—'quykeneth,' Wyclif. (Comp. 1 Cor. 15. 45.) The formal enactment, whether positive or negative, can only kill. For while it makes no difference whatever in the condition of the man who fulfils it, it condemns him who disobeys or neglects to perform its precepts. (See John 3. 17, 18; Rom. 3. 20; 4. 20; 5. 13; 7. 10.) The 'spirit,' the breath or influence proceeding from God, can only 'give life,' since it comes from Him who is 'life,' and by breathing into man a new heart, enables him to perform naturally, without the aid of any enactments, the things that are pleasing to God. 'The Law, if it lay hold of a murderer, putteth him to death; the gospel, if it lay hold of a murderer, enlighteneth and giveth him life' (CHRYSOSTOM). (Comp. John 6. 63; Rom. 8. 11; 1 Cor. 15. 45; Gal. 6. 8; 1 Pet. 3. 18)"—C. B.

7. And if the ministration of death—"that is, the Mosaic dispensation, which proves such to those who prefer it to the gospel, the most considerable part of which was engraven on those two stones, was attended with so great glory"—WESLEY.

"The thoughts of the apostle have travelled to the record of the circumstances connected with the giving of the Law as the foundation of the first covenant, and of them he proceeds to speak fully. We can almost picture him to ourselves as taking up his LXX. version of the Law, and reproducing its very words and thoughts. So that the children of Israel, etc. They could not bear to look on the glory, even though it was perishing and evanescent"—ELLICOTT.

8. The ministration of the Spirit—"that is, the Christian dispensation"—WESLEY.

"The ministry of the gospel, which conveys the Spirit to those who believe. (Comp. Gal. 3. 4.) 'He that supplies to you the Spirit.' Shall be in glory—inference from the splendour of the ministry of Moses"—BEET.

9. The ministration of condemnation. "Such the Mosaic dispensation proved to all the Jews who rejected the gospel; whereas through the gospel (hence called the ministration of righteousness) God both imputed and imparted righteousness to all believers. But how can the Moral Law (which alone was engraven on stone) be the ministration of condemnation, if it requires no more than a sincere obedience, such as is proportioned to our infirm state? If this is sufficient to justify us, then the Law ceases to be a 'ministration of condemnation.' It becomes (flatly contrary to the apostle's doctrine) the 'ministration of righteousness'"—WESLEY.

"This verse develops, and thus supports, the argument of vers. 7, 8. Condemnation—the link connecting 'letter' with 'kills' in ver. 6. The Law pronounces the condemnation of all who disobey it; and therefore of all men. For none can obey it. Consequently, the only immediate effect of the Law is that just so far as we know it we are condemned by it. For 'through Law comes understanding of sin' (Rom. 3. 20). By conveying to men such a law Moses was a minister of condemnation. (Comp. 'minister of sin,' Gal. 2. 17.) Of righteousness—manifested in the gospel of faith for all who believe. (Rom. 1. 17; 3. 21 f.) As minister of the gospel, S. Paul was a means of imparting to men this righteousness. It is the link connecting the gospel preached by S. Paul and the Holy Spirit received by those who believe it. The immediate effect of the Law is to bring men under God's frown; the immediate effect of the gospel is that they rejoice in the smile of God. And S. Paul argues that if, as recorded in Ex. 34. 29, glory pertains to the former, then more abundant glory pertains to the latter"—BEET.

10. It hath no glory in this respect, because of the glory that excelleth—"that is, none in comparison of this more excellent glory. The greater light swallows up the less"—WESLEY.

Bishop WORDSWORTH, who places this passage and the LXX. of Ex. 34. in parallel columns, shows how S. Paul throughout this chapter is using the very words of the LXX., which must therefore be the index to his meaning. He paraphrases thus, "That was glorified, but glorious as it was, it was not glorified in one respect—that is, it was not glorified relatively to and in comparison with the Evangelical ministry, which far transcends its glory, and absorbs it." BEET says: "If a supernatural brightness attested the grandeur of the old covenant, and if the old covenant now sinks into insignificance in presence of the new, surely an infinite splendour belongs to, and therefore awaits, the ministry of the new covenant. For nothing less than infinite splendour can throw into the shade the splendour of the old covenant."

11. That which remaineth—"that dispensation which remains to the end of the world; that spirit and life which remain for ever"—WESLEY.

"With the passing nature of the covenant of which he was mediator, the passing brightness of Moses' face was in beautiful though incidental agreement. Even the little outward details of the two covenants were in harmony with their inward essence"—BEET.

12. Having therefore this hope—"being fully persuaded of this"—WESLEY.

"Seeing then that we have such hope—i.e. the hope that the Christian covenant is one of which the glory is permanent—we use great plainness of speech—('trist,' i.e. 'trust,' Wyclif; 'boldness,' Tyndale and Cranmer). The translation, 'boldness of speech,' we owe to the Geneva Version. The word means originally (1) fulness or frankness of 'speech.' Hence it comes to mean (2) openness, frankness generally, and hence (3) boldness, intrepidity. The former is the meaning here. S. Paul contrasts the fulness and frankness of the gospel on all matters relating to the future of man with the mysterious silence of the Law (i.e. the books of Moses), which hardly in the most distant manner allude to a future life. It may be remarked that even Jesus Christ Himself used much reserve (Matt. 8. 4; 9. 30; 12. 16; 13. 10–13; 16. 20; 17. 9) until His work on earth was finished. Then (Matt. 28. 19; Mark 16. 15) He decreed that this reserve should cease for ever. 'We speak everywhere with freedom, keeping back nothing, concealing nothing, suspecting nothing, but speaking plainly' (CHRYSOSTOM). 'A ministry whose very life is outspokenness and free fearlessness—which scorns to take a via media because it is safe in the eyes of the world' (ROBERTSON). This unrestrained openness proceeds from his conviction that the future glory will substantiate his words"—S. C.

13. "And we do not act as Moses did, who put a vail over his face—which is to be understood with regard to his writings also. So that the children of Israel could not look steadfastly to the end of that dispensation which is now abolished—the end of this was Christ. The whole Mosaic dispensation tended to, and terminated in, him; but the Israelites had only a dim, wavering sight of Him of whom Moses spake in an obscure, covert manner"—WESLEY.

"That this privilege of unreserve was not equally vouchsafed to the old ministry is shown allegorically. It is assumed for the purpose of the allegory that the sons of Israel also, had they seen the gradual extinction of the glory on the face of Moses, would have regarded it as an emblem of transitoriness, and have fixed their gaze unduly upon the termination of his ministry. With this is combined the idea that a premature discernment of this transitoriness, by a people in spiritual infancy, would have prevented the old ministry from taking its full effect as a schoolmaster to bring men to Christ. We must remember that the passage is allegorical, and therefore exempted from strict historical criticism, as well as that the apostle has in view, not Moses only but the false teachers at Corinth, who deliberately used a vail to hide the gospel truth. Moses prophesied of the Messiah, and looked forward to a dispensation beyond his own. (Deut. 18. 15)"—S. C.

14. "The same vail remaineth on their understanding unremoved—not so much as 'folded back' (so the word implies) so as to admit a little glimmering light. On the public reading of the Old Testament. The vail is not now on the face of Moses or of his writings, but 'on the reading' of them, and 'on the heart of them that believe not.' Which is taken away in Christ—that is, from the heart of them that truly believe on Him"—WESLEY.

"The effect produced by the vail. They did not see the end of that which was passing away, 'but,' on the contrary, 'their thoughts got hardened.' This was the exact opposite of the result produced by the apostle's frank discharge of his office, which inscribed the tablets of the heart with the Spirit of the living God. The 'thoughts' are the spiritual perceptions, discernments, intuitions. These lost their sensibility and quickness, and became callous. The vail continued not uplifted, because it was in Christ that it was (to be) done away, and the Jews had not yet been converted to Christ. He is speaking of the national conversion, the salvation of all Israel, which is treated at length in Rom. 11"—S. C. "Unless God give sight as well as light, and enlighten both organ and object, we can see nothing"—TRAPP.

16. When it—"their heart—shall turn to the Lord—to Christ by living faith. The vail is taken away—that very moment; and they see, with the utmost clearness, how all types and prophecies of the Law are fully accomplished in Him"—WESLEY.

The vail shall be taken away. "The tense in the original is present, not future, and may be interpreted (1) with Bishop Wordsworth, 'is in process of removal,' or perhaps better (2) with Dean Alford, 'is there and then removed, i.e. at the moment when the heart turns to the Lord, just as Moses took off the vail when he turned to speak to God.' (See also Isa. 25. 7.) It is to be observed that these words are a quotation of the LXX. of Ex. 34. 34, substituting, however, the present for the past tense"—LIAS. "S. Paul cannot leave his people in darkness without expressing a hope that they will some day come to the light. This verse is true of each individual who turns to Christ. Is taken away—a fixed, unchangeable principle of the kingdom of God. So surely as one turns to Christ, the vail is removed"—BEET.

17. Now the Lord—"Christ is that Spirit of the Law whereof I speak, to which the letter was intended to lead. And where the Spirit of the Lord, Christ, is, there is liberty—not the vail, the emblem of slavery. There is liberty from servile fear, liberty from the guilt and from the power of sin, liberty to behold with open face the glory of the Lord"—WESLEY.

"Now the Lord is that Spirit—lit. 'the Spirit,' i.e. the Spirit which was to replace the letter. The sense is as follows: 'The Lord (of whom I have just spoken—see last verse) (is the Spirit of which I have just spoken—see last verse) is the Spirit of which I have said (ver. 6) that it should be substituted for the letter.' For the Lord, even Jesus Christ, is Himself that new power — that higher inspiration — through which man finds what he ought to do written, no longer in precepts external to himself, but in his own regenerate heart. The new birth of the Spirit is but the implanting in man the humanity of Jesus Christ. 'The last Adam was made a life-giving Spirit' (1 Cor. 15. 45). This expression, like John 4. 24, refers, not to the person, but to the essential nature of God, just as in John 6. 63, the expression is applied even to the words of God, when they communicate to man essential principles of God's spiritual kingdom. (Comp. also John 1. 13; 3. 3, 5; Rom. 8. 2, 4.) Other explanations of this most difficult passage have been given. (1) 'The Spirit is the Lord,' Chrysostom; and he remarks on the order of the words in the Greek of John 4. 24 in support of his translation; (2) 'The Lord is identical with the Holy Spirit'; (3) 'The Lord with whom Moses spoke is the Holy Spirit'; (4) 'The Lord is the Holy Ghost, in so far as the Holy Ghost is the living principle of the indwelling of Christ'; (5) 'The Lord no dout is a Sprete,' Tyndale, whom Cranmer follows. It seems on the whole best to interpret the words as above. S. Paul now boldly declares that the 'Spirit' of which he has spoken is nothing less than Christ Himself. And where the Spirit of the Lord is. Hitherto St Paul has been speaking of the Divine nature of Him who transforms the heart of man. He now speaks of the personal agency through whom that work is achieved. Christ does these things by His Spirit, who is also the Spirit of the Father. (Rom. 8. 9; comp. also Gal. 4. 6; Phil. 1. 19; 1 Pet. 1. 11; with John 14. 16, 17, 26; 15. 26; 1 Cor. 2. 10–12, etc.) This interpretation involves no incongruity with the rest of the passage. The Three Persons in the blessed Trinity are one in essence, and that essence is Spirit. But the personal agency whereby God works His purpose in man's heart is the Holy Spirit, as Scripture everywhere declares. See the passages cited above. There is liberty—liberty not only to speak openly (ver. 12), but (ver. 18) to gaze with unveiled face upon the glory of God, and thus to learn how to fulfil the law of man's being. This liberty is the special privilege assured to man by the gospel. (See John 8. 32; Rom. 6. 18, 22)"—C. B. "There is no freedom from the shackles that bind the soul to earth, the flesh, and sin, till the Holy Spirit sets us free, and by the lightning force of truth breaks the chains that bind us to sin"—GUTHRIE.

18. "And, accordingly, all we that believe in Him, beholding as in a glass—in the mirror of the gospel—the glory of the Lord—His glorious love — are transformed into the same image—into the same love—from one degree of this glory to another, in a manner worthy of His almighty Spirit. What a beautiful contrast is here! Moses saw the glory of the Lord, and it rendered his face so bright that he covered it with a vail; Israel not being able to bear the reflected light. We behold His glory in the glass of His word, and our faces shine too; yet we vail them not, but diffuse the lustre which is continually increasing, as we fix the eye of our mind more and more steadfastly on His glory displayed in the gospel"—WESLEY.

But we all with unveiled face reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit (R. V.). BEET says: "This verse reveals the infinite value of persevering Christian contemplation. As we continue looking into the gospel mirror there rises before us with increasing clearness an image in which are combined every element of moral grandeur in its highest degree, the image of the GOD-MAN. As we contemplate it we feel its power (for it is a living and life-giving image of the Lord of the Spirit), and ourselves are changed, in a manner corresponding with Christ's gifts of the Spirit, into a likeness of Him at whom we gaze." WAITE says: "The idea apparently is that the glorified Saviour is realised by the spiritual vision as clearly as in a burnished mirror (ch. 3. 14)." And NEWMAN, who regards the verse as expressing the devotional spirit of the people of God, adds: "As speech is the organ of human society, and the means of human civilisation, so is prayer the instrument of Divine fellowship and Divine training."

CHAPTER IV.

1. Therefore having this ministry—spoken of, 2 Cor. 3. 6—as we have received mercy—"have been mercifully supported in all our trials—we faint not—we desist not in any degree from our glorious enterprise"—WESLEY.

The first two verses of this chapter contain the principles of the Christian ministry; they embrace its motives—a sense of mercy and a sense of hope; they declare its straightforwardness, its scorn of craft and secresy, its rejection of pious frauds and adroit casuistry; and they show that its influence is moral, and not official. The same topic and reasoning are continued to ver. 7. The persons addressed are still those whom he hopes to save from Judaism, and to whom therefore he must justify fully his apostleship and his mode of exercising it. On this account, i.e. because of the transcendent superiority of his ministry, holding it not by self-appointment, but having received it, utterly unworthy as he was (1 Cor. 15. 9), by an act of God's mercy, he does not fail in the courage which both the mercy and the ministry demand of him. He claims for his office all the glory that belongs to it, and he preaches boldly the pure gospel, whatever it may cost him (ch. 3. 12).

2. But have renounced—"set at open defiance—the hidden things of shame—all things which men need to hide, or to be ashamed of. Not walking in craftiness—using no disguise, subtlety, guile. Nor privily corrupting the pure word of God—by additions or alterations, or by attempting to accommodate it to the taste of the hearers"—WESLEY.

"The truth appeals to every conscience, however wicked or ignorant. For it sets forth and agrees with the spiritual realities of every man's own heart, and proclaims that which every man's heart knows to be true. For the written Law accords with the law written in the heart; and the gospel accords with man's need of salvation. Otherwise there would be no hope for the unsaved"—BEET.

"But by manifestation of the truth—i.e. by bringing the truth clearly and plainly to light, without any attempt at concealment—commending. The word 'commending' has here obviously the same signification as 'recommend'—this cannot be said of ch. 3—to every man's conscience. The individual conscience is, and always must be, the ultimate tribunal to which all teaching must appeal, and S. Paul assumes that in it there resides a faculty of appreciating and acknowledging truth"—LIAS. "A pure conscience hath a witness in every man's bosom. (See. 1 Cor. 14. 24)"—TRAPP.

3. But if our gospel also—"as well as the Law of Moses"—WESLEY.

But and if our gospel is vailed, it is vailed in them that are perishing. The apostle here refers to an objection, "You say that a vail lay upon the hearts of the Jews when Moses was read. But your gospel is not clear and evident to all." For his answer see next note. It is hid to them that are lost—lit. "is hidden among the perishing." Our gospel is hid too, in some cases, I grant. But it is hid only in perishing souls, who will not lay hold on the only hope of deliverance. (Comp. John 3. 18; Acts 4. 12.) This is not the language of logic, but of deep and strong conviction.

4. The god of this world. "What a sublime and horrible description of Satan! He is indeed the god of all that believe not, and works in them with inconceivable energy. Hath blinded—not only veiled, the eye of their understanding. Illumination — is properly the reflection or propagation of light, from those who are already enlightened, to others. Who is the image of God. Hence also we may understand how great is the glory of Christ. He that sees the Son sees the Father in the face of Christ. The Son exactly exhibits the Father to us"—WESLEY.

"It is the worldly heart which hides the truth. The light of the glorious gospel is shut out by ourselves from our lives, apart from immorality, apart even from actual sin. For worldliness is distinct from sin, and the denunciation of it is peculiar to Christianity. It does not consist in distinct acts, nor in thoughts of transgression, but it is the spirit of a whole life, which hides all that is invisible, real, and eternal, because it is devoted to the transient and the unreal. Christ and the world cannot exist in the same heart. Men who find their all in the world—how can they, fevered by its business, excited by its pleasures, petrified by its maxims, see God in His purity, or comprehend the calm radiance of eternity?"—ROBERTSON. "Satan obtained the world by conquest; but conquest is a cracked title. A thief is not the more honest because he was able to force the poor traveller to deliver his purse; and a thief on the throne, like Satan, is no better than a private one on the road"—GURNALL.

5. For—"the fault is not in us, neither in the doctrine they hear from us—we preach not ourselves—as able either to enlighten, or pardon, or sanctify you—but Jesus Christ—as your only wisdom, righteousness, sanctification. And ourselves your servants—ready to do the meanest offices—for Jesus' sake—not for honour, interest, or pleasure"—WESLEY.

For we preach not ourselves. "A reason is here given for the foregoing statement. If S. Paul's gospel be hid, it is not because it is his own, and therefore destined to come to nought. (See ch. 3. 7.) No, it is the gospel of Christ which he preaches, and if any refuse to listen to it, it is because he has suffered himself to be blinded by the devil"—C. B. "We are to preach, not the Christ of this sect or of that man, but Christ fully—Christ our Hope and Pattern and Life—Christ in us, the Light which is in every man subjectively; and Christ the Light which, shining objectively in His life, and death, and resurrection, daily increases, as we gaze; the light of the Christ within us"—ROBERTSON. And ourselves your servants—"the original is stronger, 'and ourselves your slaves'—he does not say 'the slaves of Jesus,' but what is by far more humble and lowly, 'your slaves.' 'Yet that he may not appear to speak or think in too abject a strain, for Jesus' sake' (ESTIUS)"—C. B.

For God hath shined in our hearts—"the hearts of all those whom the god of this world no longer blinds. God who is Himself our Light; not only the Author of light, but also the Fountain of it. To enlighten us with the knowledge of the glory of God—of His glorious love and of His glorious image—in the face of Jesus Christ—which reflects His glory in another manner than the face of Moses did"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul states the reason why it is impossible for him to preach himself in any other capacity than that of a servant, or to preach anyone else except Christ as Lord. The allusion to his conversion is obvious. The scales which fell from his bodily eyes at Damascus were but types of those which fell from his spirit. What was revealed to him was the glory of God in the face of Christ, God's image, whom he saw in His glorified form at his conversion. The express object which the shining of God in his heart had was the illumining or the luminous diffusion amongst men of the knowledge of this glory. (See Acts 9. 15, and comp. Gal. 1. 16.) When God had so converted him, and so disclosed to him the object of his conversion, how could he do otherwise than preach Christ as Lord, and the express image of the Father's perfection, or himself as anything else than the servant of the Church for Christ's sake!"—S. C. "In the face of Jesus Christ. The same word is used here as in ch. 2. 10. See note on the words 'image of God,' above. 'A notable place, whence we learn that God is not to be investigated in His unsearchable height, for He inhabits the light unapproachable (1 Tim. 6. 16), but to be known as far as He reveals Himself in Christ. It is more useful for us to behold God as He appears in His only-begotten Son, than to investigate His secret essence' (CALVIN)"—C. B.

7. But we—"not only the apostles, but all true believers—have this treasure—of Divine light, love, glory—in earthen vessels—in frail, feeble, perishing bodies. He proceeds to show that afflictions, yea death itself, are so far from hindering the ministration of the Spirit, that they even further it, sharpen the ministers, and increase the fruit. That the excellence of the power—which works these in us—may undeniably appear to be of God"—WESLEY.

"The treasure is the glorious ministry described in the last verse, not excluding the glory which he has in common with all believers, according to ch. 3. 18. The earthenware vessel, which is not the whole man (ver. 16), but only the body, expresses the absence of beauty and solidity, such as belongs to vessels of gold and silver, and the liability to defacement, breakage, and destruction. This does not imply a general baseness of the body. Christianity insists upon the true dignity of the body, which is the sanctuary of the Holy Ghost here, and destined to glory hereafter. God intended that the power should be His, for had He used as His ministers the great ones of the earth, it might have seemed that the gospel was established by human agency. But it was clear that the work was God's, when the organs employed were frail and worn"—S. C. "In a leathern purse may be a precious pearl"—TRAPP.

8. We are troubled, etc. "The four articles in this verse respect inward, the four in the next outward, afflictions. In each clause the former part shows the 'earthen vessels,' the latter 'the excellence of the power.' Not crushed—not swallowed up in care and anxiety. Perplexed—what course to take, but never despairing of His power and love to carry us through"—WESLEY.

Of these verses (8–9), BEET says: "We have a description of the weakness of the earthenware vessels, and of their preservation. Helpless—confined in narrow space. (Same word in ch. 6. 12; Rom. 2. 9.) This verse proves that it denotes something worse than afflicted. At every point difficulties press upon them; but they are not without way of escape. Perplexed—not knowing which way to go, seeing no way open to them. Utterly perplexed—same word as 'without way of escape' in ch. 1. 8. Although there seemed to be no way open to them, they were not absolutely without a way. This is not contradicted, but confirmed, by ch. 1. 8. From their own point of view there was then no way of escape: but God made one. Pursued—as in Rom. 12. 14. Not deserted, 'or not left behind in' peril—not abandoned to their pursuers. (Comp. Heb. 13. 5.) Thrown down—as if in their flight. Not perishing—a last triumphant denial. Notice the climax. At every step they are heavily pressed; but their path is not hedged up. Enemies pursue them; but they are not left alone in their flight. They fall; but even then they survive."

10. Always—"wherever we go—bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus—continually expecting to lay down our lives like Him—that the life of Jesus might be manifested in our body also—that we may also rise and be glorified like Him"—WESLEY.

"While apparently continuing the description of his hardships S. Paul now explains their relation to the sufferings of Christ, and then states their Divine purpose. Always—parallel to 'in everything' (ver. 8)—the putting to death—the whole process which ended in the death of Christ—carrying about, etc., explained in ver. 11, 'given up to death because of Jesus.' S. Paul's hardships and deadly peril arose from the same cause as those which led Christ to the cross; and were, therefore, in some sense, a repetition and reproduction of them. In order that, etc., lays stress on the Divine purpose of those perils. Also the life—the resurrection life, placed in conspicuous contrast to the death, of Christ. Made manifest. S. Paul's body, rescued by God's power from deadly peril, was a conspicuous picture of Jesus alive after He had been put to death. For the miraculous power which raised Christ from the grave saved S. Paul from going down into it (comp. ch. 13. 4). It was a picture of His life; in order that thus the power (ver. 7) of God might be manifested"—BEET. "The life of Jesus dwelling in the hearts of His saints is shown in the power they possess of enduring, in their often feeble frames, sufferings and toils such as might daunt the strongest men, as well as in the unselfishness which welcomes such sufferings and toils for the glory of God and the well-being of man.

Meyer cites Ignatius, 'If we do not of our own accord accept death after the manner of His passion, His life is not in us.'"

11. For we who yet live—"who are not yet killed for the testimony of Jesus—are always delivered unto death—are perpetually in the very jaws of destruction, which we willingly submit to, that we may 'obtain a better resurrection'"—WESLEY.

"Always, which is emphatic, and begins the verse in the original, shows more distinctly that the being put to death is not a thing undergone once for all, but a continually renewed process. He dies daily. We the living, which is rather more pointed than 'we which live,' serves in part the same purpose, signifying that he is maintained in life only to be handed over to death again. The original word for are delivered is the same which is used of Judas Iscariot's 'handing over' Jesus to His Roman executioners. Christ applies it both to Himself and His disciples. (Luke 21. 12.) It means strictly 'are being handed over.' The strong phrase, in our mortal flesh, is in an emphatic position at the end of the verse, and, substituted for 'in our body' of ver. 10, indicates how deeply the resurrection-life of Christ penetrated in the apostle's physical organism. It communicated a living power and a kind of imperishableness to the very substance of the body, to the flesh which is essentially mortal and corruptible'"—S. C.

12. So then death worketh in us, life in you. "You live in peace; we die daily. Yet—living or dying, so long as we believe, we cannot but speak"—WESLEY.

"Death—the abstract principle personified. In the plots and attacks of enemies 'death' was active, stretching out its hand to take them. And in their spared life, preserved by God's power and spent in proclaiming the gospel, the abstract principle of life was at work among their hearers. The preachers daily felt themselves sinking into the grave; and their daily deliverance was daily working eternal life among their converts"—BEET.

13. Having the same spirit of faith—"which animated the saints of old, David in particular, when he said, I believed, and therefore have I spoken—that is, I trusted in God, and therefore He hath put this song of praise in my mouth. We also speak—we preach the gospel, even in the midst of affliction and death, because we believe that God will raise us up from the dead, and will present us, ministers with you, all His members, 'faultless before His presence with exceeding joy'"—WESLEY.

"We having the same spirit of faith. The idea of boldness and outspokenness is still present with the apostle. He speaks openly, because he has reason to believe what he says. And the thought is connected with the last verse by the fact that it is to his speaking that the Corinthians owe their life. The 'same spirit' means the spirit that dwelt in the Psalmist. According as it is written. (See Ps. 116. 10.) The Psalmist was 'sore troubled,' but his faith enabled him to triumph over affliction and to declare the loving-kindness of the Lord. A similar faith enabled S. Paul and his fellow-labourers to declare the good tidings of Christ, though encompassed by infirmity and trouble"—LIAS. "The writer had been in imminent peril of life, and in consequence of his belief in God's protection, he spake in prayer for deliverance. Having obtained it, he proclaimed the mercy and righteousness of God, and declared that he should be well-pleasing to God in the land of the living. Similarly the apostle, having faith, confirmed by experience, that he will be delivered from his deadly trials further to serve God in the land of the living, does not allow his sufferings to stop his speaking"—S. C.

14. Knowing that He which raised up the Lord Jesus. Here we have the source of the apostle's faith and confidence. He knew that the resurrection of Christ was an accomplished fact. Hence arose his persuasion that a life was given to him which should survive and overcome even death itself. By Jesus. All recent editors substitute "with Jesus," which, however, does not mean at the same time with, but by virtue of the operation of the same life and spirit. For the life that dwells in Jesus dwells also in His disciples. (John 6. 54.) We are the members, Christ the Head; we are the crop, "Christ the first-fruits." (1 Cor. 15. 23.) (Comp. Rom. 1. 4, as well as ch. 3. 17, 18, and Eph. 2. 5, 6; Col. 2. 13.) Chrysostom omits the words altogether. Meyer remarks that though S. Paul believed that he and the majority of his readers would live to see the actual coming of Christ in the flesh, the possibility that this might not be the case was ever before his eyes. (See 1 Cor. 15. 51; 1 Thess. 4. 15.)

15. For all things—"whether adverse or prosperous — are for your sakes — for the profit of all that believe, as well as all that preach. That the overflowing grace—which continues you alive both in soul and body—might abound—yet more through the thanksgiving of many — for thanksgiving invites more abundant grace"—WESLEY.

"The statement resembles that of ch. 1. 6, and the object which God has in view is the same with that described in the latter part of ch. 1. 2. The grace is the continual deliverance from death, as is the gift in ch. 1. 12. Its having abounded consists in its being ample and always vouchsafed. The original means, 'having come to greater increase.' The longer he is spared, the greater will be the number of persons won to Christ, or confirmed in Christ, and the greater the company of thanksgivers. The rendering of thanks and glory to God, for the inestimable benefits received through Christ, implies the restoration of the true relation between God and man, and is, according to the apostle's view, the end and aim of everything in this world"—S. C.

16. Therefore—"because of this grace—we faint not. The outward man — the body. The inward man—the soul"—WESLEY.

The phrase outward man occurs only here. The "inward man" is spoken of in Rom. 7. 2, and Eph. 3. 16. In both passages it denotes not the whole of man's immaterial nature, but its highest part, through which he is receptive of Divine influences, of illumination, and of becoming a "new creature." The idea of "renewal" occurs in three other places in S. Paul—Rom. 12. 2; Eph. 4. 23; Col. 3. 2. The meaning here is not that he is receiving new supplies of resolution, courage, energy, enabling him to continue his work with intensified vigour, but that the spiritual man, according to Col. 3. 10, is renewed . . . according to the image of Him that created him. PETER MARTYR, dying, said: "My body is weak, my mind is well, well for the present, and it will be better hereafter." "There are some men to whom this hope is impossible. There are some who live a merely human life; and life merely as such, since it does not necessarily imply immortality, produces no inward certainty of an existence beyond the grave. But S. Paul, beset by persecution, the martyr of the cross, daily flying for his life, drew immortal comforts out of all his trials. Every peril, every decay of the outward, strengthened in him that inward man 'risen with Christ,' which is the earnest of our immortal life"—ROBERTSON.

17. Our light affliction. "The beauty and sublimity of S. Paul's expressions here, as descriptive of heavenly glory, opposed to temporal afflictions, surpass all imagination, and cannot be preserved in any translation or paraphrase, which after all must sink infinitely below the astonishing original"—WESLEY.

"The explanation of these two opposite processes going on simultaneously is that the same affliction, which works the physical waste, works also the spiritual renewal. It is almost impossible to reproduce the force of the original, in which the language labours under the load of glory. The momentary lightness of our affliction worketh for us, in a surpassing manner, to a surpassing result, an eternal weight of glory. Affliction, generally regarded as a load, has here the quality of lightness. Glory, generally regarded as an ethereal splendour, is a weight. The affliction is not light in itself, but only when put in the balance with the weight; nor momentary in itself, but only when set against eternity. (Rom. 8. 17, 18, is the parallel to this passage; comp. Heb. 2. 9, 10.) Compensation for affliction does not seem to be any part of the meaning; he is speaking rather of the immediate communication of Christ's spirit and life to those who bear His sufferings, which, in the forthcoming kingdom, will reveal itself in glory"—WAITE. "Worketh for us. If our dear Lord did not put these thorns into our bed, we should sleep out our lives and lose our glory: affliction calls to us as the angel to Elijah, 'Up,' thou hast a great way to go. A far more exceeding—words are too weak to express heaven's happiness"—TRAPP.

18. The things that are seen — "men, money, things of earth. The things that are not seen—God, grace, heaven"—WESLEY.

"At the things which are not seen. The Christian habitually views all that comes before him from the standpoint of the invisible world, which is revealed to him by the spirit from within. (See 1 Cor. 2. 9, 10, 13; 1 John 4. 5, 6; also Heb. 11. 1.) For the things which are seen are temporal—rather, 'temporary,' i.e. they last, and are intended to last, but a season. But the things which are not seen are eternal. Here was the secret of the apostle's confidence. The invisible truths of which he was persuaded, which lay at the root of the resurrection of Christ, and therefore of the moral strength he felt within him, and was enabled to impart to others, rested upon no uncertain basis, but upon the unchangeable will of the Eternal God"—LIAS. "The things which are seen are this visible world with its circumstances and experiences, whether they bring with them earthly good, or such evil as extreme bodily suffering. The things which are not seen are the future kingdom, with all its glorious circumstances and mode of existence, not excluding the body of glory itself. The reason for fixing the view upon the things not seen, and averting it from the seen, is that the gaze at the eternal qualifies, the gaze at the temporary disqualifies, men for glory"—S. C.

CHAPTER V.

1. Our earthly house—"which is only a tabernacle, or tent, not designed for a lasting habitation"—WESLEY.

"For we know. This verse gives the reason for what has gone before. 'We are consoled in our present afflictions, sustained in our hope of future glory, supported in our conviction that what is visible is speedily to be replaced by what is eternal, by the knowledge, spiritually acquired, that God has prepared a spiritual body (1 Cor. 15. 44) to replace the present frail and temporary habitation of the soul.' Calvin remarks that this, with S. Paul, is not a matter of opinion or belief, but of actual knowledge, a boast which no heathen dare have made. Our earthly house of this tabernacle—earthly, not earthy. That which exists upon the earth, not what is made of earth. (Comp. 1 Cor. 15. 40 and 47; see also John 3. 12; Phil. 2. 10.) House of this tabernacle is better rendered 'tabernacle-house.' Stanley suggests our English word 'tenement' as best expressing the idea of the original, and supposes the Greek word to have been suggested to S. Paul by his Cilician house, as well as by his occupation of tent-making. (Acts 18. 3.) A similar expression is found in 2 Pet. 1. 13, and in Wisd. 9. 15"—C. B. "For we know—not we think, or hope only; this is the triumph of trust; this is, as Latimer calls it, 'the sweetmeats of the feast of a good conscience.' There are other dainty dishes in this feast, but this is the banquet"—TRAPP. "A house not made with hands—not as contrasted with the earthly body, which is also 'not made with hand,' but with other houses which are made with hand"—ALFORD. The expression is used to mark the Divine origin of the spiritual body. "It cannot be questioned that there is a deep and wide testimony in man's nature to the existence of a God, and of a future life; it may be pronounced either true or false, but it must be admitted to exist"—KER. "Man is, by the terms of his existence, a being of eternity, and he cannot unmake himself"—LIDDON.

2. Desiring to be clothed upon. "This body, which is now covered with flesh and blood, with the glorious house which is from heaven. Instead of flesh and blood, which cannot enter heaven, the rising body will be clothed or covered with what is analogous thereto, but incorruptible and immortal. Macarius speaks largely of this"—WESLEY.

"Argument of vers. 2-4.—By Christians now death is looked upon without terrible recoil, as being the only entrance into life. We bow to the inevitable. But in the early Christians the possibility of surviving the coming of Christ woke up with new intensity man's natural love of life, and made death seem very dark. They therefore longed eagerly for Christ's return, hoping thus to clothe themselves with immortal raiment, without laying aside their mortal bodies. This yearning for an immortal body, S. Paul felt to be Divinely implanted, and therefore not doomed to disappointment. But the possibility of death to S. Paul was too real to be ignored. Therefore, in view of it, his yearning for an immortal body assured him that if his present body be removed by death a heavenly body awaits him. For, otherwise, he will stand before Christ as a naked spirit, in utter contradiction to yearnings which he felt to be Divine, and of whose realisation he had a Divine pledge. Thus a purely human instinct, not weakened but intensified by Christianity, and sanctified by the felt presence of the Holy Spirit, is seen to be a prophecy of God's purpose concerning us"—BEET. "The flesh will not be annihilated, but spiritualised, glorified, and beautified, as the human body of Christ was at the transfiguration"—S. JEROME.

3. If being clothed—"that is, with the image of God, while we are in the body. We shall not be found naked—of the wedding garment"—WESLEY.

"If Christ shall find him at His advent not divested of his natural body by death, but still alive, his assumption of the new body will be a super-investment, a process like that of putting on an upper garment"—S. C.

4. We groan, being burdened. "The apostle speaks with exact propriety. A burden naturally expresses groans. And we are here burdened with numberless afflictions, infirmities, temptations. Not that we would be unclothed—not that we desire to remain without a body. Faith does not understand that philosophical contempt of what the wise Creator has given. But clothed upon—with the glorious, immortal, incorruptible, spiritual body. That what is mortal—this present mortal body—may be swallowed up of life—covered with that which lives for ever"—WESLEY.

"Not for that we would be unclothed, etc.—that is, it is not that we are to get rid of something, but to gain something. Not the lowering of the body, but the strengthening of the spirit—that is spirituality. S. Paul taught that the true way of mortifying the flesh is to strengthen the spirit. The mortal will disappear in the elevation of the immortal. It is quite possible that men might conceive (of the future state) as a disembodied state, and suppose the apostle to represent life in a visible form as a degradation"—ROBERTSON. "Such was the view of Greek philosophers almost without exception (see note on 1 Cor. 15. 12). S. Paul, affirming the old Jewish view that God had created all things, and made them very good, entirely repudiates this doctrine, and declares that he does not desire separation from the body, but only its spiritualisation. 'S. Paul regards it as an especial happiness not to taste death, not to be obliged to put off this body, but to be glorified living like Elijah, drawing the heavenly body over the present mortal body as a garment, yet in such a manner that the mortal body is absorbed in the nature of the spiritual body' (OLSHAUSEN). So TERTULLIAN, 'not as wishing to undergo death, but that death should be anticipated by life.' The whole passage should be compared with 1 Cor. 15. 35-54. That mortality might be swallowed up of life—i.e. 'covered over and arrayed in the vesture of immortality' (TERTULLIAN). 'Mortality' should rather be rendered 'what is mortal'"—C. B.

5. Now He that hath wrought us to this very thing—"this longing for immortality—is God. For none but God, none less than the Almighty, could have wrought this in us"—WESLEY.

"The Holy Spirit in S. Paul's heart was a pledge that the promise he had believed would be fulfilled, and was thus an earnest of the coming inheritance. (Comp. Eph. 1. 16.) Since S. Paul's clinging to his present body while yearning for a better is introduced merely in proof that if he die, there awaits him a body from heaven, the words this very thing refer probably only to the yearning for the heavenly body, without reference to his reluctance to die"—BEET.

6. Therefore we behave undauntedly—"but most of all when we have death in view; knowing that our greatest happiness lies beyond the grave"—WESLEY.

Being therefore always of good courage (R.V.). "We are confident, therefore, or courageous in all dangers and sufferings, and dare venture even upon death itself, knowing that while we sojourn in the body, we are absent, 'we are exiles,' from Christ, in the enjoyment of whom our chief happiness consists"—BENSON. "We are absent from the Lord. God is present with all mankind, because He sustains them by His power; He dwells in them, because 'in Him they live, and move, and have their being.' He is present with His faithful ones by the greater energy of His Spirit; He lives in them, dwells in their midst, and so within them. But in the meantime He is absent from us, in that He does not yet present Himself to be seen face to face; because as yet we are exiles from His kingdom, and lack the blessed immortality which the angels, who are with Him, are privileged to enjoy"—CALVIN.

7. "For we cannot clearly see Him in this life, wherein we walk by faith only—an evidence, indeed, that necessarily implies a kind of 'seeing Him who is invisible,' yet as far beneath what we shall have in eternity, as it is above that of bare, unassisted reason"—WESLEY.

"In the government of the world it is the things unseen that are the motives of obedience. And God will have it that you shall believe His promises if ever you will have the benefit, and believe His threatenings if ever you will escape the threatened evil"—BAXTER. "The objects which direct our steps do not yet appear. We walk amid eternal realities, now unseen, but known through the word we have believed. Chief among these is our home in the presence of Christ. Hence we speak of a home unseen by mortal eye. Same thought in same connection in Rom. 8. 24"—BEET.

8. Present with the Lord. "This demonstrates that the happiness of the saints is not deferred till the resurrection"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul had established in his mind such a clear conviction of the invisible world, of the redeemed beyond this life, that it had become a refuge to him. This world could not touch him. He had the power of losing himself in that other world. By faith he rose into the bright and heavenly sphere"—BEECHER.

"This verse and vers. 6, 7, shed light on a matter of which the Bible says little, the state of the saved between death and the resurrection. For S. Paul evidently thinks of no alternative except to be at home in the body and at home in the Lord. Therefore departed believers are with Christ; and if so, not unconscious; for the unconscious are practically nowhere. Their nearness to Christ is such that, compared with it, their present spiritual union with Him is absence. And, although they have not yet entered their 'eternal house' and put on their heavenly clothing, yet in the presence of Christ they are 'at home.' And their eternal intercourse with Christ (1 Thess. 4. 17) has begun"—BEET.

9. Therefore we are ambitious—"the only ambition which has place in a Christian. Whether present—in the body—or absent—from it"—WESLEY.

Wherefore also we make it our aim, whether at home or absent, to be well-pleasing unto Him (R.V.). "S. Paul worked, knowing that the night was coming. That spirit which characterised his Master was remarkable in him. His was not the service of the slave; it was the joyous service of the freeman. He was not working to win life, but because he had life; he was labouring in love to please God"—ROBERTSON.

10. For we all—"apostles as well as other men, whether now present in the body, or absent from it—must appear—openly, without covering, where all hidden things will be revealed; probably the sins even of the faithful, which were forgiven long before. For many of their good works, as their repentance, their revenge against sin, cannot otherwise appear. But this will be done at their own desire, without grief, and without shame. According to what he hath done in the body, whether good or evil. In the body he did either good or evil; in the body he is recompensed accordingly"—WESLEY.

For we must all be made manifest before the judgment seat of Christ (R.V.). "God will call His servants to give account of their time, their talents, and all the offices and trusts of life. Therefore while we are absent in the body, we labour the more to be accepted of Him"—SUTCLIFFE. "It is natural to try and please God when present with Him. But even when absent, Christians do not forget that He will judge them. Before the judgment-seat of Christ. (Comp. Matt. 25. 31-46; Rom. 14. 10.) Observe that 'God' is the word used in the latter passage, as though 'the two ideas were convertible'"—STANLEY. "The judgment-seat, in the New Testament, is used of the judge's seat, which, in the Roman basilica or judgment-hall, was 'a lofty seat, raised on an elevated platform,' so that the figure of the judge must have been seen towering above the crowd which thronged the long nave of the building"—STANLEY. "This, he adds, was the most august representation of justice which the world at that time, or perhaps ever, exhibited"—C. B. "If men were absolved from the fear of judgment to come, no restraint would be strong enough to bridle the impetuous resolutions of his depraved will"—BATES. The things done in the body—"that is, the just reward of those things. Then shall a good conscience be more worth than all the world's good. Whether it be good or bad. Let us so live as those that must render an account of all"—TRAPP. This is the reason why Christians are to strive during the present life to be pleasing to God. Their wages in the next world shall be according to their acts in this. (Comp. Rom. 2. 5-10; 1 Thess. 4. 6; Jude 14, 15.)

11. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we—"the more earnestly persuade men to seek His favour; and as God knoweth this, so, I trust, ye know it in your own consciences"—WESLEY.

Knowing therefore the fear of the Lord (R.V.). "Assurance, so intimately connected with the love of God, is equally connected with the love of man. Knowing the awful situation of the impenitent at His bar, we persuade men—we risk all for their salvation. The world accounted this extraordinary zeal—fanaticism; but if the apostles were beside themselves, it was for the churches; it was that the rebellious world might be reconciled to God"—SUTCLIFFE. "When a man knows the terrors of the Lord, he 'persuades men.' Hence came the tears of Jeremiah; hence flowed the tears of Him who knew the doom of Jerusalem. Therefore, if in our tone there be anything denunciatory, threatening, may God give us the spirit to persuade! May He teach us to believe the terrors of which we speak! There is no perhaps. These are things which will be hereafter. You cannot alter the eternal laws. You cannot put your hand in the flame and not be burnt. You cannot sin in the body and escape the sin; for it goes inwards, becomes part of you, and is itself the penalty which cleaves for ever to your spirit. Sow in the flesh, and you will reap corruption. Yield to passion, and it becomes your tyrant and your torment. Be sensual, self-indulgent, indolent, worldly, hard—oh! they all have their corresponding penalties: Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap"—ROBERTSON. "The thought of the future punishment for the wicked, which the Bible reveals, is enough to make an earthquake of terror in every man's soul. I do not accept the doctrine of eternal punishment because I delight in it. I would cast in doubts, if I could, till I had filled hell up to the brim. I would destroy all faith in it; but that would do me no good; I could not destroy the thing. The exposition of future punishment, in God's word, is not to be regarded as a threat, but as a merciful declaration. If, in the ocean of life, over which we are bound to eternity, there are these rocks and shoals, it is no cruelty to chart them down; it is an eminent and prominent mercy"—BEECHER.

12. "We do not say this, as if we thought there was any need of again recommending ourselves to you, but to give you an occasion of rejoicing and praising God, and to furnish you with an answer to those false apostles who glory in appearance, but not in heart, being condemned by their own conscience"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul has just appealed to God and the consciences of his readers, and these are precisely the tribunals to which a self-commender does not appeal. So the thought, We are not commending ourselves again, suggested itself very naturally. The rendering is, Who boast in person, not in heart, and the sense, that they boast of things which lie upon the surface and make up only the outer and apparent man, not those qualities which constitute the inner, moral, spiritual Christian man"—S. C. "The false teachers gloried 'in appearance,' in outward demonstration, in dazzling credentials, such as eloquence, or prided themselves in a superabundance of spiritual gifts. On the contrary, S. Paul says that the true apostolic credentials are those of the heart; and, accordingly, the proofs he had given were—his truth, his sufferings, his persuasiveness, his simplicity, his boldness, and his life, as being an image of Christ's"—ROBERTSON.

13. For if we are transported beyond ourselves—"or at least, appear so to others, treated of, vers. 15-21, speaking or writing with uncommon vehemence—it is to God. He understands (if men do not) the emotion which Himself inspires. If we be sober—treated of, ch. 6. 1-10—if I proceed in a more calm, sedate manner—it is for your sakes. Even good men bear this, rather than the other method, in their teachers. But these must obey God, whoever is offended by it"—WESLEY.

Of sober mind (R.V.). "He sums up his whole existence under two forms of manifestation, of which one is what his enemies called his madness, the other what he calls his sober sanity. He would have them argue against his enemies thus, 'Whatever you may think of Paul he has but two ends in view. His life is devoted, in one aspect of it, to God and His glory: in another, to us and to our salvation'"—S. C. "There are cases in which it is wise for a Christian to vindicate himself against false charges; there are others in which it is wiser to restrain himself, and to remain silent. There are some charges of a nature so delicate, complicated, and shadowy, that public defence leaves the matter worse than before. It is better, then, to let time defend you. For there are cases in which dignified silence is the Christian's only defence. So it was in our Saviour's life. Men misinterpreted His words, and blackened His reputation. How was He to answer? Was He to go into the petty charges one by one? or was He to leave time and God to defend His cause? He was sober for our cause"—ROBERTSON.

14. For the love of Christ—"to us, and our love to Him—constraineth us—both to the one and the other; beareth us on with such a strong, steady, prevailing influence, as winds and tides exert when they waft the vessel to its destined harbour. While we thus judge, that if Christ died for all, then are all, even the best of men, naturally dead—in a state of spiritual death, and liable to death eternal. For had any man been otherwise, Christ had not needed to have died for him"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul says, the Christian is constrained by love to act. And why? Because God has taught him that it is beautiful and right to do so, and because God has made the love of Christ paramount in his heart to all other love. Let us make, therefore, a distinction. When we say that a Christian is free from the law, we do not mean that he may break it, or not, as he likes. We mean that he is bound to do right by a nobler tie than 'you must.' Christian liberty, then, is a loving servitude to God"—ROBERTSON. "Love to Christ is an abiding motive. It is neither a fancy, nor a sentiment, nor an evanescent emotion. It is a principle—calm, steady, undecaying. Of all principles, a high-principled affection to the Saviour is the steadiest and most secure. Other incentives to action are apt to alter or lose their influence altogether"—HAMILTON. "The New Testament teaches something beyond morality—as much beyond it as the blossom is beyond the leaf, namely, the soul's vital connection with the Lord Jesus Christ"—BEECHER.

15. And that He died for all—"that all might be saved. That they who live—that all who live upon the earth—should not henceforth—from the moment they know Him—live unto themselves—seek their own honour, profit, pleasure,—but unto Him—in all righteousness and true holiness"—WESLEY.

"Such is the Christian law of sacrifice: to present our bodies and souls to Christ as a living offering. It is no longer the law of nature which rules our life, no longer self-preservation, self-indulgence; but it is self-surrender towards God and towards man"—ROBERTSON. "Christ, by His death, escaped completely from the burden and the curse of sin. S. Paul reckons, therefore, that the former life of sin of those for whom Christ died, has come to an end on His cross, and that, like Him, they too are dead to sin. (See Rom. 6. 10.) Objectively and virtually they died to sin when Christ died: they died subjectively and actually, only, when, and so far as in faith, they pronounced, touching themselves, the judgment of this verse, i.e. when they reckoned themselves to be dead to sin. S. Paul says that all died, because the subjective and actual death to sin of those who dare pronounce this judgment is a direct outworking and communication of the objective and historic death of Christ and of our divinely-ordained union with His death—Christ died in order that we may live a life in which every thought and purpose and effort point to Him, and all our powers and opportunities are used to please and exalt Him and to do His work. Thus Christ will be, what self once was, the one aim of life"—BEET.

16. So that we from this time—"that we knew the love of Christ—know no one—neither ourselves, nor you, neither the rest of the apostles (Gal. 2. 6), nor any other person. After the flesh—according to his former state, country, descent, nobility, riches, power, wisdom. We fear not the great. We regard not the rich or wise. We account not the least less than ourselves. We consider all, only in order to save all. Who is he that thus 'knows no one after the flesh'? In what land do these Christians live? Yea, if we have known even Christ after the flesh—so as to love Him barely with a natural love, so as to glory in having conversed with Him on earth, so as to expect only temporal benefits from Him"—WESLEY.

"Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh—i.e. 'we regard no man from a purely fleshly point of view, but look upon him as endowed with a new vital principle from above which has changed his heart.' (Comp. ver. 17; Rom. 8. 1–11; 1 Cor. 2. 10–16.) 'Even in Christ a transition took place analogous to that which happened to man in regeneration. In the resurrection the life according to the flesh passed over into a life according to the Spirit' (OLSHAUSEN). 'He who knows no man after the flesh has entirely lost sight in the case of a Jew, for example, of his Jewish origin, in the case of a rich man of his riches, in that of a learned man of his learning, in that of a slave of his slavery, and so on' (MEYER). (Comp. Matt. 2. 9; John 8. 39; Rom. 2. 28, 29; 10. 12; 1 Cor. 12. 13; Gal. 3. 28; Col. 3. 11.) Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh—i.e. from a purely human point of view, as the Son of David simply (Rom. 1. 3), not as the Incarnate Son of God, the Divine Word. S. Paul, and many others of the first preachers of the faith (comp. Acts 1. 6), had started with such carnal conceptions, but they had disappeared before the light of God's truth"—C. B. "S. Paul cannot refer to his no longer knowing Christ according to the flesh. Surely this would not need emphatic and contrasted assertion. He simply repeats the general assertion, which is the chief matter of this verse. In consequence of S. Paul's judgment about the death of Christ, he no longer looks upon men according to their appearance in flesh and blood. Yet he admits that he did so once, even in the case of Christ. But so completely is he changed that, in spite of this aggravated case in his past life, he no longer knows men according to the flesh"—BEET.

17. Therefore if anyone be in Christ—"a true believer in Him—there is a new creation—only the power that makes a world can make a Christian. And when he is so created, the old things are passed away—of their own accord, even as snow in spring. Behold— the present, visible, undeniable change!—all things are become new—he has new life, new senses, new faculties, new affections, new appetites, new ideas and conceptions. His whole tenor of action and conversation is new, and he lives, as it were, in a new world. God, men, the whole creation, heaven, earth, and all therein, appear in a new light, and stand related to him in a new manner, since he was created anew in Christ Jesus"—WESLEY.

"Every sin is against a good man's nature; he is ill at ease when he has missed his prayers, he is amazed if he have fallen into error, he is infinitely ashamed of his imprudence; he remembers a sin as he thinks of an enemy, or the horrors of a midnight apparition; for all his capacities, his understanding, and his choosing faculties, are filled up with the opinions and persuasions, with the love and with the desires of God"—JEREMY TAYLOR. "He is a new creature. These words may be rendered, 'there is a new creature,' i.e. a new creation takes place within him. Whosoever is united to Christ by faith possesses in himself the gift of a Divine, regenerated, spiritual humanity, which Christ gives through His Spirit. (Comp. John 5. 21; 6. 33, 39, 40, 54, 57; 1 Cor. 15. 45; 1 Pet. 1. 3; 2. 2; and 2 Pet. 1. 4; also ch. 1. 21, 22; 3. 18; 4. 11; 5. 5.) This life, which he possessed not before, is in fact a new creation of the whole man, 'not to be distinguished from regeneration'"—MEYER. "What is the religion of too many? They are like machines, impelled by force; they are influenced only by external considerations. Their hearts are not engaged. Hence, in every religious exercise, they perform a task. They would love God much better, if He would excuse them from the hateful obligation. The obedience of the Christian is, in consequence of regeneration, natural; and hence it is pleasant and invariable"—JAY.

18. "And all these new things are from God, considered under this very notion, as reconciling us—the world (ver. 19)—to Himself"—WESLEY.

All the love of God is a flow of this Divine self-giving charity. Creation itself is sacrifice, the self-impartation of the Divine Being. "God is angry with the wicked. For Christ was the Representative of God under the name of humanity. Now Christ was angry. That, therefore, which God feels—or rather, the relation in which He stands towards sin—'corresponds with that which in pure humanity is the emotion of anger. No other word will then adequately represent God's feeling or rather attitude' (ROBERTSON). But the reconciliation was God's work of love, carried out by Jesus Christ, who came to reveal His nature and beneficial purposes to mankind, and to accomplish them by taking our mortal flesh, by His pure and stainless life, by His mysterious death upon the cross for our sakes, by His resurrection from the dead, as well as by His sending His Spirit to work out His blessed will in us. This is 'reconciliation by Jesus Christ.' The ministry of reconciliation—lit. 'the reconciliation,' i.e. that which has just been mentioned. (Comp. ch. 3. 3, where S. Paul describes the Corinthians as an epistle of Christ ministered by him with the Spirit of the living God.) The word ministry signifies service rendered freely, not of compulsion. It carries with it the idea of diligence, whatever derivation of the Greek word we take. It was the apostles' task, voluntarily undertaken by themselves, to proclaim the good tidings of reconciliation through Christ throughout the world, and thus to put it in men's power to accept and act upon it. Tyndale, followed by Cranmer and the Geneva Version, render 'and hath given unto us the office to preach the atonement'"—C. B.

19. Namely—the sum of which is, God—"the whole Godhead, but more eminently God the Father—was in Christ, reconciling the world—which was before at enmity with God—to Himself—so taking away that enmity, which could not otherwise be removed than by the blood of the Son of God"—WESLEY.

"God was in Christ reconciling—or 'that God in Christ was reconciling.' Either translation is grammatically and theologically admissible. The former translation, preferred by the Latin expositors, lays most stress upon the indwelling of God in Christ. (Comp. John 14. 10, 17.) The latter, which has found most favour among the Greek commentators, indicates the fact, not merely that God reconciled the world, but that the process of reconciliation was carried on 'in the person and work of Christ'"—MEYER. The world unto Himself. It is frequently declared in Scripture that God's purpose embraces all mankind ("the whole world," ALFORD). (Comp. John 1. 29; 3. 16; 4. 42; 5. 33; 1 Tim. 2. 4; 5. 10; 1 John 2. 2, etc.) "The way in which the text speaks of the reconciliation of God to us is, Not imputing their trespasses, for the atonement is made when God no longer reckons the sinner guilty. Here is the mystery of the atonement. God is reconciled to men for Christ's sake. Earnestly I insist that the atonement is through Christ. God is reconciled to humanity in Christ; then to us through Him. God was in Christ. It was a Divine humanity. To that humanity God is reconciled: there could be no enmity between God and Christ. To all those in whom Christ's Spirit is, God imputes the righteousness which is as yet only seminal, germinal: a seed, not a tree; a spring, not a river; an aspiration, not an attainment; a righteousness in faith, not a righteousness in works. We do not mean that each man reconciles himself as Christ did, by being righteous; but we mean that God views him favourably as partaking of that humanity which has been once exhibited on earth, a holy, perfect, and Divine thing"—ROBERTSON.

20. Therefore we are ambassadors for Christ—we beseech you in Christ's stead. "Herein the apostle might appear to some 'transported beyond himself.' In general he uses a more calm, sedate kind of exhortation, as in the beginning of the next chapter. What unparallelled condescension and Divine tender mercies are displayed in this verse! Did the judge ever beseech a condemned criminal to accept a pardon? Does the creditor ever beseech a ruined debtor to accept an acquittance in full? Yet our Almighty Lord, and our Eternal Judge, not only vouchsafes to offer these blessings, but invites us, entreats us, and with the most tender importunity solicits us not to reject them"—WESLEY.

"The apostle declares that it was on Christ's behalf that he was acting, i.e. in order that Christ might not fail to attain the object of his work; and that his mission was that of an ambassador, and that in this capacity he represented God. God is the author and giver of the reconciliation, men are the recipients. This language of the apostle supposes that the world is engaged in an unnatural and unprovoked rebellion against its Maker; that it is in His power to destroy sinners; that if He were to deal with them according to their deserts, this must be their portion; but that, through the mediation of His Son, He had, as it were, suspended hostilities, had sent His servants with words of peace, and had commissioned them to persuade, to entreat, and even to beseech them to be reconciled. And reconciliation to God includes everything that belongs to true conversion. It is the opposite of a state of alienation and enmity to Him (Col. 1. 21)"—FULLER.

21. He made Him a sin-offering, who knew no sin—"a commendation peculiar to Christ—for us—who knew no righteousness, who were inwardly and outwardly nothing but sin; who must have been consumed by the Divine justice, had not this atonement been made for our sins. That we might be made the righteousness of God through Him—might through Him be invested with that righteousness, first imputed to us, then implanted in us, which is in every sense the righteousness of God"—WESLEY.

S. Paul shows how strong an inducement to comply with his prayer he is empowered to hold out in his preaching, on account of the manner in which God's love and mercy established reconciliation. "For He hath made Him to be sin for us—lit. 'He made,' i.e. in the sacrifice on the cross. The word 'sin' has been variously explained as a 'sin-offering,' a sinner,' and so on. But it is best to take the word in its literal acceptation. 'He made Him to be sin,' i.e. appointed Him to be the Representative of sin and sinners, treated Him as sin and sinners are treated. (Comp. ver. 15.) He took on Himself to be the Representative of humanity in its aspect of sinfulness (comp. Rom. 8. 3; Phil. 2. 7), and to bear the burden of sin in all its completeness. Hence He won the right to represent humanity in all respects, and hence we are entitled to be regarded as God's righteousness (which He was), not in ourselves, but in Him as our Representative in all things"—C. B. Who knew no sin. (Comp. Heb. 4. 15; 1 Pet. 2. 22; 1 John 3. 5; John 8. 46.) "That we might be made, etc.—that is, that God might regard and treat us as though we were righteous, having a righteousness, not of our own, nor of the works of the Law, but yet a most real righteousness, of which God is the author and giver. The idea involved in the words 'in Him' is that of representation, as in ch. 4. 14, 'if One for all died, therefore all died.' The abstract terms sin and righteousness signify that there is no sin whatever of which Christ did not bear the guilt, nor any element of righteousness which believers do not obtain from God in Christ. He did not say righteous, but righteousness, and that the righteousness of God"—CHRYSOSTOM.

CHAPTER VI.

1. "We then not only beseech, but as fellow-labourers with you, who are working out your own salvation, do also exhort you, not to receive the grace of God—which we have been now describing—in vain. We receive it by faith; and not in vain, if we add to this persevering holiness"—WESLEY.

"That ye receive not the grace of God in vain—i.e. that ye make not His kindness in being reconciled to you through Jesus Christ useless by neglecting to walk according to the new life He hath given you in Him (ch. 5. 17). That even the new life itself may be so received as to make its reception useless is clear from the words, 'Every branch in Me that beareth not fruit He taketh away' (John 15. 2). 'For lest they should think that believing on Him that calleth is itself reconciliation, He adds these words, requiring the earnestness which respects the life' (CHRYSOSTOM)"—C. B. It seems as if S. Paul had in his mind some others who had received the grace of God in vain. The danger of so doing still exists, and demands the unceasing watchfulness of men, and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit.

2. For He saith. "The sense is, As of old there was a particular time wherein God was pleased to pour out His peculiar blessing, so there is now. And this is a particular time: this is a time of peculiar blessing"—WESLEY.

"A statement of God Himself is adduced in support of the exhortations. God declares that He offers His grace to the heathen nations, amongst whom were the Corinthians, with a definite opportunity of accepting it. If the opportunity is allowed to slip, it will be lost. In the passage cited (Isa. 44. 8), the Messiah, 'the Servant of God,' complains of Israel, 'I have laboured in vain: I have spent my strength for nought and in vain,' which expressions suggested the apostle's 'in vain' here. The Lord answered, In an acceptable time have I heard thee, and in a day of salvation have I succoured thee. This hearing and this succour, as the context of the prophecy implies, were to be realised in the bringing over of the Gentiles to Christ's cause. The grace of God, therefore, offered to the Corinthians, was a part of the hearing and the succour rendered to the Messiah. This shows in what sense S. Paul applies to the heathen believers what was originally addressed to the Saviour. It is in the very nature of 'a time' and 'a day' that they are fugitive and pass away. 'It is now or never'"—WAITE.

3. "Giving, as far as in us lies, no offence, that the ministry be not blamed on our account"—WESLEY.

"Giving no offence in any thing. This verse is closely connected in sense with ver. 1. S. Paul now enters upon a long passage, in which he shows how the 'ministry of reconciliation' is practically carried on. The demeanour of the apostles towards those among whom they preached the gospel is as forcible a mode of proclaiming the reconciliation as their words. Yet he has not lost sight of the vindication of himself, which runs through the whole Epistle. You may judge for yourself, he is saying in effect, whether this be the conduct to expect from one charged with such a mission"—C. B. "The ministry—the important office held by S. Paul and his companions. He felt that the influence of Christianity upon the world depended very much upon the collective impression made by its prominent advocates; and this impression would be determined in no small measure by his own personal conduct"—BEET.

4. But approving ourselves as the ministers of God—"such as His ministers ought to be. In much patience—shown (1) in afflictions, necessities, distresses — all which are general terms; (2) in stripes, imprisonments, tumults—which are particular sorts of afflictions, necessity, distress; (3) in labours, watchings, fastings—voluntarily endured. All these are expressed in the plural number, to denote a variety of them. In 'afflictions,' several ways to escape may appear, though none without difficulty; in 'necessities' one only, and that a difficult one; in 'distresses,' none at all appears"—WESLEY.

"The apostle commended himself into four classes—(1) from patience (or rather 'endurance') to fastings, referring to the bodily sufferings of the apostle; (2) from pureness to love unfeigned, referring to the virtues, that is, the manifestations of the Divine presence in S. Paul; (3) from by the word of truth to by evil report and good report, referring to the means whereby he was enabled to prove himself to be a true minister of God; and (4) the remainder, relating to the acceptation in which the apostles were held, and its contrast with the reality"—C. B.

5. In tumults. "The Greek word implies such attacks as a man cannot stand against, but which bear him hither and thither by violence"—WESLEY.

"In stripes—comp. ch. 11. 23, 24; Acts 16. 23. In imprisonments—comp. ch. 9. 23. The Acts of the Apostles, up to this date, records only one such, namely, that at Philippi. (Acts 16. 23–40.) But the Acts is far from recording all the events of S. Paul's life. In tumults. The word in the original signifies primarily 'unsettlement.' (Comp. margin of A.V., 'tossings to and fro.') S. Chrysostom would interpret it of the uncertain dwelling-place of the apostle. But the word came to mean disorder or tumult. (See Luke 21. 9; 1 Cor. 14. 33; Jas. 3. 16, as well as ch. 12. 20, where the word occurs.) In these passages moral disorder, not local unsettlement, is clearly implied. For the tumults which the apostle went through, see Acts 13. 50; 14. 5, 19; 16. 22; 17. 5; 18. 12; 19. 23–41. In labours—i.e. (1) the toils by which he supported himself (comp. Acts 18. 3; 20. 34; 1 Thess. 2. 9; 2 Thess. 3. 8); and (2) his labours for the cause of Christ (comp. Rom. 16. 12; 1 Tim. 4. 10). In watchings—lit. 'sleeplessness,' caused by 'manual labour, teaching, travelling, meditating, praying, cares, and the like' (MEYER). In fastings. Since S. Paul himself distinguished these fastings from ordinary hunger and thirst (ch. 11. 27) we must do so also. 'Not fasting from want, but a voluntary exercise of abstinence' (CALVIN). Fasting, we know, was practised under the new covenant as well as the old. (See Acts 13. 2, 3; 14. 23)"—C. B.

6. "By prudence—spiritual, Divine; not what the world terms so. Worldly prudence is the practical use of worldly wisdom; Divine prudence is the due exercise of grace, making spiritual understanding go as far as possible. By love unfeigned—the chief fruit of the Spirit"—WESLEY.

After his constant endurance, other graces and qualities which had characterised his ministerial life are enumerated—(1) chastity and knowledge. Next to his mastery over hunger comes, very naturally, his mastery over another appetite, and the more obviously suitable the mention of this was with reference to heathen and especially Corinthian licentiousness, the more unnecessary it is to give the original word any other than its proper sense of chastity. Knowledge goes hand in hand with chastity. Long-suffering and kindness are both forms of that charity (1 Cor. 13. 4), which, as he urges so strongly (1 Cor. 8. 1), should attend upon knowledge. The pure are sometimes intolerant of the impure, and those who have not abused knowledge of those that have. Not so S. Paul.

7. "By the convincing and converting power of God—accompanying His word; and also attesting it by divers miracles. By the ar- mour of righteousness on the right hand and the left—that is, on all sides; the panoply or whole armour of God"—WESLEY.

"From the spirit and love in the heart the advance to word and deed is natural. The word of truth includes both his preaching and his communications in ordinary intercourse, for he had been accused of falsehood with regard to both. The 'power of God' (ch. 4. 7) comprises the whole of his ministerial activity, but the contest must determine what manifestation of this power is particularly meant, and it points to his disciplinary courage and firmness. He claimed no power of his own, for it was God's, but as he had exercised it decisively in one case (1 Cor. 5. 4), he might do so again, if his warnings were neglected. The right-hand and left-hand weapons may signify that he is no more afraid, as was falsely said, to assail with his right hand pagan corruption, than he was to pull down Judaising strongholds (ch. 10. 4), and that he was equally ready to parry with his left, by all righteous means in his power, every blow aimed at him in his office or person"—WAITE.

8. By honour and dishonour—"when we are present. By evil report and good report—when we are absent. Who could bear honour and good report, were it not balanced by dishonour! As deceivers—artful, designing men. So the world represents all true ministers of Christ. Yet true—upright, sincere, in the sight of God"—WESLEY.

In the evil report of their enemies they are deceivers: and good men know that they are true. These contrasts commend the apostles as ministers of God. The men whom some decry as deceivers are found to be true, and similar contrasts follow in the next verse.

9. As unknown—"for the world knoweth us not, as it knew Him not. Yet well known—to God, and to those who are the seals of our ministry. As dying, yet behold—suddenly, unexpectedly, God interposes and we live"—WESLEY.

"It is objected that they are obscure and unknown. And really they are daily becoming well known, and the principles of their conduct are day by day better understood. So great is their peril that they seem to be actually falling into the grave. (Comp. ch. 4. 11; 1 Cor. 15. 31; Rom. 8. 36.) Yet in the moment of apparent destruction, suddenly comes deliverance. And behold we live—graphic picture, retaining even the exclamation of wonder at unexpected rescue. As chastised—to some men they seem to be put by God under special discipline. So seemed a more illustrious Sufferer. (Isa. 53. 4.) All things—as in Rom. 3. 32; 1 Cor. 3. 22. The whole wealth of God is theirs, and will be their eternal enjoyment"—BEET.

10. As sorrowing—"for our own manifold imperfections, and for the sins and sufferings of our brethren—yet always rejoicing—in present peace, love, power, and a sure hope of future glory. As having nothing, yet possessing all things—for all things are ours, if we are Christ's. What a magnificence of thought is this!"—WESLEY.

"He does not, in the least, exempt himself from the general law of being schooled by suffering. He grants that his sufferings are God's discipline, but he does not allow external suffering to cause him grief. Poor he may be, but he can make many rich with the blessings of the gospel. (See Eph. 1. 7, 18; 2. 7; 3. 8, 16.) Possessing all things—i.e. in Christ. (Rom. 8. 32; 1 Cor. 3. 22, 23; Phil 4. 13.) Content is the gift of heaven, and not the certain effect of anything upon earth. Happiness and comfort stream immediately from God Himself, as light issues from the sun, and sometimes looks and darts itself into the meanest corners, while it forbears to visit the noblest rooms. It is not what a man has, but what he is, which must make him happy"—SOUTH.

11. "From the praise of the Christian ministry which he began, 1 Cor. 2. 14, he now draws his affectionate exhortation. O ye Corinthians—he seldom uses this appellation. But it has here a peculiar force. Our mouth is opened toward you—with uncommon freedom, because our heart is enlarged—in tenderness"—WESLEY.

"Our mouth is open unto you—i.e. 'we have spoken with perfect frankness on all points, keeping nothing back, because we love you. (Comp. ch. 3. 12)' (Chrysostom). Our heart is enlarged—i.e. in what has been said. The expression refers to the expansive effect of love and sympathy in the affections, just as we speak of a man of wide sympathies as 'large-hearted'"—C. B. "The apostle's affection overflows in an exuberant apostrophe. His love was deep, and this flow of eloquence arose out of the expansion of his heart. Our heart is enlarged. S. Paul had received a multitude of provocations from the Corinthians. They had denied the truthfulness of his ministry, charged him with interested motives, sneered at his manner, and held up to scorn the meanness of his appearance. In the face of this his heart expands—partly with compassion. Their insults and haughty tone only impressed him with a sense of their need, with the feeling of their wandering ignorance. They were his 'children.' His spirit sought for them the only excuse it could. Thus spoke, before him, One who loved even more than he; for the same thought occurs in the dying words of Christ, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' What a well-spring of love, inexhaustible in its freshness as in its life! And this is the true test of gracious charity. Does the heart expand or narrow as the life goes on? Our mouth is open unto you. He might have shut his lips, and in dignified pride refused to plead his own cause. But instead he speaks his thoughts aloud—freely. Be sure that a man who speaks so has nothing to conceal. S. Paul has no reservation in his life, or on his lips: he was a genuine man, true in the innermost recesses of his spirit"—ROBERTSON.

12. Ye are not straitened in us. "Our heart is wide enough to receive you all. But ye are straitened in your own bowels—your hearts are shut up, and so not capable of the blessings you might enjoy"—WESLEY.

The scanty room was not in him, but in the seat of their own affections, and it hampered his free admission to their hearts. Even now the feeling in Corinth towards him was not all that he could desire.

13. Now for a recompence of the same—"of my parental tenderness. I speak as to my children—I ask nothing hard or grievous. Be ye also enlarged—open your hearts, first to God, and then to us (so ch. 8. 5), that God may 'dwell in you' (ch. 6. 16; 7. 1); and that ye may 'receive us' (ch. 7. 2)"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul details the circumstances of his ministry, and he asks in return, not the affection of the Corinthians, nor their admiration, but this: that they receive not the grace of God in vain, and again, be ye also enlarged"—ROBERTSON. "He claims, instead of their present narrow-heartedness, a reciprocation on their part of his capacious love for them. They should repay in the same kind and to the same extent as they received. Assuming that his request is granted, he proceeds after this noble preface to deliver in detail (ch. 6. 13–7. 1) the admonition which he couched in general terms at ch. 6. 1, 2"—WAITE.

14. Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers—"Christians with Jews or heathens. The apostle particularly speaks of marriage. But the reasons he urges equally hold against any needless intimacy with them. Of the five questions that follow, the three former contain the argument; the two latter, the conclusion"—WESLEY.

"Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers. Dean Stanley observes on the 'remarkable dislocation of the argument here.' But the connection of thought is not difficult to trace. The only reward (see last verse) S. Paul sought from the Corinthians was to conduct themselves in accordance with the gospel of Christ. This was the best form their sympathy with him could take. Therefore he touches on some of the points on which they were in the habit of doing most violence to their Christian profession. They did not keep sufficiently aloof from unbelievers, but even went so far as to 'sit at meat' with them 'in the idol-temple' (see 1 Cor. 8. 10, and notes), and thus become partakers with them in their idolatry, whereby they were the cause of infinite mischief to the souls of their brethren. The reference in the words 'unequally yoked together' is to the precept in Deut. 22. 10, a precept, like many similar ones in the same chapter (vers. 9, 11, 12) and elsewhere in the Mosaic laws, manifestly figurative in its character. The apostle's words must not be confined to intermarriages with the heathen, though of course it includes them in the prohibition. It refers to all kinds of close and intimate relations. 'They are yoked together with unbelievers, who enter into close companionship with them' (ESTIUS). Unrighteousness — lit. 'lawlessness,' the normal condition of the heathen man (Rom. 6. 19), while the Christian is endowed with 'God's righteousness' (ch. 5. 21). Light and darkness. (Comp. John 1. 5; 3. 19, the one signifying the condition of man in Christ, the other his condition without Christ; see also Eph. 5. 8; 1 Thess. 5. 5; and ch. 4. 4)"—C. B. "The fundamental idea is that everything has been created by God 'after its kind,' that everything is to be allowed to retain unadulterated the qualities which belong to its kind, and that there is impurity in mixing them"—WAITE.

15. "What concord hath Christ—whom ye serve—with Belial—to whom they belong"—WESLEY.

"Belial. This word, derived from two Hebrew ones signifying 'of no profit,' was used in the Old Testament (e.g. Deut. 13. 13; 1 Sam. 2. 12) in the phrase, 'child,' 'son,' or 'daughter of Belial,' to signify a worthless person, and generally (as in Deut. 15. 9, in the Hebrew) as a substantive signifying worthlessness. It seems to have been personified among the later Jews (some such personification seems clearly indicated by the language of the apostle), and to have become a synonym for Satan"—C. B.

16. What agreement hath the temple of God with idols? "If God would not endure idols in any part of the land wherein He dwelt, how much less, under His own roof! He does not say, 'with the temple of idols,' for idols do not dwell in their worshippers. As God hath said—to His ancient Church, and in them to all the Israel of God—I will dwell in them, and walk in them—the former signifying His perpetual presence; the latter, his operation. And I will be to them a God, and they shall be to Me a people—the sum of the whole gospel covenant"—WESLEY.

"From the general matter of 'unbelievers,' S. Paul comes now to the specific matter of idolatry. Against this he warned the Corinthian Christians in 1 Cor. 10. 14 ff. by referring to the Lord's Supper: he warns them now by the great truth that believers are the temple of God. The word us puts S. Paul among those he warns. They share with him this great dignity, and he with them the duty it involves. Living God—in contrast to lifeless idols, as in 1 Thess. 1. 9"—BEET. I will be their God, and they shall be My people. S. Paul here boldly transfers the prophecies that relate to the earthly Israel to the spiritual Israel, the Christian Church. (Comp. Rom. 9. 25, 26; 1 Cor. 10. 1-11; Gal. 4. 26; Heb. 12. 22; 1 Pet. 2. 9, 10; Rev. 3. 12; 21. 2, 10.)

17. Touch not the unclean person—"keep at the utmost distance from him. And I will receive you—into My house and family"—WESLEY.

"Wherefore come out from among them—a combination of Isa. 52. 11 with Ezek. 20. 34. This passage must be read in conjunction with 1 Cor. 5. 10, and must be understood, not of absolute separation, but of abstinence from any kind of intimacy. 'Wherever union in the highest cannot be, there friendship and intimate partnership must not be tried (Robertson)"—C. B. That into which God will welcome those who come out in what the land of Canaan symbolises in the prophetic passages, and the next verse suggests that S. Paul had in his mind the idea of the family and household of God.

18. And ye shall be to Me for sons and for daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. "The promise made to Solomon (1 Chron. 28. 6) is here applied to all believers, as the promise made particularly to Joshua is applied to them (Heb. 13. 5). Who can express the worth, who can conceive the dignity, of this Divine adoption? Yet it belongs to all who believe the gospel, who have faith in Christ. They have access to the Almighty; such free and welcome access as a beloved child to an indulgent father. To Him they may fly for aid in every difficulty, and from Him obtain a supply in all their wants"—WESLEY.

"The blessings consequent upon this welcome are the privileges of adopted sons and daughters of God. When the titles, Father and Son, designate the relation between God and His people in the Old Testament, they signify only paternal affections and treatment on one side, and filial feelings and conduct on the other, that is a sonship by example. So S. Paul says of the Jews, 'to whom pertaineth the adoption' (Rom. 9. 4). Under the new covenant a higher sonship is accessible, also by adoption, not by generation. The condition of it is faith (Gal. 3. 26) in Christ. But to as many as receive Christ by faith, and so become sons of God, Christ grants the privilege of becoming also children of God, that is, sons by generation, by a new birth which is of God (John 1. 12), through the Spirit, and is regeneration. With this new birth begins the holy life of a new creature, and it is only by perseverance in this life of holiness that the position and blessings of adoption can be maintained. It is precisely this that the apostle is urging upon his readers"—S. C.

CHAPTER VII.

1. Let us cleanse ourselves. "This is the latter part of the exhortation, which was proposed (ch. 6. 1, and resumed, ver. 14). From all pollution of the flesh—all outward sin. And of the spirit—all inward. Yet let us not rest in negative religion, but perfect holiness—carrying it to the height in all its branches, and enduring to the end in the loving fear of God, the sure foundation of all holiness"—WESLEY.

"Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness—rather 'defilement' (see note on 6. 17), sin taking the place of 'the unclean thing' under the Law. For what is meant by defilement in the case of a Christian, see Matt. 15. 18-20; Mark 7. 20-23, where, however, the word translated 'defile' means to 'make common,' i.e. to reduce to the same condition as the rest of mankind. Here it is the stain of sin which is the predominant idea. Of the flesh and spirit—i.e. inward as well as outward. (See 1 Sam. 16. 7; Matt. 12. 34, 35.) The outward defilement is caused by sins of the flesh, or bodily part of man, the inward by those of the spirit, such as pride, unbelief, and the like"—LIAS. We must keep ourselves apart, not only from sensual, but also from spiritual defilement. The Jewish law required only the purification of the flesh; the gospel, which is the inner spirit of the Law, demands the purification of the spirit. The imagination, which was given to spiritualise the senses, is often turned into a means of sensualising the spirit. Beware of reverie, and indulgence in forbidden images, unless you would introduce into your bosom a serpent, which will creep and crawl, and leave the venom of its windings in your heart. Realise the grandeur of saintliness, and you will shrink from degrading your soul and debasing your spirit. Perfecting holiness in the fear of God—perfection and nothing less is to be the aim of the Christian. (Comp. Matt. 5. 48; Rom. 12. 2; Col. 1. 22, 28; 4. 12.) With this view he is to cleanse himself daily by sincere repentance from every defilement of sin, and to watch that he offend not in like kind again. The fear of offending God is a very necessary element in the process of sanctification. "We cannot do without awe; there is no depth of character without it. Tender motives are not enough to restrain from sin"—ROBERTSON.

2. Receive us. "The sum of what is said in this, as well as in the tenth and following chapters. We have hurt no man—in his person. We have corrupted no man—in his principles. We have defrauded no man—of his property. In this he intimates likewise the good he had done them, but with the utmost modesty, as it were not looking upon it"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul here refers to the charges brought against him. He had been accused of wronging the Corinthians, by claiming an authority to which he had no right, and which he turned to his own account (see 1 Cor. 9. 1-6; ch. 1. 12-17; 5. 12; 6. 3, 4, 12; 10. 7-11; 11. 7; 12. 14); of corrupting them by preaching false doctrine (ch. 2. 17; 4. 2), unless, with Thomas Aquinas, we interpret it of 'bad example; of defrauding them (ch. 12. 17, 18), where the word here used is translated 'make a gain of.' To this he replies by challenging them to prove their assertions, to name a single instance in which he had done either"—C. B. Honesty, uprightness, integrity of character, are sometimes called mere moral virtues; and religious people are too often deficient in these points; but the bright honour of the Apostle Paul was never stained. He could say, I have wronged no man

3. I speak not to condemn you—"not as if I accused you of laying this to my charge. I am so far from thinking so unkindly of you, that ye are in our hearts, to live and die with you—that is, I could rejoice to spend all my days with you"—WESLEY.

"I speak not to condemn you. 'It might seem as if this were spoken at them with indirect reproach. Therefore he adds, 'I am not reproaching you for past injustice: I only say these things to assure you of my undiminished love' (ROBERTSON). For I have said before. (See ch. 1. 6; 4. 10–12, 15; 5. 11, 13-15.) You are in our hearts to die and live with you. 'There is one thing in the character of S. Paul which often escapes observation. Carlyle calls him an 'unkempt Apostle Paul,' and some say of him 'he was a man rude, brave, true, unpolished.' We all know his integrity, his truth, his daring, his incorruptible honesty. But besides these, there was a refined and delicate courtesy, which was for ever taking off the edge of his sharpest rebukes, and sensitively anticipating every pain his words might give' (ROBERTSON). He refers to Philemon 8, 12, 14, 17–20; Acts 26. 29; and Phil. 3. 18. (See also 1 Cor. 4. 14; ch. 6. 11–13; 9. 4, and the whole of the present chapter"—C. B.

4. I am filled with comfort—"of this he treats, ver. 6, etc.; of his joy, ver. 7, etc.; of both, ver. 13"—WESLEY.

"Great is my boldness, 'frankness' of speech towards you. This plainly refers to ch. 6. 11, and there is no reason to dilute the idea into 'confidence,' although the frankness is that of confidence in his readers. This, and not the desire to condemn, is the explanation of the unreservedness of his warning. More indicative of his love still than free speech to them is glorying speech to others on their behalf"—S. C.

5. Our flesh—"that is, we ourselves—had no rest: from without—from the heathens—were fightings—furious and cruel oppositions; from within—from our brethren—were fears—lest they should be seduced"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul's anxiety at Troas (ch. 2. 13) continued even after arriving in Macedonia. We—probably S. Paul and Timothy. Our flesh, depicts the effect on their body in virtue of its constitution, of their anxiety about the Corinthians. Without, within, expound 'in everything.' Fears—probably, as suggested by ver. 6, about the Corinthian church and the effect of his letter. (Comp. ch. 2. 4.) The state of that church might well give him dark forebodings"—BEET.

6. "It was not the mere presence of Titus, but the tidings he brought, which so rejoiced the apostle"—C. B.

7. Your earnest desire—"to rectify what had been amiss. Your grief—for what had offended God, and troubled me"—WESLEY.

"Titus clearly delivered his account with joyful emotion, and indeed the scene which he had to describe was extraordinary, as may be seen in ver. 11. The comfort was such as for the apostle to 'feel rejoiced rather than troubled as before'"—S. C.

8. I did repent—"that is, I felt a tender sorrow for having grieved you, till I saw the happy effect of it"—WESLEY.

"There was a moment in the apostle's life when he half regretted what he had done. To some persons this would be perplexing. They cannot understand how an inspired apostle could regret what he had done: if it were done by inspiration, what room could there be for misgivings? And if he regretted an act done under God's guidance, just as any common man might regret a foolish act, how could the apostle be inspired? But this, which might perplex some, exhibits the very beauty and naturalness of the whole narrative. God's inspiration does not take a man and make a passive machine of him. When God inspires, His Spirit mixes with the spirit of man in the form of thought, not without struggles and misgivings of the human element. Otherwise it would not be inspiration of the man, but simply a Divine echo through the man"—ROBERTSON. "Similar conflicts of the human with the Divine in the inspired writers may be seen in Ex. 4. 10–14; 6. 12; Jer. 1. 6–9; 14. 13; 20. 7–9, 14–18, and in the whole Book of Jonah. For I perceive that the same Epistle hath made you sorry. There are a good many various readings here, and the editors have adopted various punctuations, possibly from the difficulty mentioned in the last note. But in truth there need be no such difficulty. The right course was that taken in the First Epistle, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. But after the Epistle was sent, the tender human heart of S. Paul doubted whether he had done right, whether he had not given unnecessary pain, and the like, and his mind was not fully set at rest on the point until the arrival of Titus showed him clearly the hand of God in the matter. Such self-questionings are constantly going on in the mind of every conscientious man, even when he has been acting most thoroughly under the guidance of God's Spirit. The words here translated 'made sorry,' which is owing to Wyclif, is the same word which in ch 2. is rendered 'caused grief, and 'grieved'"—C. B.

9. "Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry. Another instance of the tender consideration of S. Paul. He will not run the risk of being supposed, even for a moment, to have taken pleasure in others' pain"—C. B. "Learn never to smooth away, through fear of results, the difficulties of love and friendship by concealment, or a subtle suppression of facts or feelings. Reprove, explain, submit with all gentleness, and yet with all truth and openness. The deadliest poison you can instil into the wine of life is a fearful reserve which creates suspicion, or a lie which will canker and kill your own love, and through that your friend's. The great blessings of this life are friendship and affection. Be sure that the only irreparable blight of both is falseness"—ROBERTSON.

10. The sorrow of the world—"sorrow that arises from worldly considerations—worketh death—naturally tends to work or occasion death, temporal, spiritual, and eternal"—WESLEY.

The difference between the true repentance and the false remorse may be illustrated by the cases of David and Saul, S. Peter and Judas. True grief for sin works a change of mind leading to salvation, and salvation is no matter of regret. But the false grief which the world feels and which hath no eye to God, worketh death. ROBERTSON says: "The beautiful law is, that in proportion as the repentance increases, the grief diminishes. 'I rejoice,' says S. Paul, 'that I made you sorry, though it were but for a time.' Grief for a time, but repentance for ever." But the sorrow of the world—i.e. of the world untouched and unregenerated by the Spirit of God—the sorrow of the natural man, "the opposite of the sorrow according to God" (Stanley). (See 1 Cor. 2. 14.) Worketh death—death of the body, sometimes as when despair tempts to suicide, or brings on deadly sickness. Death of the soul, when sorrow fails to melt the heart, but leads it to that state of rebellious stubbornness, of entire alienation from God, which is expressed in the words "hardness of heart and contempt of His word and commandments." (Comp. Prov. 17. 22.)

11. How great diligence is wrought in you—"shown in all the following particulars. Yea, clearing of yourselves—some had been more, some less, faulty; whence arose these various affections. Hence their apologising and indignation, with respect to themselves; their fear and desire, with respect to the apostle; their zeal and revenge, with respect to the offender, yea, and themselves also. Clearing of yourselves—from either sharing in, or approving of, his sin. Indignation—that ye had not immediately corrected the offender. Fear—of God's displeasure, or lest I should come with a rod. Vehement desire—to see me again. Zeal—for the glory of God, and the soul of that sinner. Yea, revenge—ye took a kind of holy revenge upon yourselves, being scarce able to forgive yourselves. In all things ye—as a church—have approved yourselves to be pure—that is, free from blame, since ye received my letter"—WESLEY.

"What carefulness—lit. 'diligence' (so Tyndale and Cranmer; 'moral earnestness,' Robertson). (See Mark 6. 25; Luke 1. 39; where it is translated 'haste.') What clearing of yourselves—lit. 'defence or excuse,' but a better translation than that in the text is impossible. Indignation or 'vexation,' a sort of feeling between indignation and disgust at themselves for having been 'puffed up,' and not having 'rather mourned that he that had done this deed had not been taken away from among them' (1 Cor. 5. 2). Fear. (See 1 Cor. 4. 21, and ver. 15.) Or, perhaps, fear of God's wrath. (See ver. 1, but comp. note below.) Vehement desire—rather 'longing,' i.e. for S. Paul's presence. (See Phil. 1. 8; 2. 26; 1 Thess. 3. 6; also ch. 5. 2; 9. 14.) The same word in ver. 7 is translated 'earnest desire.' Theophylact detects here another instance of the anxiety of the apostle not to lay too much stress on his authority. To the idea of fear he immediately subjoins that of affection. Revenge—'punysshment,' Tyndale. The word is used of punishment inflicted by judicial process. (See Luke 18. 3; also ch. 10. 6.) Such a process had taken place in this case. (Comp. 1 Cor. 5. 4, 5, with 2 Cor. 2. 6)"—C. B.

12. "It was not only, or chiefly, for the sake of the incestuous person, or of his father; but to show my care over you"—WESLEY.

"The worst misfortune that can happen is to sin and to escape detection: shame and sorrow do God's work as nothing else can do it. A sin undetected is the soil out of which fresh sin will grow. The apostle was not delivering his own soul, but he was trying to save their souls"—ROBERTSON.

13. For this reason, because this and no other had been his purpose, and because the facts showed that it had been attained, we are comforted. No comfort could have come from attaining such purpose as had been imputed to him.

14. It was a special ground of rejoicing to S. Paul that the conduct of the Corinthians had shown the boast, which partly induced Titus to go, to be true, and that he was spared the humiliation of seeing his praise of them proved hollow.

15. The impression made upon Titus by his visit was so favourable that the apostle can use it as a seal of the established reconciliation between the church and himself, which he declared in ver. 16.

16. The apostle's meaning is, that in everything I am of good courage in consequence of your conduct. From this chapter, says ROBERTSON, we learn "the value of explanations. Had S. Paul left the matter unsettled, or only half settled, there never could have been a hearty understanding between him and the Corinthians. Whenever there is a misunderstanding between man and man, the true remedy is a direct and open request for explanation." (Comp. Matt. 18. 15–17.)

CHAPTER VIII.

1. We declare to you the grace of God—"which evidently appeared by this happy effect"—WESLEY.

"The zeal of the Macedonians, to which S. Paul was an eye-witness, was an excellent starting-point for his topic, and calculated to provoke emulation. The first cause of Christian almsgiving is the grace of God. The grace given in the churches denotes that the churches were receptacles and abiding-places of the grace"—S. C.

2. In a great trial of affliction—"being continually persecuted, harassed, and plundered"—WESLEY.

"The apostle refers to the persecutions which they shared with him, which, if not endured in a proper spirit, would have shut them up in the contemplation of their own sorrows, instead of making them anxious to relieve those of others. The abundance of their joy and their deep poverty. (Comp. 1 Cor. 1. 26.) 'In spite of their troubled condition they had displayed great joyfulness, and in spite of their poverty they had displayed great liberality' (De Wette). The Geneva Version, instead of 'deep poverty,' has 'the poverty which had consumed them even to the very bottom.' The literal rendering of 'deep' is down to the depth, or according to depth. 'Munificence,' says Chrysostom, 'is determined not by the measure of what is given, but by the mind of those who bestow it.' (Comp. Luke 21. 3.) The condition of Greece in the time of Augustus was one of great desolation and distress"—C. B.

3. Willing of themselves—lit. "of their own choice," not excluding, however, as Meyer well remarks, Divine, but only human, influence in the matter. (Comp. ver. 17.)

4. Praying us with much entreaty—"probably S. Paul had lovingly admonished them not to do beyond their power"—WESLEY.

These Macedonians pleaded hard to be allowed as a favour to join with the other churches in this service for the brethren in Judea. This verse suggests that S. Paul hesitated, because of their poverty, to accept their co-operation.

5. And not as we hoped—"that is, beyond all we could hope. They gave themselves to us, by the will of God—in obedience to His will, to be wholly directed by us"—WESLEY.

"First. Here may be a reference to the order of time, but it is better to understand it of the order of importance; 'above all' (Alford). By the will of God. It was God's will that they should have the power to act thus, if they were willing to carry out His will. (Comp. 1 Thess. 4. 3; 5. 18; 1 Tim. 2. 4)"—C. B.

6. As he had begun—"when he was with you before"—WESLEY.

"On a former visit to Corinth, doubtless that referred to in ch. 12. 18, undertaken at S. Paul's request, probably with express reference to this collection, some time before S. Paul wrote the First Epistle"—BEET.

7. Observe that faith and utterance and the like were of little avail without love. (See 1 Cor. 8. 1; 13.; 2 Pet. 1. 5–7.)

8. I speak not by commandment. "The apostles 'never spoke as dictators' (Robertson). (See ch. 1. 24, and ver. 10, as well as 1 Cor. 7. 6, 25; Philemon 8, 9, 13, 14; and 1 Pet. 5. 3)"—C. B. BEET says that S. Paul put to the proof the genuineness of their love, and so tested the worth of their Christian profession. And there is no surer way of doing this than to ask money for Christian purposes. For men generally trust in, and cling to, material good.

9. For ye know—"and this knowledge is the true source of love. The grace—the most sincere, most free, and most abundant love. He became poor—in becoming man, in all His life; in His death. Rich—in the favour and image of God"—WESLEY.

"In S. Paul's eyes 'Christ is the reference for everything. To Christ's life and to Christ's spirit, S. Paul refers all questions, both practical and speculative, for solution' (ROBERTSON). Though He was rich, yet for your sakes He became poor—rather, 'being' rich (comp. John 3. 13 in the Greek, ch. 11. 31). There is no 'was' in the original. Jesus Christ did not cease to be rich when He made Himself poor. He did not cease to be God when He became Man. For 'became poor' we should perhaps translate, 'made Himself a beggar.' The word seems to indicate a more abject condition than mere poverty. 'For the word, see Matt. 5. 3, also ch. 6. 10, and ver. 2 of this chapter. For the idea, comp. Matt. 8. 20; Phil. 2. 6-8.' That ye through His poverty might be rich. We could only attain to God by His bringing Himself down to our level. (See John 1. 9–14, 18; 12. 45; 14. 9; Col. 1. 15; Heb. 1. 3.) And by thus putting Himself on an equality with us He enriched us with all the treasures that dwell in Him. (Comp. Eph. 1. 7, 8; 2. 5–7; 3. 16–19; Col. 2. 2, 3, etc., as well as Phil. 2. 6-8 just cited)"—LIAS.

10. Note the same careful distinction between command and counsel, as in 1 Cor. 7. 25.

11. The sense is "you made a resolution last year to do a certain work. Carry out that resolution now, and let the completion of the task bear witness, as far as your ability goes, to the genuineness of the resolution you then made"—C. B.

12. A man—"every believer—is accepted—with God—according to what he hath. And the same rule holds universally. Whosoever acknowledges himself to be a vile, guilty sinner, and, in consequence of this acknowledgment, flies for refuge to the wounds of a crucified Saviour, and relies on His merits alone for salvation, may in every circumstance of life apply this indulgent declaration to himself"—WESLEY.

Christian liberality is the work of a willing mind. It is not the value of the contribution, but the love of the contributor which makes it precious. The offering is sanctified or made unholy in God's sight by the spirit in which it is given. The most striking passage in which this truth is illustrated is that of the widow's mite. Tried by the gauge of the treasurer of a charity, it was next to nothing. Tried by the test of charity, it was more than that of all. Her coins, worthless in the eyes of the rich Pharisee, were in the eyes of Christ transformed, by her love, into the gold of the Eternal City.

13. "To you pressure—lit. 'affliction'; privation of the necessaries of life, through liberality towards the Christians of Judea"—BEET. In S. Paul's spirit of entreaty we remark the spirit of reciprocity. It might have been supposed that because S. Paul was a Jew he was therefore anxious for his Jewish brethren; and that, in urging the Corinthians to give liberally, even out of their poverty, he forgot the unfairness of the request, and was satisfied so long as only the Jews were relieved—it mattered not at whose expense"—ROBERTSON.

14. That their abundance—"if need should so require — may be—at another time — a supply to your want: that there may be an equality—no want on one side, no superfluity on the other. It may likewise have a further meaning—that as the temporal bounty of the Corinthians did now supply the temporal wants of their poor brethren in Judea, so the prayers of these might be a means of bringing down many spiritual blessings on their benefactors; so that all the spiritual wants of the one might be amply supplied; all the temporal of the other"—WESLEY.

"The apostle is probably glancing at actual discontent inspired by his adversaries about his requisition of money, and he gently reminds his readers that they may, one day, need a requital in kind from those whom they assist"—S. C. "By establishing the principle of mutual monetary help, he was doing something to shelter the people of God in the dark days awaiting the Church and the world"—BEET.

15. As it is written, He that had gathered the most had nothing over; and he that had gathered the least did not lack—"that is, in which that scripture is in another sense fulfilled"—WESLEY.

"As it is written—in Ex. 16. 18. In this miracle S. Paul perceives a great universal principle of human life. God has given to every man a certain capacity and a certain power of enjoyment. Beyond that he cannot find delight. Whatever he heaps or hoards beyond that is not enjoyment but disquiet"—ROBERTSON. "As a pattern of what he desires to see in the Christian Church, S. Paul quotes Ex. 16. 18, almost word for word from the LXX., viz. the narrative of Israel in the wilderness, supplied by the gift of God, so that none had too much and none too little. Had not more, had not less than he needed. For they gathered according to the size of their families. So far as the Christian life permeates church members and churches will there be reproduced this ancient and beautiful ideal of a company in which each has sufficient, an ideal never realised in material good so completely as in Israel in the wilderness. For all men are but gatherers of food given by God"—BEET.

16. "But thanks be to God. The word translated 'thanks' here is that translated 'grace, gift,' in other places of this Epistle. We learn from vers. 6, 17, that Titus, moved by the strong interest in the Corinthians which his first mission had excited, and being requested by the apostle to undertake the work of stimulating their energy in the charitable work they had undertaken (ver. 10), determined of his own accord to visit Corinth, instead of writing (this seems the only way in which we can reconcile ver. 6 with ver. 17), and thus to stir up the Corinthians by his personal presence to a holy emulation of the good deeds of the churches of Macedonia. Titus can hardly, as some have thought, have been entrusted with this Epistle on the occasion of which the apostle speaks, for S. Paul speaks in the past tense of this mission"—C. B.

17. Being more forward—"than to need it, though he received it well"—WESLEY.

"The readiness of Titus, like all good in man, is the work and gift of God. So eager was he to complete the work he had begun that his journey was really an outflow of his own earnest wish"—BEET.

18. We—"I and Timothy. The brother—the ancients generally supposed this was S. Luke. Whose praise—for faithfully dispensing the gospel, is through all the churches"—WESLEY.

"The commendation of the first of Titus's two companions might mean either that he had written a Gospel, or was distinguished as a preacher, or as a worker in the gospel cause"—S. C.

19. He was appointed by the churches—"of Macedonia—with this gift—which they were carrying from Macedonia to Jerusalem. For the declaration of our ready mind—that of S. Paul and his fellow-traveller, ready to be the servants of all"—WESLEY.

"And not that only—i.e. not only is he praised throughout all the churches—but who was also chosen of the churches—i.e. chosen by the churches. (See note on 1 Cor. 14. 24; ch. 1. 16; 2. 6, 12 of this Epistle, and Heb. 12. 5, etc.) The word here used signifies 'chosen by show of hands.' So also in Acts 14. 23. Voting by show of hands was the custom among the Greeks as among ourselves"—C. B.

20. "Avoiding this. The word is used in Greek of furling the sails of a vessel to avoid a disaster. It occurs again in the New Testament in 2 Thess. 3. 6. But it may perhaps be translated 'making this arrangement.' That no man should blame us. Chrysostom and Calvin remark on the care taken by the apostle to avoid giving the slightest cause for suspicion. He did not, says the former, send Titus alone. 'He was not,' says the latter, 'so satisfied with himself as to think it unworthy of his dignity to avoid calumny.' And he adds, 'Certainly nothing exposes a man to unpleasant insinuations more than the management of public money.' In this is to be observed S. Paul's wisdom, not only as a man of the world but as a man of God. He knew that he lived in a censorious age, that he was as a city set on a hill, that the world would scan his every act and his every word, and attribute all conceivable and even inconceivable evil to what he did in all honour. It was just because of S. Paul's honour and innocence that he was likely to have omitted this prudence"—ROBERTSON.

21. "Honest things—rather what is honourable. The word implies what is of good repute among mankind, and hence what is honourable and noble in itself. Also in the sight of men. It is not enough for the Christian to have a clear conscience. He must give no man an opportunity of insinuating that his conscience is not clear. (See Matt. 5. 14–16)"—C. B.

22. With them—"with Titus and Luke. Our brother—perhaps Apollos"—WESLEY.

"Titus's second companion must have been a coadjutor of S. Paul in matters of business connected with his ministry, for the word rendered 'diligent' in the A.V. signifies zeal and energy in the transaction of affairs"—S. C.

23. My partner—"in my cares and labours. The glory of Christ—signal instruments of advancing His glory"—WESLEY.

"That Titus was a companion of their beloved apostle, and a worker with him for their good, was his high commendation. The other two have three commendations. They are brothers in Christ, apostles approved and sent by Christian churches, men whose mission and work reveal the glory of Christ. To S. Paul and his readers they are brothers; to whole churches they are specially related as their apostles; and to Christ as men bringing Him glory"—BEET.

24. Before the churches — "present by their messengers"—WESLEY.

"A motive, drawn from ver. 23, for receiving the messengers worthily. Owing to their just stated relationships, what you do to them, you do in the presence of the churches who sent them"—BEET.

CHAPTER IX.

1. To write to you—"largely"—WESLEY.

"For—i.e. I am not writing to you about the ministry to the saints, for that is unnecessary. I am writing about your reception of the brethren, and your being ready when they come. (See ver. 3.) The ministering—lit. 'the ministry.' (See note on ch. 3. 3.) Anything which conveyed God's good gifts from one member of the church to another was, in the apostle's eyes, a 'ministry.' It is superfluous for me to write to you. 'Observe the tender wisdom of this proceeding. The charity which finds us unprepared is a call as hateful as that of any creditor whom it is hard to pay. S. Paul knew this well, therefore he gave timely notice' (ROBERTSON). It was unnecessary to write to them about the collection itself. It was not unnecessary to remind them, as a matter of Christian prudence, that they must not allow themselves to be taken unawares, lest the amount of their bounty should hardly correspond to what men had a reason to expect. (Comp. 1 Cor. 16. 2.) Calvin, however, thinks that the apostle wavered between confidence and anxiety. He knew their readiness, but he feared the instability of human nature"—LIAS.

2. I boast to them of Macedonia—"with whom he then was"—WESLEY.

And your zeal hath provoked very many. "We did not advise, we did not exhort; we only praised you, we only boasted of you; and this was enough for exhortation of them"—CHRYSOSTOM.

3. "I have sent the above-mentioned brethren before me"—WESLEY.

"Yet have I sent. Although instructions to make the collection were needless, it was not needless for me to send the brethren. (See note on ver. 1.) For 'I have sent,' the Greek has 'I sent.' Our boasting—lit. 'our ground of boasting,' but see ch. 5. 12. It was not that S. Paul expected no result from the collection, but feared that it might be one out of all proportion to what his expressions of confidence in the Corinthian church would have led other churches to expect. In this behalf—rather 'in this respect,' i.e. in regard to the matter of the collection. He had not hesitated to speak of their other good qualities. (See 1 Cor. 1. 4–8; and for the expression, see ch. 3. 10)"—C. B.

5. Spoken of before — "by me, to the Macedonians. Not as a matter of covetousness—as wrung by importunity from covetous persons"—WESLEY.

And not as of covetousness—rather, perhaps, "greed," i.e. to be given in a generous and not in a grudging spirit. But Dr. Plumptre regards it as possibly referring to S. Paul, "as a work of 'your' bounty, not of 'my' claims upon your purses." Ch. 7. 2; 12. 17, 18, which he cites, are decidedly in favour of this interpretation. For "covetous, covetousness," see 1 Cor. 5. 10.

6. He that soweth sparingly shall reap sparingly; he that soweth bountifully shall reap bountifully—"a general rule. God will reward to the proportion of the work, and the temper whence it proceeds'—WESLEY.

"He which soweth sparingly. He calls it sowing," says CHRYSOSTOM, "in order that we may learn by the figure of the harvest that in giving we receive more than we give." (Comp. Gal. 6. 7–9; also Prov. 11. 18.) WAITE says: "To write that they should give liberally would have been superfluous, yet this he allows himself to say. Giving is not a sacrifice, but a sowing followed by a reaping, and as is the sowing so the reaping. The giver of the recompense is, of course, God. Both idea and language are taken from the Old Testament. (See Prov. 11. 24)."

7. Of necessity—"because he cannot tell how to refuse"—WESLEY.

"Passing from amount to motive, and states the inward moral condition, without which no man can reap. His sowing must spring out of deliberate preference, not out of a state of mind in which grief is felt at parting with possessions, nor out of compulsion, in which a man thinks that he must give, whether from respectability, reputation, or from urgent admonitions"—S. C.

8. "How remarkable are these words! Each is loaded with matter, and increases all the way it goes. All grace—every kind of blessing. That ye may abound to every good work. God gives us everything, that we may do good therewith, and so receive more blessings. All things in this life, even rewards, are, to the faithful, seeds in order to a future harvest"—WESLEY.

"All grace. See notes on grace elsewhere, especially ch. 8. 6. and ver. 15 of this chapter; also comp. 1 Cor. 16. 3. The meaning here is, 'God is able to make every gift of His loving-kindness to abound to you, that you, being thus enriched, may impart of His bounty to others.' Sufficiency. This is translated 'contentment' in 1 Tim. 6. 6, while the corresponding adjective is rendered 'content' in Phil. 4. 11. But 1 Tim. 6. 8 explains the meaning of the word. It is the state of mind which, needing nothing but the barest necessaries, regards all other things as superfluities, to be parted with whenever the needs of others require them. This is the force of the words 'all,' twice repeated, and 'always.' At all times, save when he is actually deprived of food and raiment, the Christian ought to regard himself as having enough. It is worthy of remark that this self-sufficingness was a favourite virtue with heathen philosophers, though destitute, in the case of the Stoics, of all the gentler and more attractive aspects in which it has been wont to present itself among Christians. The use of this word, as of the word noticed in ver. 6, seems to show that S. Paul was well acquainted with the philosophy of Aristotle"—LIAS. "Sufficiency—objective possession of, or subjective consciousness of possessing, all that they need. The latter sense here. Same word in 1 Tim. 6. 6; Phil. 4. 11. They who know that God will supply all their need, and they only, are independent of the uncertainties of life. They can therefore afford to give away money to others. Thus 'sufficiency' is essential for large and cheerful giving"—BEET.

9. He hath scattered abroad—"a generous word. With a full hand, without any anxious thought which way each grain falls. His righteousness — His beneficence, with the blessed effects of it—remaineth for ever—unexhausted, God still renewing His store"—WESLEY.

'God can provide abundantly for givers, and that He actually does so is now shown by Scripture. It is said of the man that feareth the Lord (Ps. 112. 9), 'He scattered, he gave to the poor.' Scattered denotes, not without reference to sowing, liberal giving in many directions. To the poor shows the giving discriminates its proper objects. The abiding of righteousness for ever is God's reward for scattering"—S. C. "His righteousness remaineth for ever. As this passage is simply quoted from the Old Testament, it seems unfair to build any theological argument upon it, especially as on points like these the Hebrew language has by no means the precision of the Greek. It probably means no more than this, that a good and charitable deed remains such for evermore. The parenthesis, which in the A.V. includes ver. 10, ought to include this verse only"—C. B.

10. And He who supplieth seed—"opportunity and ability to help others. And bread—all things needful for your own souls and bodies. Will continually supply you with that seed, yea, multiply it to you more and more. And increase the fruits of your righteousness—the happy effects of your love to God and man"—WESLEY.

"Now He that ministereth. The word used twice in this verse has the original signification of 'leading a chorus.' Hence it came to mean to 'defray the expenses' of a chorus, since, when a wealthy man was appointed to any office of importance in his city, it was usual for him to provide festal displays for the citizens. Hence it came to have the general meaning of 'furnish, provide,' as here. Both minister. In the best MSS. these verbs are in the future-indicative, i.e. will minister, will multiply, will increase; not, as the received Greek text, in the optative. Bread for your food. In the Greek these words seem to belong to the former verb, 'Now He that supplieth seed to the sower and bread for food will supply and multiply,' etc. The words here are a quotation from the LXX. version of Isa. 55. 10. Increase the fruits of your righteousness. (Comp. 1 Cor. 1. 30; 3. 6.) The words are taken from the LXX. version of Hos. 10. 12. The metaphor is taken from the natural processes of growth just referred to. God supplies the seed of works of mercy; He multiplies it, and good works in plenty are the crop"—C. B. "God who can and does thus bless charitable giving, will do so in the case of the Corinthians. He who, in the natural economy of the world, supplies seed to the sower, and bread, as its fruit, for the support of life, will, in His moral economy, likewise requite those who till the soil and sow the seed of charity"—S. C.

11. Which worketh by us thanksgiving to God—"both from us who distribute, and them who receive your bounty"—WESLEY.

We have here the same truth as in the preceding verse, from another point of view. When men, by a right use of previous gifts, themselves thankfully receive God's further gifts, and again, in imitation of His bounty, use them for the good of others, so that these recipients also thank God for the benefaction, it is, as far as it goes, the re-establishment of the right relation between God and men, and men and men.

12. "The deep religious significance of the collection cannot be dismissed in a single sentence. Its chief value consisted in its spiritual results, so he impresses upon his readers that the immediate end attained by the work of charity, the supplying of the wants of the saints, however excellent, is not its only one, and then reiterates in a fuller form what he had said about the more excellent fruit of thanksgiving"—S. C.

13. Your avowed subjection — "openly testified by your actions — to all men—who stand in need of it"—WESLEY.

"This collection was a conspicuous act of submission to the apostolic authority which enjoined it, and to Christ (comp. 8. 5), for whose sake it was made, by those who professed to be His servants"—BEET.

14. "Teaches that the prayer of brethren for brethren is as much a glorifying of God as thanksgiving itself. The apostle attributes to the grateful Jewish Christians a feeling prompting their prayer"—S. C.

15. His unspeakable gift — "His outward and inward blessings, the number and excellence of which cannot be uttered"—WESLEY.

"Thanks. The word is the same which is elsewhere translated 'grace.' For His unspeakable gift. This, as Dean Alford suggests (after Chrysostom), can be none other than Jesus Christ Himself. No other gift could correspond to the word 'unspeakable,' which suggests (like Rom. 11. 33; Eph. 3. 18, 19) the idea of God. And in Jesus Christ 'dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily' (Col. 2. 9). From Him all gifts of nature or grace proceed. And what the gift is which is above all others, we learn from such passages as Rom. 5. 15; 6. 23; Heb. 6. 4'—C. B.

CHAPTER X.

1. Now I Paul myself — "a strongly emphatical expression—who when present am base among you. So, probably, some of the false teachers affirmed. Copying after the meekness and gentleness of Christ, entreat—though I might command 'you'"—WESLEY.

Now I Paul myself. "Until now, S. Paul has addressed himself pre-eminently to the better intentioned in the Christian Church, but henceforth he addresses himself to those who had sought to lower his dignity and weaken his authority by representing him as weak in personal 'influence,' as well as in bodily strength and consistency of purpose, 'although courageous and full of self-commendation in his letters' (OLSHAUSEN). The word 'myself' is difficult to explain. Deans Stanley and Alford explain it (1) of S. Paul's intention to enter upon personal matters. S. Chrysostom seems to imply (2) that it refers to the emphasis with which he speaks, and he cites Gal. 5. 2; Philem. 19. But (3) it seems more probable that it means 'I, the very man who in absence am said to be bold, show my consistency by preferring meekness even in my letters. I am meek, not because I am afraid, but because I ought to be meek. But if meekness fails, then I must be severe.' (Comp. vers. 2, 9, 10; also 1 Cor. 4. 21.) It must be remembered that one main purpose of this Epistle is to vindicate the consistency of the apostle. (See ch. 1. 17–19)"—C. B.

2. "Do not constrain me when present to be bold—to exert my apostolical authority. Who think of us as walking after the flesh—as acting in a cowardly or crafty manner"—WESLEY.

Lit. I entreat thee, not being bold. Compliance or non-compliance with this request rested entirely with the Corinthians. The word here translated beseech is not the same as the one used in the last verse. BEET says: "This verse implies that there may be occasions requiring the Christian to lay aside the meekness and clemency which Christ loved to manifest, and to assert himself and act with severity. Sometimes (John 2. 15) Christ did so. But S. Paul's example warns us to do this, as he did, reluctantly and only after efforts to avoid it have failed, as something abnormal, caused and justified by abnormal circumstances."

3. Though we walk in the flesh — "in mortal bodies, and, consequently, are not free from human weakness. Yet we do not war—against the world and the devil—after the flesh — by any carnal or worldly methods, Though the apostle here, and in several other parts of this Epistle, speaks in the plural number, for the sake of modesty and decency, yet he principally means himself. On him were these reflections thrown, and it is his own authority which he is vindicating"—WESLEY.

"In the flesh. To walk in the flesh is to possess the fleshly nature with its many infirmities. (See Rom. 7.) To walk after the flesh is to neglect the dictates of the higher spiritual nature, and to live as though the desires of the body were the only ones that needed satisfying. War after the flesh. The metaphor of a warfare, as applied to the Christian life, is a common one with S. Paul, though it is more usually used of the internal conflict of the Christian soul than of the external warfare waged against the evil around. (See 1 Cor. 9. 26; Eph. 6. 10–17; 1 Thess. 5. 8; 1 Tim. 1. 18; 6. 12; 2 Tim. 2. 3, 4; 4. 7.) Bishop Wordsworth remarks on the fact that 'the armies of imperial Rome, her camps and her campaigns,' and the rest, were 'objects that presented themselves to S. Paul in his travels, and were very familiar to his readers.' (Comp. ch. 2. 14–16)"—LIAS.

4. For the weapons of our warfare—"those we use in this war—are not carnal—but spiritual, and therefore mighty to the throwing down of strongholds—of all the difficulties which men or devils can raise in our way. Though faith and prayer belong also to the Christian armour (Eph. 6. 15, etc.), yet the word of God seems to be here chiefly intended"—WESLEY.

Mighty—i.e. "powerful," is an offset against the weakness of the flesh. For the reason why God chooses weak instruments see ch. 4. 7. But He always gives them the requisite "excess of power" over all opposition. Pulling down of strongholds shows the actual efficacy of these weapons in the hands of S. Paul. Every godly man may be equally valiant and triumphant.

5. "Destroying all vain reasonings, and every high thing which exalteth itself—as a wall or rampart—against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought—or, rather, faculty of the mind — into captivity to the obedience of Christ. Those evil reasonings are destroyed. The mind itself, being overcome and taken captive, lays down all authority of its own, and entirely gives itself up to perform, for the time to come, to Christ its conqueror, the obedience of faith"—WESLEY.

"Casting down. This is not spoken of the 'weapons,' but of the apostles. Imaginations—rather, as margin, 'reasonings.' The rendering 'imaginations' comes from Tyndale. S. Paul refers to the efforts of human reason to deal with things beyond it, the best corrective of which is and always will be the simple proclamation of God's message to man. Against the knowledge of God. For this phrase see Prov. 2. 5; Hos. 6. 6; 1 Cor. 15. 34; Col. 1. 10, and the kindred phrase in Isa. 11. 9; 2 Pet 2. 20. Here it signifies that by which we know God, i.e. the gospel. (See 1 Cor. 2. 16; 13. 12; Gal. 4. 9.) Bringing into captivity—another military metaphor"—C. B. Every thought. The word is the same as in ch. 2. 11; 3. 14; 4. 4. It occurs only in Phil. 4. 7, and in this Epistle. Not only ourselves, but every thought in us must bow to Christ. His victory over us must be complete. We cannot know Him as the supply of all our needs, as our strength and joy and life, until we have seen ourselves to be needy and helpless and lost, i.e. until every high thought within us has been brought down to the dust.

6. Being in readiness to avenge all disobedience—"not only by spiritual censure, but miraculous punishments. When your obedience is fulfilled—when the sound part of you have given proof of your obedience, so that I am in no danger of punishing the innocent with the guilty"—WESLEY.

"The opposition of his enemies suggests to S. Paul a military metaphor. To him life is not only a walk, but a warfare. But he is equipped with superhuman weapons, with which he pulls down whatever in man lifts itself up, thus hindering men from knowing God, and brings every thought to bow to God; and with which He is able to punish all that resist. This reveals the error of those who look upon S. Paul as acting merely from human motives and with human powers. And it gives immense force to his appeal to be allowed to leave unused these great punitive powers, and to imitate the meekness and clemency of Christ. Thus S. Paul begins his self-defence by an entreaty that his opponents will not compel him to punish them; and gives proof of his power to do so by pointing to the spiritual triumphs of blessing, far above human power, which he obtains day by day in the hearts of men. For these triumphs prove that the power of God is with him"—BEET.

7. Do you look at the outward appearance of things—"does any of you judge of a minister of Christ by his person, or any outward circumstance? Let him again think this of himself—let him learn it from his own reflection, before I convince him by a severer method"—WESLEY.

S. Paul asks in surprise whether his readers regard merely external advantages destitute of all spiritual worth, such as his Judaising enemies possessed. They boasted that they belonged to Christ in some special manner in which the apostle did not. Some of them despised S. Paul because of his lowly appearance and demeanour among them. He asks whether it is on the outside of things that they fixed their attention, and then bids them, instead of looking at externals and reckoning accordingly, to make another reckoning from the solitude of their inner selves. The advice is good for men to-day.

8. I should not be ashamed—"as having said more than I could make good"—WESLEY.

"I should not be ashamed—lit. 'I shall not be ashamed,' or perhaps 'shamed,' i.e. brought to shame. 'Shall not be pointed out as a liar or a vain boaster' (CHRYSOSTOM)"—C. B.

9. "I say this, that I may not seem to terrify you by letters—threatening more than I can perform"—WESLEY.

"He had been accused of such terrorism. The letters meant are only those which he had written to the Corinthians. The weighty and strong passages in them were those in which he denounced heathen immoralities, as we know that he did in all the Corinthian letters"—S. C.

10. His bodily presence is weak. "His stature, says S. Chrysostom, was low, his body crooked, and his head bald"—WESLEY.

"His bodily presence is weak. The bodily weakness of the apostle seems clearly indicated by many passages in Scripture. We may perhaps gather from Acts 14. 12 (though this is doubtful) that he was of less dignified presence than S. Barnabas. He refers to his infirmity in 1 Cor. 2. 3. It was probably the thorn in the flesh of which he speaks in ch. 12. 7, and the 'temptation' which was 'in his flesh,' in Gal. 4. 13, 14. There is an admirable note on S. Paul's personal appearance at the end of Dr. Plumptre's Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles in the Bishop of Gloucester's New Testament for English Readers. Worthi to be dispisid (Wyclif). This is the proper meaning of the word 'contemptible.' Whatever S. Paul's fervour and mental and spiritual power may have been it is evident that he lacked the conventional gifts of the orator—the powerful voice, the fluent and facile delivery, the arts whereby to enchain attention. It was not the manner of his speech, but its matter, which attracted his hearers to him"—C. B.

11. Such a one—"i.e. the man who speaks in this way. That, such as we are in word by letters—it is evident that S. Paul's opponents were not very measured in their opposition to him. Not only did they deny his apostolic authority (1 Cor. 9. 1, 6), not only did they ridicule his appearance, but they even charged him with the grossest cowardice. For nothing is more contemptible than to utter loud threats when at a distance, and to subside into silence and meekness when confronted with an adversary"—LIAS.

12. For we presume not—"a strong irony, to equal ourselves—as partners of the same office. Or to compare ourselves—as partakers of the same labour. They among themselves limiting themselves—choosing and limiting their provinces according to their own fancy"—WESLEY.

"In the very act of saying, with a touch of irony, that he will not compare himself with the rival teachers, the apostle virtually does compare himself. And the point he makes is that they instituted no such comparison. They were their own standards of excellence"—ELLICOTT.

13. "But we will not, like them, boastingly extend ourselves beyond our measure, but according to the measure of the province which God hath allotted us—to me, in particular, as the Apostle of the Gentiles. A measure which reaches even unto you. God allotted to each apostle his province, and the measure or bounds thereof"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul fixes the rule of his conduct. He will not act beyond his commission as to persons or things, nor go beyond the line prescribed to him, which false apostles did. His resolution was to keep within his own province. His commission as an apostle was to preach the gospel everywhere, especially among the Gentiles, and he was not confined to one place; yet he observed the directions of Providence and the Holy Spirit as to where he should labour"—M. HENRY.

14. We are come even to you—"by a gradual, regular process, having taken the intermediate places in our way, in preaching the gospel of Christ"—WESLEY.

"The meaning is, For we are not straining ourselves beyond our due limits in claiming you as our charge, for it is an undeniable fact that we came as far as you in our work of preaching the gospel. Corinth was the farthest point the gospel had yet reached"—LIAS.

15. Having hope, now your faith is increased—"so that you can the better spare us. To be enlarged by you abundantly—that is, enabled by you to go still further"—WESLEY.

"Not boasting of things without our measure. The apostle now repeats what he has before said in ver. 13, but directs his remarks more pointedly against the false teachers by adding, in other men's labours. For they, as Meyer remarks, were adorning themselves with strange feathers as they intruded themselves into other men's spheres of work. See also for S. Paul's line of conduct, Gal. 2. 9. When your faith is increased. Two reasons may be assigned for this reservation: (1) that as we have seen (ch. 2. 12, 13), S. Paul could not settle himself to any other work while the Corinthian church was in such an unsatisfactory condition, and (2) that the consistent conduct of one Christian community was an immense help to the first missionaries of the gospel in founding another. (See Tit. 2. 8; 1 Pet. 2. 12.) Enlarged. The apostle seems to identify himself with his work, as he has before identified himself with the Corinthian church. (See ch. 3. 2; 7. 3.) He is enlarged when the Church is enlarged by his means"—C. B.

16. In the regions beyond you—"to the west and south, where the gospel had not yet been preached"—WESLEY.

To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you—i.e. the rest of Greece, Italy, and Spain. (Comp. Rom. 15. 19, 24-28.) S. Paul here attributes his further progress in the gospel not to his own energy, but to their faith, another instance of his identification of himself with those in whom the same life dwelt. (Comp. ch. 1. 11.) And not to boast in another man's line—lit. and not "to have boasted." Both this word and the word translated "enlarged" and "preach the gospel" are in the past tense. S. Paul here again reflects indirectly, but most severely, upon his opponents. Our hope is first that your faith may increase, and then that we may congratulate ourselves on having carried the good tidings of the gospel to those who as yet have not heard them, not, as others do, on the successes which by intruding into another man's work, we have found ready made for us.

17. But he that glorieth. This passage occurs in 1 Cor. 1. 31, where it is prefaced by the words, "it is written." It is, in fact, a paraphrase of Jer. 9. 24. Meyer remarks that a noble example of this kind of glorying is given by S. Paul himself in 1 Cor. 15. 10. (Comp. also ch. 12. 10.)

18. For not he that commendeth himself is approved. "S. Paul's self-commendation is only wrung from him by circumstances. The Corinthians cannot judge of things 'after the appearance' (ver. 7). S. Paul, bearing in mind the wise man's advice to 'answer a fool according to his folly' (Prov. 26. 5), shows that even from that point of view the new teachers could not arrogate to themselves any superiority over him. But he takes care to remark that the only true ground of approval is to do the work of God"—C. B.

CHAPTER XI.

1. I wish ye would bear. "So does he pave the way for what otherwise might have given offence. With my folly—of commending myself; which to many may appear folly; and really would be so, were it not on this occasion absolutely necessary"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul admits the foolishness of talking about oneself; but claims forbearance, on the ground that he does not say much. To talk about oneself is usually a mark of unsound mind. Of this folly, to a small extent, and (ver. 13) to serve God, S. Paul will now be guilty. These words (comp. ver. 16; 12. 1-11) betray a man unaccustomed to speak about himself. He cannot do so, even to serve God, without apology"—BEET.

2. For. "The cause of his seeming folly is expressed in this and the following verse; the cause why they should bear with him (ver. 4)"—WESLEY.

Present you as a chaste virgin to Christ—"i.e. at His coming. (Comp. Eph. 5. 27) where Christ is said, Himself to present the Church to Himself. The betrothal in S. Paul's day, as in some Christian countries at the present time, preceded the marriage sometimes by a considerable interval. There is a reference here also to the passages from the Old Testament cited above, and to Ezek. 23., etc."—C. B.

3. But I fear. "Love is full of these fears. Lest as the serpent—a most apposite comparison—deceived Eve—simple, ignorant of evil—by his subtlety—which is in the highest degree dangerous to such a disposition—so your minds—we might therefore be tempted, even if there were no sin in us—might be corrupted—losing their virginal purity—from the simplicity that is in Christ—that simplicity which is lovingly intent on Him alone, seeking no other person or thing"—WESLEY.

As the serpent beguiled Eve. "The Church, as a second Eve, is espoused to Christ, the new Adam. (1 Cor. 15. 45.) She must beware lest, like Eve, she listens to the voice of the same tempter, who ever lieth in wait to deceive, and to lose the privileges she was destined to enjoy. (See ch. 2. 11.) Through his subtlety. (See ch. 4. 2.) A similar sentiment will be found in Col. 2. 4-8. For the serpent, see Gen. 3. 1"—LIAS. From the simplicity—rather, "single-mindedness." (See ch. 1. 12; 8. 2; 9. 11-13.) That is in Christ—"lit. that is unto Christ" "that ye had toward Christ"—CRANMER. "This is an expression commonly mistaken. People suppose simplicity means that a child or ploughman can understand. Now if this be simplicity, the simplicity of the gospel was corrupted by S. Paul himself. 'Simple,' according to S. Paul, means, 'unmixed, unadulterated'"—ROBERTSON. The meaning therefore is, "your single-minded devotion to Christ."

4. If indeed—"any could show you another Saviour, a more powerful Spirit, a better gospel. Ye might well bear with him—but this is impossible"—WESLEY.

He that cometh. "This shows that the false teachers came from elsewhere, whence they brought their corruptions (Chrysostom). (Comp. Acts 15. 1-24; Gal. 2. 4-12.) Otherwise, says Olshausen, they would have been excommunicated. Another Jesus. The word is not the same as that translated 'another' below. In this case it means the 'same' Jesus ('the historical Jesus,' Stanley), but preached in such a way as to produce a different impression. (Comp. the Greek in Gal. 1. 6, 7.) Or if ye receive another spirit, which ye have not received—lit. 'whom (or which) ye did not receive.' The preaching of Jesus after quite another fashion, that of bondage to law (Acts 15. 1; Gal. 4. 21), would involve the communication of a different spirit (see last note) to the spirit of liberty made known by S. Paul (Rom. 8. 2-15)"—C. B.

5. "He is not seriously comparing himself with them, but speaking with increasing bitterness of the supposed position of inferiority which they had tried to assign him"—S. C. S. Paul may mean that no apostles existed anywhere, however great they might be, who could claim superiority over him. (Comp. Gal. 2. 6–9.) ROBERTSON has some interesting remarks on the common interpretation: "Some cannot understand the feeling which prompts an expression like this. Shallow men would call it egotism, vanity, folly, as if egotism consisted only in speaking of oneself. True Christian modesty is not the being ignorant of what we are, neither does it consist in affecting ignorance. It consists in this—in having a high and sublime standard set before us, so that we feel how far we are from attaining to that."

6. If I am unskilful in speech—"if I speak in a plain, unadorned way, like an unlearned person. So the Greek word properly signifies" —WESLEY.

But though I be rude in speech. The word signifies one not specially instructed in an art. "It does not mean one who is not eloquent, but one who has not learned eloquence by the rules of rhetorical schools"—WORDSWORTH. (See ch. 10. 10.)

7. Have I committed an offence? "Will any turn this into an objection? In humbling myself—to work at my trade. That ye might be exalted—to be children of God"—WESLEY.

"This passage is ironical. The Corinthians had allowed S. Paul's anxious desire not to be burdensome to them to be used against him. (See 1 Cor. 9. 1–14.) He asks if such an anxiety for their welfare was to be imputed to him as a sin. (Comp. the very similar passage in ch. 12. 13.) Abasing myself—i.e. by working for his living, when he might have enjoyed what men are apt to regard as a dignified ease at their expense. For the word see note on ch. 10. 1. That you might be exalted. He speaks, not of temporal exaltation, for his coming made no difference, unless perhaps for the worse, in their temporal condition, but of the 'height of Christian salvation' (Meyer) to which they had been lifted"—C. B.

8. I spoiled other churches. "I, as it were, took the spoils of them: it is a military term. Taking wages (or 'pay,' another military word) of them—when I came to you at first. And when I was present with you, and wanted—my work not quite supplying my necessities—I was chargeable to no man—of Corinth"—WESLEY.

"I robbed other churches. Meyer says this is 'an hyperbolical expression.' And yet in one sense it was true, for the Corinthians were just as much bound to support the apostle when at Corinth as any other churches were when the apostle was with them, and therefore if, when at Corinth, he availed himself of assistance from those other churches, he was taking from them what they ought not to have been called upon to supply. Why he did so we are told in ver. 12. Taking wages of them. The Philippian church, we learn from Phil. 4. 15, 16 (comp. next verse), is the church referred to. Their liberality, S. Paul felt, was not likely to be cast in his teeth, therefore he readily accepted it. In later days he again received their bounty with a willingness which would not, he knew, be misconstrued. This is an instance of that minute but undesigned agreement in points of detail which constitutes so strong an argument for the genuineness of most of the Scriptures of the New Testament. (For the word translated 'wages,' see S. Luke 3. 14; Rom. 6. 23; 1 Cor. 9. 7.) It was most commonly used of a soldier's pay, when given in kind"—C. B.

9. For—"I chose to receive help from the poor Macedonians, rather than the rich Corinthians! Were the poor in all ages more generous than the rich?"—WESLEY.

"The principal fact set forth in this passage, the arrival at Corinth of brethren from Macedonia during S. Paul's residence in that city, is explicitly recorded (Acts 18. 1–5)"—PALEY.

10. This my boasting shall not be stopped —"for I will receive nothing from you"—WESLEY.

As the truth of Christ is in me—"rather, 'the truthe of Crist is in me' (Wyclif, whom the Geneva and Rheims versions follow here), or 'if the truth' (Tyndale and Cranmer). 'There is no oath' (Dean Alford, who refers to Rom. 9. 1). 'The mind of Christ is in him (1 Cor. 2. 16), the heart of Christ beats in him (Phil. 1. 8), Christ speaks in him (ch. 12. 3), and all this through the Spirit of Christ which dwells in him"—MEYER.

11. "Do I refuse to receive anything of you, because I love you not? God knoweth that that is not the case"—WESLEY.

"Wherefore? The question interrupts the discourse as if to compel the readers to consider S. Paul's conduct and motive. Because I do not love you? His refusal of money from the Corinthians while accepting it from the Macedonians might seem to be an act of contemptuous dislike. For we seldom refuse a gift from those we love. God knows—before whom S. Paul's heart and apostolic work 'are made manifest'"—BEET. "He would not give occasion for any to accuse him of worldly designs in preaching the gospel"—M. HENRY.

12. Who desire any occasion—"to censure me. That wherein they boast, they may be found even as we—they boasted of being 'burdensome to no man.' But it was a vain boast in them, though not in the apostle"—WESLEY.

"That wherein they glory, they may be found even as we. These words seem to imply that the Corinthian false teachers did not accept money or maintenance for their services. But then it is difficult to see how they could have made that very practice an argument against S. Paul. It is, therefore, better to suppose that they boasted of their disinterestedness, in spite of their willingness to enrich themselves at the Corinthians' expense (see next verse), and that S. Paul was determined that they should have no solid ground for insinuations of this kind against him—though such were made nevertheless (ch. 12. 16, 17) by those who judged of the apostle by themselves. So he steadfastly refused to take a farthing of money from the Corinthians, preferring to undergo privations (ver. 9) rather than give an opportunity to his opponents to assert of him what was true of themselves, that his professed disinterestedness was only a pretence"—LIAS.

14. Satan himself is transformed—"uses to transform himself; to put on the fairest appearance"—WESLEY.

"Satan himself is transformed. (Comp. ch. 2. 11.) Not that he is really so transformed, but that he appears to be so, to those who judge 'according to the appearance' (ch. 10. 7; Gal. 6. 12; Phil. 1. 15; 3. 18; Tit. 1. 10, 11), 'transformed into, not becoming' (Chrysostom). He reads 'if Satan himself'"—C. B. "Satan's empire is darkness (Col. 1. 13). But it is his habit to approach men in the garb of an angel from heaven. And at all times evil is prone to assume the appearance of good"—BEET.

15. "Therefore it is no great, no strange, thing; whose end, notwithstanding all their disguises, shall be according to their works"—WESLEY.

"His ministers—doing, of their own free choice, his work. (Comp. 'his angels,' Matt. 25. 41; Rev. 12. 7.) Such are all who deal in falsehood and guile; for unconsciously they are acting under his guidance and are working out his purposes. This fearful description implies that S. Paul's opponents, though church members and professed followers and apostles of Jesus, were bad men, deliberately deceiving the Corinthian Christians. Therefore, since evil ever assumes the garb of good, in order to ensnare men, it was no wonder that these men assumed a garb which was not their own. Ministers of righteousness—as in ch. 3. 9. (Comp. Rom. 6. 19.) These men put on a new garb, representing themselves as men labouring to make dominant among men conformity to the law of God, and thus servants of the abstract principle of 'righteousness.' Whose end, etc. Their guilt was so evident that a mere statement of a general principle announces their fate. These words imply that S. Paul had no expectation that all men will eventually be saved. For he is evidently thinking of bad works; and therefore of a bad end"—BEET.

16. I say again—"he premises a new apology to this new commendation of himself. Let no man think me a fool—let none think I do this without the utmost necessity. But if any do think me foolish herein, yet bear with my folly"—WESLEY.

"I say again. (Comp. ch. 10. 8; 11. 1, 6.) Three times he has attempted to begin his boast. First he is interrupted by the recollection of the hollowness of the boast of his opponents; again, he is checked by the difficulty of pressing it on men so perverted by the influence of their false teachers; and again, when he is led aside to answer the charge arising from his refusal of support. Now once more he returns to the point, and now for the first time carries it through"—STANLEY. Let no man think me a fool. This reiterated appeal to the Corinthians is due to the fact that S. Paul keenly feels the unsuitableness of such boasting to the Christian character. (See ch. 12. 6, and notes on ch. 10. 8; 11. 1.) "Observe how, when about to enter upon his own praises, he checks himself"—CHRYSOSTOM.

17. I speak not after the Lord—"not by an express command from Him, though still under the direction of His Spirit. But as it were foolishly—in such a manner as many may think foolish"—WESLEY.

"There are many things"—he mentions war, self-defence, generous resentment—"which are not exactly after Christ, and yet are not contrary to the spirit of Christ"—ROBERTSON. "By itself it is not after the Lord, but it becomes so by the intention"—CHRYSOSTOM. "Like an oath, self-praise may under certain circumstances become necessary, especially for those who, like S. Paul, have the public duties of a sacred ministry to discharge"—WORDSWORTH. S. Paul was resolved "by all means to save some" (1 Cor. 9. 22). If there were those at Corinth who raised objections to his ministrations, he took them on their own ground, and showed that, low and unworthy as that ground was, even there they had no sufficient justification for their conduct. It is often necessary to adopt such a course, on the principle laid down by our Lord in Matt. 7. 6. Appeals to the higher spiritual instincts of men who have never cultivated those instincts are useless. We must deal with mankind as they are, and hope thus to lead them to become what at present they are not. And if it be asked how we are to know when to walk "after the Lord," and when to condescend to the folly of mankind, the answer is, whenever we conscientiously believe it to be for their benefit.

18. After the flesh—"that is, in external things"—WESLEY.

"This verse states explicitly the excuse first intimated. It is because many boast according to the flesh that I also will boast. The emphasis lies upon the reason. The words 'according to the flesh' show how such boasting cannot be 'according to the will of the Lord,' and that he requires some apology for resorting to it. They prepare his readers also for the carnal strain which he is about to adopt; carnal only because the things which were boasted of are external and circumstantial, such as Hebrew descent, for instance (vers. 22, 23)"—S. C.

19. Being wise—"a beautiful irony"—WESLEY.

"Since S. Paul's readers are full of sense, it is easy for them to condescend to bear with others, who have less sense than themselves. This bitterly sarcastic justification of his own boasting, S. Paul supports at once, in ver. 20, by his readers' forbearance towards his opponents"—BEET.

20. For ye suffer—"not only the folly, but the gross abuses, of those false apostles. If a man enslave you—lord it over you in the most arbitrary manner. If he devour you—by his exorbitant demands; notwithstanding his boast of not being burdensome. If he take from you—by open violence. If he exalt himself—by the most unbounded self-commendation. If he smite you on the face (a very possible case)—under pretence of Divine zeal"—WESLEY.

Smite you on the face—an utterly extraordinary and inconceivable piece of presumption, according to our modern notions. But we do not habitually realise the immense extent to which Christianity has leavened our habits. Dean Stanley refers us to 1 Kings 22. 24; Matt. 5. 39; Luke 22. 64; Acts. 23. 2; 1 Tim. 3. 3; Tit. 1. 7; and to the canon of the Council of Braga (A.D. 675), which orders that no bishop at his will and pleasure shall strike (the original, however, seems to imply scourging) his clergy, lest he lose the respect which they owe him. He might have referred also to the famous Latrocinium, or robber synod of Ephesus, in which one patriarch of the church and his adherents literally stamped another to death, and even to a period so late as the Council of Trent, in which it is admitted, even by the Jesuit historian Pallavicino, that scenes of personal violence occurred among those who were or should have been teachers of religion. —See his History of the Council of Trent, bk. viii. ch. 6.

21. I speak with regard to reproach, as though we had been weak—"I say, 'Bear with me,' even on supposition that the weakness be real which they reproach me with"—WESLEY.

"We have become weak—by laying all our powers on the altar of Christ, and by going at His bidding into positions of helplessness. (Comp. Phil. 3. 8.) These words are inserted to make conspicuous the contrast which follows. Anyone is daring (as in ch. 10. 2)—as the opponents were. I also—keeps before us, as in vers. 16, 18, the comparison of S. Paul and his opponents. In whatever matter they act fearlessly, disregarding consequences, S. Paul, though ever acknowledging his own weakness, is equally fearless. They are not afraid to usurp authority over the Church of Christ, and S. Paul is not afraid to punish them" —BEET.

22. Are they Hebrews, Israelites, the seed of Abraham—"these were the heads on which they boasted"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul's answer is, that he too was a Hebrew; or, as he puts it in Phil. 3. 5, 'a Hebrew, born of Hebrews.' What he means is obviously that his parents were Jews of Palestine, and that the accident of his birth in Tarsus had not annulled his claim to that nationality. As a matter of fact it made him able to unite things that were commonly looked on as incompatible, and to be both a Hebrew and a Hellenist"—ELLICOTT.

23. "I am more so than they. In deaths often—surrounding me in the most dreadful forms"—WESLEY.

"I speak as a fool—rather as a 'madman.' Our translation is Tyndale's. The word in the original is stronger than that in vers. 16, 19. S. Paul is not thinking here so much of the impression his words may produce on the Corinthians, as of the fact that all 'boasting' in God's sight is 'excluded' by the 'law of faith' (Rom. 3. 27; comp. Luke 17. 10). Mad indeed is it to boast of anything as constituting a claim on God for reward. But facts are facts, and they may be appealed to, not for self-glorification, but (ch. 12. 11) to confute pretensions which ought never to be advanced. In labours more abundant. (Comp. 1. Cor. 15. 10.) He now commences the proof of this assertion, and it consists not in words but in deeds. He appeals to 'a life hitherto without precedent in the history of the world. Self-devotion at particular moments, or for some special national cause, had been often seen before; but a self-devotion involving sacrifices like those here described, extending through a period of at least fourteen years, and in behalf of no local or family interest, but for the interest of mankind at large, was up to this time a thing unknown' (Stanley). In prisons more frequent—'what is left out is more than is ennumerated' (Chrysostom). There is but one imprisonment mentioned up to this time in the Acts (ch. 16. 23). So there is but one beaten with rods (see below). The Acts of the Apostles, being written with a special purpose (see note on ch. 1. 8; 6. 5), does not attempt to give a full account of S. Paul's labours and sufferings. Estius accounts it a proof of S. Paul's modesty that he had never mentioned these things even to a friend so intimate as S. Luke.' In deaths oft. (Comp. ch. 1. 9, 10; 4. 11; 1 Cor. 15. 31.) 'Perils containing death,' i.e. as a possible event (Chrysostom)" —C. B.

24. Five times I received from the Jews forty stripes save one—"which was the utmost that the Law allowed. With the Romans he sometimes pleaded his privilege as a Roman; but from the Jews he suffered all things"—WESLEY.

"None of these are recorded in the Acts. It is probable that his words refer to the early period of his work in Cilicia. The number of the stripes in Jewish punishments of this kind rested on the rule of Deut. 25. 3, which fixed forty as the maximum. The punishment was inflicted with a leather scourge of three knotted thongs"—ELLICOTT. "Notice that the Jews, even in cruelty and injustice to a servant of God, were scrupulously careful to obey in an insignificant detail the letter of the Law. (Comp. Matt. 23. 23)"—BEET.

25. Thrice I have been shipwrecked—"before his voyage to Rome. In the deep—probably floating on some part of the vessel"—WESLEY.

Thrice was I beaten with rods. (See Acts 16. 22, 23, and note on ver. 23.) This punishment is also said frequently to have caused the death of the victim. It was inflicted by the Romans on those who did not possess the privilege of Roman citizenship. (Acts 22. 25.)

"The shipwreck related in Acts 27 is not one of these, but occurred some time afterwards. We have no other account of those referred to here. A night and a day. The apostle here speaks of some terrible peril, compared to which even the shipwreck related in Acts 27 was a trifling one"—C. B.

27. In cold and nakedness—"having no place where to lay my head; no convenient raiment to cover me; yet appearing before noblemen, governors, kings, and not being ashamed"—WESLEY.

"The current of his thoughts has carried him away into sufferings and perils, but he has not exhausted the exertions and trials which wasted his body. In toil and labour. The first of these, in the original, describes the physical wear and tear and weariness, the second the painful efforts of hard work. The hunger and thirst meant were not endured in voluntary devotional exercises, but in famines, droughts, in the wilderness or at sea, or on long journeys. The fastings are abstinence practised when he preferred his ministerial labours to the satisfaction of his wants (ch. 6. 5)"—S. C.

28. Beside the things which are from without—"which I suffer on the account of others—namely, the care of all the churches—a more modest expression than if he had said, the care of the whole Church. All—even those I have not seen in the flesh. S. Peter himself could not have said this in so strong a sense"—WESLEY.

"This anxiety explains his prayers (Rom. 1. 9; Phil. 1. 4; Col. 1. 3; 1 Thess. 1. 2) for each church singly"—BEET. "It is remarkable that S. Paul does not glory in what he has done, but in what he had borne; he does not speak of his successes, of his converts, of the heresies he had subdued; but he speaks of the manifold trials which he had undergone for Christ. He had 'filled up that which was behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh, for His body's sake, which is the Church.' This marks all his conduct and sufferings as being in the spirit of the cross, that it was for the sake of others"—ROBERTSON.

29. Who—"so he had not only the care of the churches but of every person therein—is weak, and I am not weak—by sympathy, as well as by condescension. Who is offended—hindered in, or turned out of, the good way, and I burn not—being pained as though I had fire in my bosom"—WESLEY.

"Examples of this anxiety, and its effect upon S. Paul. Weak—in faith and spiritual life (1 Cor. 8. 9; Rom. 14. 1). Weakness is practically a limitation of our action. S. Paul makes the weakness of these brethren a limitation of his own action. (So 1 Cor. 8. 9-13; Rom. 15. 1.) For his intense sympathy moves him to look at everything from their point of view, and to abstain from whatever will injure them"—BEET. "Men came to the apostle with their tales of shame, and told how they had been tempted and had fallen; and here, too, he, in that illimitable sympathy of his, seemed to have travelled with them on the downward road. He felt himself suffused, as it were, with the burning glow of their shame. He blushed with them and for them, as though the sin had been his own"—ELLICOTT.

30. I will glory of the things that concern my infirmities—"of what shows my weakness, rather than my strength"—WESLEY.

A retrospective and prospective reflection furnishes the transition step from what precedes to what follows.

31. "God, who knows all things, knows that he lies not in what he has said and is going to say—who is blessed for ever is a brief, pious doxology, adding solemnity to the asseveration, and perhaps expresses thankfulness for deliverance and support in all these distresses"—S. C. Meyer reminds us, the visions and revelations related in ch. 12. 1-4, are an interruption of his enumeration of his infirmities, which he resumes in ch. 12. 5. And perhaps eighteen centuries of Christianity have somewhat dimmed our perception of the immense difference between this vaunt and those customary among the inflated teachers of S. Paul's day. They enlarged their triumphs, their influence with the rich and great, the success of their oratory, the number of their disciples, and this with an arrogance which in our days would be justly contemptible. S. Paul, while he shows his sincerity by the fact that his life was exposed to danger, narrates nothing but his escape, a circumstance not likely in itself to raise his reputation among men who judged only according to outward appearance. Men should not so judge.

32. The governor under Aretas—"king of Arabia and Syria, of which Damascus was a chief city, willing to oblige the Jews, kept the city—"setting guards at all the gates day and night"—WESLEY.

Aretas (see Josephus' Antiquities, xviii.) was the king of Arabia Petræa. His daughter had been divorced by Herod Antipas, in order that he might marry Herodias, "his brother Philip's wife" (see Matt. 14. 3-5). This and some disputes about the frontier led to war being proclaimed, and a battle was fought (A.D. 36) in which Herod's army was entirely destroyed. It is thought by some that Aretas profited by this circumstance to seize on Damascus, and that it was just at this juncture (A.D. 37) that S. Paul returned to Damascus from his stay in Arabia. Others, however, place this event about the year 39, after Herod Antipas had been banished to Gaul, and think that Aretas, taken into favour by Caligula, had obtained Damascus, among the various changes which the new emperor made in the arrangements of his eastern provinces.

33. Through a window — "of an house which stood on the city wall"—WESLEY.

"We have here another witness of the correctness of the Book of Acts. (Comp. Acts 9. 25.) The slight difference is easily explained by supposing that the Jews prompted and assisted Ethnarch to watch for S. Paul. The abrupt transition from this incident suggests that it was designed to be the beginning of a series of proofs of S. Paul's 'weaknesses,' a series commencing at the very commencement of his Christian course; but broken off suddenly to make way for the more startling matter of ch. 12. 2-4. S. Paul's furtive mode of escape (in the darkness of night, Acts 9. 24) proves the extreme peril and helplessness of his position. By narrating this incident he was therefore boasting in the things which belong to his weakness"—BEET.

CHAPTER XII.

1. It is not expedient — "unless on so pressing an occasion. Visions are seen; revelations heard"—WESLEY.

"The narrative of S. Paul's first great peril seemed to be the beginning of a series of similar adventures. But the series is suddenly broken off by another expression of reluctance to speak about himself. He writes under necessity. This reveals again his deep consciousness of the folly of boasting. Needful—in order to put his opponents to shame, and thus rescue the readers from their snares. (Comp. ver. 11; 11. 30.) Not profitable—as a general principle, neither for him who speaks nor those who hear"—BEET.

2. I knew a man in Christ — "that is, a Christian. It is plain, from vers. 6, 7, that he means himself, though in modesty he speaks as of a third person. Whether in the body or out of the body I know not. It is equally possible with God to present distant things to the imagination in the body, as if the soul were absent from it and present with them; or to transport both soul and body for what time He pleases to heaven; or to transport the soul only thither for a season, and in the meantime to preserve the body fit for its re-entrance. But since the apostle himself did not know whether his soul was in the body, or whether one or both were actually in heaven, it would be vain curiosity for us to attempt determining it. The third heaven—where God is; far above the aerial and the starry heaven. Some suppose it was here the apostle was let into the mystery of the future state of the Church, and received his orders to turn from the Jews and go to the Gentiles"—WESLEY.

"Christ—i.e. after his conversion, when he had become united to Christ. Above fourteen years ago. And yet, as Chrysostom and Calvin remark, he had kept silence about it all this time. The secret raptures of the soul should be matters between it and God, not subjects of boasting, save where necessity compels it. After all, the main point (ver. 6) is what a man is, not what he has seen, even of things beyond the sphere of sense. Whether this were the revelation spoken of in Gal. 1. 12; 2. 2, we cannot tell. S. Paul had many such revelations, and he gives here no distinct intimation of the time at which the vision occurred. Whether out of the body. The apostle here by implication acknowledges the possibility of consciousness and receptivity in a disembodied state"—ALFORD. "S. Paul shrunk from saying 'I was rapt,' which would have seemed like a boast. His personal will was for the time so annihilated that he speaks of himself as though he were another and not himself. A man in Christ might merely describe his Christian state; but in this context it expresses that his individuality was swallowed up in Christ; that it was the spirit of Christ in which he lived that rendered him capable of the translation and its experiences"—S. C. I cannot tell. "The fact of the vision was certain enough. He saw clearly what God gave him permission to see, but whether the soul was rapt from his body left without life, or whether body and soul were caught up together to the third heaven and to paradise, was known only to God"—LIAS.

3. Yea, I knew such a man — "that at another time"—WESLEY.

"At the gates of paradise. Before access to the Divine presence, he seems to pause with reverential awe, and restates his unconsciousness as to his embodied or disembodied state in the same language as before, substituting only 'apart from' for 'out of.' The repetition may imply that he conceived the possibility of his body having been left in the vestibule of paradise, so to speak, and that his spirit and soul alone were admitted"—S. C.

4. He was caught up into paradise—"the seat of happy spirits in their separate state, between death and the resurrection. Things which it is not possible for man to utter— human language being incapable of expressing them. Here he anticipated the joyous rest of the righteous that die in the Lord. But this rapture did not precede, but follow after, his being caught up to the third heaven: a strong intimation that he must first discharge his mission, and then enter into glory. And beyond all doubt, such a foretaste of it served to strengthen him in all his after trials, when he could call to mind the very joy that was prepared for him"—WESLEY.

"He does not say what he saw, but only what he heard; but, as he is giving an account of a vision, and also speaking with reverential reticence, we are justified in inferring that he saw the things incorruptible, undefiled, which fade not away, reserved in heaven for the saints (1 Pet. 1. 4), and that he beheld the glorified Lord"—S. C. "Unspeakable words—lit. 'unspoken words,' which may in this case have been the fact, since, if S. Paul were out of the body, as he himself tells us he may have been, the words could not have been 'spoken,' in our sense of the word. But the epithet usually has the sense which the context attaches to it here, words not to be uttered. Calvin asks to what purpose then were they uttered to S. Paul, and replies that he needed such spiritual consolation to sustain him in the heavy load of afflictions and cares which was laid upon him. We may also hence learn, he continues, that there are depths in the counsels of God which we must not hope or even wish to penetrate while here on earth. Dean Stanley contrasts the reticence of S. Paul with the full details of his supposed visions given by Mahomet, and he might have added many others who have given detailed accounts of things seen in their ecstasies"—C. B. "Not lawful for a man to utter—Christian modesty forbids. There are transfiguration moments, bridal hours of the soul; and not easily forgiven are those who would utter the secrets of its high intercourse with its Lord. There is a certain spiritual indelicacy in persons who cannot perceive that not everything which is a matter of experience and knowledge is, therefore, a subject of conversation. Secret things belong to God"—ROBERTSON. "Paradise—probably a Persian word, but found in Hebrew. In Gen. 13. 10, the Jordan valley looks like 'the paradise of God'; and in chaps. 2 and 3 the 'garden of Eden' is constantly rendered 'paradise of pleasure.' To this last, Rev. 2. 7 evidently refers, and 2. Cor. 12. 4 and Luke 23. 43 suggest it. In Luke 23. 43 it is evidently the pleasant place where the souls of the departed righteous wait for the resurrection. The associations of the word suggest that Christ by His entrance made the dark Sheol or Hades (Hebrew and Greek names for the place of the dead) into a place of delight (Rev. 2. 7; comp. ch. 22. 2), and refers to the place of final glory, which will surround the palace and throne of God. It is practically the same as the New Jerusalem, which John saw coming down out of heaven from God; and which may therefore be supposed to be already existing in heaven. It is thus distinguished from the paradise into which at His death Christ entered. It is difficult to say whether S. Paul refers here to the happy place of the departed righteous, or to that more glorious place before the throne where we may conceive sinless spirits of other races already dwelling in glory, and which will in the great day extend its boundaries to earth, that it may be the final home of redeemed mankind"—BEET.

5. Of such an one I will—"I might, glory; but I will not glory of myself—as considered in myself"—WESLEY.

S. Paul desires to put the fact in the background that it is of himself he is speaking. (See next verse.) He even seems to make a distinction between himself as he is and the man once so highly glorified by God, and returns to a kind of boasting more in accordance with his own sense of propriety. So he expatiates on the thorn in the flesh as an instance of how human weakness does but serve to manifest the power of God.

6. For if I should resolve to glory—"referring to, I might glory of such a glorious revelation. I should not be a fool—that is, it could not justly be accounted folly to relate the naked truth. But I forbear—I speak sparingly of these things, for fear anyone should think too highly of me. O where is this fear now to be found? Who is afraid of this?"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul here identifies himself with the man who saw the visions. 'I shall not be foolish, even if I do boast, for I shall only be speaking the truth. But I refrain.' Forbear. (See ch. 1. 23; 9. 6; 13. 2, where the word is the same in the Greek; also 1 Cor. 7. 28, and Rom. 8. 32; 11. 21.) Lest any man should think. It is not visions or revelations, however exalted, for which a man ought to be esteemed, but his conduct and the message with which he is entrusted"—LIAS. "Whatever estimate his person or speech, as known to his readers, might occasion, he was content with it, and would not try to raise it by anything to which their eyes and ears could not bear testimony. He knew in fact that all personal defects were in accordance with God's will and served His purpose, as he goes on to show"—S. C.

7. There was given me—"by the wise and gracious providence of God—a thorn in the flesh—a visitation more painful than any thorn sticking in the flesh. A messenger or angel of Satan to buffet me—perhaps both visibly and invisibly; and the word in the original expresses the present, as well as the past, time. All kinds of affliction had befallen the apostle. Yet none of those did he deprecate. But here he speaks of one, as above all the rest, one that macerated him with weakness, and by the pain and ignominy of it prevented his being lifted up more, or, at least, not less than the most vehement headache could have done, which many of the ancients say he laboured under. S. Paul seems to have had a fresh fear of these 'buffetings' every moment, when he so frequently represses himself in his boasting, though it was extorted from him by the utmost necessity"—WESLEY.

"That I be not beyond measure lifted up—kind foresight of God. That S. Paul found himself exposed to this danger, warns us of the spiritual peril which always accompanies special gifts. None but a great and humble man could have made such confessions"—BEET. Thorn—we should inquire not what the thorn was, but why it was sent. We should look for general rather than special truths in it. We are sure that it was a trial partaking of the nature of a thorn; and that the apostle rejoiced in it—not as a thorn, but because God's strength was given to support him under it. ROBERTSON says: "I infer they were secret trials, unknown to others. A thorn is a small, invisible cause of suffering; a pang so small as to be unsuspected; some secret trouble, unknown even to our most intimate friends. I infer that it is something evil, for he calls it a messenger of Satan to buffet him. We must not allow our understandings to be so perverted as to think that because pain can be blessed to us, it is in itself a blessed thing, and ought to be liked by a Christian. Very unreal habits of thought are thus fostered. The Christians rejoiced in tribulation—in God; but that in spite of, not because of, tribulation. And here, God does not command S. Paul to think the throb of his thorn enjoyable. He only bids him bear it. A thorn causes perpetual, unvarying, incessant pain. Let this peculiar characteristic be remembered, as distinguishing the thorn from ordinary sorrows. It is an ever-present possibility of pang."

8. Concerning this. "He had now forgot his being lifted up. I besought the Lord thrice—as our Lord besought His Father"—WESLEY.

For this thing I besought the Lord thrice—lit. "concerning" this. For the word translated "besought" see ch. 1. 3; 8. 6, and ver. 18 of this chapter. With S. Paul's prayer here compare Matt. 26. 39–44, and the parallel passages in the other Gospels. It is not wrong to offer such petitions, or our Lord would not have done so. But humanity in its weakness often shrinks from trials which God in His wisdom knows to be best for it. The only requisite for such prayers is that they shall be offered in a spirit of submission to a higher will. Dean Stanley remarks on S. Paul's vivid sense of a personal Lord, to whom all difficulties may be taken, and who never fails to answer such appeals. The Lord—Jesus Christ. We may compare S. Paul's imitation of his Master with that of S. Stephen. (See Acts. 7. 59, and comp. Luke 23. 46.)

9. But He said to me—"in answer to my third request. My grace is sufficient for thee—how tender a repulse! We see there may be grace where there is the quickest sense of pain. My strength is more illustriously displayed by the weakness of the instrument. Therefore will I glorify in my weakness rather than my revelations, that the strength of Christ may rest upon me. The Greek word properly means, may 'cover me all over like a tent.' We ought most willingly to accept whatever tends to this end, however contrary to flesh and blood"—WESLEY.

Sufficient for thee, etc. "'My smile and my purpose to do thee good will afford everything needful for thy highest welfare, even in spite of this great affliction.' This implied refusal is at once justified by a great truth. The well-known power, with which Christ makes His people strong (Phil. 4. 30) to do and to dare and to suffer. Weakness—conspicuous contrast to power. Accomplished—attains its full goal, works out its full results, and thus reveals its full grandeur. (Same word in Rom. 2. 27; Gal. 5. 16; Luke 12. 50; 18. 31; 22. 37; John 19. 28, 30.) The power of Christ manifests to the full its irresistible energy, and attains its highest results by performing works of power with powerless instruments. For this reason Christ refused to remove the stake in the flesh which seemed to be to S. Paul an element of weakness. (Comp. ch. 4. 7; 1. 9.) Notice that 'the power' of Christ makes His grace sufficient for us. For He who smiles upon us is able to accomplish His kindly purpose"—BEET.

10. Weaknesses—"whether proceeding from Satan or men. For when I am weak—deeply conscious of my weakness—then does the strength of Christ rest upon me"—WESLEY.

"A final inference from the relation of his weakness to Christ's strength, and going beyond that of the last verse, by passing from a feeling of elation in weaknesses to a calm approval of them by the mind and judgment, and by specifying various extreme forms of them with a sense of triumph that in all the strength of grace conquers the feebleness of the flesh. He then worthily winds up his boasting by a noble Christian paradox, which identifies the times of his weakness precisely with those of his strength"—S. C.

11. Though I am nothing—"of myself"—WESLEY.

"The words are partly ironical—partly speak of an impatient consciousness that what he had been saying would seem to give colour to the opprobious epithets that had been flung at him"—ELLICOTT.

12. Truly the signs, etc. The passage is remarkable for using the word "signs," first, in the general sense, as "notes" or "tokens," and the more specifically for works of supernatural power; and it is one of those sentences in which S. Paul distinctly claims a supernatural power for himself, and appeals to its exercise. (Comp. Rom. 15. 19—written, it will be remembered, shortly after this—and 1 Cor. 2. 4.)

13. What is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches? "His mind travels back to the insinuation that he cared less for them than he did for the churches of Macedonia, because he had maintained his independence, and had received no gifts from them. If they complained of this, they should, at least, remember that this was the only point of inferiority. They had experienced fully all the advantages that flowed from his special power as an apostle"—ELLICOTT.

14. The third time—"having been disappointed twice. I seek not yours—your goods—but you—your souls"—WESLEY.

"Already twice he has laboured among them without remuneration; and he is in readiness to come a third time, and do the same. For I do not seek, etc.—an abiding general purpose supporting the foregoing specific resolve. Seek you. (Comp. 1 Cor. 9. 19; Matt. 18. 15.) His converts saved are the eternal enrichment which S. Paul seeks"—BEET.

15. I will gladly spend—"all I have. And be spent—myself"—WESLEY.

"Thus S. Paul concludes his long boast by words of love, the greatest we can conceive, a love not destroyed but moved to greater sacrifice by the unloving spirit of those loved. Such is the love revealed in God's gift of His Son for rebellious man"—BEET.

16. "But some may object, though I did not burden you, though I did not take anything of you myself, yet being crafty I caught you with guile—I did secretly by my messengers what I would not do openly, or in person"—WESLEY.

Being crafty, etc. These words are frequently quoted, as though the practice here referred to were a defensible one. The next verse shows that S. Paul repudiates such an imputation with the utmost distinctness. WAITE says: "He had been charged with declining support himself, for the dishonest purpose of obtaining it more largely through his agents, and the imputation was connected with his endeavours to expedite the collection through Titus and others. For the sake of argument he allows the charge, in order to see how it tallies with facts. But be it so; I did not become a burden to you; yet (per contra), being a crafty villain, I caught you by guile." The original for "crafty villain" means strictly one who chooses with shrewd discernment the aptest means for attaining unprincipled ends.

17. "I answer this lying accusation by appealing to plain fact, Did I make a gain of you by Titus—or any other of my messengers? You know the contrary. It should be carefully observed that S. Paul does not allow, but absolutely denies, that he had caught them with guile; so that the common plea for guile, which has been often drawn from this text, is utterly without foundation"—WESLEY.

Did I take advantage of you? (R.V.). "He has in his mind, as far as we know, Timotheus, who had been sent before the First Epistle (1 Cor. 4. 17); Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, who were the bearers of that Epistle (1 Cor. 16. 15); and Titus, who was sent to learn what its effect had been. Had any of these, he asks, been asking for money on his account?"—ELLICOTT. Both S. Paul and Titus were animated by the same spirit of disinterestedness, and had acted as followers of Christ.

18. I desired Titus—"to go to you"—WESLEY.

This was the testimony of a good conscience, and such blessedness with "the light of God's countenance from above, and faith's view of a sorrowless world beyond, put more joy into the heart than any outward thing can put of sorrow."

19. Think ye that we again excuse ourselves—"that I speak this for my own sake? No. I speak all this for your sakes"—WESLEY.

S. Paul was deeply conscious that he was striving to fulfil his great commission, and this raised him above all earthly circumstances, and enabled him to grapple with difficulties from which a timid man would have turned away.

21. Who had sinned before—"my last coming to Corinth"—WESLEY.

"Many of these Corinthian Christians did not sufficiently and deeply enough abhor their earlier heathen abominations; therefore he wished to inspire them with a feeling of sincere repentance, and to find it evinced by their conduct when he presented himself at Corinth"—OLSHAUSEN.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CONCLUSION.—1. I am coming this third time. "He had been coming twice before, though he did not actually come"—WESLEY.

The apostle faithfully admonishes, and warns as to the result of continued neglect of duty. Whatever indulgence may have been shown in the past, he declares that all who are found in sin shall receive his condemnation. Of two or three witnesses. "So he calleth his threefold admonition. God's word neglected will one day be a swift witness against the contemners. Moses shall accuse men (John 5. 46); God's word lay hold on them (Zech. 1. 6), and stick in their hearts and flesh, as fire, throughout all eternity (Jer. 5. 14)"—TRAPP.

2. All the rest—"who have since then sinned in any of these kinds. I will not spare—I will severely punish them"—WESLEY.

"With what wisdom and caution the apostle proceeds in the executing and inflicting the severe censures of the Church: he uses admonitions before he proceeds to the sentence of excommunication"—BURKITT.

3. Which to you-ward is not weak. "There is still a touch of indignant sadness in the tone in which the words are uttered. Men will not be able to cast that reproach of weakness upon Him whose might they will feel all too keenly"—ELLICOTT.

4. He was crucified through weakness—"through the impotence of human nature. We also are weak with Him—we appear weak and despicable by partaking of the same sufferings for His sake. But we shall live with Him—being raised from the dead—by the power of God in you—by that Divine energy which is now in every believer (ver. 5)"—WESLEY.

"Proof of the power of Christ in S. Paul, in view of admitted human weakness. The crucifixion of Christ was a result of His human weakness. This involves, as does ch. 8. 9, the mystery of the Incarnation. And the dread reality of these words must not be set aside. We are here told expressly that Christ was crucified, because He had not power to save Himself. Yet He is unchangeably Divine, and had dwelt from eternity in infinite power. We must therefore conceive the Eternal Son as willingly taking upon Himself at His incarnation, in a mode to us inconceivable but Divine, for a time and for our salvation, real human weakness; and as being in His dying moments forsaken (Matt. 27. 46) by God, and powerless in the hands of His enemies. The ridicule of the Jews (Matt. 27. 42), 'Others He saved: Himself He cannot save,' was solemn truth. But He lives upon the throne. By the power of God—'who raised Him from the dead and gave Him glory' (1 Pet. 1. 21). The resurrection of Christ is ever attributed to the Father's power. (Ch. 4. 14; 1 Cor. 15. 15; Rom. 4. 24; ch. 6. 4.) He who was so weak that He could not save Himself from the cross now lives by the outstretched arm of God. And the 'power' thus manifested is proof that (ver. 3) Christ is 'powerful' in His Church to save and to punish. For the power of the Father abides in those whom it rescues; even, we may reverently suppose, in the risen God-Man. (Comp. John 5. 26; 6. 57; Col. 1. 19.) Therefore the power of God which raised Christ is proof that Christ has power to inflict punishment in His Church"—BEET. For though He was crucified through weakness. Chrysostom observes that these words were a great difficulty to the weaker sort. But he explains them by John 11. 3, 4; Phil. 2. 27; 1 Tim. 5. 23, where the word in the original is the same as, or cognate to, that employed here. There is another reading here, which by omitting "though," or rather "if," in the original, strengthens the apostle's statement. There need be no difficulty. Our Lord assumed our human nature with all its infirmities (Heb. 2. 10-18; 4. 15; 5. 2, 3; see also ch. 8. 9, and Phil. 2. 7, 8), although they were the result of sin. He bore all those infirmities, death itself included. And then He shook them all off for ever when He rose again by the power of God.

5. Prove yourselves—"whether ye are such as can, or such as cannot, bear the test—this is the proper meaning of the word which we translate reprobates. Know ye not yourselves, that Jesus Christ is in you? All Christian believers know this, by the witness and by the fruit of His Spirit. Some translate the words 'Jesus Christ is among you,' that is, in the church of Corinth; and understand them of the miraculous gifts and the power of Christ which attended the censures of the apostle"—WESLEY.

Try your own selves (R.V.).

Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. "The words rendered (1) 'examine' and (2) 'prove' have the sense (1) of 'testing' (the word is often translated 'tempt') and (2) subjecting to a process the result of which is satisfactory. See for (2) 1 Cor. 11. 28. The words 'yourselves are in each case emphatic. The connection with what has gone before would seem to be as follows. The apostle had been among the Corinthians in weakness. (1 Cor. 2. 3; comp. ch. 10. 1, 10.) He had boasted of nothing but his infirmity. (Ch. 11. 30; 12. 5, 9.) So that many of them had come to regard him with contempt. But the gospel, he says, is a power. He appeals to the testimony of their own Christian experience on the point, as in ch. 4. 2; 5. 11; 6. 4. 'Is it not a power?' he says. 'Look at yourselves. Do you not feel it to be so in your own hearts? Does not Jesus Christ dwell in you, at least in all who are not finally cast off by Him, and does He not make manifest His power in the subjugation of the natural man within you? Could this have taken place unless the gospel were a real power of God? And then to whom, humanly speaking, do you owe this power? Is it not to him of whom you are ready to believe that he is no true apostle of Christ?' Whether ye be in the faith—i.e. whether 'Christ be present and actively working within you, the certain result of all true faith'"—MEYER. "The subject-matter of our examination, Whether ye be in the faith, i.e. whether the faith of Christ be in you, whether the principle of faith be in your hearts, its power in your consciences, its practice in your lives, whether your faith be the parent and principle of obedience, working love, and working by love"—BURKITT.

6. And I trust ye shall know—"by proving yourselves, not by putting my authority to the proof"—WESLEY.

But I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates—i.e. I trust that you will find that we have not lost this Divine power of Christ dwelling within us, but that you will find it as mighty to confront and to subdue the obstinate resistance of evil, as it was to implant the first strivings after good.

7. I pray God that ye may do no evil—"to give me occasion of showing my apostolical power. I do not desire to appear approved—by miraculously punishing you. But that ye may do that which is good, though we should be as reprobates—having no occasion to give that proof of our apostleship"—WESLEY.

Honest (R.V. "honourable").

Now I pray to God that ye do no evil. "S. Paul's whole heart is set upon the desire that the power of Christ which dwells in the Christian body should be displayed in the victory of his converts over evil, and this not for any personal ends of his own—not even in order that he might manifest the high estimation in which God holds him—but simply for the sake of Him whose minister he is, and for their sake to whom he ministers Him. Approved—the opposite to 'reprobate,' or rather 'rejected'"—C. B.

8. For we can do nothing against the truth—"neither against that which is just and right, nor against those who walk according to the truth of the gospel"—WESLEY.

"The foregoing unselfish prayer traced to a necessity of S. Paul's nature. We cannot—because it would be contrary to inmost disposition. The truth—the word of God, which corresponds always with absolute reality. It is designed to mould men's conduct in correspondence with God's will, that thus they may 'do the truth.' Consequently, to lead men into sin, is to act against the truth. This, to S. Paul's renewed nature, was impossible"—BEET. Bishop Latimer tells of one, who fell away from the known truth, to mocking and scorning it; yet was afterwards touched in conscience for it. Beware of this sin, saith he; for I have known no more than this that repented. It is a very dangerous precipice.

9. For we rejoice when we are weak—"when we appear so, having no occasion to show our apostolic power. And this we wish, even your perfection—in the faith that worketh by love"—WESLEY.

This we also pray for, even your perfecting (R.V.). "As Christ's weakness, the breathing out the abundance of His life, conferred a higher power upon the world, so likewise S. Paul would be content to be weak, and breathe out his life, if his children in the Spirit are only strong"—OLSHAUSEN.

10. According to the authority which the Lord gave me for building up, and not for casting down (R.V.). S. Paul shows his anxiety to employ his apostolic authority solely to edification.

11. Be perfect—"aspire to the highest degree of holiness. Be of good comfort—filled with Divine consolation. Be of one mind—desire, labour, pray for it, to the utmost degree that is possible"—WESLEY.

"Finally, brethren, farewell. The word (lit. 'rejoice') was the natural close of a Greek letter, and is therefore adequately represented by the English 'farewell,' if we only remember that it was used in all the fulness of its meaning. 'Rejoice—let that be our last word to you'"—ELLICOTT. Be of one mind—let there be unity of purpose (1 Cor. 1. 10), shows how greatly such a condition of experience was needed. Be at peace—same word in Rom. 12. 18. BEET says: "If we obey S. Paul's exhortation to peace, the external fountain of peace, and of love the source of peace, will dwell in us. (Comp. Rom. 15. 33; 1 Thess. 5. 23; 1 John 4. 7-13; John 14. 23.)"

13. The grace—"or favour—of our Lord Jesus Christ—by which alone we can come to the Father. And the love of God—manifested to you, and abiding in you. And the communion—or fellowship—of the Holy Ghost—in all His gifts and graces. It is with great reason that this comprehensive and instructive blessing is pronounced at the close of our solemn assemblies; and it is a very indecent thing to see so many quitting them, or getting into postures of remove, before this short sentence can be ended. How often have we heard this awful benediction pronounced! Let us study it more and more, that we may value it proportionably; that we may either deliver or receive it with a becoming reverence, with eyes and hearts lifted up to God, 'who giveth the blessing out of Sion, and life for evermore'"—WESLEY.

"Parting benediction—the most full in the New Testament, embracing conspicuously each Person of the Trinity. All of you—emphatic, including those now unrepentant. The smile which ever beams from the face of Christ, the eternal love which fills the heart of God, and the Holy Spirit who fills the hearts of the children of God with consciousness of His eternal love, are to be our companions along the pilgrimage of life. And, if so, the sunshine of Christ's smile, the unchanging love of God, and the guidance and strengthening of the Holy Spirit, will make our path, be it ever so rough, a path of peace and joy"—BEET. All the saints salute you. "Sanctity is no enemy to courtesy; it doth not remove it but rectify it"—TRAPP.

14. "The grace of the Lord. This is the fullest form of any of the benedictions given by S. Paul, and it comes fitly at the end of the harshest of his Epistles. It must be regarded as the overflowing of a loving heart, conscious of the severity of the language the apostle has been compelled to use, yet deeply penetrated with a sense of its necessity for the well-being of the flock. The benediction is invoked upon all, the slanderers and gainsayers, the seekers after worldly wisdom, the hearkeners to false doctrine, as well as the faithful and obedient disciples. In regard to its form, we may remark that it was the 'grace' or 'favour' of Jesus Christ in condescending to visit us, through which we received the revelation of the love of God, and that it was through that love that we received the gift of the Holy Spirit, to dwell in our hearts by faith, and thus to knit us into one body in Christ"—C. B. "The words contain a prayer for the highest blessings and benefits of which the Corinthians could possibly be made partakers—all that love which doth or can flow from the Father; all that grace which was purchased by the Son; and all that fellowship and communion with the Holy Spirit, and communication from Him, which might render them meet for the service of Christ on earth, and for the full and final enjoyment of Him in heaven"—WATSON. "A full text for the Holy Trinity. Here the apostle calls the Father God, the Son Lord, and the Spirit the Holy Ghost; and as he attributes love to the Father, grace to the Son, so fellowship to the Holy Ghost; so that we have no reason to doubt of the personality of either or any of them"—BURKITT.

THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

"THIS Epistle is not written, as most of S. Paul's are, to the Christians of a particular city, but to those of a whole country in Asia Minor, the metropolis of which was Ancyra. These readily embraced the gospel; but, after S. Paul had left them, certain men came among them, who (like those mentioned, Acts 15) taught that it was necessary to be circumcised, and to keep the Mosaic Law. They affirmed that all the other apostles taught thus; that S. Paul was inferior to them; and that even he sometimes practised and recommended the Law, though at other times he opposed it. The first part, therefore, of this Epistle is spent in vindicating himself and his doctrine; proving (1) that he had it immediately from Christ Himself, and that he was not inferior to the other apostles; (2) that it was the very same which the other apostles preached; and (3) that his practice was consistent with his doctrine.

"The second contains proofs drawn from the Old Testament, that the Law and all its ceremonies were abolished by Christ.

"The third contains practical inferences, closed with his usual benediction.

"To be a little more distinct:—

"THIS EPISTLE CONTAINS—

I. The Inscription, ... Chap. i. 1–5.
II. The calling the Galatians back to the true gospel; wherein he
  1. Reproves them for leaving it, . . . ,, i. 6–10.
  2. Asserts the authority of the gospel he had preached, who,

    (2) Was no way inferior to S. Peter himself, ,, i. 18–ii. 21.
    (3) Defends Justification by Faith, and again reproves the Galatians, . . ,, iii. 1–iv. 11.

—WESLEY

CHAPTER I.

1. Paul, an apostle. "Here it was necessary for S. Paul to assert his authority; otherwise he was very modest in the use of his title. He seldom mentions it when he mentions others in the salutations with himself, as in the Epistles to the Philippians and Thessalonians; or when he writes about secular affairs, as in that to Philemon. Not of men—not commissioned from them, but from God the Father. Neither by man—neither by any man as an instrument, but by Jesus Christ. Who raised Him from the dead—of which it was the peculiar business of an apostle to bear witness" —WESLEY.

Read the Introductory Note. This and the following chapter deal chiefly with the denial by the false teachers of S. Paul's apostolic authority. In the very first sentence of his letter he is careful to assert that authority, and to describe it as having come directly from God. The exact rendering is, not through a man, but through Jesus Christ—a clear indication of S. Paul's belief in the divinity of Christ. The Father is here alluded to, not in a general sense, but as the Father of Jesus Christ. The resurrection is mentioned here, because it was the risen Christ who called him to the apostleship.

2. And all the brethren—"who agree with me in what I now write"—WESLEY.

In other Epistles S. Paul has associated the names of fellow-workers with his own in the opening sentence. In this place no names are mentioned, and he adopts the first person singular as soon as possible. "S. Paul's authority has been challenged, and S. Paul alone answers the challenge"—LIGHTFOOT. The words, and all the brethren, must therefore be regarded as belonging exclusively to the greeting, and not to the exhortations which follow it.

3. See note on Col. 1. 2. "The words to you between grace and peace, detain our attention and mark off each as a distinct object of thought"—BEET.

4. That He might deliver us from the present evil world—"from the guilt, wickedness, and misery wherein it is involved, and from its vain and foolish customs and pleasures. According to the will of God—without any merit of ours. S. Paul begins most of his Epistles with thanksgiving; but, writing to the Galatians, he alters his style, and first sets down his main proposition, That by the merits of Christ alone, giving Himself for our sins, we are justified: neither does he term them, as he does others, either 'saints,' 'elect,' or 'churches of God'"—WESLEY.

The exact rendering is, who surrendered Himself with regard to our sins, that He might rescue us out of this evil age which is setting in. The early Christians were strongly impressed with a belief that the Second Coming was close at hand, and that an age of apostasy and extraordinary wickedness would precede it. Into such apostasy the Galatians were falling, and such is S. Paul's intense concern for their safety that he interrupts his formal greeting to give them a solemn warning. "See how he directs every word against self-righteousness!"—LUTHER. According to the will of God. (Comp. 2 Cor. 5. 19.) God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself. So S. Paul had written a few months before. The thought never fails to fill him with holy gratitude. Hence he breaks forth into a doxology.

5. To whom be glory—"for this His gracious will"—WESLEY.

To S. Paul, the Father is the source of redemption. The unscriptural notion that the Father monopolises justice, and the Son mercy, is unknown to him. He here glorifies the Father who "so loved the world that He gave" the Son as a Saviour. Here the greeting ends. With great skill S. Paul has contrived to weave into it the two great propositions he is about to establish—his own apostolic authority, and the all-sufficient merits of Christ. In all his other letters he follows up the greeting by words commending the faith and good works of his readers. Here, however, he passes on immediately to dignified rebuke. He will only praise where praise is due.

6. I marvel that ye are removed so soon—"after my leaving you—from Him who called you by the grace of Christ—His gracious gospel and His gracious power"—WESLEY.

I marvel. The Greek word usually suggests surprise at something blameworthy. The literal translation is, I marvel that ye are so quickly turning renegades. The exact meaning is uncertain. It may be either, "I marvel that your apostasy is developing so fast," or else "I marvel that you are falling away so soon after my last visit (or after your conversion)." Their conversion had occurred only seven years before at most. He uses the present tense because the apostasy is developing even as he dictates the letter. From Him, etc.—that is, God. "The whole mode of setting forth the apostasy makes the readers sensible of its antagonism to God and salvation"—MEYER.

7. "Which, indeed, is not properly another gospel. For what ye have now received is no gospel at all: it is not glad, but heavy, tidings, as setting your acceptance with God upon terms impossible to be performed. But there are some that trouble you. The same word occurs in Acts 15. 24. And would—if they were able—subvert or overthrow the gospel of Christ—the better to effect which, they suggest that the other apostles, yea, and I myself, insist upon the observance of the Law" —WESLEY.

To another gospel. A somewhat misleading translation. (R.V. "To a different gospel") —different from the Pauline gospel of salvation by faith in Christ. Which is not another. He at once corrects himself. Truth is one. There cannot be two gospels. The false teaching is indeed "different" from the true gospel, but it is not "another" gospel. You Galatians should know there is only one gospel. My calling these new doctrines by that name was a mistake, only (R.V.) there are some that trouble you, by asserting that their "different" teaching is another gospel, and would overthrow the true gospel, by setting up their falsehoods in its stead.

8. But if we—"I and all the apostles—or an angel from heaven—if it were possible—preach another gospel, let him be accursed —cut off from Christ and God"—WESLEY.

Having now directly referred to the false teachers, S. Paul, that his readers may be alive to the immense gravity of the situation, thunders a twice-repeated anathema at those who have produced it. He takes the highest possible ground. His indignation is not on account of antagonism to himself, but antagonism to truth. Though he himself should fall away from it, that truth must still be supreme. In that case he invokes the curse even on his own head. Even if we, or an angel out of heaven, preach a gospel unto you contrary to that we did preach unto you, let him be anathema.

9. As—"he speaks upon mature deliberation; after pausing, it seems, between the two verses. We—I and the brethren who are with me—have said before—many times, in effect, if not in terms. So I say—all those brethren knew the truth of the gospel. S. Paul knew the Galatians had received the true gospel"—WESLEY.

As we said before (probably during the second visit to Galatia, when the danger was imminent), so I say now again. If anyone is preaching any gospel to you, contrary to that which ye did receive—whether it be I, my brethren, an angel, your new teachers, or anyone else—let him be anathema. This sentence contemplates the exclusion of the offenders from the covenants of grace, their loss of final salvation. FINDLAY adds: "But does the declaration preclude in such a case the possibility of repentance? We trow not. It declares the doom which is due to any, be he man or angel, who should do what these 'troublers' are doing. It is a general sentence, and has for the individuals concerned the effect of a warning, like the announcement made concerning the traitor at the Last Supper. However unlikely repentance might be in either instance, there is nothing to forbid it. So when S. Peter said to Simon Magus, 'Thy money perish with thee!' he nevertheless continued, 'Repent, therefore, of this thy wickedness, and pray the Lord, if perhaps the thought of thy heart shall be forgiven thee' (Acts 8. 20-22). To his worst opponents, on any sign of contrition, S. Paul, we may be sure, would have gladly said the same."

10. For—"he adds the reason why he speaks so confidently—do I now satisfy men —is this what I aim at in preaching or writing? If I still—since I was an apostle—pleased men—studied to please them; if this were my motive of action—nay, if I did, in fact, please the men who know not God—I should not be the servant of Christ. Hear this, all ye who vainly hope to keep in favour both with God and with the world!"—WESLEY.

For am I now persuading men or God? The emphasis is on the word now. The false teacher had accused S. Paul of time-serving, and of ingratiating himself with men. "After these anathemas, can such a charge be brought now?' Can there be any further doubt as to which I prefer—the favour of men, or the favour of God? Men-pleasers cannot be God-pleasers. If I were still (as before my conversion) pleasing men, I should not be the servant of Christ.

11. But I certify you, brethren—"he does not till now give them even this appellation. That the gospel which was preached by me among you is not according to man—not from man, not by man, not suited to the taste of man"—WESLEY.

For I make known to you, brethren (R.V.). This phrase calls attention to some important statement. The first great division of the Epistle is here formally introduced. By a short history of his conversion, and of his relations with the various apostles and churches, S. Paul is about to establish his own apostolic authority. "I assure you, brethren, the gospel you were taught by me is not of human devising. I did not myself receive it from man, but from Jesus Christ. I did not learn it as one learns a lesson by painful study. It flashed upon me as a revelation from Jesus Christ"—LIGHTFOOT.

12. For neither did I receive it—"at once —nor was I taught it—slowly and gradually, by any man—but by the revelation of Jesus Christ. Our Lord revealed to him at first His resurrection, ascension, and the calling of the Gentiles, and his own apostleship; and told him then there were other things for which He would appear to him"—WESLEY.

"My gospel originated with Christ Himself, and therefore it must be the true gospel, for He is the Truth. Nor can it have become contaminated with error by reaching me through human channels. I did not receive it or learn it from a human teacher, but by direct revelation of Jesus Christ." In all this S. Paul is demonstrating his complete independence of the earlier apostles. The false teachers have represented that his commission to teach is derived from and terminable by the elders at Jerusalem. He stoutly denies this. Not only did he receive his apostleship directly from Christ, but even for his knowledge of the Christian religion he was indebted to no human instrument. The revelation, the conversion, the apostleship, were all directly from the risen Lord. S. Paul's "burning bush" was not at Jerusalem but on the way to Damascus.

13. I persecuted the Church of God—"that is, the believers in Christ"—WESLEY.

Having substituted the way to Damascus for Jerusalem, as his spiritual and apostolic birthplace, S. Paul recognises that some may deny the miraculous appearance of Christ which there took place. In proof of it he appeals to the sweeping change in his creed and conduct, which only such a miracle can explain.

14. "Being zealous of the unwritten traditions—over and above those written in the law"—WESLEY.

Ye did hear (when I was with you) my manner of life formerly in Judaism, that beyond measure I kept persecuting the Church of God, and devastating it: and I kept advancing in Judaism beyond many of my own age in my own race, being more thoroughly a zealot for the traditions of my fathers.

Such is the exact translation. But "kept advancing in Judaism" might be even better rendered "went on keeping pace in Judaism." His devotion to Judaism increased, and kept pace with his growing hostility to Christianity. S. Paul recalls all these details, not to boast of his own zeal, but to call attention to the overwhelming power of the revelation of Christ in changing the greatest enemy of the faith into her chiefest apostle.

15. But when it pleased God. "He ascribes nothing to his own merits, endeavours, or sincerity. Who separated me from my mother's womb—set me apart for an apostle, as He did Jeremiah for a prophet. (Jer. 1. 5.) Such an unconditional predestination as this may consist both with God's justice and mercy. And called me by His grace—by His free and almighty love, to be both a Christian and an apostle"—WESLEY.

Amid all the persecutions, hardships, and misrepresentations he had to endure, S. Paul was continually upheld by this dignified conception of God's eternal purpose concerning him. Nor, indeed, has any great religious leader succeeded without such a conviction.

16. To reveal His Son in me—"by the powerful operation of His Spirit (2 Cor. 4. 6); as well as to me, by the heavenly vision. That I might preach Him to others—which I should have been ill qualified to do had I not first known Him myself. I did not confer with flesh and blood—being fully satisfied of the Divine will, and determined to obey, I took no counsel with any man, neither with my own reason nor inclination, which might have raised numberless objections"—WESLEY.

"It pleased God to reveal His Son in me. This is the essential matter in S. Paul's conversion, as in that of every Christian. The outward manifestation of Jesus Christ served in his case to bring about this result, and was necessary to qualify him for his extraordinary vocation. But the issue of the revelation was a Divine certainty within the breast of S. Paul himself, showing that not by words alone he learned the things concerning faith, but that he was also filled with the abundance of the Spirit, the revelation shining through his very soul; and that he had Christ speaking in himself"—FINDLAY.

An external manifestation of Christ was so made to him on the way to Damascus as to produce Christ in him. Or the words may mean that Christ was revealed to others in the changed life of S. Paul. The latter view, however, seems to obscure the next clause. God (1) revealed Christ to S. Paul (it pleased God . . . to reveal His Son in me), that (2) S. Paul might reveal Christ to others (lit. set Him forth as good tidings among the Gentiles, to whom S. Paul's mission especially was).

17. Neither did I go up to Jerusalem—"the residence of the apostles—but I immediately went again into Arabia, and returned again to Damascus. He presupposes the journey to Damascus, in which he was converted, as being known to them all"—WESLEY.

Neither did I go up unto Jerusalem to those who were apostles before me, but I went away into Arabia, and returned again to Damascus. He is still emphasising his independence of the earlier apostles. He has already said that his Christian life and apostleship did not originate with them; he now goes on to say that it was not even developed by them. The change in him was begun, continued, and ended by Christ alone. Instead of going up to the mother church at Jerusalem on his conversion, he went away from it, probably to the kingdom of Aretas, bordering Judea. There, like Moses in Midian, he was trained for his life's work.

18. Then after three years—"wherein I had given full proof of my apostleship—I went to visit Peter — to converse with him" — —WESLEY.

After three years from his conversion. Very likely one whole year and parts of two other years. I went up to Jerusalem to make acquaintance with Cephas, and I remained with him fifteen days. The Greek verb implies a desire to see a celebrity. S. Paul's motive was to secure S. Peter's friendship; not his apostolic sanction, as the false teachers affirm.

19. "But other of the apostles I saw none, save James the brother—that is, 'the kinsman'—of the Lord. Therefore when S. Barnabas is said to have 'brought him into the apostles' (Acts 9. 27), only S. Peter and S. James are meant"—WESLEY.

But no other apostle did I see, but only James the brother of the Lord. He mentions this to show that his visit to Jerusalem was of a private and unofficial nature. Far from going there to seek ordination from the apostolic college, he did not even see the other apostles. James, here called "the brother of the Lord,' to distinguish him from James the brother of John, was perhaps not fully recognised as an apostle at this date.

20. The private and official nature of his visit to Jerusalem is a supremely important part of his argument. Between this visit and the next elapsed fourteen years of apostolic work, such as even S. Paul's opponents would admit to be blessed of God. If, then, his assertions in vers. 18 and 19 be true, his argument is established, and his independent apostolic authority vindicated. Hence the earnest assurance the things that I speak unto you, before God I lie not.

21. Then I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia—regions far distant from Jerusalem, and thus making it impossible that he should be under the training of the apostles there. Indeed, so complete was his independence of the latter that:—

22. I was still unknown by face unto the churches of Judea—"except to that of Jerusalem"—WESLEY.

And even in the Jerusalem church he was known only to S. Peter and S. James. In fact, the Judean churches knew nothing of him except from occasional tidings of his far-off labours. Indeed:—

23. They only heard say, He that once persecuted us, now preacheth the faith of which he once made havoc; and they glorified God in me—"that is, on my account"—WESLEY.

"He does not say, 'They marvelled at me, they praised me, they were struck with admiration of me,' but he attributes all to grace"—CHRYSOSTOM.

CHAPTER II.

"S. Paul continues the historical proof of his full apostolic independence"—MEYER. In the previous chapter he has proved his independence by the fact that for many years he had no formal intercourse with the earlier apostles. In the present chapter he goes on to show that when such intercourse did take place he throughout posed and was recognised as a true apostle.

1. Then fourteen years after—"my first journey thither—I went up again to Jerusalem. This seems to be the journey mentioned (Acts 15), several passages here referring to that great council, wherein all the apostles showed that they were of the same judgment with him"—WESLEY.

He mentions the long period that intervened, a period full of fruitful missionary activity, as yet another proof that he was independent of the original apostles. With Barnabas—whose work had been chiefly among the Gentiles—taking Titus also with me. The question to be settled was, "Can an uncircumcised Gentile be a true Christian?" Titus, a noble specimen of Gentile Christianity, accompanied S. Paul and S. Barnabas as a living argument that he could.

2. I went up—"not by any command from them, but by an express revelation from God. And laid before them — the chief of the church in Jerusalem — the gospel which I preach among the Gentiles (Acts 15. 4), touching justification by faith alone; not that they might confirm me therein, but that I might remove prejudice from them. Yet not publicly at first, but severally to those of eminence—speaking to them one by one. Lest I should run, or should have run, in vain—lest I should lose the fruit either of my present or past labours. For they might have greatly hindered this, had they not been fully satisfied both with his mission and doctrine. The word 'run' beautifully expresses the swift progress of the gospel"—WESLEY.

"Arrived at Jerusalem, I set forth the principles of the gospel, as I had preached it and still preach it to the Gentiles—the doctrine of grace, the freedom from the Ceremonial Law. This explanation I gave in a private conference with the leading apostles of the circumcision. In all this I had one object in view; that the gospel might have free course among the Gentiles, that my past and present labours might not be thwarted by opposition or misunderstanding"—LIGHTFOOT.

3. But neither was Titus, who was with me—"when I conversed with them — compelled to be circumcised—a clear proof that none of the apostles insisted on the circumcising Gentile believers. The sense is, And it is true, some of those false brethren would fain have compelled Titus to be circumcised; but I utterly refused it"—WESLEY.

But not even Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised (R.V.). The meaning is, "But far from proclaiming my gospel to be wrong, or myself to have run in vain, the council did not even insist finally upon the circumcision of the Greek Titus!" And if an uncircumcised Gentile was tolerated in an apostolic council, surely S. Paul had carried the day.

4. Because of false brethren—"who seem to have urged it. Introduced unawares—into some of those private conferences at Jerusalem. Who had slipped in to spy out our liberty—from the Ceremonial Law. That they might, if possible, bring us into that bondage again"—WESLEY.

Lit. And that because of false brethren privately brought in, who came in privately to spy out our freedom which we have, etc. This verse presents the reason why S. Paul held out against the circumcision of Titus.

Had the request been pressed, for example, only by such a man as S. Peter, who, at that time at least, adopted a liberal attitude to Gentile believers, S. Paul might have yielded, knowing that no disastrous use would have been made of the concession. But the request came from false brethren, with no lawful standing in the council, who would have promptly misrepresented S. Paul's action, and lost no time in substituting the bondage of Jewish ceremonialism for the "freedom" of the Gentile churches. "Because of the false brethren." S. Paul held out so stoutly, that Titus "was not compelled to be circumcised." The grammatical structure of these two verses in the Greek is broken and excited, as though, even as he dictates the account of it, S. Paul is passing again through that momentous struggle for Gentile liberty. FINDLAY says: "To know what S. Paul means by 'false brethren' we must turn to ch. 1. 6, 9; 3. 1; 4. 17; 5. 7–12; 6. 12–14 in this Epistle; and again to 2 Cor. 2. 17; 3. 1; 4. 2. They were men bearing the name of Christ, and professing faith in Him, but Pharisees at heart; self-seeking, rancorous, unscrupulous men, bent on exploiting the Pauline churches for their own advantage, and regarding Gentile converts to Christ as so many possible recruits for the ranks of the circumcision."

5. To whom we did not yield by submission—"although in love he would have yielded to any. With such wonderful prudence did the apostle use his Christian liberty! circumcising Timothy (Acts 16. 3) because of weak brethren, but not Titus, because of false brethren. That the truth of the gospel—that is, the true genuine gospel—might continue with you—with you Gentiles. So we defend, for your sakes, the privilege which you would give up"—WESLEY.

To whom, not even for an hour, did we yield by submission. S. Paul means that he and S. Barnabas maintained an uncompromising attitude throughout the whole debate. But this was not from obstinacy or pride; although it was pain to them, they held out that the truth of the gospel might continue with the Gentiles.

6. And they who undoubtedly were something—"above all others. What they were—how eminent soever. It is no difference to me—so that I should alter either my doctrine or my practice. God accepteth no man's person—for any eminence in gifts or outward prerogatives. In that conference added nothing to me—neither as to doctrine nor mission"—WESLEY.

But from those who were reputed to be somewhat (whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth not man's person)—they, I say, who were of repute imparted nothing to me (R.V.). He adds yet another proof of his independent apostleship. "During my intercourse with the elder apostles, they taught me nothing I did not know before, they corrected nothing in my teaching, they added nothing to my authority; but, on the other hand, they cordially recognised my mission to the uncircumcision." The words in brackets strengthen the thought. Although the elder apostles were in great repute, through their connection with Christ during His earthly ministry, this did not alter the fact that they "imparted nothing to S. Paul."

7. But when they saw—"by the effects which I laid before them (ver. 8; Acts 15. 12). That I was intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision—that is, with the charge of preaching it to the uncircumcised heathens"—WESLEY.

Even as Peter with the gospel of the circumcision. Of course S. Peter had a mission to the Gentiles also, and there was nothing to hinder S. Paul from working among the Jews, but the primary sphere of activity is here thought of in each case. "Once for all this charge had devolved upon S. Paul. He is 'appointed herald and apostle' of Christ Jesus, who gave Himself a ransom for all—teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth. (1 Tim. 2. 6, 7.) That office S. Paul still holds. He is the leader of Christian evangelism. Every new movement in heathen missionary enterprise looks to his teaching for guidance and inspiration"—FINDLAY.

8. For He that wrought effectually in Peter for the apostleship of the circumcision—"to qualify him for, and support him in, the discharge of that office to the Jews—wrought likewise effectually in and by me—for and in the discharge of my office toward the Gentiles"—WESLEY.

For the very same proofs which confirmed S. Peter's call and apostleship confirmed S. Paul's also. Indisputable conversions had followed the preaching of both. Judging by their fruits, if S. Paul was no true apostle neither was S. Peter. The effectual working of God in both of them was conclusive. In spite of minor differences of opinion, the elder apostles could not doubt the direct call and full apostolic standing of the great preacher to the Gentiles. ELLICOTT says: "In Peter and in me would be better translated for Peter and for me. He that wrought effectually for Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision the same wrought effectually for me toward the Gentiles."

9. And when James—"probably named first because he was bishop of the church in Jerusalem. And Cephas—speaking of him at Jerusalem he calls him by his Hebrew name. And John. Hence it appears that he also was at the council, though he is not particularly named in the Acts. Who undoubtedly were pillars—the principal supporters and defenders of the gospel. Knew—after they had heard the account I gave them—the grace—of apostleship—which was given me, they—in the name of all—gave to me and Barnabas—my fellow-labourer—the right hands of fellowship. They gave us their hands in token of receiving us as their fellow-labourers, mutually agreeing that we—I and those in union with me—should go to the Gentiles—chiefly; and they—with those that were in union with them, chiefly to the circumcision—the Jews"—WESLEY.

Reputed to be pillars (R.V.). S. James was the eldest of the brethren of the Lord. Hence the position of honour assigned to him. The right hands of fellowship did not merely imply recognition as fellow-workers, but also acknowledgment of apostolic equality. FINDLAY'S comment on this verse is: "With S. Peter and S. James S. Paul had met before, and was to meet again. But, so far as we can learn, this was the only occasion on which his path crossed that of S. John. Nor is this apostle mentioned again in S. Paul's letters. . . . S. John was to be the heir of S. Paul's labours at Ephesus and in Asia Minor. And S. John's long life, touching the verge of the second century, his catholic position, his serene and lofty spirit, blending in itself and resolving into a higher unity the tendencies of S. James and S. Peter and S. Paul, give us the best assurance that in the apostolic age there was indeed 'one holy, catholic, apostolic Church.' S. Paul's fellowship with S. Peter and with S. James was cordial and endeared. But to hold the hand of S. John, the disciple whom Jesus loved, was yet higher satisfaction. The clasp symbolised a union between men most opposite in temperament and training, and brought to the knowledge of Christ in very different ways, but whose communion in Him was deep as the life eternal. S. Paul and S. John are the two master-minds of the New Testament. Of all men that ever lived, these two best understood Jesus Christ."

10. Of the poor—"the poor Christians in Judea, who had lost all they had for Christ's sake"—WESLEY.

I also was forward to do (R.V. "I was also zealous to do"). "Henceforth our spheres of labour were to be separate. One reservation, however, was made. They asked me to continue, as I had done hitherto, to provide for the wants of the poor brethren of Judea. Independently of their request, it was my own earnest desire"—LIGHTFOOT. And he did so. (Comp. Acts. 24. 17.)

11. But—"the argument here comes to the height. S. Paul reproves S. Peter himself. So far was he from receiving his doctrine from man, or from being inferior to the chief of the apostles—when Peter—afterwards—came to Antioch—then the chief of all the Gentile churches—I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed—for fear of man (ver. 12), for dissimulation (ver. 13), and for not walking uprightly (ver. 14)"—WESLEY.

I resisted him to the face, because he stood condemned (R.V.). With this verse begins S. Paul's crowning argument. He has proved his independence (1) by showing that for many years he had no official intercourse with the apostles, and (2) by showing that when an official meeting did take place, the "pillars" fully recognised his status. Now he goes much further, and concludes his whole proof (3) by showing that his position was such that he had even publicly rebuked the chief of the apostles, S. Peter himself! Would a subordinate have been suffered to do this? Step by step this artless autobiography has advanced to the triumphant vindication of its author. In Syria and Cilicia—not an inferior! In Jerusalem—an admitted equal! In Antioch—more than an equal! This incident probably occurred soon after the council at Jerusalem. (Comp. Acts 15. 30–40.)

12. How fully this incident consists with what the Gospels tell us of S. Peter! With a few differences of detail it is the drama of the denial once more enacted. Certain from James—false brethren, who doubtless had credentials from S. James, which they deceitfully abused. He did eat with the Gentiles. The false brethren had been Pharisees (see Acts 15. 5), hence their attitude in this matter. He gradually withdrew and separated himself. The Greek words indicate "the cautious withdrawal of a timid person, who shrinks from observation"—LIGHTFOOT.

13. And the other believing Jews—"who were at Antioch—dissembled with him, so that even Barnabas was carried away with their dissimulation—was borne away, as with a torrent, into the same ill-practice"—WESLEY.

The defection of a great leader like S. Peter inevitably affected many of the rank and file, and at this S. Paul scarcely wondered. But both surprise and pain are implied in the words even Barnabas. This was strange conduct after S. Barnabas had helped to fight against ceremoniation. No doubt it was one of the causes of the separation recorded in Acts 15. 39.

14. I said to Cephas before them all. "See Paul single against Peter and all the Jews! If thou being a Jew, yet livest, in thy ordinary conversation, after the manner of the Gentiles—not observing the Ceremonial Law, which thou knowest to be now abolished—why compellest thou the Gentiles—by withdrawing thyself and all the ministers from them, either to judaise, to keep the Ceremonial Law, or to be excluded from Church communion"—WESLEY.

S. Paul would not have rebuked a fellow-apostle publicly had not the fault been committed publicly. He asks S. Peter for an explanation of his extraordinary change of attitude: "How is it that thou (who though a Jew upon whom, if upon anyone, the Ceremonial Law is binding, dost cast aside that Law, and dost live without its observances like the Gentiles)—how is it that thou dost act in a manner which will involve the forcing of the Gentiles to live under Jewish restrictions?" It is true that at the moment of S. Paul's rebuking S. Peter the latter is living as a Jew, and not as a Gentile: but S. Paul has in mind S. Peter's whole conduct since his vision. (See Acts 10.) "If the Law, which was enjoined upon Jews and not Gentiles, can be discarded by a Jew like yourself, can it not much more be ignored by Gentiles?"

15. We. "S. Paul, to spare S. Peter, drops the first person singular, and speaks in the plural number. In ver. 18 he speaks in the first person singular again by a figure; and without a figure (ver. 19, etc.). Who are Jews by nature—by birth, not proselytes only. And not sinners of the Gentiles—that is, not sinful Gentiles; not such gross, enormous, abandoned sinners, as the heathens generally were"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul here passes from the outward to the inward, from the circumstances of S. Peter's conduct to the inner world of spiritual consciousness, in which his offence finds its deeper condemnation. 'You and I,' he goes on to say, 'not Gentile sinners, but men of Jewish birth—yet for all that, knowing that there is no justification for man in works of Law, only through faith in Christ,—we, too, put our faith in Christ, in order to be justified by faith in Him, not by works of Law; for as the Scripture taught us, in that way no flesh will be justified"—FINDLAY.

"The first clause of this verse is concessive: 'We grant you that we were born Jews, and not Gentiles: members of the chosen race and not sinners.' The next clause explains why it was that, with all these privileges, the Christian, though thus born a Jew, transferred his allegiance from the Law to Christ. The reason was that the Law failed in the one great object—to justify us, or obtain our acquittal in the sight of God. By nature—i.e. by birth. The privileges of the Jew belonged to all Jews alike, simply by the mere fact that they were Jews. Sinners—the word was almost a synonym for 'heathen' in the mouth of a strict Jew. Hence there is a slight irony in its use by S. Paul"—ELLICOTT.

16. Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the Law—"not even of the Moral, much less the Ceremonial Law. But by the faith of Jesus Christ—that is, by faith in Him. The name Jesus was first known by the Gentiles; the name Christ by the Jews. And they are not always placed promiscuously; but generally in a more solemn way of speaking the apostle says, Christ Jesus; in a more familiar, Jesus Christ. Even we—and how much more must the Gentiles, who have still less pretence to depend on their own works! Have believed—knowing there is no other way. Because—considering the demands of the Law, and the state of human nature, it is evident, that by the works of the Law—by such an obedience as it requires—shall no flesh living—no human creature, Jew or Gentile—be justified. Hitherto S. Paul had been considering that single question, 'Are Christians obliged to observe the Ceremonial Law?' But he here insensibly goes further, and, by citing this scripture, shows that what he spoke directly of the Ceremonial, included also the Moral, Law. For David undoubtedly did so, when he said (Ps. 143. 2), the place here referred to, 'In thy sight shall no man living be justified'; which the apostle likewise explains (Rom. 3. 19, 20), in such a manner as can agree to none but the Moral Law"—WESLEY.

Bishop LIGHTFOOT thus paraphrases vers. 15 and 16: "Only consider our own case. We were born to all the privileges of the Israelitish race: we were not sinners as we proudly call the Gentiles. What then? We saw that the observance of the Law would not justify any man, that faith in Jesus Christ was the only means of justification. Therefore we turned to a belief in Christ. Thus our Christian profession is itself an acknowledgment that such observances are worthless and void, because, as the Scripture declares, no flesh can be justified by works of Law." ELLICOTT'S comment is: "The inability of the Law to justify comes out in two ways—(1) The only way in which the Law could justify was through a complete obedience to its provisions. But it was impossible to render a complete obedience to it; and to offend in one point was 'to be guilty of all'; so that practically, as a matter of fact, no one was justified by it; (2) nor did it help men to justify themselves. It was something dead and lifeless—a mere written letter, possessing none of those 'means of grace' which are offered by Christianity. Christ Himself, through faith in Him, is the great means."

17. But if while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves are still found sinners—"if we continue in sin, will it therefore follow that Christ is the minister or countenancer of sin?"—WESLEY.

But if, while we sought to be justified in Christ, we ourselves also were found sinners (R.V.). Notice most carefully the past tenses. This is a difficult verse. Possibly S. Paul here drops the narrative of his rebuke to S. Peter, although it is more probable that the words from this point to the end of the chapter formed part of that rebuke. He seems to be turning aside for a moment to answer a probable objection—"the ever-recurring objection that the gospel of Christ, which reveals the guilt of even the most moral men, is opposed to morality"—BEET. The whole thought may be thus paraphrased: "Though by nature we were not sinners of the Gentiles, it was needful, in order that we might be justified in Christ, that we should see ourselves to be, like them, sinners in need of Christ. Christ enabled us to see ourselves in such a light. We ourselves also were found sinners. But in showing us that we were sinners, did Christ make us sinners? Is Christ a minister of sin?"

18. "By no means. For if I build again—by my sinful practice—the things which I destroyed—by my preaching, I only make myself—or show myself, not Christ, to be a transgressor; the whole blame lies on me, not Him or His gospel. As if he had said, The objection were just, if the gospel promised justification to men continuing in sin. But it does not. Therefore, if any who profess the gospel do not live according to it, they are sinners, it is certain, but not justified, and so the gospel is clear"—WESLEY.

Prove myself (R.V.). "Nothing of the kind! On the other hand, I should make myself a sinner, I should fall inevitably into condemnation, if I set up that abandoned Law again!"—FINDLAY. "By eating with the Gentiles, S. Peter was pulling down the barrier of Mosaic restrictions; by afterwards withdrawing from them he was building it again. This express and evident reference S. Paul courteously veils by using the first person, as though merely stating a general principle. Transgressor. If by formerly pulling down the restrictions of the Law, S. Peter had, as ver. 19 will show, been really carrying out the ultimate purpose of the Law, he is now, by maintaining the same restrictions, opposing the Law, and transgressing the limits it has marked out for its own operation. His own inconsistency condemns him"—BEET.

19. For I through the Law—"applied by the Spirit to my heart, and deeply convincing me of my utter sinfulness and helplessness—am dead to the Law—to all hope of justification from it—that I may live to God—not continue in sin. For this very end am I, in this sense, freed from the Law, that I may be freed from sin"—WESLEY.

"Died to the Law that I might, etc. (R.V.). (Comp. Rom. 7. 4, 'Put to death through the Law, through the body of Christ.') By His crucified body, S. Paul was removed completely from the jurisdiction of Law, so that God no longer treats him according to his previous obedience to a rule of conduct, as though such obedience were the means of obtaining His favour. This is another way of saying that by the death of Christ, God has reconciled the justification of sinners with His own justice. And this escape from the claims of the Law and separation from its rule was brought about by means of Law. For it was to satisfy these claims that Christ died, and the purpose of the Law was to force men to Christ, and by so doing place them beyond its own jurisdiction. Thus objectively and subjectively S. Paul's deliverance from the rule of law was brought about by the operation of Law. That I may live for God: God's purpose in liberating S. Paul from Law. This verse embodies in a few words the most distinctive teaching of S. Paul"—BEET.

20. "The apostle goes on to describe how he is freed from sin, how far he is from continuing therein. I am crucified with Christ—made conformable to His death; 'the body of sin is destroyed' (Rom. 6. 6). And I—as to my corrupt nature—live no longer—being dead to sin. But Christ liveth in me—is a fountain of life in my inmost soul, from which all my tempers, words, and actions flow. And the life that I now live in the flesh—even in this mortal body—I live by faith in the Son of God—I derive every moment from that supernatural principle; from a Divine evidence and conviction, that 'He loved me, and delivered up Himself for me'"—WESLEY.

I have been crucified with Christ; yet I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me: and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God (R.V.). This verse is "the summit and marrow of Christianity"—BENGEL. I have been crucified. The tense in the Greek indicates the continuance of the experience. S. Paul "is deeply and gratefully conscious that his own life, both in its essence and its manifestations, is infinitely above himself who lives it; and it is a direct outflow of the immortal life of Christ, so that S. Paul's thoughts and words and acts have their true source not in him but in Christ. Thus S. Paul lives on earth in human flesh a life, not earthly but heavenly, not human but Divine; a life which is in some sense a continuation of Christ's life on earth. Notice that it is the crucified Saviour who lives in those who have shared His crucifixion. Only they whose former lives have come to an end upon the cross of Christ have Christ living in them. For union with Him implies (Rom. 6. 3) union with His death"—BEET. Observe how he corrects, so to speak, each preceding statement by a new one. I have been crucified: yet I live: and yet no longer I, etc. As we follow the words and clauses we are following the working of the apostle's mind as he dictated this letter, "My old life came to an end on the cross! But I have a new life. I live! And yet, in a sense, I do not live: for it is Christ that liveth in me! I am not thinking of my physical life—my life in the flesh—but of my spiritual life; and this spiritual life I live in the sphere and atmosphere of faith. Yes, faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself up for me." On the latter words, comp. Rom. 8. 37; Eph. 5. 25. "Loved me, etc. He appropriates to himself," as Chrysostom observes, "the love which belongs equally to the whole world. For Christ is indeed the personal Friend of each man individually; and is as much to him 'as if He had died for him alone'"—LIGHTFOOT.

21. "Meantime I do not make void—in seeking to be justified by my own works—the grace of God—the free love of God in Christ Jesus. But they do who seek justification by the Law. For if righteousness is by the Law—if men might be justified by their obedience to the Law, moral or ceremonial—then Christ died in vain—without any necessity for it, since men might have been saved without His death; might, by their own obedience, have been both discharged from condemnation, and entitled to eternal life"—WESLEY.

"I will not stultify the grace of God. If righteousness can be won by Law, why, then, Christ died for nothing!"—FINDLAY.

CHAPTER III.

S. PAUL does not tell us what effect his rebuke had upon S. Peter. In the concluding words of the last chapter, the autobiographical modulates into the doctrinal. The vindication of apostolic authority has been crowned by an account of a rebuke administered to so important an apostle as S. Peter. But what was the rebuke about? Why, it was about that very false teaching which S. Paul is now going to denounce! Artless as it seems to be, it is impossible not to marvel at the astonishing skill with which S. Paul effects this easy transition from a defence of himself to a defence of his gospel. The great theological division of the Epistle begins here, and extends to ch. 5. 12. In the last verse of the preceding chapter he has said that such conduct as S. Peter's at Antioch implies principles which strip Christ's death of meaning. Throughout this long division of his letter he is going to show that "justification is by faith, apart from Law, and therefore from circumcision"—BEET.

1. O thoughtless Galatians—"he breaks in upon them with a beautiful abruptness. Who hath bewitched you—thus to contradict both your own reason and experience? Before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been as evidently set forth—by our preaching, as if He had been crucified among you"—WESLEY.

Before whose eyes Jesus Christ was openly set forth crucified (R.V.). The error of S. Peter just criticised, as implying a denial of the efficacy of Christ's death, is the very error which the false teachers have sown in Galatia. The hollowness and the perils of it compel S. Paul to cry out in indignant surprise, O senseless Galatians, who did fascinate you? The latter verb alludes to the "evil eye," in which the ancients, like some moderns, believed. S. Paul compares the false teaching with an evil spell, and asks how men could have yielded to it, before whose eyes Jesus Christ was placarded as crucified.

2. This only would I learn of you—"that is, this one argument might convince you. Did ye receive the witness and the fruit of the Spirit by performing the works of the Law, or by hearing of and receiving faith?"—WESLEY.

The Judaisers are teaching that the Galatians cannot enjoy Christian privileges without circumcision and other works of Law. S. Paul adopts a very short and easy method with them. He appeals to experience. Before they had heard circumcision mentioned, all true believers in Galatia had enjoyed Christian privileges, to the extent even of receiving the Spirit. The false teaching is therefore condemned by facts. "See how well he handles the matter by means of experience"—LUTHER.

3. Are ye so thoughtless—"as not to consider what you have yourselves experienced? Having begun in the Spirit—having set out under the light and power of the Spirit by faith, do ye now, when ye ought to be more spiritual, and more acquainted with the power of faith, expect to be made perfect by the flesh? Do you think to complete either your justification or sanctification, by giving up that faith, and depending on the Law, which is a gross and carnal thing when opposed to the gospel?"—WESLEY.

Lit. Are ye so senseless? Having begun by means of the Spirit, are ye now brought to maturity by means of the flesh? Having begun in the Spirit—"begun your career as Christians in a manner so entirely spiritual—with the spiritual act of faith on your part, and with an answering gift of spiritual graces and powers. Made perfect by the flesh. Do you wish to finish and complete the career thus auspiciously begun under a system of things entirely different—a system carnal and material, narrow, slavish, and literal—the Law in place of the gospel? By 'the flesh' is here meant the Law, which, though described as spiritual in Rom. 7. 14, and though it really was spiritual in view of its origin, in another aspect—as imposing a system of literal obedience upon its adherents—was carnal, 'earthly,' rigid, petty, and low. It had none of that sublime expansiveness and aspiration which belongs to faith. It was a grievous reversing of the whole order of progress—to begin with faith, and, instead of completing with faith that which faith had begun, to fall back upon a condition of things which was shared with the Christian by the unemancipated Jew"—ELLICOTT.

4. Have ye suffered—"both from the zealous Jews and from the heathens—so many things—for adhering to the gospel—in vain—so as to lose all the blessings which ye might have obtained, by enduring to the end. If it be yet in vain—as if he had said, I hope better things, even that ye will endure to the end"—WESLEY.

We do not know of any persecutions which the Galatians were called upon to endure on account of Christianity. There are, of course, no punctuation marks in the Greek MSS., and perhaps it is best to substitute a mark of exclamation for the mark of interrogation in the English versions. The sense will then be, So much have ye suffered without benefit! "You have endured the interference of these new teachers, with their useless and indeed harmful additions to your creed, and all that their interference has produced, without being any the better for it, the Law being powerless to benefit men who, like yourselves, have attained to the gospel. All these words and rites you have endured—in vain!" If, indeed, it is only in vain. S. Paul is not, after all, sure that the new teachers have merely done the Galatians no good. For all he knows they have done harm. Hence these words. Perhaps their endurance of the heresy has been "only in vain" or profitless; but who knows that it may not also have led them away from simple faith in Christ, and therefore from salvation? (It is right to remark that most expositors agree with Wesley in the very different interpretation given in his note above.)

5. "And at the present time, Doth he that ministereth the gift of the Spirit to you, and worketh miracles among you, do it by the works of the Law—that is, in confirmation of his preaching justification by works, or of his preaching justification by faith?"—WESLEY.

"This question implies that miracles were indisputably wrought in the apostolic churches. S. Paul asks, 'What is the immediate source from which you receive day by day the Holy Spirit, and from which proceeds power to work miracles? Is it works done in obedience to a rule of conduct or attention to, and belief of, a spoken word?' Answer is needless. They know that when most firmly they believe the gospel, then most richly does the Spirit animate and glorify their entire life, and then most mightily does the power of God endow them with supernatural capacities"—BEET.

6. "Doubtless in confirmation of that grand doctrine, that we are justified by faith, even as Abraham was. The apostle, both in this and in the Epistle to the Romans, makes great use of the instance of Abraham: the rather, because from Abraham the Jews drew their great argument, as they do this day, both for their own continuance in Judaism, and for denying the Gentiles to be the Church of God"—WESLEY.

"The answer to the question asked in the former verse is assumed, 'Surely of faith; and so it was with Abraham'"—LIGHTFOOT. S. Paul is here quoting Gen. 15. 6, according to the LXX. version. ELLICOTT says: "The argument is here very condensed. Ideas lie close together in the apostle's mind, which are some distance apart in ours. He asks whether, in bestowing the gifts of the Spirit upon the Christian Church, God made use of the medium of the Law or of faith. The answer he assumes to be faith; and his thoughts fly at once to that crucial instance of faith, the faith of Abraham."

7. Know then that they who are partakers of his faith, these—"and these only—are the sons of Abraham, and therefore heirs of the promises made to him"—WESLEY.

The constant boast of the Jews was, "We have Abraham to our father." This meant that they could trace their physical descent uninterruptedly from him. Hence they considered themselves the inheritors of the promise made to his seed. S. Paul meets and destroys the claim by substituting spiritual for physical kinship. By the very passage from Genesis, which was so popular in the Jewish schools, he shows that Abraham's faith was the means of his justification, and the occasion of the promises to him and to his sons. But who are his sons? Those who can prove descent from him "according to flesh," by reciting tedious genealogies? Certainly not. The supremely important thing is not to have Abraham's blood in the veins, but Abraham's faith in the heart. All men, be they Jews or Gentiles, who exercise the sublime faith of Abraham, but no others, are his seed. They that are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. How complete must have been the conversion of the ex-Pharisee for him to enunciate such a principle as this! Brought up to "have confidence in the flesh" (Phil. 3. 4, 5, 6), he learns to despise mere flesh-and-blood lineage, and to look upon religion as purely a spiritual fact necessarily related in each individual case to personal faith in Christ—such personal faith as Abraham had in God.

8. And the Scripture—"that is, the Holy Spirit, who gave the Scripture—foreseeing that God would justify the Gentiles also by faith, declared before—so great is the excellency and fulness of the Scripture, that all the things which ever can be controverted are therein both foreseen and determined. In or through thee—as the father of the Messiah—shall all the nations be blessed"—WESLEY.

S. Paul here seems to think of the Scripture as a person; and, expounded as it is to the Church in each generation by the Holy Spirit, we ought not to think of it only as a collection of ancient writings, but as the living voice of God. "The promise to Abraham was an anticipation of the gospel, not only as announcing the Messiah, but also as involving the doctrine of righteousness by faith"—LIGHTFOOT.

In thee. MEYER differs from Wesley's note above, and explains "'In thee,' that is, in the fact that thou art blessed (art justified) is involved (as a consequence) the blessedness of all the Gentiles, in so far as all the Gentiles are to attain justification by faith; and it is in the blessing of Abraham, the father of all the faithful (Rom. 4), that the connection between faith and justification is opened and instituted for all future time."

9. "So then all they, and they only, who are of faith—who truly believe—are blessed with faithful Abraham—receive the blessing as he did, namely, by faith"—WESLEY.

"The general result from vers. 7 and 8. If, namely, believers are sons of Abraham (ver. 7), and if the Scripture, in its promise of blessing to Abraham, has had in view faith as the source of Divine justification for the Gentiles, believers accordingly are those who are blessed with believing Abraham"—MEYER.

10. "They only receive it. For as many as are of the works of the Law—as God deals with on that footing, only on the terms the Law proposes, are under a curse; for it is written, Cursed is everyone who continueth not in all the things which are written in the Law. Who continueth not in all the things—so it requires what no man can perform, viz. perfect, uninterrupted, and perpetual obedience"—WESLEY.

"An argument from the contrary for the correctness of the result exhibited in ver. 9. For how entirely different is the position of those who are workers of the Law! These, as a whole, according to the Scripture, are under a curse; so that it cannot be supposed that they should become blessed"—MEYER. S. Paul is quoting Deut. 27. 26, which carefully read. It is the summing up of the curses on Mount Ebal. So comprehensive and searching were the requirements of the Law to which it refers, that no man had fully met them. None have continued in all the things. Hence all who rely on law-keeping for salvation are under a curse.

11. "But that none is justified by his obedience to the Law in the sight of God—whatever may be done in the sight of man, is further evident from the words of Habakkuk—the just shall live by faith—that is, the man who is accounted just or righteous before God, shall continue in a state of acceptance, life, and salvation, by faith. This is the way God has chosen"—WESLEY.

Bishop LIGHTFOOT thus paraphrases this and the foregoing verse: "On the other hand, all who depend on works of Law are under a curse. This the Scripture itself declares. It utters an anathema against all who fail to fulfil every single ordinance contained in the book of the Law. Again the same truth, that the Law does not justify in the sight of God, appears from another Scripture, which declares that the just shall live by faith."

12. And the Law is not of faith—"but quite opposite to it: it does not say, Believe; but Do"—WESLEY.

"Faith is not the starting-point of the Law. The Law does not take faith as its fundamental principle. On the other hand, it rightly enforces the performance of all its enactments"—LIGHTFOOT. But he that, etc. (quoted from Lev. 18. 5).

13. "Christ—Christ alone. The abruptness of the sentence shows a holy indignation at those who reject so great a blessing. Hath redeemed us—whether Jews or Gentiles, at an high price—from the curse of the Law—the curse of God, which the Law denounces against all transgressors of it. Being made a curse for us—taking the curse upon Himself, that we might be delivered from it, willingly submitting to that death which the Law pronounces peculiarly accursed"—WESLEY.

Christ redeemed us from the curse of the Law, having become a curse for us (R.V.). S. Paul has shown that as many as are of the works of the Law are under a curse (ver. 10). He now shows how Christ has bought us off from this curse, by taking our place, and becoming a curse for us. Compare the latter words with 2 Cor. 5. 21, "made sin on our behalf." Both phrases are too profound for written exposition. The only school where their meaning and power may be even partially apprehended is at Calvary. We must gaze with faith and love upon the sacrificed Lamb of God if we would know what these things be. Light upon their infinite significance is only born of the darkness that was "over all the land until the ninth hour." For it is written, etc. The quotation is from Deut. 21. 23, according to the LXX. version.

14. That the blessing of Abraham—"the blessing promised to him—might come on the Gentiles—also. That we—who believe, whether Jews or Gentiles—might receive the promise of the Spirit—which includes all the other promises. Through faith—not by works; for faith looks wholly to the promise"—WESLEY.

"Thus the Law, the great barrier which excluded the Gentiles, is done away in Christ. By its removal the Gentiles are put on a level with us Jews; and, so united, we and they alike receive the promise in the gift of the Spirit through our faith"—LIGHTFOOT. "The blessing of Abraham—pronounced upon Abraham, and to be fulfilled in his seed. Through Jesus Christ—through the relation into which they enter with Christ by embracing Christianity. We—the apostle and his readers, whether Jews or Gentiles. Receive the promise of the Spirit—a special outpouring of the Spirit was to be one of the characteristics of the great messianic manifestation. (Comp. Joel 2. 28, 29; Acts 2. 16-21)"—ELLICOTT.

15. I speak after the manner of men—"I illustrate this by a familiar instance, taken from the practice of men. Though it be but a man's covenant, yet, if it be once legally confirmed, none—no, not the covenanter himself, unless something unforeseen occur, which cannot be the case with God—disannulleth, or addeth thereto—any new conditions"—WESLEY.

S. Paul has been showing that the Law cannot justify (ver. 9, etc.). He is now going to show that neither can the Law hinder justification. He will establish this by showing the subordination of the Law to the promise. His illustration, based on the sacredness of even human covenants, sounds a note of confidence at the very outset of his argument. His whole reasoning in this connection requires careful attention. "This is the central point of the argument with the Judaisers"—FINDLAY.

16. Now the promises were made to Abraham and his seed. "Several promises were made to Abraham; but the chief of all, and which was several times repeated, was that of the blessing through Christ. He—that is, God—saith not, And to seeds, as of many—as if the promise were made to several kinds of seed—but as of one—that is, one kind of seed, one posterity, one kind of sons. And to all these the blessing belonged by promise. Which is Christ—including all that believe in Him"—WESLEY.

The promises referred to are contained in Gen. 13. 15 and Gen. 17. 8. "S. Paul brings into view the object of the covenant, the person designated by it—Christ, its proper Heir. This consideration, though stated here parenthetically, lies at the basis of the settlement made with Abraham; its importance is made manifest by the after course of S. Paul's exposition"—FINDLAY.

17. And this I say—"what I mean is this. The covenant which was before confirmed of God—by the promise itself, by the repetition of it, and by a solemn oath, concerning the blessing all nations. Through Christ, the Law which was four hundred and thirty years after—counting from the time when the promise was first made to Abraham. (Gen. 12. 2, 3.) Doth not disannul, so as to make the promise of no effect—with regard to all nations, if only the Jewish were to receive it; yea, with regard to them also, if it was by works, so as to supersede it, and introduce another way of obtaining the blessing"—WESLEY.

Four hundred and thirty years. There are chronological difficulties connected with this passage, but they need not alarm us. They hold a false theory of inspiration who would wish S. Paul to turn aside from his argument in order to discuss an irrelevant detail of historical criticism. Whatever the exact interval may have been between the promise and the Law, S. Paul's reasoning remains valid. FINDLAY says: "The bearing of S. Paul's argument is now perfectly clear. He is using the promise to Abraham to overthrow the supremacy of the Mosaic Law. The promise was, he says, the prior settlement. No subsequent transaction could invalidate it, or disqualify those entitled under it to receive the inheritance. That testament lies at the foundation of the sacred history. The Jew least of all could deny this. How could such an instrument be set aside? Or what right has anyone to limit it by stipulations of a later date?"

18. And again—"this is a new argument. The former was drawn from the time, this from the nature, of the transaction. If the eternal inheritance be obtained by keeping the Law, it is no more by virtue of the free promise—these being just opposite to each other. But it is by promise. Therefore it is not by the Law"—WESLEY.

Bishop LIGHTFOOT thus admirably paraphrases this and the two preceding verses: "Now the promise of God was not given to Abraham alone, but to his seed. What is meant by 'his seed'? The form of expression denotes unity. It must have its fulfilment in some one person. This person is Christ. Thus it was unfulfilled when the Law came. Between the giving of the promise then and the fulfilment of it the Law intervened. And coming many hundred years after, it was plainly distinct from the promise, it did not interpret the terms of the promise. Thus the Law cannot set aside the promise. Yet this would be done in effect, if the inheritance could only be obtained by obedience to the Law: since the promise itself imposed no such condition."

19. It—"the Ceremonial Law—was added—to the promise—because of transgressions. Probably, the yoke of the Ceremonial Law was inflicted as a punishment for the national sin of idolatry (Ex. 32. 1), at least the more grievous parts of it; and the whole of it was a prophetic type of Christ. The Moral Law was added to the promise to discover and restrain transgressions, to convince men of their guilt, and need of the promise, and give some check to sin. And this Law passeth not away; but the Ceremonial Law was only introduced till Christ, the seed to or through whom the promise was made, should come. And it was ordained by angels in the hand of a Mediator—it was not given to Israel, like the promise to Abraham, immediately from God Himself; but was conveyed by the ministry of angels to Moses, and delivered into his hand as a mediator between God and them to remind them of the great Mediator"—WESLEY.

What, then, is the Law? (R.V.). S. Paul's quick mind suggests to him the need of guarding what he has said from misapprehension. Reading the foregoing passage, some may think that he disparages the Law as useless or worse. He hastens to correct any such misunderstanding. The Law, he has shown, cannot save. The Law, he has also shown, cannot hinder salvation by making void the earlier promise. But the Law (like everything else originating with God) has a use and meaning after all. He will vindicate its use and meaning by answering the question, What, then, is the Law? But he will so answer as to keep in view its inferiority to the dispensation of grace. "In four points this inferiority is seen—(1) Instead of justifying it condemns, instead of giving life it kills; it was added to reveal and multiply transgressions. (2) It was but temporary; when the seed came, to whom the promise was given, it was annulled. (3) It did not come direct from God to man. There was a double interposition, a twofold mediation between the giver and the recipient. There were the angels, who administered it as God's instruments; there was Moses (or the high-priest) who delivered it to man. (4) As follows from the idea of mediation, it was of the nature of a contract, depending for its fulfilment on the observance of its conditions by the two contracting parties. Not so the promise which, proceeding from the sole fiat of God, is unconditional and unchangeable"—LIGHTFOOT. On the adding of the Law because of transgressions, comp. ver. 22 below, and also Rom. 3. 20 and 5. 20. The later rabbis loved to speculate concerning the angels who assisted in the giving of the Law, and there are many to-day who seem to have nothing better to do than to weave useless fancies round such passages. The reticence of Scripture in such matters has surely only one lesson for us.

20. Now the mediator is not a mediator of one. "There must be two parties, or there can be no mediator between them; but God who made the free promise to Abraham is only one of the parties. The other, Abraham, was not present at the time of Moses. Therefore in the promise Moses had nothing to do. The Law, wherein he was concerned, was a transaction of quite another nature"—WESLEY.

More than four hundred interpretations of this verse have been put forward. We shall only expound the passage soundly by following S. Paul's thought through the preceding and following verses. For the moment he has suspended his full answer to the question, "What, then, is the Law?" Just at this stage, the subordination and inferiority of Law to promise dominates his mind. One aspect of this inferiority is the need for mediation. Now, mediation implies two parties. In the case of the Law it was a contract between God and the Jewish people. But a contract is only valid so long as both sides fulfil the agreed conditions. Bearing in mind, then, how extremely improbable it was that such conditions could be fulfilled by the Jews, we see how precarious it was, and how inferior to the promise! For God who gave the promise is One! In the Law there were two parties—the unchangeable God and weak and sinful men. The latter deprived the arrangement of all absoluteness and certainty, for their failure to obey the terms might invalidate it at any moment. But in the promise we see the unchangeable God only! Here, then, we have a blessed certainty—absolute and unconditional. There is no neutralising element of human weakness, but only the eternal "Father of Lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning."

21. "Will it follow from thence that the Law is against, opposite to the promises of God? By no means. They are well consistent. But yet the Law cannot give life, as the promise doth. If there had been a Law which could have given life—which could have entitled a sinner to life, God would have spared His own Son, and righteousness, or justification, with all the blessings consequent upon it, would have been by that Law"—WESLEY.

"Thus the Law differs widely from the promise. But does this difference imply antagonism? Did the Law interfere with the promise? Far otherwise. Indeed, we might imagine such a Law that it would take the place of the promise—would justify and give life. This was not the effect of the Law of Moses"—LIGHTFOOT.

22. But, "on the contrary, the Scripture, wherein that law is written, hath concluded all under sin—hath shut them up together (so the word properly signifies), as in a prison, under sentence of death, to the end that all being cut off from expecting justification by the Law, the promise might be freely given to them that believe"—WESLEY.

The answer to the question, What, then, is the Law? is here given. We have seen that the promise was made to Abraham and to his seed. We have further seen that Abraham's seed are those who have faith. But faith in what or whom? Faith in Christ as a Saviour from sin. But we must know we have sinned, before we can feel our need of, and repose faith in, a Saviour from sin. And here is the use of the Law. By its compendious precepts, which we have failed to obey, it shows us that we have "come short." "The Law came in beside, that the trespass might abound." (Rom. 5. 20.) The Law so confronts us with the damning fact of sin as to drive us to Christ for salvation.

23. But before faith—"that is, the gospel dispensation—came, we were kept—as in close custody—under the Law—the Mosaic dispensation. Shut up unto the faith which was to be revealed—reserved and prepared for the gospel dispensation"—WESLEY.

This verse is practically a repetition in other words of the statement in the previous verse, with the thought of the historical order of Promise, Law, and Faith (Abraham, Moses, Christ) more dominant. (See below.)

24. Wherefore the Law was our schoolmaster unto Christ—"it was designed to train us up for Christ. And this it did both by its commands, which showed the need we had for His atonement; and its ceremonies, which all pointed us to Him"—WESLEY.

Schoolmaster is a misleading rendering. S. Paul's illustration is that of a pædagogus—generally a superior slave who had charge of children under seven years of age. Hence the thought is not that of teaching about Christ, but leading to Christ. This is the best place for remarking an important consideration regarding S. Paul's treatment of the use of the Law in this chapter. He has omitted one very important use of the Law. We have seen that it was given to convince us of sin, but surely it was intended to restrain sin as well. "Thou shalt not steal" was spoken, not only that those who do steal may be aware they are sinners, but also that men might be dissuaded from stealing. And this applies to the whole of the Moral Law. As to the Ceremonial Law, it was partly typical and partly a concession to the ritualistic tendency of a very slightly developed religious community. All these aspects of the Law S. Paul here ignores. But he does so advisedly. "The immediate moral purpose of the Law, to hold men back from sin, which must have been in God's thought when giving it, is by S. Paul completely subordinated to its ultimate evangelical purpose. To him the Law is only a preparation for the gospel"—BEET.

25. But faith—"that is, the gospel dispensation—being come, we are no longer under that schoolmaster—the Mosaic dispensation"—WESLEY.

"Faith is the true emancipator of the human mind. It comes to take its place as mistress of the soul, queen in the realm of the heart; to be henceforth its spring of life, the norm and guiding principle of its activity. The Mosaic Law—a system of external, repressive ordinances—is no longer to be the basis of religion. Faith assumes its sovereignty, and claims its inheritance. Faith is come—for Christ is come, its author and finisher"—FINDLAY.

26. For ye—"Christians are all adult sons of God—and so need a schoolmaster no longer"—WESLEY.

In the previous verse he has written "we." But S. Paul is a Jew. He therefore changes "we" into "ye," in order to bring out emphatically the participation of Gentiles in the glorious privileges of the gospel. "Therefore, we no more need the pædagogus. The end being attained, what further need for the means?" Observe the stride S. Paul has here taken. In ver. 8 our faith is stated to make us sons of Abraham. Here, "through faith in Christ Jesus, we are all the sons of God!" The grand argument has at length been unfolded, and S. Paul can speak of us, not only as heirs of the promise, but as recipients of its fulfilment. Here, again, we have a verse which transcends exposition. That we should be sons of God is one of the most characteristic, and at the same time one of the most profound, doctrines of Christianity. The sublimest human philosophy derives its grandeur from a paraphrasing of this unsearchable idea. To S. Paul this was the ultimate idea. (Comp. ch. 4. 5, etc.) It is by reason of the vital union of believers with Christ, the Only-begotten Son of God, that they are sons of God.

27. "For as many of you as have testified your faith by being baptized in the name of Christ, have put on Christ—have received Him as your righteousness, and are therefore sons of God through Him"—WESLEY.

The solemn rite of baptism accompanied the admission of the Galatian converts into the body of Christ. As many as expressed their faith in this way did put on Christ. Note that, although no support is given in this verse to high doctrines of baptismal regeneration, the duty of every believer to receive this holy sacrament is distinctly implied. Put on Christ. See concluding words of the note on previous verse. True believers in Christ have, as it were, "put on" like a garment His Sonship relation to the Father.

28. There is neither Jew nor Greek—"that is, there is no difference betweeen them; they are equally accepted through faith. There is neither male nor female—circumcision being laid aside, which was peculiar to males, and was designed to put a difference, during that dispensation, between Jews and Gentiles"—WESLEY.

The "chosen people" of Judaism has given place to the "universal brotherhood" of Christianity. Race distinctions, social distinctions, even sex distinctions, vanish in the infinitely glorious truth of the union of humanity with the Divine Being. Ye are all one person in Christ—a body whereof we are members and He the Head. One Spirit enables us, one Divine life fills us. Here is an echo of the Redeemer's prayer "that they may be one, even as We are one; I in them, and they in Me, that they may be perfected into one."

29. If ye are Christ's—"that is, believers in Him"—WESLEY.

S. Paul the mystic, again gives place to S. Paul the controversialist. Christ (ver. 16) has been shown to be Abraham's seed. And if the Galatians are part of Christ (so the Greek) they also are Abraham's seed, and hence are as much inheritors of the promise as the Judaisers themselves.

CHAPTER IV.

1. Now—"to illustrate by a plain similitude the pre-eminence of the Christian over the legal dispensation—the heir, as long as he is a child—as he is under age—differeth nothing from a servant—not being at liberty either to use or enjoy his estate. Though he be lord—proprietor of it all"—WESLEY.

Refer back to ver. 24. S. Paul has digressed for a moment in order to call attention to the changed position of affairs now that faith is come. He here returns to make good and explain his illustration of the pædagogus, whereby he has been showing the purpose of the Law. FINDLAY says: "The difference between Judaism and Christianity, historically unfolded in ch. 3, is here restated in graphic summary. We see, first, the heir of God in his minority; and again, the same heir in possession of his estate."

2. But is under tutors—"as to his person—and stewards—as to his substance"—WESLEY.

Tutors and governors (R.V. "Guardians and stewards"). The father in this illustration is evidently dead, and has left detailed instructions in his will as to his son's executors, and the age at which he shall be released from their control. The heavenly Father, of course, "ever liveth." But the absence of analogy in this minor point does not weaken the force of S. Paul's illustration. His illustrations, like Christ's parables, are seldom intended to go on "all fours."

3. So we—"the Church of God—when we were children—in our minority, under the legal dispensation—were in bondage—in a kind of servile state—under the elements of the world—under the typical observances of the Law, which were like the first elements of grammar, the A B C of children; and were of so gross a nature, as hardly to carry our thoughts beyond this world"—WESLEY.

He is speaking of both Jews and Gentiles. Before Christ came, man's knowledge of God was almost wholly through material objects; he spelt out a few truths, written in such alphabets as the holy things of the old covenant, or (in the case of the Gentiles) the physical phenomena around him. (Comp. Rom. 1. 20.) Held in bondage—an echo of ch. 3. 23. But it is fair to call attention also to the New Testament teaching that knowledge is liberty. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free" (John 8. 32). Whence it follows, that not to know the truth, and to know only the rudiments of the world, was a state of "bondage."

4. But when the fulness of the time—"appointed by the Father (ver. 2). Was come, God sent forth—from His own bosom—His Son, miraculously made of the substance of a woman. Made under the Law—both under the precept, and under the curse, of it"—WESLEY.

When the long years of the world's minority were expired. Such is certainly the primary meaning. But there may be an added reference to the preparation in history for Christ. Every student knows that the state of religion, morals, philosophy, politics, at the close of the pre-Christian era, was such as to constitute a most striking "fulness of times." Sent forth. The Greek word means "sent out from Himself." His Son. The pre-existence is distinctively implied. Born of a woman. The God-Man's human life, and the source of it, are here indicated. Under the Law. The statement that He was born a Jew increases the historical definiteness of the verse, and serves a further purpose. (See below.)

5. To redeem those under the Law—"from the curse of it, and from that low, servile state. That we—Jews who believe—might receive the adoption—all the privileges of adult sons"—WESLEY.

"By being born a Jew, He took upon Himself the obligation to keep, in every sense, the Law of Moses; and accepted obedience to Law as the condition of the approval of God. Those under Law—the Jews. In a wide yet correct sense all men are under Law. Actually, those under obligation to keep the Law are also under its curse. For all men have broken the Law. From this curse Christ came to buy us off (same word in ch. 3. 13), by Himself enduring it. This purpose implies that Christ's assumed obligation to keep the Law, and therefore His perfect obedience, were needful for man's deliverance from the penalty of sin, i.e. needful to reconcile (Rom. 3. 26) His deliverance with God's justice. It thus involves the active obedience of Christ as an essential element of man's salvation. But this element S. Paul does not make prominent. He attributes salvation always to the death, never to the obedient life, of Christ"—BEET. In order that we might receive the adoption of sons. Why did God send forth His Son? "In order that" He might "redeem" us. Why did He "redeem" us? "In order that we might receive the adoption of sons." (See notes on ch. 3. 26 and 27.) Creation and redemption are summarised in the saying, "Now are we the sons of God."

6. And because ye—"Gentiles who believe—are also thus made His adult sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts likewise, crying, Abba, Father—enabling you to call upon God both with the confidence, and the tempers, of dutiful children. The Hebrew and Greek word are joined together, to express the joint cry of the Jews and Gentiles"—WESLEY.

"It must be true that ye are the sons of God. For otherwise, whence have ye the Spirit? It is because ye are sons, that God," etc. Spirit of His Son. The discourses in S. John's Gospel, in which Christ promises to come again in the Paraclete, are the best commentary on this phrase. Crying, Abba, Father. While the Spirit is sent because we are sons, on the other hand we become aware of our sonship because the Spirit has been sent into our hearts. It is His voice which teaches us to call God our Father.

7. Wherefore thou—"who believest in Christ—art no more a servant—like those who are under the Law—but a son—of mature age. And if a son, then an heir of all the promises, and of the all-sufficient God Himself"—WESLEY.

From "ye" S. Paul changes to thou, addressing himself to each individual reader. The illustration of ver. 1 is still before his mind, but varied in one particular. He seems not to be thinking about an intestate father, whose property, according to Roman law, was shared by adopted equally with born sons. The thought therefore is, Ye are no longer bondservants but adopted sons, and consequently heirs through God, i.e. through what God has done for you. Since the early part of ch. 3. S. Paul has been developing an argument with regard to Christians in general. Here he reaches the close of it, and tells his readers that they are no longer bondservants but sons and heirs. But in the next verse he returns suddenly and sadly to the apostasy of his readers. He has been describing their ideal condition as believers. Now he must rebuke their real condition as apostates.

8. Indeed then, when ye know not God, ye served them that by nature—"that is, in reality—are no gods—and so were under a far worse bondage than even that of the Jews. For they did serve the true God, though in a low, slavish manner"—WESLEY.

Howbeit at that time, not knowing God, ye were in bondage to them which by nature are no gods (R.V.). S. Paul would only look upon the gods of heathendom as demons. While they were idolaters and knew not God their state was indeed one of bondage, but how much worse is their state now! Not to have the light was wretchedness, but to reject it is sin!

9. But now being known of God—"as His beloved children—how turn ye back to the weak and poor elements—'weak,' utterly unable to purge your conscience from guilt, or to give that filial confidence in God: 'poor'—incapable of enriching the soul with such holiness and happiness as ye are heirs to. Ye desire to be again in bondage—though of another kind; now to these elements, as before to those idols"—WESLEY.

But now that ye have come to know God, or rather to be known of God (R.V.). That they knew God is implied in ver. 6. The whole Epistle also implies that before the false teachers came they had by simple faith known "God, and Jesus Christ whom He has sent." S. Paul adds, "or rather," etc., in order that salvation may be seen as wholly of grace. He corrects by it the previous phrase which might savour of human merit. How turn ye back again? His exposition of the place and function of the Law has shown that it is powerless to save, and that the man under the Law is under bondage. He therefore describes the Galatian apostasy as a relapse from liberty to slavery.

10. Ye observe days—"Jewish Sabbaths—and months—new moons—and times—as that of the Passover, Pentecost, and the feast of tabernacles—and years—annual solemnities. It does not mean sabbatic years. These were not to be observed out of the land of Canaan"—WESLEY.

He brings forward these facts to confirm the charge of going back into the bondage of the Law. The Greek signifies, Ye minutely observe. TISCHENDORF and others translate this as a question—a sorrowful and reproachful, Do you observe? etc.

11. "The apostle here, dropping the argument, applies to the affections (vers. 11–20), and humbles himself to the Galatians, with an inexpressible tenderness"—WESLEY.

I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed labour upon you in vain (R.V.). He does not say "I am afraid lest," but "I am afraid of you, lest." Hence the meaning is not that he grieves over the trouble he has put himself to in vain; but that he grieves over the possibility of their not being saved after all. He is pitying them, not himself.

12. Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am—"meet me in mutual love—for I am as you were—I still love you as affectionately as ye once loved me. Why should I not? Ye have not injured me at all—I have received no personal injury from you"—WESLEY.

As ye are (R.V.). By observing days and months and seasons and years—the Galatians have fallen into that very ceremonialism which S. Paul escaped from at his conversion. The meaning here is therefore: "Become as I am—a man who has shaken off the bondage of ordinances. For I am as ye are—I have abandoned Judaism, born Jew as I am, and have placed myself on the same spiritual level as you born Gentiles. If I, for your sakes, could give up ordinances amid which I was bred and born, surely you, for my sake, will give up these ordinances which you have so lately received that you cannot yet be attached to them as I was. This is what I deserve from you; and, unless your attitude to me has changed, you will do what I ask. Ye have not injured me at all in the past, and surely will not do so now."

13. I preached to you, notwithstanding infirmity of the flesh—"that is, notwithstanding bodily weakness, and under great disadvantage from the despicableness of my outward appearance"—WESLEY.

Because of an infirmity (R.V.). S. Paul is here referring to some events known to his readers, but not known to us. It would seem that he had not intended to preach in Galatia, but being detained there by sickness he spent his compulsory leisure in setting forth Christ crucified.

14. And ye did not slight my temptation—"that is, ye did not slight or disdain me for my temptation, my 'thorn in the flesh'"—WESLEY.

That which was a temptation to you (R.V.). "Ye remember, when detained by sickness, I preached the gospel to you, what a hearty welcome ye gave me. My infirmity might well have tempted you to reject my message. It was far otherwise. Ye did not spurn me, nor loathe me, but received me as an angel of God, as Christ Jesus Himself"—LIGHTFOOT.

15. What was then the blessedness ye spake of—"on which ye so congratulated one another"—WESLEY.

Where then is that gratulation of yourselves? for I bear you witness, that if possible ye would have plucked out your eyes and given them to me (R.V.).

16. So, then, am I become your enemy because I tell you the truth? "You remember in what condition I first came to you; and I remember well the kindness that you lavished on me,—you would have given me your very 'eyes' if I had needed them! Alas, what has become of this delight and gratitude? Now, because I tell you the truth you seem to think I hate you"—FINDLAY.

17. They—"the judaising teachers who are come among you—zealously affect you—express an extraordinary regard for you. But not well—their zeal is not according to knowledge; neither have they a single eye to your spiritual advantage. Yea, they would exclude you—from me and from the blessings of the gospel. That ye might affect—love and esteem—them"—WESLEY.

Your false teachers are paying diligent court to you, but their motive is not your interest so much as their own. By winning you over to their side, they hope to cut you off from me, in order that ye may seek them as your spiritual advisers, which will flatter their own pride.

18. In a good thing—"in what is really worthy our zeal. True zeal is only fervent love"—WESLEY.

"Not that I am jealous of your making other friends in my absence; only let the friendship be honourable and sincere"—FINDLAY.

19. My little children. "He speaks as a parent, both with authority, and the most tender sympathy, toward weak and sickly children. Of whom I travail in birth again—as I did before (ver. 13) in vehement pain, sorrow, desire, prayer—till Christ be formed in you—till there be in you all the mind that was in Him"—WESLEY.

20. I could wish to be present with you now—"particularly in this exigency. And to change—variously to attemper. My voice. He writes with much softness; but he would speak with more. The voice may more easily be varied according to the occasion than a letter can. For I stand in doubt of you—so that I am at a loss how to speak at this distance"—WESLEY.

I am perplexed about you (R.V.).

"O my children! I am suffering a mother's pangs for you once more, longing to see Christ formed in you! Would that I could be with you and speak in some kinder tone! You perplex me, and I know not what to write"—FINDLAY.

21. Do ye not hear the Law—"regard what it says"—WESLEY.

The paragraph beginning with this verse and ending at ch. 5. 1 is a master-stroke of argument. His readers have been led away by teaching full of rabbinical lore and allegories. S. Paul will meet the false teachers on their own ground, and vanquish them with their own weapons. "Ye constantly appeal to the Law, the Law! To the Law we will go, and hear what it really says!"

23. Was born after the flesh—"in a natural way—by promise—through that supernatural strength which was given Abraham in consequence of the promise"—WESLEY.

(See under ver. 28.)

24. Which things are an allegory. "An allegory is a figurative speech, wherein one thing is expressed, and another intended. For those two sons are types of the two covenants. One covenant is that given from Mount Sinai, which beareth children to bondage—that is, all who are under this, the Jewish covenant, are in bondage. Which covenant is typified by Agar"—WESLEY.

(See under ver. 28.)

25. For this is Mount Sinai in Arabia—"that is, the type of Mount Sinai. And answereth to—resembles—Jerusalem that now is, and is in bondage—like Agar, both to the Law and to the Romans"—WESLEY.

The exact translation is, Now this Hagar is Mount Sinai in Arabia, and stands in line with the Jerusalem that now is. All the various persons and objects mentioned or implied in the allegory fall into two groups, as soldiers make up two opposing armies. Hagar, Ishmael, Sinai, the old covenant, and "the Jerusalem that now is," stand in one line; Sarah, Isaac, Mount Sion, the new covenant, and "the Jerusalem that is above" in the opposing line.

26. "But the other covenant is derived from Jerusalem that is above, which is free—like Sarah, from all inward and outward bondage, and is the mother of us all—that is, all who believe in Christ, are free citizens of the New Jerusalem"—WESLEY.

(See under ver. 28.)

27. For it is written. "Those words in the primary sense promise a flourishing state to Judea, after its desolation by the Chaldeans. Rejoice, thou barren, that bearest not. Ye heathen nations, who were destitute, for many ages, of a seed to serve the Lord. Break forth, and cry aloud for joy, thou that, in former time, travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children than she that hath an husband—for ye that were so long utterly desolate shall at length bear more children than the Jewish Church, which was of old espoused to God"—WESLEY.

(See under next verse.)

28. Now we—"who believe, whether Jews or Gentiles—are children of the promise—not born in a natural way, but by the supernatural power of God. And as such we are heirs of the promise made to believing Abraham"—WESLEY.

The following is Bishop LIGHTFOOT'S paraphrase of vers. 21–28: "Ye who vaunt your submission to Law, listen while I read you a lesson out of the Law. The Scripture says that Abraham had two sons, the one the child of the bondwoman, the other the child of the free. The child of the bondwoman, we are there told, came into the world in the common course of nature; the child of the free was born in fulfilment of a promise. These things may be treated as an allegory. The two mothers represent two covenants. The one, Hagar, is the covenant given from Mount Sinai, whose children are born into slavery (for Sinai is in Arabia, the land of Hagar and the Hagarenes), and this covenant corresponds to the earthly Jerusalem, which is in bondage with her children. The other answers to the heavenly Jerusalem, which is free. I mean the Church of Christ, our common mother. In her progeny is fulfilled the prophetic saying, which bids the barren and forsaken wife rejoice, because her offspring shall be far more numerous than her rival's, who claims the husband for herself." S. Paul has here crushed his opponents with their own engines. The story of Ishmael and Isaac, often used by the Jews as an illustration and proof of their claims, when studied in connection with what S. Paul has established, in ch. 3, is seen to bear an exactly opposite meaning. The Jews are the children of Hagar and of bondage, and only those who are sons of God, through faith in Christ Jesus (ch. 3, 26), are children of promise and of freedom. The pet allegory of the Judaisers has become the very instrument of their discomfiture!

29. But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, so it is now also—"and so it will be in all ages and nations, to the end of the world"—WESLEY.

Blow upon blow! "These Judaisers must be descendants of Hagar! By their fruits ye may know them. They persecute and treat as inferiors the spiritual children, just as Ishmael, Hagar's first-born, ridiculed Isaac, the child of promise." This persecution was no fancy, imagined for the sake of argument. S. Paul's very life had often been in danger from it.

30. But what saith the Scripture—"showing the consequence of this—Cast out the bondwoman and her son—who mocked Isaac. In like manner will God cast out all who seek to be justified by the Law, especially if they persecute them who are His children by faith"—WESLEY.

He deals one last blow with the allegory before casting it aside. And what a blow it is! As Ishmael and Isaac could not remain in the same house, the Law and the gospel cannot coexist. The false teachers know this, and bid the simple gospel depart, leaving their legalism in full possession. But what saith the Scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son, and it has been proved that these represent the Law. It is the Law, then, which must go, and the gospel which must enjoy an unshared supremacy!

31. So then—"to sum up all—we—who believe—are not children of the bondwoman—have nothing to do with the servile Mosaic dispensation—but of the free—being free from the curse and the bond of that Law, and from the power of sin and Satan"—WESLEY.

"Remembering that we are children of the free woman, let us not act as bondslaves."

CHAPTER V.

1. Stand fast therefore in the liberty—"from the Ceremonial Law—wherewith Christ hath made us—and all believers—free; and be not entangled again with the yoke of legal bondage"—WESLEY.

With freedom did Christ set us free; stand fast therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage (R.V.). This verse belongs properly to the last chapter, forming the practical application of its concluding argument. They had been held, before their conversion, in the yoke of heathenism; now they were submitting to the yoke of legalism, although Christ had lived and died and risen again to free them from bondage in any form.

2. If ye be circumcised—"and seek to be justified thereby—Christ—the Christian institution—will profit you nothing—for you thereby disclaim Christ, and all the blessings which are through faith in Him"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul now in a warning tone reveals to them the fearful danger to which they are exposed. This he does by the address Behold (in the singular), exciting the special attention of every individual reader, and with the energetic defiant interposition of his personal authority. On such a footing Christ cannot be Christ, the Mediator of salvation. S. Paul's judgment presupposes that circumcision is adopted, not as a condition of a holy life, but as a condition of salvation, which was the question raised among the Galatians"—MEYER. Will profit you nothing. (See on ch. 1. 4.) The meaning is "will profit you nothing" at the general judgment (which the early Church expected soon to take place).

3. I testify to every man—"every Gentile—that is circumcised. He thereby makes himself a debtor—obliges himself, at the peril of his salvation, to do the whole Law"—WESLEY.

Observe the solemn yea. The argument is this, "Circumcision is the seal of the Law. He who willingly and deliberately undergoes circumcision enters upon a compact to fulfil the Law. To fulfil it, therefore, he is bound, and he cannot plead the grace of Christ, for he has entered on another mode of justification"—LIGHTFOOT.

4. Therefore Christ is become of no effect to you—"who seek to be justified by the Law. Ye are fallen from grace—ye renounce the new covenant. Ye disclaim the benefit of this gracious dispensation"—WESLEY.

Ye are severed from Christ, ye who would be justified by the Law (R.V.). "Although actual justification in Law is impossible, the mere beginning of the fruitless process, as S. Paul's readers by their observance (ch. 4. 10) of days and seasons, had already begun it, had actually separated them from the influences proceeding from the cross of Christ"—BEET. "Whoever becomes righteous by obedience to the Law becomes so no longer by the grace of God, but by works according to desert (Rom. 4. 11, 16; 11. 6), so that thus his relation of grace towards God (which is capable of being lost) has ceased"—MEYER.

5. For we—"who believe in Christ, who are under the gospel dispensation—through the Spirit—without any of these cardinal ordinances—wait for—in sure confidence of attaining—the hope of righteousness—the righteousness we hope for, and full reward of it. This righteousness we receive of God through faith; and by faith we shall obtain the reward"—WESLEY.

We is very emphatic in the Greek, and means S. Paul and those like him. S. Paul is confident that these have not fallen from grace. Religion with them is through the Spirit and by faith. That of the Galatian apostates is of ordinances and carnal rites. And this difference is a further proof that the latter have fallen from grace. Their error has severed them from the Church as well as from Christ. Observe how in this verse and the next we have hope, faith, and love.

6. For in Christ Jesus—"according to the institution which He hath established, according to the tenor of the Christian covenant—neither circumcision—with the most punctual observance of the Law—nor uncircumcision—with the most exact heathen morality—availeth anything—toward present justification or eternal salvation. But faith—alone; even that faith which worketh by love all inward and outward holiness"—WESLEY.

Here we have again the old point that religion is a spiritual fact. The rites of the old dispensation had their place (see notes on ch. 3), but in Christ Jesus they are done away. The essential now is faith working by love. This latter phrase, when once grasped, does away with the apparent contradiction between S. Paul and S. James. We are saved by faith, not by works, but the only faith which saves is that which also works by love. This is the noblest conceivable teaching on the subject of righteous living. A man may live a life full of the actions commonly considered righteous, from no higher motive than the fear of future punishment, or the desire to gain the good opinion of others. Such a morality is as low as its aims. The "obedience from the heart" of Rom. 6. 17 is better than any sacrifice to fear or to self-love. BENGEL says of this phrase, "In these words lies the whole of Christianity."

7. Ye did run well—"in the race of faith. Who hath hindered you in your course, that you should not still obey the truth?"—WESLEY.

So there were backsliders even among the converts of a S. Paul!

8. "This your present persuasion cometh not from God, who called you to His kingdom and glory"—WESLEY.

This persuasion came not of Him that calleth you (R.V.). He "that calls," in the writings of S. Paul, always means God. "The call to leave your old belief is not a call from God."

9. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump—"one troubler (ver. 10) troubles all"—WESLEY.

This proverb is also quoted in 1 Cor. 5. 6. "If the false apostles have, by means of their persuasion, succeeded in making even but a small beginning in the work of imparting to you erroneous doctrines or false principles, this will develop itself to the corruption of your whole Christian faith and life"—MEYER.

10. Yet I have confidence that—"after ye have read this—ye will be otherwise minded—than I am, and ye were. But he that troubleth you—it seems to have been one person chiefly who endeavoured to seduce them—shall bear his judgment—a heavy burden, already hanging over his head"—WESLEY.

"He has a confidence about them which he feels to be an outflow of Christian life, that, when they receive this letter, they will share his alarm about the influence of a little leaven, and will recognise in the teaching of the disturbers an influence to be feared. This reveals S. Paul's confidence that this letter will have its designed salutary effect. It is almost the only gleam of light in the Epistle"—BEET. Shall bear his judgment. The "his" seems to indicate that sentence, which, at the last judgment, will be the special portion of disturbers of the Church—his appropriate, well-deserved judgment. The words must not be taken as a threat of excommunication at the hands of S. Paul.

11. But if I still preach circumcision—"as that troubler seems to have affirmed, probably taking occasion from his having circumcised Timothy—why do I still suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased—the grand reason why the Jews were so offended at his preaching Christ crucified, and so bitterly persecuted him for it, was, that it implied the abolition of the Law. Yet S. Paul did not condemn the conforming, out of condescension to the weakness of anyone, even to the Ceremonial Law; but he did absolutely condemn those who taught it as necessary to justification"—WESLEY.

"At this point the malicious charge of his enemies rises up before the apostle, 'Why, you do the same thing yourself; you caused Timothy to be circumcised.' To this he replies, 'What! do I, who have incurred the deadly hatred of the Judaisers, who am exposed to continual persecution from them, do I preach circumcision?"—LIGHTFOOT. S. Paul the logician is in evidence once more. "The charge that I myself favour circumcision is either true or false. If true, why am I still persecuted, as opposed to circumcision? If false, why is it made?"

12. I would they were even cut off——from your communion; cast out of your church, that thus trouble you"—WESLEY.

I would they would even mutilate themselves (R.V. margin)—as did the priests of Cybele. "A mere passing wish. S. Paul wishes for a moment that the disturbers would go so far as to join the ranks of the heathen devotees around them. He thus compared circumcision with idolatrous mutilation. And rightly; for although once commended by God as a sign of His covenant, yet to do it when no longer required, was but to imitate the needless self-inflictions of heathenism"—BEET.

13. Ye have been called to liberty—"from sin and misery, as well as from the Ceremonial Law; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh—take not occasion from hence to gratify corrupt nature. But by love serve one another—and hereby show that Christ has made you free"—WESLEY.

"It is with justice that I speak so indignantly against these men; for ye, who are being worked upon by them to bring you under the bondage of the Law, have received God's call to the messianic kingdom for an object entirely different—in order that ye may be free"—MEYER. Only, etc. S. Paul concludes his long discourse on doctrine at this point, and with the same breath begins his discourse on morals. He was sensitive to the tendency, so often yielded to since his day, to pervert justification by faith into Antinomianism. (Comp. this and the following chapter with Rom. 6., where ethics follow doctrine in the same way.) He speaks of liberty, not licence.

14. For all the Law is fulfilled in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself—"inasmuch as none can do this without loving God (1 John 4. 12); and the love of God and man includes all perfection"—WESLEY.

But through love be servants one to another (R.V.). "In a sense you ought to be in bondage after all—the willing service which each should feel himself bound to render to his brother." This and the foregoing verse are most beautifully expressed. His readers wished to be in bondage and to submit to the Law. The greater part of the Epistle has been devoted to warn them against the unchristian "bondage" of ceremonialism, and the abrogated "law" of rites. And now it is as though he says, "I have taken away 'the bondage' and the 'law' which would have destroyed your Christian life; but if you are so set upon being in 'bondage,' let it be the 'bondage' of mutual love; if you are so set upon obeying a 'law,' why the whole 'law' is obeyed in one word in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

15. But if—"on the contrary, in consequence of the divisions which those troublers have occasioned among you—ye bite one another by evil speaking—and devour one another—by railing and clamour—take heed ye be not consumed one of another—by bitterness, strife, and contention, our health and strength, both of body and soul, are consumed as well as our substance and reputation"—WESLEY.

"But if, instead of loving, ye contend with one another, like wild beasts, crying, 'The Church shall be this,' or 'The Church shall be that,' the Church will perish altogether, for she can only exist in an atmosphere of love."

16. I say then. "He now explains what he proposed (ver. 13). Walk by the Spirit—follow His guidance in all things—and fulfil not—in anything—the desire of the flesh—of corrupt nature"—WESLEY.

"After pointing to love as the disposition of heart from which flows human morality, in contrast to self-surrender to the flesh, which is ever a source of enmity, S. Paul now still further traces Christian morality to its Divine source, viz. the Spirit of God, whom he contrasts with the flesh"—BEET. To S. Paul the flesh and the Law appear nearly related. (Comp. his treatment of the subject in Romans.)

17. For the flesh desireth against the Spirit—"nature desires what is quite contrary to the Spirit of God. But the Spirit against the flesh—but the Holy Spirit on His part opposes your evil nature. These are contrary to each other—the flesh and the Spirit; there can be no agreement between them. That ye may not do the things which ye would—that being thus strengthened by the Spirit, ye may not fulfil the desire of the flesh, as otherwise ye would do"—WESLEY.

The rendering of the A.V., so that ye cannot do, etc., "is a serious mistranslation. For it implies that the readers were not able to do what their better judgment approved; whereas S. Paul speaks only of opposite tendencies, leaving open the possibility of successfully resisting them"—BEET. The last clause refers to the flesh and spirit. "If ye would do the good, the flesh opposes you; if ye would do the evil, the spirit opposes you."

18. But if ye are led by the Spirit—"of liberty and love, unto all holiness—ye are not under the Law—not under the curse or bondage of it; not under the guilt or the power of sin"—WESLEY.

"If, however, of these two conflicting powers, the Spirit is that which rules you, in what blessed freedom ye are then"—MEYER. In the four following verses "the assertion just made by S. Paul that the readers, as led by the Spirit, would not be under the Law, he now illustrates more particularly by setting forth the entirely opposite moral states which are produced by the flesh and by the spirit respectively: the former exclude from Messiah's kingdom (are therefore abandoned to the curse of the Law), while against the latter there is no law"—MEYER.

19. Now the works of the flesh—"by which that inward principle is discovered—are manifest—plain and undeniable. 'Works' are mentioned in the plural because they are distinct from, and often inconsistent with, each other. But 'the fruit of the Spirit' is mentioned in the singular (ver. 22), as being all consistent and connected together. Which are these. He enumerates those 'works of the flesh' to which the Galatians were most inclined; and those parts of 'the fruit of the Spirit' of which they stood in the greatest need"—WESLEY.

This black list of the works of the flesh names fifteen sins, which may be arranged in four groups: (1) Sensuality—fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness (or "wantonness"—indecency which does not even hide itself). (2) Idolatry—idolatry, sorcery. (3) Violations of brotherly love—enmities, strife, jealousies, wraths, factions, divisions, heresies, envyings. (4) Intemperance—drunkenness, revellings. "From early habit and constant association a Gentile church would be peculiarly exposed to sins of the first two classes. The third would be a probable consequence of their religious dissensions, inflaming the excitable temperament of a Celtic people. The fourth seems to be thrown in to give a sort of completeness to the list, though not unfitly addressed to a nation whose Gallic descent perhaps disposed them too easily to these excesses"—LIGHTFOOT.

20. Idolatry, witchcraft. "That this means witchcraft, strictly speaking (not poisoning), appears from its being joined with the worship of devil-gods, and not with murder. This is frequently and solemnly forbidden in the Old Testament. Divisions—in domestic or civil matters. Heresies are divisions in religious communities"—WESLEY.

21. Revellings—"luxurious entertainments. Some of the works here mentioned are wrought principally, if not entirely, in the mind; and yet they are called 'works of the flesh.' Hence it is clear, the apostle does not by 'the flesh' mean the body, or sensual appetites and inclinations only, but the corruption of human nature, as it spreads through all the powers of the soul, as well as all the members of the body. Of which I tell you before—before the event, I forewarn you"—WESLEY.

Revellings. The plural seems to describe the habit of excess. Let us remember that the glutton is as unmistakably a sinner as the drunkard. And such like. Even the horrible evils he has named are but a few samples of the hideous bulk of sin, of the which, etc. He tells them plainly, as he did when resident in Galatia, that they which practise such things, being manifestly without true saving "faith working through love," shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

22. Love—"the root of all the rest. Gentleness—toward all men; ignorant and wicked men in particular. Goodness—the Greek word means all that is benign, soft, winning, tender, either in temper or behaviour"—WESLEY.

"He has spoken of the works of the flesh, and now goes on to speak of the fruit of the Spirit. S. Paul only uses the word 'fruit' of what is good. The catalogue falls into three groups of three each. The first of these comprises Christian habits of mind in their more general aspect—love, joy, peace; the second gives special qualities affecting a man's intercourse with his neighbours, longsuffering, kindness, beneficence; while the third, again general in character like the first, exhibits the principles which guide a Christian's conduct, honesty, gentleness, temperance"—LIGHTFOOT.

23. Meekness—"holding all the affections and passions in even balance"—WESLEY.

Against such there is no law. "Since the Spirit produces as His fruit dispositions which the Law does not condemn, they who (ver. 18) are led by the Spirit, are not under Law. The Law is no longer a burden under which they groan. Just so, upright citizens think nothing of the criminal law; whereas, to those who break it or wish to break it, the same law is a terrible reality"—BEET.

24. And they that are Christ's—"true believers in Him—have thus crucified the flesh—nailed it, as it were, to a cross, whence it has no power to break loose, but is continually weaker and weaker. With its affections and desires—all its evil passions, appetites, and inclinations"—WESLEY.

"After S. Paul has in ver. 17 explained his exhortation given in ver. 16, and recommended compliance with it on account of its blessed results (vers. 18–23), he now shows how this compliance—the walking in the Spirit—has its ground and motive in the specific nature of the Christian; if the Christian has crucified his flesh, and consequently lives through the Spirit, his walk also must follow the Spirit"—MEYER.

25. If we live by the Spirit—"if we are raised from the dead, and are alive to God, by the operation of His Spirit—let us walk by the Spirit—let us follow His guidance, in all our tempers, thoughts, words, and actions"—WESLEY.

"If the Christian has crucified his flesh it is no longer the ruling power of his life; which on the contrary proceeds now from the Holy Spirit, the power opposed to the flesh; and the obligation thence arising is, that the conduct also of the Christian should correspond to this principle of life (for otherwise what a self-contradiction he would exhibit)"—MEYER. On the whole passage (vers. 13-25) Dr. BEET says: "Notice the massive simplicity and grandeur of S. Paul's double foundation of Christian morality. He lays down first the one precept of love, in the very words of the ancient Law, a precept including all others. But even this, if it stood alone, would but reveal our inability to do what God requires, and thus condemn us. S. Paul therefore invokes the Spirit, the seed Divine, from which grows, by its unseen and mysterious vitality, the fruit of love and of all virtue. A specimen of the superstructure this foundation is capable of supporting, S. Paul will erect for us in the next section."

26. Be not desirous of vain glory—"of the praise or esteem of men. They who do not carefully and closely follow the Spirit, easily slide into this: the natural effects of which are, provoking to envy them that are beneath us, and envying them that are above us"—WESLEY.

This verse belongs more properly to the next chapter. (Comp. with ver. 15.) There were, no doubt, some unhappy personal animosities complicating the controversy in Galatia. These were known to S. Paul, and hence this exhortation. But though eighteen centuries have passed, other churches as well as the Galatian need to think upon such words as these.

CHAPTER VI.

1. Brethren, if a man be overtaken in any fault—"by surprise, ignorance, or stress of temptation—ye who are spiritual—who continue to live and walk by the Spirit—restore such an one—by reproof, instruction, or exhortation. Every one who can, ought to help herein; only in the spirit of meekness. This is essential to a spiritual man; and in this lies the whole force of the cure. Considering thyself—the plural is beautifully changed into the singular. Let each take heed to himself. Lest thou also be tempted. Temptation easily and swiftly passes from one to another; especially if a man endeavours to cure another without preserving his own meekness"—WESLEY.

"Brethren. A whole argument lies hidden under this one word"—BENGEL. "In the spirit of meekness. Never are we in greater peril of undue self-assertion, and therefore in greater need of 'meekness,' than in reproving others. For their fall invokes in us a sense of superiority"—BEET.

2. Bear ye one another's burdens—"sympathise with, and assist, each other, in all your weaknesses, grievances, trials. And so fulfil the law of Christ. 'The law of Christ' (an uncommon expression) is the law of love: this our Lord peculiarly recommends; this He makes the distinguishing mark of His disciples"—WESLEY.

"If you must needs impose burdens on yourselves, let them be the burdens of mutual sympathy. If you must needs observe a law, let it be the law of Christ"—LIGHTFOOT. (For "the law of Christ," see Matt. 22. 39.)

3. If anyone think himself to be something—"above his brethren, or by any strength of his own—when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself—he alone will bear their burdens, who knows himself to be nothing"—WESLEY.

The exhortation to the spirit of meekness still chiefly possesses the apostle's mind. The close relation of "meekness" to unselfishness will be apparent to all, and this gives the key to the order of thought in these verses. "Meekness" in ver. 1 suggests the mention of unselfishness in ver. 2, and this in its turn suggests the warning in ver. 3 to the man who is without true "meekness."

4. But let every man try his own work—"narrowly examine all he is, and all he doeth—and then he shall have rejoicing in himself—he will find in himself matter of rejoicing, if his works are right before God—and not in another—not in glorying over others"—WESLEY.

But let each man prove his own work, and then shall he have his glorying in regard of himself alone, and not of his neighbour (R.V.). This verse, again, is suggested by the preceding verse. Instead of the empty conceit there deplored, S. Paul asks every man to examine his own life, in itself, and not in comparison with other lives. If the examination reveal a real progress in holiness, he will then glorify God for his own success, not for the failure of others. (Comp. Luke 18. 11, "God, I thank Thee that I am not as the rest of men.")

5. For everyone shall bear his own burden—"in that day shall give an account of himself to God"—WESLEY.

In the Greek two different words are used for burden. That in ver. 2 suggests an oppressive, heavy weight, while that in ver. 5 means simply a load, such as the kit which each soldier has to carry. The former others may help us to bear; but the latter each man shall bear for himself. There is for each of us a rightly-calculated "load" of moral responsibility, which we cannot shift to the shoulders of another.

6. "Let him that is taught impart to him that teacheth all such temporal good things as he stands in need of"—WESLEY.

The literal meaning is let him go shares with. "I spoke of bearing one another's burdens. There is one special application I would make of this rule. Provide for the temporal wants of your teachers in Christ"—LIGHTFOOT. MEYER prefers to interpret all good things in a wider sense than Wesley and Lightfoot. He takes it to mean, "Let the disciple make common cause with the teacher in all that is morally good."

7. God is not mocked—"although they attempt to mock Him, who think to reap otherwise than they sow"—WESLEY.

It is an important fact that these solemn and oft-quoted words were first written to confirm a command (according to the majority of scholars) on the subject of Christian giving. "What? you hold back? Nay, do not deceive yourselves. Your niggardliness will find you out. You cannot cheat God by your fair professions. You cannot mock Him"—LIGHTFOOT.

8. For he that now soweth to the flesh—"that follows the desires of corrupt nature—shall hereafter of the flesh—out of this very seed—reap corruption—death everlasting. But he that soweth to the Spirit—that follows His guidance in all his tempers and conversation—shall of the Spirit—by the free grace and power of God—reap life everlasting"—WESLEY.

In this verse and the latter part of the foregoing, we have (1) two kinds of seed—selfishness and unselfishness; (2) two kinds of soil—the flesh, the Spirit; (3) two kinds of harvest—corruption and eternal life. God's moral laws work themselves out as certainly as gravitation.

9. But let us not be weary in well doing—"let us persevere in sowing to the Spirit. For in due season—when the harvest is come—we shall reap, if we faint not"—WESLEY.

If we do not fail in sowing unto the Spirit, God will not fail to reward us with the harvest. If we go on sowing through all this life, we shall go on reaping through all eternity.

10. Therefore as we have opportunity—"at whatever time or place, and in whatever manner we can. The opportunity in general is our lifetime; but there are also many particular opportunities. Satan is quickened in doing hurt, by the shortness of the time. (Rev. 12. 12.) By the same consideration let us be quickened in doing good. Let us do good—in every possible kind, and in every possible degree. Unto all men—neighbours or strangers, good or evil, friends or enemies. But especially to them who are of the household of faith—for all believers are but one family"—WESLEY.

So then, as we have a seasonable time. The reference to the season of reaping in the previous verse suggests to S. Paul that there is also a season for sowing. It is only a short season even to our thought. But to the apostles, who expected the Second Coming to take place in their own day, it was even shorter. The word as in this case bears the sense of "while" as well as "inasmuch as."

11. See with how large letters I have written unto you, with mine own hand (R.V.). At this stage S. Paul takes the pen from his amanuensis, to whom he has been dictating the Epistle, and adds a concluding paragraph with his own hand. This was his custom, in order to authenticate his letters and guard against forgeries. The A.V. "how large a letter" is quite a wrong translation. The apostle traces the last words of his work in letters of unusual size, to call attention to the supreme importance of his counsels in this crisis of Galatian church life; just as in printed books to-day we use italics or large capitals when we wish to emphasise something. "I have written" (R.V.) is the literal translation, certainly, but misleads the English reader. In Greek a letter-writer always imagines himself in the situation of the reader, and therefore uses a past tense where we should use a present. Hence the true rendering into present-day English is "I write." The few sentences which follow form a rapid summary of the chief exhortations of the whole letter.

12. As many as desire to make a fair appearance in the flesh—"to preserve a fair character—these constrain you—both by their example and importunity—to be circumcised—not so much from a principle of conscience, as lest they should suffer persecution—from the unbelieving Jews. For the cross of Christ—for maintaining that faith in a crucified Saviour is alone sufficient for justification"—WESLEY.

The Jewish false teachers who had corrupted the Galatians were nominally Christians. As such they were liable to be persecuted by their fellow-countrymen as followers of the crucified Nazarene. But by a zealous championship of circumcision—the symbol of Jewish spiritual primacy—they hoped to secure the sympathies of the Jews, and thus escape all persecution. Hence self-interest really dictated all their high-sounding talk in Galatia.

13. For neither they themselves keep the whole Law—"so far are they from a real zeal for it. But yet they desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh—that they may boast of you as their proselytes, and make a merit of this with the other Jews"—WESLEY.

This verse gives a further reason why the false teachers should not be listened to. Not only the selfishness of their motive, but the inconsistencies of their lives discredit what they have to say.

14. But God forbid that I should glory—"should boast of anything I have, am, or do; or rely on anything for my acceptance with God, but what Christ hath done and suffered for me. By means of which the world is crucified to me—all the things and persons in it are to me as nothing. And I unto the world—I am dead to all worldly pursuits, cares, desires, and enjoyments"—WESLEY.

The self-seeking teachers just referred to wished to glory in the flesh of those they led astray. "But as for me," says S. Paul, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." It was the shame of the cross, and the fear of being persecuted on account of it, which started the "false brethren" on the path of deceit and cowardice; but to S. Paul that same cross is the very thing in which he glories. And with reason. For on the cross the Saviour died. And on the cross, therefore, S. Paul, who as a believer was in Christ, also died; while at the same moment the world, which had been his master, died too.

15. For neither circumcision is anything, nor uncircumcision—"neither of these is of any account—but a new creation—whereby all things in us become new"—WESLEY.

"It is a matter of indifference whether one is circumcised or uncircumcised; and the only matter of importance is that one should be created anew, transferred into a new spiritual condition of life"—MEYER. "That to S. Paul circumcision is nothing, proves how completely in his view the old covenant had passed away. Thus these words are a summing up, at the close of the Epistle, of its chief argument, which, by their similarity to ver. 6 at the close of that argument, they recall"—BEET.

16. And as many as walk according to this rule—"(1) glorying only in the cross of Christ; (2) being crucified to the world; and (3) created anew. Peace and mercy be upon them, and upon the Israel, that is, the Church, of God—which consists of all those, and those only, of every nation and kindred, who walk by this rule"—WESLEY.

"The heart, full of the great truth in ver. 15, has now a wish of blessing for all who follow it in their conduct"—MEYER. What a fine touch is this reference to the Israel of God! The Epistle has defined the true Israel in the language of controversy, but takes leave of it in the language of prayers and blessing.

17. From henceforth let none trouble me—"by quarrels and disputes. For I bear—and afflictions should not be added to the afflicted—in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus—the scars, marks, and brands of my sufferings for Him"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul closes the Epistle, as he had begun it, with an uncompromising assertion of his office: 'Henceforth, let no man question my authority; let no man thwart or annoy me. Jesus is my Master, my Protector. His brand is stamped on my body. I bear this badge of an honourable servitude'"—LIGHTFOOT. "The advocates of circumcision point with pride to the circumcised bodies of their converts. S. Paul points to his own body, which bears marks of hardships endured for Christ, these hardships testifying the faithfulness of his service. This was no mere exaltation in the flesh; for these scars in the flesh had deep spiritual significance, inasmuch as they reveal the work in S. Paul's spirit of the Spirit of God. They place S. Paul and his career in significant contrast to his opponents. Than this silent comparison no appeal could be more forceful"—BEET.

18. Grace . . . Spirit . . . Brethren. This great vindication of salvation by grace, concludes with a prayer that such grace shall be given to those who read it. And after all that has been said about "the flesh," there is surely something significant in the phrase "with your spirit," rather than "with you"; while the unusual position of "brethren" in the Greek suggests special emphasis, and as BENGEL says, "the severity of the whole Epistle is softened by it." Amen. We do not know how this letter was received by the Galatian churches. But it is almost certain that the apostle's exhortations were obeyed, and this concluding prayer answered.

THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

"EPHESUS was the chief city of that part of Asia, which was a Roman province. Here S. Paul preached for three years (Acts 20. 31), and from hence the gospel was spread throughout the whole province (Acts 19. 10). At his taking leave of the Church there, he forewarned them both of great persecutions from without, and of divers heresies and schisms which would arise among themselves. And accordingly he writes this Epistle, nearly resembling that to the Colossians, written about the same time, to establish them in the doctrine he had delivered, to arm them against false teachers, and to build them up in love and holiness, both of heart and conversation. He begins this, as most of his Epistles, with thanksgiving to God for their embracing and adhering to the gospel. He shows the inestimable blessings and advantages they received thereby, as far above all the Jewish privileges as all the wisdom and philosophy of the heathens. He proves that our Lord is the Head of the whole Church; of angels and spirits, the Church triumphant, and of Jews and Gentiles, now equally members of the Church militant. In the last three chapters he exhorts them to various duties, civil and religious, personal and relative, suitable to their Christian character, privileges, assistances, and obligations.

CHAPTER I.

1. By the will of God—"not by any merit of my own—to the saints who are at Ephesus—and in all the adjacent places. For this Epistle is not directed to the Ephesians only, but likewise to all the other churches of Asia"—WESLEY.

"Some very ancient authorities omit at Ephesus" (R.V. margin). There can be little doubt that this Epistle was not addressed to the Ephesians, in the same sense as the other Epistles were addressed to particular churches. It seems to have been a circular letter, composed for the edification of the Asian churches generally. The absence of greetings to Ephesian believers, although S. Paul had worked among them three years, makes it almost incredible that this Epistle should have been written for Ephesus alone; especially when we compare the long list of greetings in ch. 16 of the Epistle to Rome, which city S. Paul had not, up to that time, seen. The superscription "to the Ephesians" probably crept into the MSS. as soon as the writings of S. Paul began to be circulated in a complete form. Some heading was needed, and it was natural that the important church at Ephesus, fragrant with so many memories of the great apostle's love and zeal, should furnish it. Translating the Greek without the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, we have to the saints who are indeed faithful, i.e. "full of faith." In Christ Jesus. This phrase is the key to the whole Epistle. Ephesians was written about five years after Corinthians, Galatians, and Romans, and during the interval, much of it spent in imprisonment, S. Paul's grand conception of life, work, everything in Christ, became vastly clearer and stronger. In this Epistle he expresses it more than twenty times.

2. In the words grace and peace, the salutations of Greek and Jew are combined. By "grace," S. Paul means all that God does for and in us; by "peace" the spiritual condition resulting therefrom.

3. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us. "God's blessing us is His bestowing all spiritual and heavenly blessings upon us. Our blessing God is the paying Him our solemn and grateful acknowledgments, both on account of His own essential blessedness, and of the blessings which He bestows upon us. He is the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, as man and Mediator: He is His Father, primarily, with respect to His Divine nature, as His Only-begotten Son; and, secondarily, with respect to His human nature, as that is personally united to the Divine. With all spiritual blessings in heavenly things—with all manner of spiritual blessings, which are heavenly in their nature, original, and tendency, and shall be completed in heaven; far different from the external privileges of the Jews, and the earthly blessings they expected from the Messiah"—WESLEY.

Read carefully (in R.V.) to the end of ver. 14. It will then be seen that the passage is really a great hymn of praise. This magnificent burst of thanksgiving consists of three stanzas, of unequal length, each one closing with the refrain To the praise of His glory. The first stanza or division (vers. 3–6) treats of the past — God's purpose of redeeming love before the foundation of the world. The second (vers. 7–12) treats of the present—the Christ sent forth in the fulness of times, in whom we have redemption through His blood. The third (vers. 13, 14) treats of the future—our inheritance, whereof the Spirit of promise is an earnest. It is improbable that this plan was present to the apostle's mind, but his thoughts naturally, though almost unconsciously, were expressed in the order above given. "Blessed be God! It is the perpetual strain of the Old Testament, from Melchizedek down to Daniel,—of David in his triumph, and Job in his misery. But not hitherto could men say, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ!" —FINDLAY. In the heavenly places (R.V.). The meaning may be (1) the Divine purpose of redeeming love, which has brought us spiritual blessings, originated in "the heavenly places"; or (2) the "spiritual blessings" are such that we who receive them, although our flesh be still on the earth, are dwelling in "the heavenly places," and our "life is hid with Christ in God."

4. As He hath chosen us—"both Jews and Gentiles, whom He foreknew as believing in Christ (1 Pet. 1. 2)"—WESLEY.

Lit. Did choose. "Here is S. Paul's first chapter of Genesis. In the beginning was the election of grace"—FINDLAY. Us—"those who believe the gospel. Not that their foreseen faith in any way moved God to save them; but that, moved only by pity for lost man, God resolved to save men by means of the good news announced by Christ, and to save those who should believe it"—BEET. Before the foundation of the world. "Before God began to made the great platform on which had lived the successive generations of men, all future ages were present to His thought; and, in view of the sin and ruin which He foresaw, He resolved to save men; not all men indiscriminately, but those who should believe the gospel; and to place these in special relation to Himself as His own"—BEET. That we should be holy and without blemish before Him. The object of redemption is here stated. It is that we are to be holy, because God is holy; perfect, even as our heavenly Father is perfect. Redemption emphasises and makes possible God's eternal purpose concerning man. In creation God said "Let us make," and in redemption "Let us renew man after our image and likeness." No Christian can afford to rest complacently in the fact that some months or years ago he was converted. God's will concerning us is "our sanctification" (1 Thess. 4. 3), to which conversion is but a preliminary, though a necessary preliminary. God's eternal purpose is only realised in that believer who is holy and without blemish before Him. In love. As there is no punctuation in the Greek MSS., these words may belong either to the clause above expounded, or to the next verse. The latter seems the more probable.

5. Having predestinated us to the adoption of sons—"having foreordained that all who afterwards believed should enjoy the dignity of being sons of God and joint-heirs with Christ. According to the good pleasure of His will—according to His free, fixed, unalterable purpose, to confer this blessing on all those who should believe in Christ, and those only"—WESLEY.

Having in love foreordained us (R.V. margin). "Love was the disposition of God, in which He, through this our election, predestined us to sonship"—MEYER. The relation of Divine predestination to human free will is an enigma which defies all attempts to satisfactorily solve it. But the saying of S. Paul, in Rom. 8. 29, "Whom He did foreknow,

He also did predestinate," seems to indicate a line along which some reconciliation between these apparently contradictory ideas may be reached. Foreknowing all who would, as free agents, accept Christ, God predestinated these to salvation; and foreknowing all who would, as free agents, reject Christ, He predestinated these to condemnation. Thus viewed, predestination does not override human freedom. But difficult as it is to state them, it must not be forgotten that predestination and election in the Scriptures do after all stand for some very real and very glorious facts. To the adoption of sons. The "choosing" mentioned in the previous verse was unto holiness, while the "foreordaining" of this verse is unto sonship. But to S. Paul these two are one. Holiness, in the form of filial obedience, springs out of sonship, or the filial relation. (Carefully comp. Rom. 8. 29 on this point.)

6. To the praise of the glory of His grace—"His glorious, free love, without any desert on our part"—WESLEY.

The recognition and praise of the Divine grace is here described as the ultimate aim of redemption. In ver. 5 that grace has been described as the source of redemption. Which He freely bestowed on us in the Beloved. With this clause the second stanza of S. Paul's hymn of praise begins. He leaves the past for the present. The Beloved. "The Beloved Son" of God. "The Son, lovable in Himself, is essentially 'the Beloved'; we, unlovable in ourselves, are accepted because of and in the 'Beloved'; and if we are called 'beloved' in our turn, it is because God sees us in His Son"—A. MONOD.

7. By whom we—"who believe—have—from the moment we believe — redemption—from the guilt and power of sin—through His blood — through what He had done and suffered for us. According to the riches of His grace—according to the abundant overflowings of His free mercy and favour"—WESLEY.

"Redemption is release by ransom. The life-blood of Jesus Christ was the price that He paid in order to secure our lawful release from the penalties entailed by our trespasses"—FINDLAY. "These words assert, in the clearest manner, that our liberation from the penalty of bondage and sin comes through Christ's death upon the cross. The need for this costly means of redemption S. Paul expounds in Rom. 3. 26. Notice that liberation was wrought out for us in the personality of Christ, and is ours by inward union with Him; and that His violent death is the channel through which it comes forth from God to us"—BEET.

The forgiveness of our trespasses. "On rising from the dead our Saviour commissioned the apostles to "proclaim in His name repentance and remission of sins to all nations" (Luke 24. 47). It was thus He proposed to save the world. This proclamation is the 'good news' of the gospel. The announcement meets the first need of the serious and awakened human spirit. It answers the question which arises in the breast of every man who thinks earnestly about his personal relations to God, and to the laws of his being. We cannot wonder that S. Paul sets the remission of sins first amongst the bestowments of God's grace, and makes it the foundation of all the rest"—FINDLAY.

8. In all wisdom—"manifested by God in the whole scheme of our salvation. And prudence — which He hath wrought in us, that we may know and do all His acceptable and perfect will"—WESLEY.

There is much food for thought in the fact that S. Paul speaks of God's gifts of pardon and wisdom with the same breath. (Comp. 1 Cor. 1. 30; Col. 1. 9; 1 Cor. 1. 5, etc.) The notion that growing wisdom implies declining spirituality, and that a cool head cannot coexist with a warm heart is quite alien to S. Paul's teaching.

9. Having made known to us—"by His word and by His Spirit—the mystery of His will—the gracious scheme of salvation by faith, which depends on His own sovereign will alone. This was but darkly discovered under the Law; is now totally hid from unbelievers; and has heights and depths which surpass all the knowledge even of true believers"—WESLEY.

This and the next verse form a parenthesis. Mystery. This word in the New Testament always implies something only to be learned by revelation. "God formed in Christ the purpose, by the dispensation of His grace, in due time to reunite the universe under the headship of Christ. This mysterious design, hitherto kept secret, He has 'made known unto us.' Its manifestation imparts a wisdom that surpasses all the wisdom of former ages. Such is the drift of this profound deliverance"—FINDLAY.

10. That in the dispensation of the fulness of the times—"in this last administration of God's fullest grace, which took place when the time appointed was fully come — He might gather together into one in Christ—might recapitulate, reunite, and place in order again under Christ, their common Head—all things which are in heaven, and on earth—all angels and men, whether living or dead, in the Lord"—WESLEY.

"For S. Paul, the fulness of the times had arrived. The Son of God was come; the kingdom of God was amongst men. It was the beginning of the end. It is a mistake to relegate this text to the dim and distant future, to some far-off consummation. We are in the midst of the Christian reconstruction of things, and are taking part in it. The decisive epoch fell when 'God sent forth His Son.' What S. Paul looks forward to is, in a word, the organisation of the universe upon a Christian basis. This reconstitution of things is provided for, and is being effected 'in the Christ.' He is the rallying point of the forces of peace and blessing. The organic principle, the organising Head, the creative nucleus of the new creation is there. The potent germ of life eternal has been introduced into the world's chaos; and its victory over the elements of disorder and death is assured"—FINDLAY.

11. Through whom we—"Jews—also have obtained an inheritance—the glorious inheritance of the heavenly Canaan, to which, when believers, we were predestinated, according to the purpose of Him that worketh all things after the counsel of His own will—the unalterable decree, 'He that believeth shall be delivered'; which 'will' is not an arbitrary will, but flowing from the rectitude of His nature; else, what security would there be that it would be His 'will' to keep His word even with the elect?"—WESLEY.

In whom also we were made a heritage (R.V.). But the A.V. rendering is better. In ver. 5 it has been said that we were "foreordained unto adoption as sons." But sonship connotes an inheritance. (Comp. Rom. 8. 17, "If children, then heirs.") "But while in the parallel passage we are designated heirs with Christ we appear in this place, according to the tenor of the context, as heirs in Him. Christ is Himself the believer's wealth, both in possession and hope; all his desire is to gain Christ (Phil. 3. 8)"—FINDLAY. "In the all-controlling 'counsel of His will' God wrought throughout the course of history to convey this heritage to us. We are children of 'the fulness of the times,' heirs of all the past. For us God has been working from eternity. On us the ends of the world have come. Thus, from the summit of our exaltation in Christ, the apostle looks backward to the beginning of Divine history"—FINDLAY.

12. That we—"Jews—who first believed—before the Gentiles. So did some of them in every place. Here is another branch of the true gospel predestination: he that believes is not only elected to salvation (if he endures to the end), but is fore-appointed of God to walk in holiness, to the praise of His glory"—WESLEY.

To the end that we should be unto the praise of His glory (R.V.). The second stanza of the hymn closes with practically the same refrain as the first (ver. 6). "When the apostle reaches the 'heritage' conferred upon us in Christ (ver. 11), he is on the boundary between the present and the future. Into that future he now presses forward, gathering from it his crowning tribute 'to the praise of God's glory.' We shall find, however, that this heritage assumes a twofold character, as did the conception of the inheritance of the Lord in the Old Testament. If the saints have their heritage in Christ, partly possessed and partly to be possessed, God has likewise, and antecedently, His inheritance in them, of which He, too, has still to take full possession"—FINDLAY. "Up to this point S. Paul's words have been true alike of Jews and Gentiles. He now mentions the two great divisions of mankind which were ever present to his thought. In ver. 12 the Jews, and in vers. 13, 14 the Gentiles are specified"—BEET.

13. In whom ye—"Gentiles—likewise believed, after ye had heard the gospel—which God made the means of your salvation; in whom after ye had believed—probably some time after their first believing—ye were sealed by that Holy Spirit of promise—holy both in His nature and in His operations, and promised to all the children of God. The sealing seems to imply—(1) a full impression of the image of God on their souls; (2) a full assurance of receiving all the promises, whether relating to time or eternity"—WESLEY.

In whom ye also, having heard the word of the truth, the gospel of your salvation—in whom having also believed ye, etc. (R.V.). It will be noticed that in this (the correct) rendering the pronoun "ye" is left without its verb. "Apparently the construction of the sentence is broken off. But the irregularity throws into prominence the truth that the sealing afterwards mentioned was in Christ. S. Paul wishes to say that in Christ the Gentile Christians, having heard the gospel, and having also believed it, were sealed, etc. This surrender of grammar to emphasis is a conspicuous feature in S. Paul"—BEET. "A seal is a token of proprietorship put by the owner upon his property; or it is the authentication of some statement or engagement, the official stamp that gives it validity; or it is the pledge of inviolability, guarding a treasure from profane or injurious hands. There is the protecting seal, the ratifying seal, and the proprietary seal. The same seal may serve each or all of these purposes. Here the thought of possession predominates (comp. ver. 4); but it can scarcely be separated from the other two"—FINDLAY. "This verse is in close harmony with the constant teaching of S. Paul, that they who believe the gospel are justified, and adopted into the family of God, and receive the Holy Spirit, e.g. Gal. 2. 16; 3. 2, 26"—BEET.

14. "Who, thus sealing us, is an earnest—both a pledge and a foretaste of our inheritance. Till the redemption of the purchased possession—till the Church, which He has purchased with His own blood, shall be fully delivered from all sin and sorrow, and advanced to everlasting glory. To the praise of His glory—of His glorious wisdom, power, and mercy"—WESLEY.

Earnest. The Phœnician word Arrhabon (lit. "fastening penny") denotes "the part of the price given by a purchaser in making a bargain, or of the wages given by the hirer concluding a contract of service, by way of assurance that the stipulated sum will be forthcoming"—FINDLAY. "In the reception of the Spirit the recipients have obtained the guarantee—as one receives earnest money as a guarantee of future payment—that they shall become actually partakers of the messianic blessedness. (Comp. Rom. 8. 15–17; Gal. 4. 6, 7)"—MEYER. Redemption. "The saints already 'have redemption,' in the radical sense of acceptance, rescue from condemnation into sonship. But they still look forward to redemption, in the developed sense of actual emancipation from the last effects of sin, which is to come when the body is glorified along with the spirit"—MOULE. God's own possession (R.V.). (Comp. Ex. 19. 5, "Ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me.") At the close of his hymn of praise the idea of God possessed by men fades out of S. Paul's mind, and the idea of men possessed by God becomes dominant. The thought from ver. 3 onwards has mainly been that of Joshua 13. 33, "The Lord, the God of Israel, is our inheritance." It now gives place to the thought of 1 Kings 8. 51, "We are Thy people, Thine inheritance." And this second is greater and more ultimate than the first thought, by as much as God is greater and more ultimate than man. (Comp. Rom. 11. 36, "For of Him, and through Him, and unto Him, are all things"), on which verse Dr. POPE says: "This is a truth to be adored rather than discussed." Unto the praise of His glory—"nearly word for word as ver. 12. It is a third refrain closing the third part of S. Paul's hymn. Each refrain represents, as the final purpose of man's salvation in its various parts, an admiring recognition by God's creatures of His essential grandeur. (Comp. 1 Pet. 2. 9.) The threefold refrain makes this final purpose very conspicuous"—BEET.

15. For this cause, etc. "Only now, after the general ascription of praise to God for the Christian economy of salvation, which had since ver. 3 flowed forth from him in an enraptured stream, does S. Paul reach that with which on other occasions he is wont at once to begin—the thanksgiving to God for the Christian position of the readers, and intercession for them"—MEYER.

Since I heard of your faith and love—"that is, of their perseverance and increase herein"—WESLEY.

R.V. relegates the words and love to the margin. Their omission makes a difficulty for the expositor. The most plausible solution is that based on the fact that the Greek word means both "faith" and "faithfulness." Accepting this, "the passage may fairly be reproduced, faith in the Lord Jesus, and faithfulness towards all the saints"—BEET.

16. I cease not—"in all my solemn addresses to God—to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers—so he did of all the churches. (Col. 1. 9)"—WESLEY.

"The thanks were literally 'unceasing' in principle, and in practice came out on every fit occasion. How much of the apostle's work for his converts consisted in the holy labour of special intercessory prayer, with thanksgiving! The recorded prayers of S. Paul form in themselves one of the richest of Scripture studies. Most observable in them is their almost invariable intercessory direction. He thinks of others, not of self, upon his knees"—MOULE. The verses which follow contain "heads of prayer for true Christians"—BENGEL.

17. "That the Father of that infinite glory which shines in the face of Christ, from whom also we receive the glorious inheritance (ver. 18), may give you the spirit of wisdom and revelation—the same who is the Spirit of promise is also, in the progress of the faithful, the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, making them wise unto salvation, and revealing to them the deep things of God. He is here speaking of that wisdom and revelation which are common to all real Christians"—WESLEY.

"God is here invoked by a double title peculiar to this passage, as the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory. The former expression reminds us of the dependence of the Lord Jesus upon the eternal Father, and accentuates the Divine sovereignty, so conspicuous in the foregoing act of praise. The key to the designation, 'Father of glory,' is in Rom. 6. 4: 'Christ was raised from the dead, through the glory of the Father'"—FINDLAY. May give unto you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him—lit. "the full knowledge." Such a full knowledge of the Father and the Son is described in John 17. 3 as "life eternal." Says ADOLPHE MONOD, echoing PASCAL, "Philosophy taking, as it must, man for its centre, says to him, know thyself. But the inspired Word, which alone can originate with God, is alone able to say to man, know God."

18. The eyes of your understanding. "It is with these alone that we discern the things of God—being first opened, and then enlightened—by His Spirit. That ye may know what is the hope of His calling—that ye may experimentally and delightfully know what are the blessings which God has called you to hope for by His word and His Spirit. And what is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints—what an immense treasure of blessedness He hath provided as an inheritance for holy souls"—WESLEY.

"Before expounding the ultimate aim of his prayer, viz. knowledge of three things pertaining to the Christian life, S. Paul states conspicuously a condition on which alone this aim can be attained, viz. the entrance of light, ever the condition of knowledge, into the inmost chamber of our nature. This light he hopes for as a result of the gift of the Spirit of God, whose special work is to impart wisdom and to unveil mysteries. For He is the one principle of spiritual life. And, always, life is an essential condition of sight"—BEET. "Three things the apostle desires that his readers may see with the heart's enlightened eyes: the hope to which God calls them, the wealth that He possesses in them, and the power which He is prepared to exert upon them as believing men"—FINDLAY. The hope of His calling. To S. Paul this hope was to "gain Christ, and be found in Him." (Comp. Phil. 3. 8.) The hope of heaven, glorious as it is, perhaps fills a place disproportionately large in the thought of many Christians, and the definite expectation of gaining Christ, in this world as well as the next, is correspondingly weakened. The riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints. (See notes on ver. 14.) "So far as we can judge of His ways, the great God who made us cares comparatively little about the upholstery and machinery of the universe; but He cares immensely about men, about the character and destiny of men. There is nothing in all that physical science discloses for God to love, nothing kindred to Himself. The Creator rejoices in His works as at the beginning, the Lord of heaven and earth in His dominion. But these are not His 'inheritance.' That is in the love of His children, in the character and number of His saints.' We are to be the praise of His glory"—FINDLAY.

19. And what the exceeding greatness of His power toward us who believe—"both in quickening our dead souls, and preserving them in spiritual life. According to the power which He exerted in Christ, raising Him from the dead—by the very same almighty power whereby He raised Christ; for no less would suffice"—WESLEY.

"After the object of the hope there is now set forth also that by which it is realised, namely, the infinite power of God shown in the resurrection, etc., of Christ"—MEYER. This is the third thing S. Paul prays that his readers may know. The other two were, as in the opening hymn, our inheritance in God, and God's inheritance in us. But S. Paul's readers may understand his statements, and yet feel unable to believe them. In the presence of such tremendous truths their faith may stagger, and they may say, "How can these things be? By what power can such wonders be wrought?" Therefore the apostle prays that they may know the surpassing greatness of His power. Knowing this, they will say, "With God all things are possible." S. Paul urges his converts to judge the sufficiency of God's power to realise His whole plan of redemption by the standard of (according to) that working of the strength of His might which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and made Him to sit at His right hand in the heavenly places. "Look at Jesus where He was—the poor, tortured, wounded body, slain by our sins, lying cold and still in Joseph's grave; then lift up your eyes and see Him where He is—enthroned in the worship and wonder of heaven! Measure by that distance, by the sweep and lift of that almighty arm, the strength of the forces engaged to your salvation, the might of the powers at work through the ages for the redemption of humanity"—FINDLAY.

20. And He hath seated Him at His own right hand—"that is, He hath exalted Him in His human nature, as a recompense for His sufferings, to a quiet, everlasting possession of all possible blessedness, majesty, and glory"—WESLEY.

On the passage reaching from this verse to ver. 23, FINDLAY remarks: "There are two steps indicated in Christ's exaltation: He was raised from the death of the cross to new life amongst men; and again from the world of men He was raised to the throne of God in heaven. In the enthronement of Jesus Christ at God's right hand (vers. 22, 23) further distinguish two separate acts: there was conferred on Him a universal Lordship; and He was made specifically Head of the Church, being given to her for her Lord and Life, He who contains the fulness of the Godhead." At His right hand in the heavenlies—"a region is spoken of, in which the glorified Lord locally is. Local conceptions, indeed, soon fail us in thoughts of the eternal world. But the fact of the Lord's veritable ascended body binds us to them in a real degree; for where body is in question there also is locality"—MOULE.

21. Far above all principality, and power, and might and dominion—"that is, God hath invested Him with uncontrollable authority over all demons in hell, all angels in heaven, and all the princes and potentates on earth. And every name that is named. We know the king is above all, though we cannot name all the officers of his court. So we know that Christ is above all, though we are not able to name all His subjects. Not only in this world, but also in that which is to come—the 'world' to come is so styled not because it does not yet exist, but because it is not visible. Principalities and powers are named now; but those also who are not even named in this world, but shall be revealed in the world to come, are all subject to Christ"—WESLEY.

From the Epistle to the Colossians we gather that the Asian churches were at this time in some danger of falling into the error of angelworship. Such a danger was no doubt present to the apostle's mind when he composed this passage. There are still Christians who waste much precious time in idle and even unseemly speculations on these matters. But all these speculations about the ranks and titles of angels, "S. Paul brushes away, without inquiring how much or how little truth there may be in them. His language shows a spirit of impatience with this elaborate angelology"—LIGHTFOOT. "S. Paul's faith saw the risen and rising One passing through and beyond and above successive ranks of angelic powers, until there was in heaven no grandeur which He had not left behind"—BEET.

22. And He hath given Him to be Head over all things to the Church—"an Head both of guidance and government, and likewise of life and influence, to the whole and every member of it. All these stand in the nearest union with Him, and have as continual and effectual a communication of activity, growth, and strength from Him, as the natural body from its head"—WESLEY.

And He put all things in subjection under His feet. "Further delineation of the exaltation of Christ. 'All things' keeps up the idea of universality already expressed by the words 'all' and 'every.' 'All things He subjected under His feet'; word for word as in 1 Cor. 15. 27, which is almost word for word from LXX. (Ps. 8. 6.) What the Psalmist asserts of man in poetic ideal S. Paul claims in each passage to have been fulfilled by Christ. And rightly. For as Son of Man, He is Heir of whatever belongs to man"—BEET.

And Him God gave, Head over all things, to the Church—"evidently in order that the Head of the universe may be also Head of the Church, thus making the universe an ally of the Church"—BEET. "At the topmost height of His glory, with thrones and princedoms beneath His feet, Christ is given to the Church! The Head over all things, the Lord of the created universe, He—and none less or lower—is the Head of redeemed humanity. For the Church is His body (this clause is interjected by way of explanation), she is the vessel of His Spirit, the organic instrument of His Divine-human life. As the spirit belongs to its body, by the like fitness the Christ in His surpassing glory is the possession of the community of believing men. The body claims its head, the wife her husband"—FINDLAY. "The Church in the later New Testament is represented passively as the temple of God, actively as the body or organ of Christ's manifestation: the former as the sphere of Divine worship and holy influence; the latter as the instrument of Christ's manifold operations on earth"—W. B. POPE.

23. The fulness of Him that filleth all in all. "It is hard to say in what sense this can be spoken of the Church; but the sense is easy and natural, if we refer it to Christ, who is the fulness of the Father"—WESLEY.

Most expositors understand this phrase to be a further description of the Church. Bishop LIGHTFOOT has tried to show that the Greek word here rendered "fulness" means "the filled condition of a thing," and further, that "the word had acquired a technical theological meaning in S. Paul's time, probably in the Palestinian schools of Jewish thought; a meaning connected especially with the eternally realised ideal of Godhead; the Divine fulness. This fulness resides (by the Father's will, yet necessarily) in the Eternal Son (Col. 1. 19); and the Son, incarnate, sacrificed, and risen, is so conjoined in spiritual union to His regenerate Church, that what is true of Him is true, within sacred limits, of her"—MOULE.

CHAPTER II.

1. And He hath quickened you. "In vers. 19 and 20 of the preceding chapter, S. Paul spoke of God's working in them by the same almighty power whereby He raised Christ from the dead. On the mention of this he, in the fulness of his heart, runs into a flow of thought concerning the glory of Christ's exaltation in the three following verses. He here resumes the thread of his discourse. Who were dead—not only diseased, but dead; absolutely void of all spiritual life, and as incapable of quickening yourselves as persons literally dead. In trespasses and sins. 'Sins' seem to be spoken chiefly of the Gentiles, who knew not God; 'trespasses' of the Jews, who had His Law, and yet regarded it not (ver. 5). The latter herein obeyed the flesh; the former, the prince of the power of the air"—WESLEY.

"After the apostle has previously spoken of the exceeding power of God in the case of believers, which may be recognised by virtue of what He has done in the case of Christ, whom He raised, exalted, etc., he wishes now, in application of this to the readers, to bring the latter to the consciousness that God has made ALSO THEM, when they were dead in their sins, to be alive, etc., with Christ, and thus has shown also in their case that exceeding power"—MEYER. And you—that is, his readers—did He quicken—"ideally, in their slain and risen Lord's triumph, actually in their spiritual regeneration; 'believing on His name,' they had definitely received 'eternal life.' The English reader will remember that in the R.V. 'to quicken' means seldom, if ever, to excite what already lives, but to bring from death to life"—MOULE. When ye were dead. He does not mean that their state resembled death; "nor only that they were in peril of death, but he signifies a real and present death"—CALVIN. Through your trespasses and sins. "Trespasses are moral falls—sins are moral failures"—BEET. Through your trespasses (R.V.) is a better translation than "in" (A.V.). We have here an echo of what

S. Paul wrote years before to the Romans, "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6. 23).

2. According to the course of this world. "The word translated 'course' properly means 'a long series of times,' wherein one corrupt age follows another. According to the prince of the power of the air—the effect of which power all may perceive, though all do not understand the cause of it: a power unspeakably penetrating and widely diffused. The spirit that now worketh—with mighty power; and so he did, and doth in all ages —in the sons of disobedience — in all who do not believe and obey the gospel"—WESLEY.

MEYER says of this verse, "Shadows before the light which arises in ver. 4." Wherein aforetime ye walked. In the preceding verse S. Paul has asserted that his readers were "dead through sins." Yet here he goes on to say that they walked in sins. The latter explains the former. The pathway of sin they walked along led straight into the valley of the shadow of spiritual death. "Of this world — the whole realm of men and things around looked upon as existing in space, and as hostile to Christ. The course or age—the whole stream and tendency of things around, looked upon as moving forward in time. According to the course, etc. — carried along by the moving current of men and things around, all belonging to this world. The two words 'course' and 'world' represent the same idea in its reference to time and space respectively. According to the ruler, etc. — parallel with 'according to the course,' etc., and another view of the same truth. Steps guided by the current of things around are guided by the unseen ruler of that current. For the visible stream is animated and directed by an unseen spirit. The authority which directs the course of those who float down the stream of things around must be that of evil spirits. These were conceived, both by Jews and by others in the ancient world, as having their abode in the air. Apparently S. Paul accepted and used this common conception as sufficiently embodying a truth he wished to teach. His words remind us that all around are spiritual enemies as near as the air we breathe. Over these reigns a tremendous potentate. Along a path marked out by him, led by unseen powers who do his bidding, and by the current of things around, once walked the Christians to whom S. Paul now writes"—BEET.

3. "Among whom we—Jews—also formerly had our conversation, doing the will of the flesh—in gross, brutal sins—and of the mind—by spiritual, diabolical wickedness. In the former clause, 'flesh' denotes the whole evil nature; in the latter, the body opposed to the soul. And were by nature—that is, in our natural state—children of wrath — having the wrath of God abiding on us, even as the Gentiles. This expression, 'by nature,' occurs also, Gal. 4. 8; Rom. 2. 14; and thrice in the eleventh chapter. All these passages agree in expressing what belongs to the nature of the persons spoken of"—WESLEY.

"After the apostle has just depicted the pre-Christian corruption of the 'readers,' who were Gentile-Christians, the sinful corruptness of all — this basis for his enthusiastic certainty of the universality of the redemption—presents itself at the same time with such vividness before his mind, that he now also includes with the others the whole body of the Jewish Christians in the same state of corruption, and accordingly, on the resumption of the argument at ver. 4, he cannot again employ the second person introduced in ver. 1, but must change this into us"—MEYER. Had our conversation. The Greek word means "moved up and down," i.e. actively spent our lives. "In the desires of the flesh, doing the resolves of the flesh—the 'resolves' differ from the 'desires' of the flesh, as a definite wish differs from the general liking from which it springs—and of the minds. The plural number reminds us that whereas all men have one 'flesh,' they have many 'minds.' Moreover, our 'minds,' like our 'flesh,' have 'wills' of their own. The condemnation implied in this verse teaches that these 'wills' do not bow to the will of God, and that consequently they who do them come under the anger of God"—BEET. And were by nature — by reason of our possessing that sinful nature common to all men — children of wrath — the inevitable consequence of living as "sons of disobedience" (ver. 2). "How strange that men should argue that God's love forbids His wrath! It is, in truth, the cause of it. I could neither love nor fear a God who did not care enough about me to be angry with me when I sin. If my child does wilful wrong, if by some act of greed or passion he imperils his moral future, and destroys the peace of the house, shall I not be grieved with him with an anger proportioned to the love I bear him? How much more shall your heavenly Father —how much more justly and wisely and mercifully?"—FINDLAY.

4. "Mercy removes misery; love confers salvation"—WESLEY.

"The Divine counter-fact now comes in, brighter for the awful contrast" — MOULE. "Mercy—compassion of the helpless. It recalls the helplessness of those under the anger of God, and thus completes the picture given in vers. 1-3. Because of His much love—traces this mercy to its source in the central attribute of God"—BEET.

5. He hath quickened us together with

Christ—"in conformity to Him, and by virtue of our union with Him. By grace ye are saved—grace is both the beginning and end. The apostle speaks indifferently either in the first or second person; the Jews and the Gentiles being in the same circumstance, both by nature and by grace. This text lays the axe to the very root of spiritual pride, and all glorying in ourselves. Therefore S. Paul, foreseeing the backwardness of mankind to receive it, yet knowing the absolute necessity of its being received, again asserts the very same truth (ver. 8) in the very same words"—WESLEY.

He hath quickened us together with Christ. "This reverses all that is implied in the words dead through trespasses. We were once, in consequence of our sins, a spiritual corpse, given up to corruption utter and helpless, from which nothing could save us except the life-giving power of God. But God has pardoned our sins, and given back to us the eternal life for which we were created. This eternal life is already our assumed possession; and the witness of it is the Holy Spirit, the breath of immortality already moving our hearts with the pulse of Divine life, and prompting all Christian activities. With Christ—as in Col. 2. 13. Our new immortal life is an outflow of the life breathed on the first Easter morning into His sacred corpse. For, had He not risen, there had been no saving faith, no gospel, and no life eternal"—BEET. By grace ye are saved. (See under ver. 8.)

6. And hath raised us up together—"both Jews and Gentiles already in spirit; and ere long our bodies too will be raised. And made us all sit together in heavenly places—this is spoken by way of anticipation. Believers are not yet possessed of their seats in heaven; but each of them has a place prepared for him"—WESLEY.

"The words the apostle uses—gave us life—raised us up—seated us in the heavenly places—embrace the whole range of salvation. This comprehensive action of Divine grace upon believing men takes place by a constant and constantly deepening union of the soul with Christ"—FINDLAY. "The entire history of the Son of Man is reproduced in the man who believes in him, not by a simple moral analogy, but by a spiritual communication, which is the true secret of our justification, as well as of our sanctification, and indeed of our whole salvation"—ADOLPHE MONOD.

7. The ages to come—"that is, all succeeding ages"—WESLEY.

That in the ages to come—"throughout the eternal future—He might show. (Comp. vers. 6, 12, 14 in the previous chapter.) Exceeding riches—a phrase intensely Pauline—in Christ Jesus—vital union with the Lord is the never silent key-note of the passage"—MOULE.

8. By grace ye are saved through faith. "Grace, without any respect to human worthiness, confers the glorious gift. Faith, with an empty hand, and without any pretence to personal desert, receives the heavenly blessing. And this is not of yourselves. 'This' refers to the whole preceding clause. That 'ye are saved through faith' is the gift of God"—WESLEY.

"In order to justify and expound 'the riches of His grace' S. Paul now repeats a few words, which, in ver. 4, burst through the grammatical order of the sentence. By grace, by the grace of God, referring definitely to the grace mentioned in ver. 7. Through faith—added in order to give a more complete account of salvation. It embodies a thought ever present to S. Paul, and ever ready to find expression. The favour of God is the Divine source, and 'faith' is the human channel, of salvation"—BEET.

9. Not by works. "Neither this faith nor this salvation is owing to any works you ever did, will, or can do"—WESLEY.

These, and the preceding words, "are added as an emphatic exposition, negative and then positive, of the words, by grace. 'You are not the source of your own salvation; it is a gift, and the gift is God's. It is not from human works.' Not from works, that no one may glory—marked characteristics of S. Paul. (Rom. 4. 2, 6; 9. 11; 11. 6; 3. 27; 1 Cor. 1. 29; Gal. 6. 14.) From every side S. Paul shuts out, as his wont is, self-salvation"—BEET. "The apostle is everywhere jealous for the sovereign claim of God to the whole praise of our salvation"—MOULE.

10. For we are His workmanship—"which proves both that salvation is by faith, and that faith is the gift of God. Created unto good works—that afterwards we might give ourselves to them. Which God had before prepared—the occasions of them; so we must still ascribe the whole to God. That we might walk in them—though not to be justified by them"—WESLEY.

Lit. His making. "His" in the original is very emphatic: "Just His work and no other's are we"—MEYER. (Comp. Ps. 100. 3, "It is He that hath made us, and not we ourselves.") "S. Paul was the last man in the world to undervalue human effort, or disparage good work of any sort. It is, in his view, the end aimed at in all that God bestows on His people, in all that He Himself works in them. Only let this end be sought in God's way and order. Man's doings must be the fruit and not the root of his salvation. 'Not of works,' but, for good works,' were believers chosen"—FINDLAY. "This little word for reconciles S. Paul and S. James better than all the commentators"—MONOD.

11. Wherefore remember—"such a remembrance strengthens faith and increases gratitude. That ye being formerly Gentiles in the flesh — neither circumcised in body nor in spirit. Who were accordingly called the uncircumcision—by way of reproach. By that which is called the circumcision—by those who call themselves the circumcised, and think this a proof that they are the people of God; and who indeed have that outward circumcision which is performed by hands in the flesh"—WESLEY.

"Therefore—because such exalted and unmerited benefits have been imparted to us (vers. 4–10). These benefits should move the reader to remember his former miserable heathen state, in order the more gratefully to appreciate by contrast with the past the value of his present state"—MEYER. So-called circumcision. In the picture he is now drawing of the former spiritual destitution of his readers, S. Paul is about to make prominent the fact that they were "outside the commonwealth of Israel." Before doing so, however, he carefully disclaims, in the present verse, all sympathy with the spiritual pride of the Jews in their attitude to the Gentiles. (Read Rom. ch. 2 and 3 for his meaning.)

12. Were at that time without Christ—"having no faith in, or knowledge of, Him. Being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel—both as to their temporal privileges and spiritual blessings. And strangers to the covenants of promise—the great promise in both the Jewish and Christian covenant was the Messiah. Having no hope—because they had no promise whereon to ground their hope —and being without God—wholly ignorant of the true God, and so in effect atheists. Such in truth are, more or less, all men, in all ages, till they know God by the teaching of His own Spirit. In the world—the wide, vain world, wherein ye wandered up and down, unholy and unhappy"—WESLEY.

"Separate from Christ (R.V.). Destitute of all the spiritual blessings which flow from inward union with Him. This full sense is required by the very conspicuous contrast in ver. 13, But now in Christ Jesus, and by the contrast maintained throughout this chapter between past and present. But the words following show that this spiritual destitution is here looked upon in the light of the separation of the Gentiles from the nation to which the ancient promises were given. In those days they had not so much as heard the name of the promised Messiah"—BEET. "The only hope on earth worthy of the name rests upon the great promise given in outline to Israel. Consequently, they who have not this hope have no hope"—BEET. "When the apostle says without God IN THE WORLD, this qualification is both reproachful and sorrowful. To be without God in the world that He has made, where 'His eternal power and Godhead' have been visible from creation, argues a darkened and perverted heart"—FINDLAY. (Comp. Rom. 1. 18–23; John 1. 10, etc.)

13. Far off—"from God and His people. Nigh—intimately united to both"—WESLEY.

"But now — a conspicuous and favourite phrase of S. Paul's, recalling the contrast ever present to his mind of the past and the present —become near—to God and to the people of God. For distance from Israel and from God are the chief points of the description in ver. 12. And in vers. 14, 15, we have peace between Jews and Gentiles given as an explanation of this verse, and in vers. 16, 18 reconciliation and approach to God, through Christ. In the blood of Christ—more specific than 'in Christ.' It suggests the continued validity of the violent death of Christ as the means of salvation"—BEET.

14. For He is our peace—"not only as He purchased it, but as He is the very bond and centre of union. He who hath made both Jews and Gentiles one Church. The apostle describes (1) the conjunction of the Gentiles with Israel (vers. 14, 15); and (2) the conjunction of both with God (vers. 15–18). Each description is subdivided into two parts; and the former part of the one, concerning abolishing the enmity, answers the former part of the other; the latter part of the one, concerning the evangelical decrees, the latter part of the other. And hath broken down the middle wall of partition—alluding to that wall of old, which separated the court of Israel from the court of the Gentiles. Such a wall was the Ceremonial Law, which Christ had now taken away"—WESLEY.

"He is—each word very emphatic, pointing conspicuously to Him in whose blood the Gentiles have been brought near" — BEET. "Peace—the opposite of that enmity between Jew and Gentile mentioned in the next verse. Who made both one. (Comp. Gal. 3. 28, and especially Col. 3. 11.) And brake down the middle wall. It is possible that the phrase was immediately suggested by the demarcation between the court of the Gentiles and the inner area of the Temple"—MOULE.

15. "Having abolished by His sufferings in the flesh the cause of enmity between the Jews and Gentiles, even the Law of ceremonial commandments through His decrees — which offer mercy to all. (See Col. 2. 14.) That He might form the two—Jew and Gentile —into one new man—one mystical body"—WESLEY.

"Having made of no effect (as in Rom. 3. 3) the enmity—means by which Christ has broken down the barrier. Consequently, the enmity is that between Jew and Gentile; especially as the aim of its removal is to create the two into one new man. In His flesh—evidently our Lord's crucified flesh and blood (so ver. 16). The law of commands in dogmas—in apposition to 'the enmity.' By rendering invalid 'the Law,' Christ brought to nothing 'the enmity'"—BEET. "That He may create, etc.—purpose for which Christ has set aside the Law and its decrees, viz. to unite by creative power into one new unity the two parts into which the Law divided mankind"—BEET. So making peace—between Jews and Gentiles.

16. In one body—"one Church—having slain—by His own death on the cross—the enmity—which had been between sinners and God"—WESLEY.

This is a "continuation of the sentence expressing the design. Christ has by His death done away with the Law, in order to make the Jew and Gentile into one new man (ver. 15), and so to accomplish the reconciliation of both with God, that they should as one body be reconciled with God through the cross, after He has slain the enmity which hitherto existed between them"—MEYER. "While writing about Christ's purpose to break down the barrier between Jew and Gentile, S. Paul remembers that this can only be done by breaking down another barrier, that between man and God. Now man can be reconciled to God only through the death of Christ. Consequently thereby or 'therein,' i.e. in the cross on which He died, Christ slew not only the enmity between man and God, but that between man and man, in order to bring in universal harmony"—BEET.

17. And He came—"after His resurrection—and preached peace—by His ministers and His Spirit—to you—Gentiles—that were afar off—at the utmost distance from God—and to them that were nigh—to the Jews, who were comparatively nigh, being His visible Church"—WESLEY.

Some expositors prefer to look upon this verse as meaning that Christ preached peace "on earth before His death"—BEET. "Christ is peace in deed (ver. 14) and word (ver. 17). He not only is peace, but He proclaimed it Himself at His appearing on earth"—HARLESS. Peace. S. Paul is still speaking of peace between man and man, though this, of course, implies peace between man and God.

18. For through Him we both—"Jews and Gentiles—have access—liberty of approaching, by the guidance and aid of one Spirit to God as our Father. Christ, the Spirit, and the Father, the Three-One God, stand frequently in the same order"—WESLEY.

"Through Him—the emphatic words of the verse. Christ took us by the hand and led us to the Father. We both—Jews and Gentiles, whose union in Christ is the dominant thought of this section. In one Spirit—the Divine Agent of all-abiding harmony of man and man. Notice here the relation of each Person of the Trinity to the work of salvation"—BEET. "Behold the secret of all true union! It is not by others coming to us, nor by our going over to them, but it is by both them and ourselves coming to Christ"—MONOD.

19. "Therefore ye are no longer strangers, but citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem; no longer foreigners, but received into the very family of God"—WESLEY.

This verse sums up what has been said from ver. 11 to this point. Ye are no more strangers to the promises (see ver. 12), nor are ye merely foreign residents without civic rites. On the other hand, "if ye are Christ's ye are Abraham's seed, heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3. 29). "The saints—not angels, nor Jews, nor Christians then alive merely, but the saints of God in the widest sense—all members of the mystical body of Christ"—ALFORD. Of the household of God—"members of the family, kinsfolk. The idea is not of domestic service, but of the 'child at home.' In the deepest sense the Gentile believer, once 'far off' in both position and condition, is now at home with his living Father in Christ"—MOULE.

20. And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets. "As the foundation sustains the building, so the word of God, declared by the apostles and prophets, sustains the faith of all believers. God laid the foundation by them, but Christ Himself is the chief Corner-stone of the foundation. Elsewhere He is termed the Foundation itself. (1 Cor. 3. 11)"—WESLEY.

From speaking of "God's household" S. Paul goes on to speak of God's house—the Church, which is God's temple. "The foundation laid by the apostles and prophets is the gospel of Christ which they have proclaimed, and by which they have established the churches"—MEYER. "Prophets conspicuously mentioned in 1 Cor. 12 as holding the second rank in the Church. As in the Old Testament they were men who spoke under special inspiration. Had the reference here been to the Old Testament prophets, the order would have been inverted, 'prophets and apostles.' Corner-stone. Christ is both the foundation underlying the entire building, and a conspicuous corner-stone, uniting its walls, and thus giving solidity to the whole"—BEET.

21. On whom all the building fitly framed together—"the whole fabric of the universal Church, rises up like a great pile of living materials. Into an holy temple in the Lord—dedicated to Christ, and inhabited by Him, in which He displays His presence, and is worshipped and glorified. What is the temple of Diana of the Ephesians, whom ye formerly worshipped, to this?"—WESLEY.

"Each several building (R.V. margin, 'Every building'). Various parts of the one great structure. Such were the various churches, Jewish or Gentile. Frequently a great building is begun at different points; and in the earlier stages its parts appear to be independent erections; but as it advances all are united into one whole. So there were in S. Paul's day, as now, various churches. But to his eye they were parts of, and were advancing towards, one great temple. The separation was apparent and passing; the unity was real and abiding. Being fitly joined together—as a living body is united by its joints. Is growing—for the progress of the building is a development of its own inner life. This word supplements the metaphor of a building by that of a tree"—BEET. "The temple is essentially holy, for it belongs to God. In the Lord—notes a closer relation than the Old Testament phrase, 'holy to the Lord.' In virtue of their inward union with the one Master, the Jewish and Gentile churches are growing into one holy temple"—BEET.

22. Ye also—the readers of this Epistle. Through the Spirit (R.V. 'In the Spirit'). "The Holy Spirit is the supreme builder of the Church, as He is the supreme witness to Jesus Christ. (John 15. 26, 27.) The words 'in the Spirit,' closing the verse with solemn emphasis, denote not the mode of God's habitation—that is self-evident — but the agency engaged in building this new house of God"—FINDLAY.

CHAPTER III.

1. For this cause—"that ye may be so 'built together'—I am a prisoner for you Gentiles—for your advantage, and for asserting your right to these blessings. This it was which so enraged the Jews against him"—WESLEY.

Some expositors supply the word am after I, Paul, thus making the verse complete. Others, however, treat vers. 2–13 as a digression. S. Paul, they say, is about to offer a prayer for his readers, but breaks off, resuming his original intention at ver. 14. On behalf of the Gentiles. The persecutions which finally brought him to the imprisonment during which this letter was written were aroused by his unflinching championship of Gentile rights as against Jewish exclusiveness.

2. The dispensation of the grace of God given me in your behalf—"that is, the commission to dispense the gracious gospel; to you Gentiles in particular. This they had heard from his own mouth"—WESLEY.

The intricate sentence, extending from this point to the end of ver. 13, "resolves itself into a statement of what God has wrought in the apostle toward the accomplishment of His great plan. It thus completes the exposition already given of that which God wrought in Christ for the Church, and that which He has wrought through Christ in Gentile believers in fulfilment of the same end"—FINDLAY. If so be that you have heard (R.V.). Of course all S. Paul's readers were perfectly familiar with it. But, shrinking from any appearance of boastfulness, he refers to his commission in this delicate and characteristic way. "A natural and beautiful rhetoric prefers to treat it as if possibly obscure and forgotten"—MOULE.

3. The mystery—"of salvation by Christ alone, and that both to Jews and Gentiles. As I wrote before—namely, Eph. 1. 9, 10—the very words of which passage he here repeats"—WESLEY.

"Vers. 1–9 speak—(1) of the mystery itself—God's gracious intention to the human race unknown in earlier times, and (2) of the man to whom, above others, it was given to make known the secret"—FINDLAY. "The mystery made known (as in ch. 1. 9) to S. Paul was spiritual wealth, entrusted to him for distribution to others. It was therefore a stewardship. Mystery and Revelation are constant correlatives. (Rom. 16. 25; 1 Cor. 2. 7, 10.) For the secrets of God are known only by those for whom God lifts the veil which hides them from unaided human vision"—BEET. In few words—considering the grandeur of the theme.

4. Whereby when ye read ye can perceive my understanding, etc. The mystery of Christ (R.V.). "Christ Himself, His person and His whole work, connecting also the Gentiles with the people of God (ver. 6)"—MEYER.

5. Which in other—"in former—ages was not so clearly or fully made known to the sons of men—to any man, no, not to Ezekiel, so often styled 'son of man'; nor to any of the ancient prophets. Those here spoken of are New Testament prophets"—WESLEY.

"Unto the sons of men—a designedly large phrase; mankind in general, both inside and outside the Jewish pale. Outside, the secret was wholly unknown; inside, it was only dimly and sparingly intimated. That it was in some measure revealed is suggested by the phrase here, 'as it is now,' etc. But the Old Testament hints were after all little more than prepared materials for New Testament revelation"—MOULE.

6. That the Gentiles are joint-heirs—"of God—and of the same body—under Christ the Head—and joint-partakers of His promise—the communion of the Holy Ghost"—WESLEY.

This verse more precisely specifies the contents of the mystery. The Greek is best rendered by the R.V., Fellow-heirs, and fellow-members of the body, and fellow-partakers of the promise. How could the equal rights of Jews and Gentiles be more clearly put? Through the gospel—by personal faith in which each individual appropriates the above-named privileges.

7. According to the gift of the grace of God—"that is, the apostleship which He hath graciously given me, and which He hath qualified me for—by the effectual working of His power—in me and by me"—WESLEY.

"The appointment of S. Paul as a minister of the gospel is traced to its source in the favour with which God smiled on him. And this grace was in harmony with the working or 'activity' of His power. Otherwise, the grace would have been ineffective"—BEET.

8. Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given. "Here are the noblest strains of eloquence to paint the exceeding low opinion the apostle had of himself, and the fulness of unfathomable blessings which are treasured up in Christ"—WESLEY.

"The apostle now explains himself more fully on what had been said in ver. 7, and that entirely from the standpoint of the humility with which, in the deep feeling of his personal unworthiness, he looked forth upon the greatness and glory of his vocation. (Comp. 1 Cor. 15. 9)"—MEYER. Less than the least. The ground of this self-abasement was "not the consciousness of sin in general, in which respect S. Paul knew that he stood on the same level as any other, but the deeply humbling consciousness of having persecuted Christ, which, inextinguishable in him, so often accompanied his recalling of the grace of the apostolic office vouchsafed to him. (1 Cor. 15. 9; Phil. 3. 6; comp. 1 Tim. 1. 13.) The unsearchable, etc. By this is meant the whole Divine fulness of salvation of which Christ is the possessor and bestower, and which is of such a nature that the human intellect cannot explore it, so as to form an adequate conception of it"—MEYER.

9. What is the fellowship of the mystery—"what those mysterious blessings are whereof all believers jointly partake. Which was, in a great measure, hidden from eternity by God, who, to make way for the free exercise of His love, created all things. This is the foundation of all His dispensations"—WESLEY.

To make, etc.—lit. "to illuminate all." The same verb is used in 2 Tim. 1. 10, which compare. All Gentiles are meant. The stewardship of the mystery. (Comp. 1 Cor. 4. 1.) "Hidden from the ages—from the beginning of time, as in Col. 1. 26—in God, whose all-knowing mind is the treasury in which this wealth lay hidden. This suggests, as is clearly implied in ver. 10, that the mystery was not known even to angels. Who created all things—links together the purpose kept secret for ages with the creation of the universe. (So ch. 1. 4; Col. 1. 16, 17.) And this suggests that the world was created with a view to the realisation of this purpose"—BEET.

10. That the manifold wisdom of God might be made known by the Church—"by what is done in the Church, which is the theatre of the Divine wisdom"—WESLEY.

To the intent, etc. This is a thought of great grandeur. (Comp. 1 Pet. 1. 12.) To the angels "pure and powerful, but still finite intelligences, the work of man's redemption is not only a touching interest, an object of benevolent attention; it is indescribably important, as a totally new and unique revelation of the mind and ways of their Lord, and perhaps (though here the hints of Scripture are few and dark) as indicating how their own bliss stands secure"—MOULE. Manifold—lit. "much variegated" or "many coloured." It points to the great variety of the Divine workings.

11. The unusually full title here given to the Redeemer seems to call attention to the historical accomplishment, by Jesus of Nazareth, of God's eternal purpose.

12. By whom we have free access—"such as those petitioners have, who are introduced to the royal presence by some distinguished favourite. And boldness—unrestrained liberty of speech, such as children use in addressing an indulgent father, when, without fear of offending, they disclose all their wants, and make known all their requests"—WESLEY.

Boldness and access in confidence (R.V.). "Freedom of speech (in prayer), of status, and of feeling"—BENGEL. Through faith, etc.—lit. the faith of Him—i.e. the faith of which He is the object. "Observe the persistent recurrence of the idea of faith. The entrance into oneness with Christ is, on our side, by faith (ch. 2. 8), and (here) the life lived in that sacred oneness is realised in the exercise of faith"—MOULE.

13. "The not fainting is your glory"—WESLEY.

Wherefore refers to all that S. Paul has said about his office. I ask, etc. Called, as he has asserted himself to be to so grand a mission, he feels confident that God will overrule His imprisonment for good, and therefore begs his readers not to be discouraged by it. (Comp. Phil. 1. 12.) Which are your glory. "S. Paul declares, conscious that his own brave perseverance is a manifestation of the grace of God, that his sufferings are an ornament to his readers"—BEET.

14, 15. Of whom—"the Father—the whole family of angels in heaven, saints in paradise, and believers on earth is named. Being the 'children of God' (a more honourable title than 'children of Abraham') and depending on him as the Father of the family"—WESLEY.

For this cause. S. Paul here resumes the prayer he had in his mind at ver. 1, repeating the opening words of that verse. "Addressing himself to God as the Father of angels and of men, the apostle asks that He will endow the readers in a manner corresponding to the wealth of His glory—in other words, that the gifts He bestows may be worthy of the universal Father, worthy of the august character in which God has now revealed Himself to mankind. According to this measure, S. Paul beseeches for the Church, in the first instance two gifts, which are after all one—viz. 'the inward strength of the Holy Spirit' (ver. 16) and 'the permanent indwelling of Christ' (ver. 17). These gifts he asks on his readers' behalf, with a view to their gaining two further blessings which are also one—viz. 'the power to understand the Divine plan' (ver. 18) as it has been expounded in this letter, and so 'to know the love of Christ' (ver. 19). Still beyond these there rises in the distance a further end for man and the Church: the reception of the entire fulness of God"—FINDLAY. Every family in heaven and on earth (R.V.)—all angels, archangels, principalities, powers in heaven; with all Jews and Gentiles on earth, who are sons of God by faith in Christ Jesus. God is the Father of them all. Thus, in the Scriptures, the name "sons of God" is applied to both angels and men.

16. The riches of His glory—"the immense fulness of His glorious wisdom, power, and mercy—the inner man—the soul"—WESLEY. According to, etc.—"as He can do who is Lord of the resources of an eternal nature and heavenly kingdom. The glory of God is, in brief, Himself, as the infinite and holy One, with all results, for Himself, and His creatures, of His being such"—MOULE. "Strengthened—fitted for the intellectual and moral effort and work and battle of the Christian life; this strengthening is to come by contact with Divine power which enters into us and makes us strong. Through His Spirit—the Bearer of the presence and power of God. The inward man—that in man which is furthest removed from the outer world and its influence, the sacred chamber in which man's personality dwells alone"—BEET.

17. Dwell—"that is, constantly and sensibly abide"—WESLEY.

The Greek word means make His home in your hearts. Hearts. In the New Testament "heart" never means the affections only, but the sum total of affections—will, conscience, intellect, etc. It corresponds with "the inward man" of ver. 16. "Though all of us is a temple for Him, yet the heart is the choir where He properly sitteth"—BAYNE. Through faith—which his readers must have, if S. Paul's prayer is to be granted.

18. That being rooted and grounded—"that is, deeply fixed and firmly established—in love. Ye may comprehend—so far as a human mind is capable—what is the breadth of the love of Christ—embracing all mankind—and length—from everlasting to everlasting—and depth—not to be fathomed by any creature—and height—not to be reached by any enemy"—WESLEY.

Rooted and grounded. In this phrase are blended the metaphors of a tree and of a building. In love. These words are very emphatic in the Greek. Ye may be able (R.V. "Ye may be strong"). It suggests the greatness of the task of comprehending Christ. In the next verse S. Paul states that this task is for ever beyond our powers. The breadth, etc. "It stretches wide over all the whole world of the nations, east and west. In its length it reaches through all time to the end of things. In depth it penetrates to the region where the faithful sleep in death. (Comp. ch. 4. 9.) And it rises to heaven's height, where Christ lives"—HOFMANN. "Wide as the furthest limits of the inhabited world, long as the ages of eternity through which God's love to His people will endure, deep as the abyss of misery and ruin from which He has raised us, high as the throne of Christ in the heavens where He has placed us"—BERNARDINE À PICONIO. It is perhaps better, however, not to press the words too literally. The incomprehensible vastness of God's love in Christ is the apostle's thought.

19. And to know. "But the apostle corrects himself, and immediately observes, it cannot be fully known. This only we know, that the love of Christ surpasses all knowledge. That ye may be filled—which is the sum of all—with all the fulness of God—with all His light, love, wisdom, holiness, power, and glory—a perfection far beyond a bare freedom from sin"—WESLEY.

To know. The Greek word here employed "signifies knowledge in the acquisition rather than possession—getting to know. Hence it is rightly and often used of things Divine that 'we know in part,' our knowledge of which falls short of the reality, while it is growing up to it. Thus understood, the contradiction of the apostle's wish disappears. We know the unknowable, just as we 'clearly see the invisible things of God' (Rom. 1. 20)"—FINDLAY. The fulness of God. This phrase may refer either to the fulness of God Himself, or to the fulness of blessing He imparts to His children.

20. Now to Him. "This doxology is admirably adapted to strengthen our faith, that we may not stagger at the great things the apostle has been praying for, as if they were too much for God to give, or for us to expect from Him. That is able. Here is a most beautiful gradation. When He has given us exceeding, yea abundant blessings, still we may ask for more. And He 'is able' to do it. But we may think of more than we have asked. He is able to do this also. Yea, and above all this. Above all we ask—above all we can think. Nay, exceedingly abundantly above all that we can either ask or think"—WESLEY.

"That which is strictly speaking the prayer, the petition, is at an end; but the confidence in the Almighty who can still do far more, draws forth from the praying heart a right full and solemn ascription of praise"—MEYER. Able. The ability of God to more than fulfil His promise is a favourite thought in New Testament doxologies. (Comp. Rom. 16. 25; Acts 20. 32; Jude 24.) Or think. S. Paul's "thoughts go beyond his prayers. But God's ability to perform goes infinitely beyond both prayers and thoughts"—BEET.

21. In the Church—"on earth and in heaven"—WESLEY.

To Him be glory (R.V. "the glory")—the glory due to God. In the Church and in Christ Jesus (R.V.). "In the Bride and the Bridegroom, in the Redeemed and the Redeemer, in the many brethren and in the Firstborn, is this perfect glory to be paid to God"—FINDLAY. Throughout, etc.—lit. "Unto all the generations of the age of the ages."

CHAPTER IV.

1. I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord—"imprisoned for His sake and for your sakes; for the sake of the gospel which he had preached amongst them. This was therefore a powerful motive to them to comfort him under it by their obedience"—WESLEY.

The first three chapters of this Epistle have dealt with Christian doctrine; the last three deal mainly with Christian morals. And this is the true order. Therefore—in view of the high vocation of the Christian which he has described. Beseech—very pathetic, following as it does the phrase "prisoner in the Lord." Ye were called (R.V.)—at their conversion.

2. With all lowliness, etc. "Observe the moral lesson here. The first and most characteristic effect of the heights and depths of Divine privilege and spiritual experience just unfolded is to be the sincerest and most unselfish humility"—MOULE.

3. Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit—"that mutual union and harmony, which is a fruit of the Spirit. The bond of peace is love"—WESLEY.

Giving diligence. The word implies some difficulty in the task. To keep. God imparts it; it is our business so to live and act as to "keep" it. Unity—the oneness of those who are filled with the Spirit. The bond of peace. "Bind thyself to thy brother. Those who are bound together in love bear all burdens lightly. Bind thyself to him and bind him to thee. Both are in thy power; for whomsoever I will I may easily make my friend"—CHRYSOSTOM.

4. There is one body—"the universal Church, all believers throughout the world—one Spirit, one Lord, one God and Father—the ever-blessed Trinity. One hope—of heaven"—WESLEY.

Vers. 4-6 are probably an early Christian hymn. They make mention of seven unities: one body, one Spirit, one hope; one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all. (Observe the Trinitarian cast of the passage, which is characteristic of this Epistle.) These unities are named to strengthen the exhortation to unity in ver. 3. One body and one Spirit. As in the human organism the animating life or spirit controls the most diverse organs and binds the most diverse materials as one body; so the Spirit of God lives in the various Christian communities, and animates them as the one body of Christ. One hope. Nothing holds men more firmly together than a common "hope."

5. "One outward baptism"—WESLEY.

"There are not several Lords, but one, who is Lord of all believers, even Christ; not several kinds of faith, but one faith, inasmuch as all place their confidence upon the atoning death of Christ; not several kinds of baptism, but one baptism, namely, into Christ (Rom. 6. 3; Gal. 3. 27; Acts 10. 48; 19. 5)."—MEYER.

6. One God and Father of all—"that believe. Who is above all—presiding over all His children, operating through them all by Christ, and dwelling in all by His Spirit"—WESLEY.

(Comp. 1 Cor. 12. 4-6 for the order, as here, of Spirit, Lord, God.) "As ever, S. Paul rises from the Son to the Father; and in the presence of the Father he lingers. For all unity in the creature has its source in this supreme unity"—BEET.

7. According to the measure of the gift of Christ—"according as Christ is pleased to give to each"—WESLEY.

In this verse S. Paul "passes from the unities of the Church to its diversities, from the common foundation of the Christian life to the variety presented in its superstructure"—FINDLAY. Unto each one. Not one was overlooked. "Grace—the undeserved favour of God, revealed in the gift of capacities for usefulness. We may cheerfully acquiesce in the absence of some gifts, which others have, knowing that other gifts have been chosen for us by the unerring wisdom of Christ"—BEET.

8. Wherefore He saith—"that is, in reference to which God saith by David, Having ascended on high He led captivity captive—He triumphed over all His enemies, Satan, sin, and death, which had before enslaved all the world; alluding to the custom of ancient conquerors, who led those they had conquered in chains after them. And, as they also used to give donations to the people, at their return from victory, so He gave gifts to men—both the ordinary and the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit"—WESLEY.

The quotation is from Ps. 68. 18. As often in S. Paul, the quotation is made very freely. For example, he alters "Thou didst take gifts" to He gave gifts. "And the alteration makes at once evident the connection between the quotation and the matter which S. Paul has now in hand. The 'gifts' received by the conqueror revealed the completeness of his victory; the 'gifts' which the ascended Saviour gave to His servants on earth revealed the completion of His work for them"—BEET.

9. Now this expression, He ascended, what is it, but that He descended—"that is, does it not imply that He descended first? Certainly it does, on the supposition of His being God. Otherwise it would not: since all the saints will ascend to heaven, though none of them descended thence. Into the lower parts of the earth—so the womb is called. (Ps. 139. 15; the grave, Ps. 63. 9)"—WESLEY.

"Inasmuch as the original dwelling-place of God, and of the Son of God, is the highest heaven, S. Paul justly points out that the ascent of Christ implies that He had already come down from heaven to save His people. Christ's return in triumph to the skies implies His previous incarnation"—BEET. Lower parts of the earth. "He descended into Hades." Some expositors (as Wesley above) understand this as the Virgin's womb. But, bearing in mind the very prominent place of Christ's death in S. Paul's thought, it is preferable to understand the descent as referring to the whole series of humiliations, from the incarnation to the crucifixion and descent into Hades.

10. He that descended—"that thus amazingly humbled Himself—is the same that ascended—that was so highly exalted. That He might fill all things—the whole Church, with His Spirit, presence, and operations"—WESLEY.

"His return to heaven marked the completion of the work for which He came to earth. And it was needful that His Spirit, driven through man's sin into exile from its body, should descend to the lowest depths reached by His servants, in order that from that depth He might raise them to be sharers of His throne. To this end He must needs claim for His own, by entering its gloomy chambers, even the realms of the dead. Therefore, in order that the whole universe might become 'the fulness of Him who fills all in all,' He both descended and rose"—BEET.

11. "And among other of His free gifts, He gave some apostles—His chief ministers and special witnesses, who saw Him after His resurrection, and received their commission directly from Him. And some prophets, and some evangelists. A prophet testifies of things to come; an evangelist of things past; and that chiefly by preaching the gospel before and after any of the apostles. All these were extraordinary officers—the ordinary were some pastors, watching over their several flocks; and some teachers, whether of the same or a lower order, to assist them as occasion might require"—WESLEY.

He gave. "He" is emphatic here—some men to be apostles, and some prophets. (Comp. 1 Cor. 12. 28.) Evangelists or "missionaries." Pastors and teachers. These words are so joined in the Greek as to imply that the two offices were practically one. The true "pastor" will always feed his flock on sound "teaching."

12. "In this verse is noted the office of ministers; in the next the aim of the saints; in vers. 14–16 the way of growing in grace. And each of these three has three parts standing in the same order- For the perfecting the saints—the completing them both in number, and their various gifts and graces; for the work of the ministry—the serving God and His Church in their various ministrations; for the edifying of the body of Christ—the building up this, His mystical body, in faith, love, holiness"—WESLEY.

This verse explains why Christ gave the gifts named in the previous verse—for the full equipment of the saints, for the work of ministering—the word being used in a wide sense, so as to include the religious activities of both clergy and laity; for the building up of the body of Christ. S. Paul often combines the metaphors of a building and a living thing in a single phrase.

13. "Till all and every one of us come in the unity of the faith and knowledge of the Son of God to an exact agreement in the Christian doctrine, and an experimental knowledge of Christ as 'the Son of God.' To a perfect man—to a state of spiritual manhood in understanding and strength—to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ—to that maturity of age and spiritual stature in which we shall be full of Christ, so that He will be all in all"—WESLEY.

As ver. 12 gave the reason for the gifts of ver. 11, so this verse states the length of time during which the gifts will be exercised, viz. till we all attain, etc. "The aim of the Christian ministry is to make itself superfluous, to raise men beyond its need"—FINDLAY. We all, etc. "The mark at which the Church has to arrive is set forth in its collective and its individual aspects. We must all 'unitedly attain the oneness of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God,' and we must attain, each of us, 'a perfect manhood, the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ'"—FINDLAY. Perfect man (R.V. "Full-grown man"; comp. Phil. 3. 15; Col. 1. 28; 4. 12; 1 Cor. 2. 16; 14. 20.) Unto the measure. "In Jesus Christ humanity rose to its ideal stature; and we see what is the proper level of our nature, the dignity and worth to which we have to rise."—FINDLAY.

14. Fluctuating to and fro—"from within, even where there is no wind, and carried about with every wind from without, when we are assaulted by others who are unstable as the wind; by the sleight of men—by their cogging the dice; so the original implies"—WESLEY.

No longer babes—implies, that spiritual babyhood was actual and frequent among Christians in S. Paul's day. Every wind, etc. "The immature Christian is carried along by what he hears, good and bad. He is, therefore, at the mercy of every influence brought to bear upon him, and is borne hither and thither in ceaseless and useless movement"—BEET. In the sleight, or in the sport of men. "These men play with religion, and with the welfare of Christian souls"—VON SODEN. Wiles. The word here means systematised, deliberate teaching of error.

15. Into Him—"into His image and Spirit, and into a full union with Him"—WESLEY.

The previous verse told S. Paul's readers what to avoid; this tells them what to pursue. He names truth and love as the antidotes to error and deceit; and counsels constant growth "up into Christ" instead of spiritual infancy.

16. From whom the whole mystical body fitly joined together—"all the parts being fitted for and adapted to each other, and most exactly harmonising with the whole. And compacted—knit and cemented together with the utmost firmness. Maketh increase by that which every joint supplieth—or by the mutual help of every joint. According to the effectual working in the measure of every member—according as every member in its measure effectually works for the support and growth of the whole. A beautiful allusion to the human body, composed of different joints and members, knit together by various ligaments, and furnished with vessels of communication from the head to every part"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Col. 2. 9.) From whom. "He is the vital source to which the whole complex organism wholly owes alike its existence and its action"—MOULE. Note in this verse the frequent Pauline paradox that the increase is all from Christ, and yet inexorably conditioned by the faith and due working of His people. In love—both the atmosphere and the hidden spring of the Christian life—"the encompassing element"—BEET; "the inmost condition"—MOULE.

17. This therefore I say. "He returns thither where he begun (ver. 1). And testify in the Lord—in the name and by the authority of the Lord Jesus. In the vanity of their mind—having lost the knowledge of the true God. (Rom. 1. 21.) This is the root of all evil walking"—WESLEY.

In the Lord—"as myself, being 'in Him,' and as to those who are in the same union. . . . The phrase 'in the Lord' occurs forty-five times in S. Paul; 'in Christ,' or closely kindred phrases, nearly eighty times"—MOULE. Other Gentiles (R.V. "The Gentiles")—for though his readers were Gentiles by physical descent, they had had a "new birth," and were so no longer. S. Paul now gives a description of the Gentiles of his day, laying his finger in turn upon their mental, spiritual, and moral deficiencies.

18. Having their understanding darkened, through the ignorance that is in them—"so that they are totally void of the light of God, neither have they any knowledge of His will. Being alienated from the life of God—utter strangers to the Divine, the spiritual life. Through the hardness of their hearts—callous and senseless. And where there is no sense, there can be no life"—WESLEY.

The vanity of their mind and their darkened understanding portray the mental state of the unregenerate Gentiles. (Comp. Rom. 1. 21.) The student of Europe's intellectual history feels that no words could more fitly describe S. Paul's epoch. Alienated, etc. He goes on to describe their spiritual condition. (Comp. ch. 2 of this Epistle.) The life of God—the life He gives and communicates to His own. This alienation, in accordance with John 17. 3, arose from ignorance of God, while the "ignorance" in its turn arose from the hardening of their heart. (Comp. the remarkable passage in Rom. 1. 18–32.)

19. Who being past feeling. "The original word is peculiarly significant. It properly means, 'past feeling pain.' Pain urges the sick to seek a remedy, which, where there is no pain, is little thought of. Have given themselves up—freely, of their own accord. Lasciviousness is but one branch of uncleanness, which implies impurity of every kind"—WESLEY.

S. Paul now passes to their moral condition. They did give themselves over to wantonness. Although fleshly impurity is principally meant, the idea of the word is properly a "throwing off of all restraint." The sensual vices of the heathen of S. Paul's day can scarcely be exaggerated.

20. But ye have not so learned Christ—"that is, ye cannot act thus, now ye know Him, since you know the Christian dispensation allows of no sin"—WESLEY.

But ye not so—"conspicuous and double contrast to the Gentiles. Christ—Himself, the matter of the knowledge they have acquired"—BEET.

21. Seeing ye have heard Him—"teaching you inwardly by His Spirit. As the truth is in Jesus—according to His own gospel"—WESLEY.

If so be that ye heard Him (R.V.). This difficult verse will be best understood in the light of the Note on the first verse of this Epistle. S. Paul probably wrote it for other Christian communities besides that at Ephesus, some of which were founded by missionaries of "John's baptism." From Acts 19. 1–7, it appears that these communities had not received the full and detailed instruction which S. Paul himself was wont to give. Hence this qualification of ver. 20. Further, there were Gnostic influences at work among the Asian churches, the tendency of which was to undervalue the historical Jesus, and to weave speculations concerning a shadowy Christ. (See Colossians and the notes.) Hence the use in this place of the name Jesus (the birth-name of the Holy Child), seldom used by S. Paul, and never without reason.

22. The old man — "that is, the whole body of sin. All sinful desires are deceitful; promising the happiness which they cannot give"—WESLEY.

The teaching of the previous verse is defined in this. That ye put away — as one lays aside garments—as concerning your former manner of life. "The clause means that the putting off concerned, had to do with a former life-course; it affected it by being the close of it"—MOULE. The old man. (See note on Col. 3. 9.) Which is corrupt, etc.—lit. "growing corrupt according to the desires of deceit" — "desires after the forbidden, full of deceitful promises of joy and gain. (See Gen. 3 for the great typical case)"—MOULE.

23. The spirit of your mind—"the very ground of your heart"—WESLEY.

Be renewed — not "renew yourselves" — LUTHER; but "become renewed" — MEYER, by submitting to the working of the Spirit. Spirit of your mind — "the Holy Spirit looked upon as enlightening the mind" — BEET.

24. The new man — "universal holiness. After—in the very image of God"—WESLEY.

The significance of the tenses in this and the two preceding verses cannot be fully brought out in an English translation. Their meaning is somewhat as follows, Put off once for all the old man—go on being constantly renewed in the Spirit of your mind; put on once for all the new man. The new man. (Comp. Col. 3. 10, 12, and especially Rom. 13. 14 and Gal. 3. 27.) After God—according with His nature and plan. True holiness (R.V. "Holiness of truth").

25. Wherefore—"seeing ye are thus created anew, walk accordingly, in every particular. For we are members one of another—to which intimate union all deceit is quite repugnant"—WESLEY.

He now proceeds to detailed moral precepts. Notice that he has first laid stress on the need of a changed heart and a new birth. Falsehood. The last word of the foregoing paragraph was truth. Hence the first vice S. Paul counsels his readers to avoid is "falsehood." For we are members. "If we are members of one body we have one interest. And where this is recognised falsehood is impossible. For it is only a cloak to hide our selfish disregard of the interests of others"—BEET.

26. Be ye angry, and sin not—"that is, if ye are angry, take heed ye sin not. Anger at sin is not evil; but we should feel only pity to the sinner. If we are angry at the person, as well as the fault, we sin. And how hardly do we avoid it! Let not the sun go down upon your wrath—reprove your brother, and be reconciled immediately. Lose not one day. A clear, express command. Reader, do you keep it?"—WESLEY.

Anger does not contradict sinlessness. God Himself is angry with the wicked every day. This verse is practically a quotation from Ps. 4. 4 in the LXX. version.

27. Neither give place to the devil—"by any delay"—WESLEY.

"Wherever the devil finds a heart shut, he finds a door open"—MONOD. "In an irritated frame of mind passion easily gains the ascendency over sobriety and watchfulness, and that physical condition is favourable to the devil for his work of seducing into everything that is opposed to God"—MEYER.

28. But rather let him labour — "lest idleness lead him to steal again. And whosoever has sinned in any kind ought the more zealously to practise the opposite virtue. That he may have to give—and so be no longer a burden and nuisance, but a blessing, to his neighbours"—WESLEY.

Let the stealer no more steal. S. Paul does not mention restitution in this place, but compare his treatment of the subject in the letter to Philemon, written about the same time. To give — so thorough did S. Paul expect their conversion to be; from robbing others they were to learn to help them.

29. But that which is good—"profitable to the speaker and hearers—to the use of edifying — to forward them in repentance, faith, or holiness. That it may minister grace—be a means of conveying more grace into their hearts. Hence we learn, what discourse is corrupt, as it were stinking in the nostrils of God; namely, all that is not profitable, not edifying, not apt to minister grace to the hearers"—WESLEY.

Corrupt speech. The Greek word means "worthless." But such as is good for edifying as the need may be (R.V.). The duty of believers as members one of another is still in S. Paul's mind.

30. Grieve not the Holy Spirit—"by any disobedience, particularly by corrupt discourse, or by any of the following sins. Do not force Him to withdraw from you, as a friend does whom you grieve by unkind behaviour. The day of redemption—that is, the day of judgment, in which our redemption will be completed"—WESLEY.

"Grieve not, etc.—a distinct indication of the personality of the blessed Spirit"—MOULE. This verse is a continuation of ver. 9. "Evil discourses are so opposed to the holy nature and aim of the Divine Spirit, who dwells in Christians, that He cannot fail to be grieved thereat. In whom ye were sealed, etc.—furnishes motive for the exhortation: for if ye have received so great a benefit, through the Holy Spirit, how wrong and ungrateful is it when you grieve Him"—MEYER.

31. Let all bitterness—"the height of settled anger, opposite to 'kindness' (ver. 32). And wrath—lasting displeasure towards the ignorant and them that are out of the way, opposite to 'tenderheartedness.' And anger

—the very first risings of disgust at those that injure you, opposite to 'forgiving one another.' And clamour—or bawling. 'I am not angry,' says one; 'but it is my way to speak so.' Then unlearn that way: it is the way to hell. And evil speaking—be it ever so mild and soft a tone, or with ever such professions of kindness. Here is a beautiful retrogradation, beginning with the highest, and descending to the lowest, degree of the want of love"—WESLEY.

All. Observe the comprehensiveness of these precepts. "Bitterness is malice sharpened to a point, and directed against the exasperating object. Wrath—the passionate outburst of resentment in rage. Anger—the settled indignation of the aggrieved soul. Clamour is the loud self-assertion of the angry man, who will make everyone hear his grievance; while the railer carries the war of the tongue into his enemies' camp, and vents his displeasure in abuse and insult"—FINDLAY. "Malice (or 'badness')—this last term is separated from the others as generic and inclusive"—BEET.

32. "As God, showing Himself kind and tenderhearted in the highest degree, hath forgiven you"—WESLEY.

"Kindness in act, tenderheartedness of feeling, are to take the place of malice with its brood of bitter passions. The men of the new life will be found forgiving one another, even as God in Christ forgave them. Here we touch the spring of Christian virtue, the master-motive in the apostle's theory of life. The cross of Jesus Christ is the centre of Pauline ethics, as of Pauline theology. The sacrifice of Calvary, while it is the ground of our salvation, supplies the standard and incentive of moral attainment. It makes life an imitation of God"—FINDLAY.

CHAPTER V.

1. Be ye therefore followers—"imitators —of God—in forgiving and loving"—WESLEY.

It is unfortunate that the chapter-division has been made at this point. This and the following verse continue the exhortation to "imitate God" of ver. 32 in the last chapter. "We must be imitators of God. And this because we are His children, objects of His tender love. For children are expected to bear their father's likeness; and loved ones are influenced by those who love them. And love is to be the encompassing element and directive principle of their steps in life—walk in love"—BEET.

2. "In ch. 4. 32; 5. 2, the Father's love and the Son's self-sacrifice are spoken of in terms precisely parallel.—Christ does not, by His sacrifice, persuade an angry Father to love His children; it is the Divine compassion in Christ that dictates and carries into effect the sacrifice. At the same time, it was 'an offering and a sacrifice to God.' God is love; but love is not everything in God. Justice is also Divine, and absolute in its own realm. Law can no more forego its rights than love forget its compassions. And the law of God imposing death as the penalty for sin, which shaped Christ's sacrifice, made it acceptable to God. Thus it was 'an odour of a sweet smell'"—FINDLAY.

3. "But let not any impure love be even named or heard of among you—keep at the utmost distance from it, as becometh saints"—WESLEY.

What a contrast after "the odour of a sweet smell"! No wonder S. Paul says, let it not be even named among you. (Comp. this verse with ch. 4. 19, noting the coupling in both passages of covetousness with fleshly sins.)

4. Nor foolish talking—"tittle-tattle, talking of nothing, the weather, fashions, meat, and drink. Or jesting—the word properly means 'wittiness, facetiousness,' esteemed by the heathens an half-virtue. But how frequently even this quenches the Spirit, those who are tender of conscience know. Which are not convenient—for a Christian; as neither increasing his faith nor holiness"—WESLEY.

Jesting here means immoral pleasantry. Convenient (R.V. "befitting"). (Comp. "as becometh saints," ver. 3.) Giving of thanks. (Comp. Phil. 4. 6; Col. 2. 7; 4. 2.)

5. A solemn reason for the commands of ver. 3. Breakers of those commands are shut out of heaven. Although the fear of exclusion from heaven is not the highest conceivable moral motive, there are cases in which it is the strongest, and we have the authority of both Christ and the apostles for employing it.

6. Because of these things—"as innocent as the heathens esteem them, and as those dealers in vain words would persuade you to think them"—WESLEY.

Let no man deceive you—as their heathen neighbours would certainly try to do. (Comp. Rom. 16. 18; 1 Cor. 3. 18; 2 Cor. 11. 3; Col. 2. 8; 2 Thess. 2. 3; Jas. 1. 26.) With empty words—words void of all truth—for because of these things—the vices before named—the wrath of God (comp. Rom. 1. 18) cometh, or "is coming," is even now on its way. (See last note on the fear of judgment as a deterrent to wrong-doing.)

7. Partakers—of their sin and of the consequent wrath of God.

8. Ye were once darkness—"total blindness and ignorance. Walk as children of light—suitably to your present knowledge"—WESLEY.

"Not merely 'in the dark.' So had the night of spiritual ignorance and sin penetrated them that they were, as it were, night itself, night embodied. Light—again not merely

'in the light.' The Divine Light of truth, holiness, and resulting joy, had now so penetrated them that they were, in a sense, light embodied; not seeing light only, but being light and emitting it. (Comp. Matt. 5. 14)"—MOULE.

9. The fruit of the light—"opposite to 'the unfruitful works of darkness' (ver. 11)—is in—that is, consists in—goodness and righteousness and truth—opposite to the sins spoken of in ch. 4. 25, etc."—WESLEY.

This verse is a parenthesis, giving both a definition of, and an incitement to, walking in the light. The A.V. renders fruit of the Spirit, as in Gal. 5. 22. But the older MSS. read fruit of the light (and so R.V.). "Right is the fruit of light"—FINDLAY. "Goodness—practical beneficence. Righteousness—conduct in agreement with the Law. Truth—moral agreement with the eternal realities"—BEET.

10. Proving, etc.—testing the rightness or wrongness of all that presents itself to be done, by the question, "Is it well-pleasing to God?"

11. Reprove them—"to avoid them is not enough"—WESLEY.

Lit. Be not partakers with. Unfruitful—in marked contrast to the "fruit of the light" (ver. 9). Reprove (R.V. margin, "convict," i.e. "prove to be wrong").

12. In secret—as flying the light. This verse is to be regarded as an emphatically-worded justification of the foregoing exhortation. The sins of those who still dwell in darkness are such that it is polluting to mention them, except when an opportunity of reproving them arises, and makes such mention inevitable.

13. "But all things which are reproved, are thereby dragged out into the light, and made manifest—shown in their proper colours, by the light. For whatsoever doth make manifest is light—that is, for nothing but light, yea, light from heaven, can make anything manifest"—WESLEY.

For everything that is made manifest is light (R.V.). "The drift of this somewhat difficult verse, suggested by the context, seems to be, 'You are light in the Lord; use this character upon the surrounding moral darkness, in order to the rescue of its victims, that they also may become light. Nothing but light will do this work; no conquest over darkness, literal or spiritual, is possible, except to light. And one evidence of this is that every such real conquest results in the subjects of darkness becoming now subjects of light, becoming lights.' More briefly, 'You are light; keep pure then, but shine far into the dark. And then other men, as already you, shall become light in the Lord'"—MOULE.

14. Wherefore He—"God—saith—in the general tenor of His word, to all who are still in darkness—awake, thou that sleepest—in ignorance of God and thyself, in stupid insensibility—and arise from the dead—from the death of sin—and Christ shall give thee light—knowledge, holiness, happiness"—WESLEY.

Not a quotation from the Old Testament but possibly from an early Christian hymn. "The lines are a free paraphrase from the Old Testament, formed by weaving together messianic passages—belonging to such a hymn as might be sung at baptisms in the Pauline churches"—FINDLAY. Wherefore—"because reproof is so necessary and salutary"—MEYER.

15. Circumspectly—"exactly, with the utmost accuracy, getting to the highest pitch of every point of holiness. Not as fools—who think not where they are going, or do not make the best of their way"—WESLEY.

Look therefore—"resumes, after the digression begun with 'rather even improve,' in ver. 11"—MEYER. "Walk—the seventh and last occurrence in the Epistle of this important metaphor. Observe how the illuminated Christian is to keep his eyes open. No guidance is promised to him which shall dispense with patient watchfulness"—MOULE.

16. "With all possible care redeeming the time—saving all you can for the best purposes; buying every possible moment out of the hands of sin and Satan; out of the hands of sloth, ease, pleasure, worldly business; the more diligently, because the present are evil days, days of the grossest ignorance, immorality, and profaneness"—WESLEY.

Lit. Buying out the opportunity—the price we have to pay being the watchfulness and circumspectness of ver. 15. (Comp. Col. 4. 5.) We are to be "like men expecting a siege, who strengthen their fortifications, and furbish their weapons, and practise their drill, and lay up stores of supplies that they may 'stand in the evil day'"—FINDLAY. The days are evil—so evil that during the next decade Rome was burnt, and many of the Christian companions of S. Paul put to death. The probability that the lives of some of his readers would be cut short by persecutors in these evil days was another reason why they should redeem every possible opportunity.

17. What the will of the Lord is—"in every time, place, and circumstance"—WESLEY.

Be not foolish, and without moral seriousness, but understand what is the will of the Lord, which must ever be the rule of your life. (Carefully comp. Rom. 12. 2.)

18. Wherein is excess—"that is, which leads to debauchery of every kind. But be ye filled with the Spirit—in all His graces, who gives a more noble pleasure than wine can do" —WESLEY.

Be not drunken with wine—a thing utterly opposed to "the will of God" just mentioned; but instead of such debasing physical excitement—be filled in spirit (R.V. margin), "Be ye filled with the Spirit"—"a command to yield up ourselves entirely to God. It tells us that we must establish it in our minds as a law of our religion that our whole being must be pervaded by the spirit of consecration. Not as the distant issue of a life of struggles, or as the final baptism of the spirit of Christianity; but as the present gift, and, indeed, as one of the earliest gifts of our redemption"—POPE. S. Paul here recognises, and provides for, our natural craving for excitement. "Our nature craves excitement—some stimulus that shall set the pulses dancing, and thrill the jaded frame, and lift the spirit above the task-work of life, and the dreary and hard conditions which make up the daily lot of multitudes. It is this craving that gives to strong drink its cruel fascination"—FINDLAY. "Man loves to feel himself alive; he would fain live his life twice at once; and he would rather draw excitement from horrible things than have no excitement at all"—MONOD. S. Paul does not denounce the longing for occasional fuller and quicker life; nor does he deny that wine, for a season, satisfies this longing; but he forbids his readers to seek the ardours they crave in wine, because therein is riot—ribald songs and speech, immoral behaviour. If we must have moments of special enthusiasm and exaltation, let them come from spiritual joys, by our being filled in Spirit (or "with the Spirit").

19. Speaking to each other—"by the Spirit—in the Psalms of David—and hymns—of praise—and spiritual songs—on any Divine subject. Singing with your hearts—as well as your voice—to the Lord—Jesus, who searcheth the heart"—WESLEY.

S. Paul gives examples of the spiritual joys which are to supply the place of intoxication. Psalms, etc., instead of the indecent songs of the drinking bouts. In addition to the Hebrew psalms of praise, a small number of Christian hymns, antiphons, and doxologies had already come into use. The ecstasies enjoyed while joining in sacred music are well known, and the writer of this note has acquaintance with several cases in which converted drunkards have found it an adequate substitute for alcoholic excitements. S. Paul's precepts are here, as elsewhere, true to the facts of human nature, and the reverse of unpractical.

20. Giving thanks—"at all times and places. And for all things—prosperous or adverse, since all work together for good. In the name of, or through, our Lord Jesus Christ—by whom we receive all good things"—WESLEY.

Thanks always for all things. Observe the comprehensiveness of the expression, subjecting yourselves, etc.; sinking considerations of self-indulgence for the good of others, and for Christ's sake. Another very practical substitute for the pleasures of drunkenness. Many drunkards who have been induced to give up drink for a time, have forsworn it altogether on perceiving the vast increase of happiness their self-denial has brought to home and loved ones.

22. "In the following directions concerning relative duties, the inferiors are all along placed before the superiors, because the general proposition is concerning submission; and inferiors ought to do their duty, whatever their superiors do. Wives, submit yourselves to your husbands—unless where God forbids. Otherwise, in all indifferent things, the will of the husband is the law to the wife. As unto the Lord. The obedience a wife pays to her husband is at the same time paid to Christ Himself; he being head of the wife, as Christ is Head of the Church"—WESLEY.

The last paragraph (vers. 15–21) closed with a reference to "submission," and the submission of wives to their own husbands is now very naturally touched upon. As unto the Lord. "The wife must recognise that her position of subordination is ordained by Christ, and that in bowing to her husband she does but submit to her Master in heaven"—BEET.

23. The head—"the governor, guide, and guardian of the wife—and He is the Saviour of the body—the Church, from all sin and misery"—WESLEY.

"See 1 Cor. 11. 3. The husband and the wife are 'one flesh' (ver. 31), and the husband, in that sacred union, is the leader. So Christ and the Church are one, and Christ is the Leader"—MOULE. R.V. Being Himself the Saviour of the body. The reference is to Christ, and not the earthly husband. The He is emphatic. "Body"—the Church.

24. In everything—"which is not contrary to any command of God"—WESLEY.

The last clause of the preceding verse was inserted by S. Paul to guard the unique dignity and office of Christ as Head of the mystical body. Earthly husbands are indeed to some extent a type of Him in that relation, but not fully so. There is a difference. He is not only the Head, but also the Saviour of the body. But, having duly recognised this, the apostle reasserts the command of ver. 22. Nevertheless (R.V. "But"), i.e. "in spite of this difference," as the Church, etc. "The apostle has guarded the husband's headship from undue comparison with the Lord's, but now he enforces its true likeness to it"—MOULE. "Their own—for not only does the wife belong to the husband, but the husband to the wife"—MONOD.

25. Even as Christ loved the Church. "Here is the true model of conjugal affection. With this kind of affection, with this degree of it, and to this end, should husbands love their wives"—WESLEY.

"The apostle, true to the spirit of the gospel, speaks to the wife of the authority of the husband, to the husband of devotion to the wife; each party is reminded not of rights, but of duties. In Christian domestic life, Jesus Christ is at once the starting-point and the goal of everything. We may even say that domestic life is the triumph of the Christian faith"—MONOD. "There are many who, out of doors, are civil and kind to all; when at home, toward their wives and children, whom they have no need to fear, they freely practise secret bitterness"—BENGEL. When the love of Christ to the Church is his standard a man will love his wife with "a love which is ready to undergo even death"—MEYER. For the love of Christ was unto death.

26. That He might sanctify it through the word—"the ordinary channel of all blessings. Having cleansed it—from the guilt and power of sin. By the washing of water—in baptism; if, with 'the outward and visible sign,' we receive the 'inward and spiritual grace'"—WESLEY.

Vers. 26 and 27 contain "a digression expounding the moral aim of Christ's self-surrender"—BEET. It, or "her" (a better translation). The pronoun is so placed in the Greek as to mean, "It was in 'her' interest that He did this, and so in the wife's interest the husband should be ready for sacrifice"—MOULE. Washing of water—lit. "bath of water." Perhaps "the bride's bath on the eve of marriage" (BEET) was in the apostle's mind. (Comp. next verse.) By the word. This phrase belongs to "sanctify her," and denotes the instrument by which the sanctification is effected.

27. That He might present it—"even in this world—to Himself—as His spouse—a glorious Church—all glorious within—not having spot—of impurity from any sin—or wrinkle—of deformity from any decay"—WESLEY.

That He might Himself present to Himself—gives a better idea of the original, and is "an emphatic assertion that the giver and receiver are the same. For the Bride has been rescued and purified by the self-surrender of the Bridegroom"—BEET. Glorious. (Comp. Rev. 19. 7, 8; 21. 11.) Spot or wrinkle. "Maintaining his metaphor, S. Paul describes moral imperfections as bodily blemishes"—BEET. Holy and without blemish—entirely His, and entirely beautiful.

28. As their own bodies—"that is, as themselves. He that loveth his wife loveth himself—which is not a sin but an indisputable duty"—WESLEY.

As their own bodies. "These words link together two closely-related metaphors—viz. the Church as the body (ver. 23) and as the bride (ver. 27) of Christ; and bring them to bear, thus linked together, upon the relation of husband and wife"—BEET. "From the duty of loving their wives as their own bodies results the proposition of conjugal ethics, that the love of one's own wife is love of oneself"—MEYER.

29. His own flesh—"that is, himself. Nourisheth and cherisheth—that is, feeds and clothes—it"—WESLEY.

This verse "assigns the reason of what immediately precedes. 'He who loves his own wife loves himself; for if he did not love her, he would hate his own flesh, which is so repugnant to nature that no one has ever yet done it but rather everyone does the opposite, as also Christ—and that gives to this natural relation the highest consecration—acts with regard to the Church, because this constitutes the members of His body"—MEYER.

30. For we. "The reason why Christ nourishes and cherishes the Church is, that close connection between them which is here expressed in the words of Moses, originally spoken concerning Eve. Are members—are as intimately united to Christ, in a spiritual sense, as if we were literally 'flesh of His flesh, and bone of His bone'"—WESLEY.

Members—or "limbs"—of His flesh, etc., omitted by the Revisers.

31. For this cause—"because of this intimate union"—WESLEY.

"The Greek in this verse is practically identical with that of Gen. 2. 24. We may reverently infer that the apostle was guided to see in that verse a Divine parable of the coming forth of the Lord, the MAN of men, from the FATHER, and His present and eternal mystical union with the true Church, His Bride"—MOULE. In a former note attention has been called to the words "in Christ," which words express the dominant idea of this Epistle, and occur more than twenty times. The profound passage (vers. 22–33) is to be read with this fact in view. S. Paul, his mind full from the outset of the life of the Church in Christ, perceives how the marriage relation (with regard to which at ver. 22 he begins to give precepts) illustrates that truth, and sets forth anew the doctrine of union with Christ, under the metaphor of marriage.

32. This mystery is great; but I speak in regard of Christ and of the Church. "This revealed mystery, the union of bride and bridegroom, is great; but I say so in reference to the bridal of redemption to which our thought has been drawn"—MOULE. "When he speaks of 'this great mystery,' he means thereby not marriage itself, but the saying of Adam about it. The text was a standing problem to the Jewish interpreters. 'But for my part,' says the apostle, 'I refer it to Christ and to the Church'"—FINDLAY.

33. Nevertheless—although our thought has just been drawn to "Christ and the Church," see to it that ye also severally love, etc.

And let the wife, etc. "So careful is S. Paul to balance the duty of the husband by that of the wife"—BEET. Observe that though S. Paul does not denounce polygamy, the whole paragraph just closed presupposes monogamy. (Comp. S. Paul's attitude to slavery. He did not prohibit it, but enunciated principles which slowly but surely undermined it, and eventually swept it away.)

CHAPTER VI.

1. Children, obey your parents. "In all things lawful the will of the parent is a law to the child. In the Lord—for His sake—for this is right—manifestly just and reasonable"—WESLEY.

"This duty is also enforced in Scripture by a temporal promise. It derives a most influential and affecting illustration from the conduct of our Lord, who was Himself an instance of subjection to parents"—WATSON. Obey—a different word from that rendered "submit" (ver. 21), for the obedience of wives differs from that of children. This is right—in harmony with God's law.

2. Honour—"that is, love, reverence, obey, assist, in all things. The mother is particularly mentioned, as being more liable to be slighted than the father. Which is the first commandment with a promise—for the promise implied in the second commandment does not belong to the keeping that command in particular, but the whole Law"—WESLEY.

S. Paul is here reminding the children of one of their earliest lessons in religious matters—the ten commandments. From this quotation it follows that S. Paul considered the ancient Moral Law as still binding, though the Ceremonial Law had passed away.

3. That thou mayest live long upon the earth. "This is usually fulfilled to eminently dutiful children; and he who lives long and well has a long seed-time for the eternal harvest. But this promise in the Christian dispensation is to be understood chiefly in a more exalted and spiritual sense"—WESLEY.

"The promise is here quoted chiefly to remind the readers of the special honour given to the command by the promise attached to it"—BEET.

4. And ye fathers—"mothers are included; but fathers are named, as being more apt to be stern and severe. Provoke not your children to wrath—do not needlessly fret or exasperate them. But bring them up—with all tenderness and mildness—in the instruction and discipline of the Lord—both in Christian knowledge and practice"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Col. 3. 21.) In this passage (vers. 1-4), as in the preceding (on marriage) and following (on service), first the weaker and then the stronger are reminded of their duties one to another. Nurture them. Moral training rather than physical is implied in the word, but parental duty of course includes both. Of the Lord. "Correction and instruction should proceed from the Lord, and be directed by the Spirit of the Lord, in such a way that it is not so much the father who corrects his children and teaches them as the Lord through him"—MONOD.

5. Your masters according to the flesh—"according to the present state of things: afterward the servant is free from his master. With fear and trembling—a proverbial expression, implying the utmost care and diligence. In singleness of heart—with a single eye to the providence and will of God"—WESLEY.

The flesh. Those who owned slaves were masters of their bodies, but not of their souls. Fear, etc.—"an anxious desire to do right, and a consciousness of the spiritual peril of disobedience"—BEET. (Comp. 1 Cor. 2. 3; 2 Cor. 7. 15; Phil. 2. 12.) "Singleness of heart—the fear and trembling are to be genuine, and without duplicity"—MEYER.

6. Not with eye-service—"serving them better when under their eye than at other times—but doing the will of God from the heart—doing whatever you do as the will of God, and with your might"—WESLEY.

S. Paul means "the service which is rendered to the eyes of the master, but in which the aim is merely to acquire the semblance of fidelity, inasmuch as one makes himself noticeable when seen by the master, but is in reality not such, acting, on the contrary, otherwise when his back is turned. The men whom such slaves endeavour to please are just their masters, and the fault of this behaviour lies in the fact that such endeavour is not conditioned by the higher point of view of serving Christ, and doing the will of God, but has as its aim simply human approbation. Even of slaves Matt. 6. 24 holds good. (Comp. Gal. 1. 10)"—MEYER.

7. Unto the Lord, and not to men—"that is, rather than to men; and by making every action of common life a sacrifice to God, having an eye to Him in all things, even as if there were no other master"—WESLEY.

Work is to be done with good will or "gladness." And this will become easy when all things are done as unto the Lord.

8. He shall receive the same—"that is, a full and adequate recompense for it"—WESLEY.

The equality of all in Christ was a prominent thought with S. Paul at the time of writing this letter. (Comp. Col. 3. 11.) "In vers. 5-8 we read (1) that there must be a genuine 'care for' our work; (2) that the sense of Christ's lordship ensures 'honesty' in work; (3) that to carefulness and honesty we must even add 'heartiness'; (4) that there is to be the servant's 'anticipation of the final reward'"—FINDLAY.

9. Do the same things to them—"that is, act toward them from the same principle, Forbearing threatening — behaving with gentleness and humanity, not in a harsh or domineering way"—WESLEY.

Nowadays we can scarcely appreciate the boldness of this precept. Slaves were for the most part regarded as made of different flesh and blood from free men. This is a practical law of conduct logically deduced from the Pauline gospel of salvation for all. Threatening—the Greek suggests "the too habitual threatening"—ELLICOTT. Knowing, etc. (See under foregoing verse, and comp. Col. 3. 25.)

10. Brethren. This is the only place in this Epistle where he uses this compellation. Soldiers frequently use it to each other in the field. Be strong—nothing less will suffice for such a fight; to be weak, and remain so, is the way to perish. In the power of His might—a very uncommon expression, plainly denoting what great assistance we need, as if 'His might' would not do, it must be the 'powerful exertion' of His might"—WESLEY.

Finally, or "from henceforth" (R.V. margin). Brethren, omit. Be strong—lit. "Be made strong"—in the Lord—in whom alone is our strength. "Wisely does the apostle, after the special injunctions to husbands and wives, etc., now in general enjoin it upon all together to be strong in the Lord"—JEROME.

11. Put on the whole armour of God. "The Greek word means a complete suit of armour. Believers are said to 'put on' the girdle, breastplate, shoes; to take the shield of faith, and sword of the Spirit. 'The whole armour'—as if the 'armour' would scarce do, it must be the 'whole' armour. This is repeated (ver. 13), because of the strength and subtlety of our adversaries, and because of an 'evil day' of sore trial being at hand"—WESLEY.

Whole armour, or "panoply"—"an entire and full suit of armour and weapons, described in detail in vers. 14-17. It is the entire provision of God to protect His servants, and to arm them for the battle of life. All this S. Paul bids his readers appropriate to themselves"—BEET. That ye may be able to stand your ground—maintain your Christian position, and hold the fortress for God. Wiles—"wily assaults"—LUTHER. The word means "stratagems." In the two most momentous temptations in history—the temptation of Eve and that of Christ—the tempter's method was stratagem and wiliness. The devil—in whose personality S. Paul emphatically believed. He is "the chief of the foes who are named in ver. 12"—BENGEL.

12. "For our wrestling is not only, not chiefly, against flesh and blood—weak men, or fleshly appetites—but against principalities, against powers—the mighty princes of all the infernal regions. And great is their power, and that likewise of those legions whom they command. Against the rulers of the world. Perhaps these 'principalities' and 'powers' remain mostly in the citadel of their kingdom of darkness. But there are other evil spirits who range abroad, to whom the provinces of the world are committed. Of the darkness—this is chiefly spiritual darkness—of this age—which prevails during the present state of things. Against wicked spirits—who continually oppose faith, love, holiness, either by force or fraud; and labour to infuse unbelief, pride, idolatry, malice, envy, anger, hatred. In heavenly places—which were once their abode, and which they still aspire to, as far as they are permitted"—WESLEY.

In a sense we do sometimes wrestle against flesh and blood, but the language of this passage is rhetorical, and not, as sometimes in English idiom, is used in the sense of "much more than." Our wrestling is not against men, but against spiritual foes. Principalities and powers—the fallen angels, here described as of different ranks, under the same titles as S. Paul elsewhere gives to the unfallen angels. The world-rulers of this darkness (R.V.). Evil spirits exercising some kind of rule over the world, so long as it is the scene of sin, and therefore of "darkness." The spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places (R.V.)—non-material beings, fighting on the side of wickedness. "Heavenly places," in the widest sense, i.e. "non-earthly places," The reference is not of course to those "heavenly places" where His own are to dwell with Christ, but to the air (comp. in R.V., Matt. 6. 26). As "flesh and blood" dwell on earth, so these "spiritual hosts" have their abode "in the air" or "heavens." In reading passages like this, of which there are several in the New Testament, we do well to be on our guard against idle and irreverent speculations concerning angelic beings, good and evil.

13. In the evil day. "The war is perpetual; but the fight is one day less, another more, violent. The evil day is either at the approach of death, or in life; may be longer or shorter; and admits of numberless varieties. And having done all, to stand—that ye may still keep on your armour, still 'stand' upon your guard, still watch and pray; and thus ye will be enabled to endure unto the end, and 'stand' with joy before the face of the Son of Man"—WESLEY.

Wherefore — "because we have to fight against these powers"—MEYER. The evil day—"the dark crisis of the campaign, whenever it may be"—MOULE. And having accomplished all things—needful for triumph. To stand—all the hosts of evil having been beaten back.

14. Having your loins girt about—"that ye may be ready for every motion—with truth—not only with the truths of the gospel, but with 'truth in the inward parts';—for without this all our knowledge of Divine truth—will prove but a poor girdle 'in the evil day.' So our Lord is described (Isa. 11. 5). And as a girded man is always ready to go on, so this seems to intimate an obedient heart, a ready will. Our Lord adds to the loins girded, the lights burning (Luke 12. 35); showing that watching and ready obedience are the inseparable companions of faith and love. And having on the breastplate of righteousness—the righteousness of a spotless purity, in which Christ will present us faultless before God, through the merit of His own blood. With this 'breastplate' our Lord is described. (Isa. 59. 17.) In the breast is the seat of conscience, which is guarded by righteousness. No armour for the back is mentioned. We are always to face our enemies"—WESLEY.

Stand, or "stand forth"—MEYER. Having girded. "It was the girdle which produced the free bearing and movement and the necessary attitude of the warrior"—MEYER. Truth. Here again, as several times already in this Epistle, S. Paul emphasises the importance of a firm grasp on Christian "truth." Breastplate—protecting the heart—of righteousness. Although this phrase includes the idea of righteous living, its chief reference is to "the righteousness which is of God by faith." Satan is described in Scripture as the accuser, and this breastplate shields us from the blows of his accusations. "It is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth?"

15. And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel—"let this be always ready to direct and confirm you in every step. This part of the armour, for the feet, is needful, considering what a journey we have to go; what a race to run. Our feet must be so shod, that our footsteps slip not. To order our life and conversation aright, we are 'prepared' by the gospel blessing, the peace and love of God ruling in the heart. (Col. 3. 14, 15.) By this only can we tread the rough ways, surmount our difficulties, and hold out to the end"—WESLEY.

The girdle and breastplate are for safety. But the warrior also needs readiness, to which this verse refers. Preparation. This word may be translated "equipment." Gospel of peace. Many explanations have been given of this reference to "peace" in a description of war. Evidently S. Paul had in his mind Isa. 52. 7, which passage colours his phraseology here. But some commentators take S. Paul to mean "readiness to preach peace to others." FINDLAY connects this with the Christian warfare, thus: "Attack is often the best mode of defence. We keep our faith by spreading it. We defend ourselves from our opponents by converting them to the gospel, which breathes everywhere reconciliation and fraternity. God's peacemakers are His mightiest warriors."

16. "Above or 'over' all—as a sort of universal covering to every other part of the armour itself, continually exercise a strong and lively faith. This you may use as a shield, which will quench all the fiery darts, the furious temptations, violent and sudden injections of the devil"—WESLEY.

The Greek word rendered shield denotes a large shield, four feet by two and a half, and covered with leather. Fiery darts—arrows with burning tow near the barb, used by the ancients, especially in naval warfare. Faith—"that faith whereby we resolutely rely on God, and His word, for deliverance from temptation"—MONOD. The devil—"the great general of the besieging host"—MOULE.

17. "And take for an helmet the hope of salvation. (1 Thess. 5. 8.) The head is that part which is most carefully to be defended. One stroke here may prove fatal. The armour for this is 'the hope of salvation.' The lowest degree of this hope is a confidence that God will work the whole work of faith in us; the highest is a full assurance of future glory, added to the experimental knowledge of pardoning love. Armed with this 'helmet,' the hope of the joy set before him, Christ 'endured the cross, and despised the shame' (Heb. 12. 2). And the sword of the Spirit, the word of God. This Satan cannot withstand, when it is edged and wielded by faith. Till now our armour has been only defensive. But we are to attack Satan, as well as secure ourselves; the shield in one hand and the sword in the other. Whoever fights with the powers of hell will need both. He that is covered with armour from head to foot, and neglects this, will be foiled after all. This whole description shows us how great a thing it is to be a Christian. The want of any one thing makes him incomplete. Though he has his loins girt with truth, righteousness for a breastplate, his feet shod with the preparation of the gospel, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit; yet one thing he wants after all. What is that? It follows"—WESLEY.

Take—the original word means "accept from the hands of another." Of salvation. "The warrior's head rising above his shield was frequently open to attack. The arrow might shoot over the shield's edge, and inflict a mortal blow. Our faith, at the best, has its deficiencies and its limits; but God's salvation reaches beyond our highest confidence in Him"—FINDLAY. The sword of the Spirit. "Either as given by the Spirit, like 'panoply of God,' or used by the Spirit"—BEET. Which is the word of God. For an illustration of the use of the written word as a "sword" against Satan, compare Christ's use of it at His temptation.

18. Praying always—"at all times, and on every occasion, in the midst of all employments, inwardly praying without ceasing. By the Spirit—through the influence of the Holy Spirit—with all prayer—with all sort of prayer,—public, private, mental, vocal. Some are careful in respect of one kind of prayer, and negligent in others. If we would have the petitions we ask, let us use all. Some there are who use only mental prayer or ejaculations, and think they are in a state of grace, and use a way of worship, far superior to any other: but such only fancy themselves to be above what is really above them; it requiring far more grace to be enabled to pour out a fervent and continued prayer than to offer up mental aspirations. And supplication—repeating and urging our prayer, as Christ did in the garden. And watching—inwardly attending on God, to know His will, to gain power to do it, and to attain to the blessings we desire. With all perseverance—continuing to the end in this holy exercise. And supplication for all the saints—wrestling in fervent, continued intercession for others, especially for the faithful, that they may do all the will of God, and be steadfast to the end. Perhaps we receive few answers to prayer, because we do not intercede enough for others"—WESLEY.

Although we cannot always be on our knees, there is a sense in which we may be praying always. Prayer is to be the constant attitude of the soul. All prayer; at all seasons; all perseverance; all saints. Observe the thoroughness and comprehensiveness of the exhortation, characteristic of S. Paul. Watching, or "keeping awake." The same Greek word is used in Mark 13. 33, Luke 21. 36. For all saints. "Let our prayers at least be catholic. At the throne of grace let us forget our sectarian divisions. Having access in one Spirit to the Father, let us realise in His presence our communion with all His children" —FINDLAY.

19. By the opening my mouth—"removing every inward and every outward hindrance"—WESLEY.

Lit. And on behalf of me—for his appeal to Cæsar was about to be heard, and as at this time more depended upon S. Paul than upon any other man in Christendom, there was urgent need that prayer should ascend for his release. That utterance may be given unto me. (Comp. Matt. 10. 18–20.) Observe that S. Paul is not thinking about his personal welfare in asking his readers to pray for him; he is concerned solely for the success of the gospel. Mystery—S. Paul has now used this word six times in the present Epistle.

20. An ambassador in bonds. "The ambassadors of men usually appear in great pomp. How differently does the ambassador of Christ appear!"—WESLEY.

Bonds. (Comp. Phil. 1. 13.) The reference here to his bondage is a pathetic touch, calculated to produce in his readers a greater readiness to pray for him. (Comp. the similar touches in Philemon.) Prisoners in S. Paul's position were often "coupled by a slight chain round the right wrist to the left of a soldier, and thus shackled. If they could afford it, they were at liberty to hire a lodging for themselves, without the walls, but within the prescribed limits"—LEWIN.

21. Ye also—"as well as others"—WESLEY. (See the notes on Col. 4. 7.) In the Lord. The last occurrence in the present Epistle of this oft-repeated phrase.

22. That he might comfort your hearts—"by relating the supports I find from God, and the success of the gospel"—WESLEY.

Our affairs—concerning which his readers were very anxious, especially as reliable information was so difficult to obtain.

23. Peace. "This verse recapitulates the whole Epistle"—WESLEY.

"Grace and peace were the first words of the Epistle—the apostle's salutation to all his churches. In peace and grace he breathes out his final blessing"—FINDLAY. To the brethren—"noting their close relation to each other and to S. Paul. This suggests the addition and love—i.e. one to another"—BEET.

24. In sincerity — "or in incorruption; without corrupting his genuine gospel, without any mixture of corrupt affections. And that with continuance, till grace issue in glory" —WESLEY.

Incorruptness—same word in 1 Cor. 15. 42, of the resurrection-body. The Church, the body of Christ, is to be characterised by a like "incorruption." This word stands "as the crown and climax of this glorious Epistle"—ALFORD.

THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

"PHILIPPI was so called from Philip, king of Macedonia, who much enlarged and beautified it. Afterwards it became a Roman colony, and the chief city of that part of Macedonia. Hither S. Paul was sent by a vision to preach; and here, not long after his coming, he was shamefully entreated. Nevertheless many were converted by him, during the short time of his abode there; by whose liberality he was more assisted than by any other church of his planting. And they had now sent large assistance to him by Epaphroditus; by whom he returns them this Epistle.

CHAPTER I.

1. Servants. "S. Paul, writing familiarly to the Philippians, does not style himself an apostle. And under the common title of 'servants,' he tenderly and modestly joins with himself his son Timotheus, who had come to Philippi not long after S. Paul had received him. (Acts 16. 3, 12.) To all the saints. The apostolic Epistles were sent more directly to the churches than to the pastors of them. With the bishops and deacons. The former properly took care of the internal state, the latter of the externals, of the Church (1 Tim. 3. 2–8); although these were not wholly confined to the one, neither those to the other. The word 'bishops' here includes all the presbyters at Philippi, as well as the ruling presbyters; the names bishop and presbyter, or elder, being promiscuously used in the first ages"—WESLEY.

Paul and Timothy — but from ver. 3 onward the singular number is used, and S. Paul alone speaks. Christ Jesus — named twice in the very first verse of the Epistle. The sublime Pauline conception expressed by the words "in Christ Jesus" is abundantly present in this letter, as in that to the Ephesians, written about the same time. Bishops or "overseers"; the fact that there were several "bishops" in one town conclusively shows that the episcopate in apostolic times was widely different from the diocesan episcopate for which Divine right and apostolic origin are so loudly claimed. Bishops and deacons—these officers are named after the saints. "The shepherd who rules goes behind the flocks"—CORNELIUS A LAPIDE.

2. Word for word as in Rom. 1. 7; 1 Cor. 1. 3; 2 Cor. 1. 2; Philem. 3. (Comp. also Gal. 1. 3; Eph. 1. 2.)

3. Every remembrance. A better translation is "my whole recollection of you," i.e. the picture of the Philippian church which S. Paul had in his mind was an entirely gratifying picture. The Philippian saints held a very high place in the apostle's regard.

4. With joy — "after the Epistle to the Ephesians, wherein love reigns, follows this, wherein there is perpetual mention of joy. 'The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy.' And joy peculiarly enlivens prayer. The sum of the whole Epistle is, I rejoice. Rejoice ye"—WESLEY. (After BENGEL.)

"This joy explains his thanks. And it becomes, even in his prison at Rome, the keynote of the Epistle"—BEET. "Negatively expressed, the sense up to this point is, 'I never make my intercessory prayer for you all, without always in it associating thanks towards my God with my entire remembrance of you'"—MEYER.

5. "The sense is, I thank God for your fellowship with us in all the blessings of the gospel, which I have done from the first day of your receiving it until now"—WESLEY.

BEET takes another view. Fellowship—"a disposition to share with others' effort, toil, peril, enjoyment, or material good, either by receiving from them a share of their good or ill, or by giving to them a share of ours.

And their brotherhood had been constant throughout their entire Christian course—from the first day until now. Constancy is the great test of personal worth. A fellow-worker always ready to co-operate is beyond price."

6. Being persuaded. "The grounds of which persuasion are set down in the following verse. That He who hath begun a good work in you, will perfect it until the day of Christ—that He who having justified, hath begun to sanctify you, will carry on this work, till it issue in glory"—WESLEY.

Being confident (R.V.). This very thing—an emphatic phrase occurring about ten times in S. Paul's writings. The day of Jesus Christ. S. Paul refers to this great "day" about twenty times altogether. To him, in common with all the early Christians, the second coming of Christ (which they expected to take place very soon) was a frequent and influential thought. Observe that we have here "Jesus Christ," and not "Christ Jesus." S. Paul uses the former phrase seventy-eight, and the latter eighty-seven times. The point is not to be unduly pressed; but he often seems to prefer the latter when our Lord is thought of chiefly as the Second Person in the Eternal Trinity; and the former when the Incarnate Saviour, manifested in history as Jesus of Nazareth, is prominent in his mind. And so in this passage. It is the "Son of Man" (Matt. 25. 31). Who shall "come in His glory." Note further that while the day of Jesus Christ has been chiefly referred to by later preachers and writers to awaken the unconverted, it was used by S. Paul to warn and encourage Christians also.

7. As it is right for me to think this of you. "Why? He does not say, 'Because of an eternal decree,' or 'Because a saint must persevere,' but, because I have you in my heart, who were all partakers of my grace—that is, because 'ye were all' ('for which I have you in my heart,' I bear you the most grateful and tender affection) 'partakers of my grace'—that is, sharers in the afflictions which God vouchsafed me as a grace or favour (vers. 29, 30); both in my bonds, and when I was called forth to answer for myself, and to confirm the gospel. It is not improbable that, after they had endured that 'great trial of affliction,' God had sealed them unto full victory, of which the apostle had a prophetic sight"—WESLEY.

"Such feelings are especially right for him, because of the intimacy of affectionate intercourse, which has brought him into living contact with the glow of their spiritual life"—MOULE. I have you in my heart (R.V. margin, "Ye have me in your heart"). If this reading be adopted, the meaning will be, "My heart ought to be full of you, because your hearts are full of me." My bonds. "Within the narrow limits of S. Paul's prison walls, his readers are ever with him. Thoughts of them dispel in part the gloom of his dungeon, and strengthen his defence of the gospel"—BEET. Ye all are partakers with me of grace. Therefore the "confidence" expressed concerning the Philippians in vers. 6 is justified. S. Paul knew what grace could do for him; and if his readers were partakers of it, it would do the same for them.

8. I long for you with the bowels of Jesus Christ. "In Paul, not Paul lives, but Jesus Christ. Therefore he longs for them 'with the bowels,' the tenderness, not of Paul, but of Jesus Christ"—BENGEL and WESLEY.

For God is my witness, how I long after you all in the tender mercies of Christ Jesus (R.V.). "Long after you." The Greek word is expressive of tender yearning. Bowels—perhaps "heart" is the best English rendering; the "bowels" were thought to be "the seat of heartfelt love" (MEYER), and of the affections generally.

9. And this I pray, that your love—"which they had already shown—may abound yet more and more. The fire which burned in the apostle never says, It is enough. In knowledge and in all spiritual sense—which is the ground of all spiritual knowledge. We must be inwardly sensible of Divine peace, joy, love; otherwise, we cannot know what they are"—WESLEY.

The prayer mentioned in ver. 4 is now more fully described. Your love. Many expositors think that love to S. Paul is meant; but in view of the words in knowledge, etc., it seems more likely to mean Christian love to God and man in its widest sense. MEYER interprets, "your love one to another." Knowledge "denotes a sound knowledge of theoretical and practical truth; discernment—a sensitively correct moral perception of the true nature, good or bad, of each circumstance, case, or object, which experience may present"—ELLICOTT.

10. That ye may try—"by that spiritual sense—the things that are excellent—not only good, but the very best; the superior excellence of which is hardly discerned, but by the adult Christian. That ye may be inwardly sincere—having a single eye to the very best things, and a pure heart. And outwardly without offence—holy, unblamable in all things"—WESLEY.

Prove the things that differ (R.V. margin). CONYBEARE, Teaching you to distinguish good from evil. But the meaning, even if these translations be adopted, is the same. S. Paul takes it for granted that a Christian man, on distinguishing good from bad, will reject the bad and "approve the things that are excellent." Sincere. The derivation of the Greek word is doubtful. It is commonly supposed to be from words meaning "sunlight," and "to examine"; hence "found pure when examined by the sun's light"; others suppose it to mean "sifted and cleansed by rapid movement"—GRIMM-THAYER. "It is the winnowed, the unmingled"—TRENCH. Without offence—"practical proof of the sincereness in reference to intercourse with others"—MEYER. The day of Christ. "The recurrence of this thought proves its firm hold on the mind of S. Paul"—BEET.

11. Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God. "Here are three properties of that sincerity which is acceptable to God—(1) It must bear fruits, 'the fruits of righteousness,' all inward and outward holinesss, all good tempers, words, and works; and so abundantly, that we may be 'filled' with them. (2) The branch and the fruits must derive both their virtue and their very being from the all-supporting, all-supplying root, Jesus Christ. (3) As all these flow from the grace of Christ, so they must issue in the glory and praise of God"—WESLEY.

Not only are we to be void of offence, and sincere (both of which words set forth the Christian character on the negative side, see note above), but we are to bear fruit. We are to be empty of sin, and filled with the fruit of righteousness. Righteousness—"right doing, conformity with the moral standard"—BEET. Unto the glory, etc. "For how far the fruitfulness tends to the honour of God, comp. John 15. 8; see Eph. 1. 6–14. God's glory is His majesty in itself; praise is the praise of that majesty"—MEYER.

12. The things concerning me—"my sufferings—have fallen out rather to the furtherance, than, as you feared, the hindrance, of the gospel"—WESLEY.

From this point to ver. 26 S. Paul describes his own circumstances. The Philippians had no doubt wondered how God could leave His most zealous and successful apostle in captivity, thus arresting the spread of the gospel, and this would be a trial of faith to them. They had further grieved over the hardships and sufferings their old friend was called to endure. In this passage S. Paul comforts them by omitting all reference to the sufferings, and by stating that the captivity, instead of hindering, has fallen out unto the furtherance of the gospel. One illustration of the truth of his words is the present Epistle, which the Church could ill spare, and which would never have been written but for his imprisonment at Rome.

13. My bonds in Christ—"endured for His sake—have been made manifest—much taken notice of—in the whole palace—of the Roman emperor"—WESLEY.

Made manifest in Christ. He means that those around him did not mistake him for an ordinary prisoner awaiting trial, but realised that he was "an ambassador in chains of the mystery of the gospel" (Eph. 6. 20). Palace (R.V. "Prætorian guard"; margin, "Prætorium"). "Prætorian guard" seems the best rendering. As one soldier after another took his turn in guarding S. Paul, the number of those to whom he made known Christ increased till throughout the whole Prætorian guard his bonds in Christ became manifest. And to all the rest (R.V.)—the Roman public as distingnished from the guard.

14. And many—"who were before afraid—trusting in the Lord through my bonds—when they observed my constancy, and safety notwithstanding, are more bold"—WESLEY.

Most of the brethren (R.V.)—not all. (See vers. 15–17.) "Through S. Paul's imprisonment most of the Christians around reposed new trust in Christ; for they saw in S. Paul, as they had never seen before, the presence, power, and sufficient grace of Christ"—BEET. To speak the word. This verse implies that not only church officers, but the brethren in general were expected to engage in active endeavours to spread the faith.

15, 16. Some indeed preach Christ out of contention—"envying S. Paul's success, and striving to hurt him thereby—not sincerely—from a real desire to glorify God—but supposing—though they were disappointed—to add more affliction to my bonds—by enraging the Romans against me"—WESLEY.

Most of the brethren (ver. 14) are doing good work from right motives, but there are exceptions. "This is not the case with all; some preach from bad motives. The mention of speaking the word brings to the apostle's mind all who were doing so; he pauses then to allude to all, specifying under the some indeed his Judaising opponents, while in some also he reverts to the sounder majority mentioned in ver. 14"—ELLICOTT. On these Judaising opponents see the notes on Galatians in this Commentary. Envy—"moved by vexation at S. Paul's success. Strife—active opposition a natural result of envy"—BEET. Contention—the word means "factiousness" or "partisanship." Not sincerely, or "not purely." Thinking to raise up affliction for me in my bonds (R.V.)—"thinking to make my chains gall me"—LIGHTFOOT. "There were many ways of injuring the apostle, unknown to us, who are unacquainted with the circumstances of the times"—CALVIN. But the chief sting of their cruelty probably lay in their mingling error with gospel truth when S. Paul's bonds prevented him from vigorously combating such error.

17. But the others out of love—"to Christ and me—knowing—not barely, supposing—that I am set—lit. 'I lie'; yet still going forward in his work. He remained at Rome as an ambassador in a place where he is employed on an important embassy"—WESLEY.

"Knowing that I lie in prison, etc."—

LUTHER. But the nature of S. Paul's confinement would scarcely justify such a phrase. Much better is MEYER'S view: "Knowing that I am destined, am ordained of God, for the defence of the gospel—a destination which they on their parts, in consequence of their love to me, feel themselves impelled to subserve. They labour sympathetically hand in hand with me."

18. In pretence—"under colour of propagating the gospel. In truth—with a real design so to do"—WESLEY.

The verse means: What does it matter? So long as the gospel is proclaimed, whether from pure motives or impure, I find and will continue to find in such proclamation a ground of joy. Note that S. Paul does not rejoice in the impure motives of his adversaries; but in the bare fact that more ears are hearing the name of Christ. "Let then the word be preached, and let it be heard; be it sincerely or be it pretendedly, so it be done, it is to him, and should be to us, matter (not only of contentment, but also) of rejoicing"—ANDREWS. "His joy reminds us that very imperfect teaching may be better than no teaching, and warns us not to despise imperfect forms of Christianity"—BEET.

19. This shall turn to my salvation—"shall procure for me a higher degree of glory. Through your prayer—obtaining for me a larger supply of the Spirit"—WESLEY.

"My salvation—not 'my deliverance from captivity'"—CHRYSOSTOM, etc., but "it will be salutary for me"—MEYER. He means that the attempt "to raise up affliction" for him, forced him to depend more upon God, and resulted in such an increase of faith in God that he was able to joy in tribulation (see last verse). Hence the whole matter has been a source of spiritual blessing to him, and will therefore make still more certain his "salvation." Spirit of Jesus Christ—the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the Son (John 15. 26).

20. As always—"since my call to the apostleship. In my body—however it may be disposed of. How that might be he did not yet know. For the apostles did not know all things; particularly in things pertaining to themselves, they had room to exercise faith and patience"—WESLEY.

Earnest expectation—"lit. 'waiting with outstretched head,' one forcible word in the Greek"—MOULE. That in nothing shall I be put to shame—"that in no respect will a result ensue tending to my shame—a result which would expose me to the reproach of having failed to fulfil my destiny"—MEYER. Christ shall be magnified, etc. "A tremendous alternative overhanging S. Paul's bodily life cannot be overlooked in this eager glance into the future. In any case 'Christ will be magnified.' But S. Paul knows not whether it will be through the continued preservation of his body in life, or through his death"—BEET.

21. To me to live is Christ—"to know, to love, to follow Christ, is my life, my glory, my joy"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Gal. 2. 20.) This verse "confirms the preceding assertion by showing the real nature of 'life' and 'death' according to the apostle's present mode of regarding them"—ELLICOTT. To me—emphatic in the original. "In my view and definition of the term, Life is but another name for Christ"—PEILE. And to die is gain—"inasmuch as by death I attain to Christ"—MEYER. And "shall be with him more intimately"—CHRYSOSTOM.

22. "Here he begins to treat of the former clause of the preceding verse. Of the latter he treats in ch. 2. 17. But if I am to live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour—this is the fruit of my living longer, that I can labour more. Glorious labour! desirable fruit! In this view long life is indeed a blessing. And what I should choose I know not—that is, if it were left to my choice"—WESLEY.

But if to live in the flesh—if this is the fruit of my work, then what I shall choose I wot not (R.V. margin, "I do not make known"). On this difficult passage ELLICOTT says: "'The connection seems to be as follows: In ver. 21 the apostle had spoken of life and death from a strictly personal point of view; in this aspect death was gain. The thought, however, of his official labours reminds him that his life bears blessing and fruitfulness to others; so he pauses; 'the hope of the conversion of many having presented itself to him, he stops and hesitates.'" VERNON BARTLET suggests the paraphrase, "But if (still) to live in the flesh (be my lot) this (means) for me fruitful work; and what my choice is to be, I declare not explicitly. For I am hemmed in on both sides, my own desire being," etc.

23. To depart—"out of bonds, flesh, the world—and to be with Christ—in a nearer and fuller union. It is better 'to depart'; it is far better to be with Christ"—WESLEY.

But I am in a strait betwixt the two—i.e. between life and death. "The apostle asks which is most worth his while, to live or to die. The same question is often presented to ourselves, and perhaps our reply has been that of the apostle. But may we not have made it with a far different import? Life and death have seemed to us like two evils, and we knew not which was the less. To the apostle they seem like two immense blessings, and he knows not which is the better"—MONOD. Having my desire to depart. The word implies the striking of a camp, or the unmooring of a ship. Hence CHRYSOSTOM paraphrases the passage, "migration from earth to heaven." BENGEL says that to depart was never undesirable for the saints, but to be with Christ is characteristic of the New Testament. "Christianity does not tell us of the splendours of the invisible world; but it does far better when it informs us that to loosen from the shore of mortality is to be with Christ"—ISAAC TAYLOR. "The man who views the prospect thus has just said that to him to live is Christ. Death is 'gain' for him, therefore, not as mere escape or release, but as a glorious augmentation; it is 'Christ' still, only very far more of Christ"—MOULE.

24. Lit. To abide by the flesh—"to hold fast to its conditions of trial for the sake of the Lord and His flock. Desire, and the sense of betterness, lie on the side of death; obligation, in view of the claims of others, lies on the side of life"—MOULE.

25. I know—"by a prophetic notice given him while he was writing this—that I shall continue some time longer with you—and doubtless he did see them after this confinement"—WESLEY.

And having this confidence—that "to abide in the flesh is more needful for your sake—I know that I shall abide. Observe the sublime faith in God's wisdom, goodness, and power, implied in this statement. 'What is best will happen!' Abide with you all. The Greek verb means 'abide by,' and gives the idea of association in life and work. Progress and joy of faith—probably 'progress' in the Christian life, and the 'joy' which always accompanies growth, both progress and joy being derived from 'faith,' the unique condition of Christian life"—BEET.

26. That your glorying may abound in Christ Jesus in me through my presence with you again (R.V.). "S. Paul's presence once more at Philippi after his imprisonment will give to the Christians there in his person an increased confidence and exaltation in Christ. Thus will his continued life increase his readers' faith in God, and consequently their joy and their spiritual growth"—BEET.

27. Only—"be careful for this, and nothing else. Stand fast in one spirit—with the most perfect unanimity. Striving together—with united strength and endeavours—for the faith of the gospel—for all the blessings revealed and promised therein"—WESLEY.

Only let your manner of life, etc. (R.V.). The Greek verb is derived from the word meaning "city," and may be rendered, "Let your life of Christian citizenship be worthy of the gospel." That whether I come—as in vers. 25, 26, he wrote he surely would—or be absent—which, for a time at least, he must be—I may hear of your state during my absence. The structure of the sentence is not strictly grammatical, but the meaning is quite clear: "If present, let me see, and if absent, let me hear that ye stand fast." In one spirit. (Comp. Acts 4. 32.) "The practical community of spirit"—DE WETTE. With one soul striving together. The Greek word is that from which our word "athlete" is derived. For the faith—for its spread among men.

28. Which—"namely, their being adversaries to the word of God, and to you the messengers of God—is an evident token—that they are on the high road to perdition; and you, in the way of salvation"—WESLEY.

And in nothing affrighted by the adversaries—the open and avowed opponents of the Philippians in their "contending for the faith." Which is for them an evident token of perdition. "The fearlessness of the persecuted will be to their enemies a proof that eternal ruin awaits them. For it will reveal supernatural help given to the persecuted, and thus prove that God is with them, and that consequently their opponents are fighting against God"—BEET. "Whenever the persecutors fail to triumph over the persecuted, the plotters over the plotted-against, the tyrants over the tyrannised, is it not thence plain that they will perish?"—CHRYSOSTOM. But of your salvation—for the God who is against them, is for you. And that from God—"refers not immediately to the word 'salvation,' but to the whole previous idea of opposition met in a way to encourage faith. God Himself has ordained the circumstances, and given the union and courage"—MOULE.

29. For to you it is given—"as a token of God's love, and of your being in the way of salvation"—WESLEY.

The "token" of the last verse was "truly not a human but a Divine token"—VAN HENGEL. In proof of this, S. Paul mentions that it was God who caused his readers to believe on Christ, thereby separating them from unbelievers; and that it was God who permitted them to suffer in His behalf at the hands of unbelievers, that the victory over persecution might be a "token" to them of the final victory over all evil which will ensure eternal salvation.

30. "Having the same kind of conflict with your adversaries, which ye saw in me—when I was with you (Acts 16. 12, 19, etc.)"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul's intention in thus speaking is to bring home to them the high dignity and distinction of suffering for Christ, which is involved in the consciousness of fellowship in conflict with the apostle"—MEYER. "He does not say 'ye heard,' but ye saw, for he sustained a conflict even in Philippi"—CHRYSOSTOM. "One of the probable recipients of this letter, the jailor, had not only seen but inflicted other sufferings in the dungeon."—MOULE.

CHAPTER II.

1. If there be therefore any consolation—"in the grace of Christ. If any comfort—in the love of God. If any fellowship of the Holy Ghost; if any bowels of mercies— resulting therefrom; any tender affection towards each other"—WESLEY.

In ver. 30 of the previous chapter he has spoken of his readers as sharing his "conflict"; he now urges them to "fulfil his joy" (see next verse), and they are to do this by cultivating that unity which he has mentioned in ver. 27. BEET thus paraphrases the verse: "If there is anything in Christ moving you to yield to my request, if my sufferings claim that consolation which love is ever ready to give, if the Holy Spirit whom ye have received as the animating principle of a new life is a spirit of brotherhood, if in your hearts suffering can evoke tenderness and pity," etc.

2. Think the same thing—"seeing Christ is your common Head. Having the same love—to God, your common Father. Being of one soul—animated with the same affections and tempers, as ye have all drank into one Spirit. Of one mind—tenderly rejoicing and grieving together"—WESLEY.

Fulfil ye my joy. "If the readers will yield to S. Paul's request, nothing will be wanting to make him 'full of joy.' We have here again the golden thread of 'joy' which runs through and illumines this Epistle"—BEET. Of the same mind. The weak point of the Philippian Christians was a lack of unity. Having the same love—"alike loving and being loved"—CHRYSOSTOM. Of one accord, of one mind, or "with accordant souls minding the one thing"—like sympathies, and cordial co-operation in all good things are meant; not necessarily identity of opinions.

3. Do nothing through contention—"which is inconsistent with your thinking the same thing—or vain glory—desire of praise, which is directly opposite to the love of God. But esteem each the others better than themselves—(for every one knows more evil of himself than he can of another). Which is a glorious fruit of the Spirit, and an admirable help to the continuing 'of one soul'"—WESLEY.

Lit. Nothing through faction, without a verb, and in structure like a motto. Lowliness of mind—"essentially a Christian grace. The world's 'poor-spirited' and the Lord's 'poor in spirit' are phrases used in very different tones"—MOULE. Each counting other better than himself. The lowly man is "so conscious of his dependence on God, and of his own imperfections and nothingness, that his own gifts only remind him that others must have gifts also, while his sense of his own utter nothingness suggests to him that these gifts may well be superior to his own, and higher in nature and degree"—ELLICOTT.

4. Aim not everyone at his own things—"only—if so, ye have not bowels of mercies"—WESLEY.

From humility S. Paul goes on to speak of unselfishness. (Comp. Gal. 6. 1. 2, where the same virtues are associated.) But also. The "also" sanctions some reasonable amount of attention to one's own interest. Indeed, the Christian teaching everywhere recognises the true egoism as well as the true altruism.

5. Have this mind, etc. From this point to ver. 11, S. Paul presents the great renunciation of Christ as the supreme example of that unselfishness to which he has exhorted the Philippians in ver. 4. There are no greater writings in the whole of the sacred canon than those of S. Paul; and there is no greater passage in the Pauline writings than that on the threshold of which we here stand. And let us remember that this great theological passage occurs as an illustration and confirmation of a moral precept. There is a modern demand for the severance of Christian morality from Christian theology; many persons regarding them as really distinct, and affecting to "hold to the one and despise the other." As MOULE well says: "Such a theory rends asunder the teaching of the New Testament, as to its most characteristic and vital elements." Christ Jesus. See under ch. 1. 6 of this Epistle. The self-limitation of the Eternal Son occupies S. Paul's mind, and dictates the order of the names.

6. "Who being in the essential form—the incommunicable nature—of God—from eternity, as He was afterwards in the form of man; real God, as real man. Counted it no act of robbery—that is the precise meaning of the words, no invasion of another's prerogative, but His own strict and unquestionable right—to be equal with God. The word here translated 'equal,' occurs in the adjective form five or six times in the New Testament. (Comp. Matt. 20. 12; Luke 6. 34; John 5. 18; Acts 11. 17; Rev. 21. 16.) In all which places it expresses not a bare resemblance, but a real and proper equality. It here implies both the fulness and the supreme height of the Godhead, to which are opposed, He 'emptied' and He 'humbled Himself'"—WESLEY.

Who being (R.V. margin, "being originally." The usage of the Greek word scarcely supports this rendering, but the eternal preexistence of the Son is taught in other passages—e.g. John 1. 1.) In the form of God. Some have attempted to dilute these words into a merely Arian statement concerning Christ. But the use of the same phrase in the next verse, "the form of a servant," together with the undoubted meaning of the Greek word, forbid such a treatment. The phrase "does express as much as 'God of God' and 'Son of God'"—ELLICOTT. The form "is the utterance of the inner life" (TRENCH) of whatever exists. "Though form is not the same as 'essence,' yet the possession of the 'form' involves participation in the 'essence' also"—LIGHTFOOT. Counted it not a prize (R.V. margin, "a thing to be grasped")—"to be on an equality with God" (R.V.). Owing to the difficulty of determining the exact meaning of the Greek word here rendered "prize" (an exceedingly rare word found only once in the Bible and once in Greek secular writings), no paraphrase of this verse can be offered with entire confidence in its accuracy. The A.V., translating the word as robbery, seems to mean, "In subsisting as the equal of God, Christ was aware that He was enjoying His just and rightful dignity; and yet," etc. MOULE paraphrases: "He dealt with His true and rightful equality, not as a thing held anxiously, and not only for Himself, as the gains of force or fraud are held, but as a thing in regard of which a most gracious sacrifice and surrender was possible for us and our salvation." ELLICOTT: "He did not deem the being on an equality with God a thing to be seized on, a state to be exclusively clutched at, and retained as a prize." BEET'S rendering has the great advantage of presenting the active meaning which the form of the Greek noun certainly suggests, "He did not count His equality with God (a means of) high-handed self-enrichment." MEYER and HOFMANN also "interpret the passage to mean that the Son did not look upon His Divine powers as a means of self-enrichment. They understand this passage to describe the Son contemplating His own Divine powers, in view of His approaching entrance into the world. He did not look upon His equality with God as a means of laying hold for Himself, after becoming man, of the good things of earth—wealth, enjoyment, power; but instead of this laid aside the form of God, i.e. the assertion of His Divine powers, and took His lot merely as a man among men. Christ thus presents an infinite contrast to the gods of Homer, who ever used their superhuman powers for their own enjoyment"—BEET. Whichever of these views we may adopt, the point of the illustration must not be lost sight of, Christ did not "look upon" His "own things" (viz. His equality with God), but on "the things of others" (viz. the needs of men).

7. Yet—"He was so far from tenaciously insisting upon, that He willingly relinquished, His claim. He was content to forego the glories of the Creator, and to appear in the form of a creature; nay, to be made in the likeness of fallen creatures; and not only to share the disgrace, but to suffer the punishment, due to the meanest and vilest amongst them all. He emptied Himself—of that Divine fulness, which He received again at His exaltation. Though He remained 'full' (John 1. 14), yet He appeared as if He had been 'empty'; for He veiled His fulness from the sight of men and angels. Yea, He not only veiled, but in some sense renounced, the glory which He had before the world began. Taking—and by that very act emptying Himself—the form of a servant—the 'form,' the 'likeness,' the 'fashion,' though not exactly the same, are yet nearly related to each other. 'The form' expresses something absolute; 'the likeness' refers to other things of the same kind; 'the fashion' respects what appears to sight and sense. Being made in the likeness of men—a real man, like other men. Hereby He took 'the form of a servant'"—WESLEY.

This verse sets forth the "exact opposite of counting His equality with God a means of self-enrichment. Himself—emphatic. A grasping hand frequently empties those on whom it is laid. So did the hand of the Eternal Son; but it was upon Himself that the violent hand was laid"—BEET. He emptied Himself—a profound saying. We can adore the fact, but not explain the process. "He divested Himself, not of His Divine nature, for this was impossible, but of the glories, the prerogatives of Deity. This He did by taking upon Him the form of a servant"—LIGHTFOOT. We must not "shrink from applying the term humiliation to our Lord's Person as Divine; not to His Divinity, which is immutable Eternal Spirit, but to His Person as Divine-human, and therefore to the Divinity as hiding, for a season, the manifestation of its glory under the veil of the flesh"—W. B. POPE. "If any man doubt how Christ emptied Himself, the text will satisfy him, by taking the form of a servant; if any still question how He took the form of a servant, he hath the apostle's resolution, by being made in the likeness of men"—PEARSON.

8. And being found in fashion as a man—"a common man, without any peculiar excellence or comeliness—He humbled Himself—to a still greater depth; becoming obedient—to God, though equal with Him. Even unto death—the greatest instance both of humiliation and obedience. Yea, the death of the cross—inflicted on few but servants or slaves"—WESLEY.

Being found in fashion as. The phraseology seems to mark the transition of S. Paul's thought, from the self-limitation of the Eternal Son of God to the humiliation and sufferings of the historical Jesus. "The fashion as a man was the outward guise of humanity, a visible clothing bearing only a distant relation to the actual nature of the Son. In this outward guise, by those who sought Him, the Incarnate Son was 'found'"—BEET. "Humbled Himself—refers to the acts of condescension and humiliation in that human nature which He emptied Himself to assume"—ELLICOTT. "Not only did He, when He was God, assume human nature, but, in that human nature, He did deeply humble Himself"—BULL. "Becoming obedient. Having laid aside the manifestation of His Divine powers and become man, the Son entered also the path of obedience, the normal moral state of man. As far as to death—the extent of Christ's obedience"—BEET. "Even death upon a cross. Not only death, but a death of suffering, shameful and accursed"—ELLICOTT. "For this was thought to be the most shameful death of all, full of dishonour, accursed"—CHRYSOSTOM. (Comp. the remark of CICERO, "Far be the very name of a cross, not only from the bodies of Roman citizens, but from their imagination, eyes, and ears.")

9. Wherefore—"because of His voluntary humiliation and obedience, He humbled Himself; but God hath exalted Him—so recompensing His humiliation. And hath given Him—so recompensing His emptying Himself —a name which is above every name—dignity and majesty superior to every creature"—WESLEY.

This verse describes "the exaltation of Christ, by the description of which, grand in its simplicity, His example becomes all the more encouraging and animating"—MEYER. God highly exalted Him—for example in the resurrection and ascension; but more is meant. On account of His deep humiliation, He received this high exaltation. A Name—"The thought is, 'God has, by His exaltation, granted to Him that the name Jesus Christ surpasses all names in glory'"—MEYER.

10. That every knee—"that Divine honour might be paid in every possible manner by every creature—might bow—either with love or trembling. Of those in heaven, earth, under the earth—that is, through the whole universe"—WESLEY.

That in the name (R.V.)—not "at the name" (A.V.). The custom of bowing at every mention of our blessed Lord, observed by some Christians, has been supposed to find support in this passage. The R.V. (and correct) rendering has no such reference. "It denotes the spiritual sphere, the holy element, as it were, in which every prayer is to be offered, and every knee to bow"—ELLICOTT. Every knee bow—"graphic delineation of the act of worship"—BEET. Of things in heaven, etc. "Angels, living men and buried men"—ALFORD. "Angels, men, and lost spirits"—CHRYSOSTOM. But it is far better to regard the words as a rhetorical expansion of the one word all, than to assign a definite meaning to each clause; especially as the Pauline teaching on Christ and the universe is presented in its fullest development in this group of Epistles.

11. And every tongue—"even of His enemies—confess that Jesus Christ is Lord—Jehovah; not now 'in the form of a servant,' but enthroned in the glory of God the Father"—WESLEY.

Some find in this verse an allusion to the spirits of the lost acknowledging the Lordship of Jesus, and confessing the justice of their sentence. But it is improbable that such a detail was present to the apostle's mind. (See note on ver. 10.) The diction is still rhetorical, and the word all continues to dominate the passage. Confess or "openly avow." But in the New Testament Greek the word implies also praise and thanksgiving. Jesus Christ. (See note on ch. 1. 6.) The exaltation of the Son of Man is the thought; hence the order of the names. To the glory, etc. "As ever, S. Paul rises from the Son to the Father. (Comp. 1 Cor. 15. 28; Eph. 1. 12-14)"—BEET.

12. Wherefore—"having proposed Christ's example, he exhorts them to secure the salvation which Christ has purchased—as ye have always—hitherto—obeyed—both God and me His minister. Now in my absence—when ye have not me to instruct, assist, and direct you —work out your own salvation. Herein let every man aim at his own things. With fear and trembling—with the utmost care and diligence"—WESLEY.

As ye did always obey. When I was with you in Philippi. Not as in my presence only (comp. ch. 1. 27), but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation. "Your own" is very emphatic in the original. "The apostle is, in fact, bidding them 'learn to walk alone,' instead of leaning too much on his presence and personal influence. 'Do not make me your proxy in spiritual duties which must be your own. Hence the 'much more' of the previous clause; his absence was the occasion for a far fuller realisation of their own personal obligation and resources in the spiritual life"—MOULE. Work out—lit. "be working out" by watchfulness, prayer, faith, and effort day by day. With fear and trembling—"'with anxiety and self-distrust' is a nearer representation of this Pauline phrase than the literal English, as appears by the use of the same phrase in 1 Cor. 2. 3; 2 Cor. 7. 15; Eph. 6. 5. The 'fear' is a fear of failure, the 'trembling' an eager anxiety"—CONYBEARE.

13. For it is God—"God alone who is with you, though I am not—that worketh in you according to His good pleasure. Not for any merit of yours. Yet His influences are not to supersede but to encourage our own efforts. Work out your own salvation. Here is our duty. For it is God that worketh in you. Oh what a glorious encouragement, to have the arm of Omnipotence stretched out for our support and our succour"—WESLEY.

The teaching of this and the previous verse is deeply instructive. There have been many who have proclaimed that the whole truth about salvation is that man must will it, and work it out for himself. On the other hand, there have been many who have practically ignored human will and effort, laying the whole stress on the decrees and effectual workings of God. And it has been widely supposed that either one of these views must exclude the other. To the finite mind this is so. But the Christian soul, mysteriously sharing the life of the Infinite, has access to truths which transcend our finite reason, and is profoundly conscious of the ultimate harmony of these apparently opposed ideas. The free will of man and the absolute sovereignty of God contradict one another in terms only, and represent two sides of one eternal and glorious truth. All this is a fair inference from the association of them by S. Paul in these two verses.

14. Do all things—"not only without contention (ver. 3), but even without murmurings and disputings—which are real, though smaller, hindrances of love"—WESLEY.

All things—as always, S. Paul's exhortation is comprehensive. Without murmurings—"as to whether you are under any obligation thereto, whether it is not too difficult, whether it is prudent, and the like"—MEYER. "About the duties of others, and the rights of self"—MOULE.

15. That ye may be blameless—"before men—and simple—before God, aiming at Him alone. As the sons of God—the God of love; acting up to your high character. Unrebukable in the midst of a crooked—guileful, serpentine, and perverse generation—such as the bulk of mankind always were. Crooked—by a corrupt nature, and yet more perverse by custom and practice"—WESLEY.

Among whom ye are seen as lights in the world. The verb in the Greek is used of the rising of stars. "The saints, in the beautiful light of holiness, were to rise star-like upon the dark sky of surrounding sin"—MOULE. Lights (R.V. margin, "luminaries"). (Comp. Matt. 5. 14–16.)

16. Holding forth the word of life—"as if with outstretched arm; a word not uncommon for one holding to another's lips food and drink"—BEET. That I may rejoice, etc. "He looks forward to a special recognition of his converts at Philippi, at the Lord's coming, and to a special 'joy of harvest' over them"—MOULE.

17. "Here he begins to treat of the latter clause of ch. 1. 22. Yea, and if I be offered—lit. 'if I be poured out'—upon the sacrifice of your faith. The Philippians, as the other converted heathens, were a sacrifice to God through S. Paul's ministry. (Rom. 15. 16.) And, as in sacrificing, wine was poured at the foot of the altar, so he was willing that his blood should be poured out. The expression well agrees with that kind of martyrdom by which he was afterwards offered up to God"—WESLEY.

Yea, and if I am poured out as a drink-offering upon the sacrifice and service of your faith. "He takes up the last word characteristically. 'Laboured for you, did I say? Nay, but if I have also to say died, poured out my heart's blood, it is only joy to me.' The imagery is sacrificial. He views the Philippians as an altar sacrifice, a burnt-offering, in their character of consecrated believers; and upon that sacrifice, the drink-offering, the libation, the outpoured wine, is S. Paul's life-blood, S. Paul as their missionary martyr"—MOULE. (Comp. Num. 15. 3, 10.) With you all—"for such a martyr death concerned them all"—MEYER.

18. Congratulate me—"when I am offered up"—WESLEY.

"That I am counted worthy to win the martyr's crown, and that blessing will result to you therefrom."

19. When I know—"upon my return, that ye stand steadfast"—WESLEY.

I also. In ch. 1. ver. 12, etc., he has written words calculated to comfort the Philippians concerning his state; and now hopes that in return equally cheering news will reach him concerning the state of his readers.

20. I have none—"of those who are now with me"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul has no one in whom care for the Philippians kindles the same emotions as in Timothy"—BEET. Naturally (R.V. margin, "Genuinely"). "With that genuineness of feeling which befits the relationship between the apostle and his converts"—ELLICOTT.

21. For all—"but Timotheus—seek their own—ease, safety, pleasure, or profit. Amazing! In that golden age of the Church, could S. Paul thoroughly approve of one only, among all the labourers that were with him? (Ch. 1. 14, 17.) And how many do we think can now approve themselves to God? Not the things of Jesus Christ. They who seek these alone, will sadly experience this. They will find few helpers likeminded with themselves, willing naked to follow a naked Master!"—WESLEY.

All—who were available as messengers to Philippi. These with the single exception of Timothy, sought their own. "The reason here given implies that self-seeking unfits a man to be a reliable witness of the spiritual life of others. For all selfishness dims spiritual vision, and thus veils to us spiritual things good or bad. Therefore selfish men cannot bring to S. Paul a trustworthy report"—BEET.

22. As a son with his father. "He uses an elegant peculiarity of phrase, speaking partly as of a son, partly as of a fellow-labourer"—WESLEY.

But ye know the proof of him—"the tried character of him"—ELLICOTT. For Timothy had laboured in Philippi, in furtherance of the gospel.

23. Him therefore I hope to send forthwith, as soon as I shall see how it will go with me (R.V.)—as soon as he knows the result of his trial.

24. But I trust in the Lord, or "am confident," etc. Shortly—no great time after Timothy.

25. To send Epaphroditus—"back immediately. Your messenger—the Philippians had sent him to S. Paul with their liberal contribution"—WESLEY.

Beyond this passage nothing is known of Epaphroditus. The theory that he is identical with Epaphras (Col. 1. 7, etc.) has no adequate support. Observe the five titles S. Paul here gives him: Brother, fellow- worker, fellow-soldier, messenger, and minister-to-need. Epaphroditus evidently stood high in S. Paul's regard.

26. He was full of heaviness—"because he supposed you would be afflicted at hearing that he was sick"—WESLEY.

This verse explains why S. Paul counted it necessary to send on Epaphroditus, instead of keeping him back as a travelling companion for Timothy. Longed after you all. The meaning is almost that of our English phrase "homesick." Was sore troubled (R.V.). "Epaphroditus earnestly wished to return to the brethren at Philippi, in order that their anxiety might be dispelled by seeing him in good health. How they heard of his sickness, and how he knew that they had heard, we do not know. But communication between Rome and the Roman colony of Philippi, along the splendid Egnatian road, would be, if not regular, yet frequent. Notice a genuine trait of excellence. Many are glad for others to know of their sickness or trouble, especially if caused by service done for them. But this good man was sorry that, through their hearing of it, his own trouble had caused trouble to others"—BEET.

27. God had compassion on him—"restoring him to health"—WESLEY.

For indeed he was sick—the report was true—nigh unto death—lit. "as neighbour side by side of death." God had mercy. Not that death is a curse; but "those who are departed this life, can no longer win souls" —CHRYSOSTOM. Sorrow on sorrow. "He does not profess the apatheia of the Stoics, as though he was of iron, and free from human affections"—CALVIN.

28. That I may be the less sorrowful—"when I know you are rejoicing"—WESLEY.

"A beautiful touch of character. Among his sorrows, he intimates, was his being the unwilling cause of separating Epaphroditus from the Philippians, and bringing him into risks at Rome. To think of him as safely returned to Philippi would be a solace, though it would be a new separation for himself. Under the shadow of that last thought, perhaps, he says not happier, but less sorrowful"—MOULE.

29. Hold such in honour. (Comp. 1 Thess. 5. 12, 13.) The reason why they should do so is given in the next verse.

30. To supply your deficiency of service —"to do what you could not do in person"— WESLEY.

He hazarded his life (R.V.).—"he gambled with his life"—LIGHTFOOT. He was equally ready to keep or lose it for the work of Christ. That which was lacking—"the personal presence of the Philippian Christians" —BEET. "How delicate and winning, and at the same time how enlisting their grateful sympathy in the fate of Epaphroditus, was it to represent the absence of the Philippians as something that had been lacking in that service, and therefore as something which Paul had 'missed,' to supply which, as representative of the Church, the man had (as his deadly sickness had actually shown) hazarded his life"—MEYER.

CHAPTER III.

1. The same things—"which you have heard before"—WESLEY.

Finally, or "as to the rest," Rejoice—the keyword of the Epistle. A new topic is now abruptly opened. Same things — the things about to be mentioned. But as they are here mentioned for the first time in this Epistle, MEYER and BEET conclude that S. Paul had enlarged upon them in an earlier Epistle, now lost. It is safe that S. Paul should repeat the contents of that Epistle, and he does not find it "irksome" to do so.

2. Beware of dogs — "unclean, unholy, rapacious men. The title which the Jews usually gave the Gentiles, he returns upon themselves. The concision—circumcision being now ceased, the apostle will not call them the circumcision, but coins a term on purpose, taken from a Greek word used by the LXX. (Lev. 21. 5) for such a cutting as God had forbidden"—WESLEY.

Beware—"look to," "observe," with a view to avoiding them. Dogs—impure, unclean. (Comp. Matt. 7. 6.) Evil workers—"they, in fact, laboured in opposition to the fundamental doctrine of justification by faith"— MEYER.

3. For we—"Christians—are the only true circumcision — the people now in covenant with God. Who worship God in spirit— not barely in the letter, but with the spiritual worship of inward holiness — and glory in Christ Jesus—as the only cause of all our blessings—and have no confidence in the flesh—in any outward advantage or prerogative"—WESLEY.

The thought of this verse is fully brought out in the Epistle to the Galatians. For we are the circumcision, "and that is why I could not apply the word to the evil workers, and was compelled to call them the concision." Who worship by the Spirit of God (R.V.) and glory in Christ Jesus, etc.— "not in our own privileges and legal performances as those false teachers do, who place their confidence in what is fleshly, i.e. in that which belongs to material human nature and has nothing in common with the Divine blessings of the Christian, such as circumcision, descent, outward observance of the Law. (Comp. vers. 4-6)"—MEYER.

4. Though I. "He subjoins this in the singular number, because the Philippians could not say thus"—WESLEY.

In order to test the worth of confidence in the flesh, S. Paul brings forward his own case. Ceasing to regard himself for the moment as a Christian, he describes his standing and advantages in relation to Judaism, "in order to measure himself with his Judaistic opponents on their own ground of proud confidence, and thereupon (in ver. 7, etc.) yet again to abandon this standpoint, and to make those Israelitish advantages vanish into nothing before the light of his vital position as a Christian"—MEYER.

5. Circumcised the eighth day—"not at ripe age, as a proselyte. Of the tribe of Benjamin—sprung from the wife, not the handmaid. An Hebrew of Hebrews—by both my parents; in everything, nation, religion, language. Touching the Law, a Pharisee—one of that sect who most accurately observe it"—WESLEY.

Lit. In respect of circumcision an eighth-day one—and thereby distinguished from Ishmaelites ("the Arabians circumcise after the thirteenth year, because Ishmael was circumcised at that age"—JOSEPHUS) and proselytes, who might be circumcised as adults. Of the stock of Israel—"a descendant of Jacob"—MEYER. Of the tribe of Benjamin—"one of the two most illustrious of the tribes"—ELLICOTT. "A Hebrew born of Hebrew parents, so that his mother also was a Hebrew woman"—MEYER.

6. "Having such a zeal for it as to persecute to the death those who did not observe it. Touching the righteousness which is described and enjoined by the Law—that is, external observances, blameless"—WESLEY.

The last clause of ver. 5, and the two clauses of this set forth "his distinguished personal position in Judaism, in a threefold climactic gradation"—MEYER. He was "a Pharisee, a zealous Pharisee, and a blameless Pharisee"—ELLICOTT. Blameless—same Greek word as in ch. 2. 15, where the "blame of men" is meant. And so here. S. Paul's conduct was such that men could find no fault with it. "His title, or temptation to 'confidence in the flesh' was thus compounded of a natal right to the seal of the covenant; hereditary and educated loyalty to the purest Jewish life and practice; personal devotion to the strictest Jewish religionism; the utmost practical energy in its defence; the most minute attention to its rules. Of its kind the position was perfect"—MOULE.

7. "But all these things, which I then accounted gain, which were once my confidence, my glory, and joy—those, ever since I have believed—I have accounted loss—nothing worth in comparison of Christ"—WESLEY.

"He does not mean that he discovered his circumcision, ancestry, energy, diligence, exactness, to be in themselves evil things. But he found them evil in respect of his having used them to shut out the true Messiah from his obedience, faith, and love. As substitutes for HIM they were not only worthless, but positive loss. Every day of reliance on them had been a day of delay and deprivation in regard to the supreme blessing"—MOULE.

8. "Yea, I still account both all these and all things else to be mere loss, compared to the inward, experimental knowledge of Christ, as my Lord, as my Prophet, Priest, and King, as teaching me wisdom, atoning for my sins, and reigning in my heart. To refer this to justification only, is miserably to pervert the whole scope of the words. They manifestly relate to sanctification also; yea, to that chiefly. For whom I have actually suffered the loss of all things—which the world loves, esteems, or admires; of which I am so far from repenting, that I still account them but dung. The discourse rises. Loss is sustained with patience, but 'dung' is cast away with abhorrence. The Greek word signifies any, the vilest refuse of things, the dross of metals, the dregs of liquors, the excrements of animals, the most worthless scraps of meat, the basest offals, fit only for dogs. That I may gain Christ. He that loses all things, not excepting himself, gains Christ, and is gained by Christ. And still there is more; which even S. Paul speaks of his having not yet gained"—WESLEY.

Excellency—more lit. "the surpassingness of the knowledge." My Lord. Notice the singular pronoun. S. Paul appropriates Christ for himself, in exchange for all he has given up. Dung—or refuse. Some so derive it as to give the meaning, "what is cast to the dogs." Gain Christ—"is to lay fast hold upon Him, to receive Him inwardly into our bosoms, and so to make Him ours and ourselves His, that we may be joined to Him as our Head, espoused to Him as our Husband, incorporated into Him as our Nourishment, engrafted in Him as our Stock, and laid upon Him as a sure Foundation"—Bishop HALL.

9. "And be found by God ingrafted in Him, not having my own righteousness, which is of the Law—that merely outward righteousness prescribed by the Law, and performed by my own strength — but that righteousness which is through faith—which can flow from no other fountain. The righteousness which is from God—from His almighty Spirit, not by my own strength, but by faith alone. Here also the apostle is far from speaking of justification only"—WESLEY.

Be found in Him—by other men during S. Paul's life, and especially by God on the day of judgment. Not having, etc. The teaching of Galatians and Romans is here tersely reproduced. (Carefully compare Rom. 3. 22; Gal. 2. 16; 3. 21; read also the great argumentative sections in which these passages occur, viz. Rom. ch. 1.-5, and Gal. 2. 3.)

10. "The knowledge of Christ, mentioned in ver. 8, is here more largely explained. That I may know Him—as my complete Saviour. And the power of His resurrection—raising me from the death of sin into all the life of love. And the fellowship of His sufferings— being crucified with Him. And made conformable to His death—so as to be dead to all things here below"—WESLEY.

Know Him—"practical and experimental, not merely speculative knowledge"—ELLICOTT. S. Paul then goes on to mention two things included in "knowing Him," the power of His resurrection—"the power of God which raised Christ from the dead. The intimate connection between the resurrection of Christ, the believer's present victory over sin, and moral elevation, and his final victory over the grave are ever present to S. Paul's thought"—BEET. And the fellowship, etc. "It is only in a participation in His sufferings that there can be one in His resurrection and glory. It is a sharing in the sufferings He suffered, a drinking from the cup He drank"—ELLICOTT. Being conformed, etc. "Every step towards a martyr's grave was making him more like Christ, who died on the cross"—BEET.

11. The resurrection of the dead—"that is, the resurrection to glory"—WESLEY.

"'For I am not yet,' he says, 'beyond feeling fear.' Thus humble-minded was he who says in another place, 'Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall'"—THEOPHYLACT.

12. Not that I have already attained—"the prize. He here enters on a new set of metaphors, taken from a race. But observe how, in the utmost fervour, he retains his sobriety of spirit. Or am already perfected. There is a difference between one that is perfect, and one that is perfected. The one is fitted for the race (ver. 15), the other, ready to receive the prize. But I pursue, if I may apprehend that—perfect holiness, preparatory to glory—for, in order to, which I was apprehended by Christ Jesus—appearing to me in the way. (Acts 26. 14.) The speaking conditionally, both here and in the preceding verse, implies no uncertainty, but only the difficulty of attaining"—WESLEY.

"By this I do not mean to say that I have already grasped it"—MEYER. Grasped what? The imagery is that of the racecourse, hence the prize is meant. "This prize typifies the bliss of Messiah's kingdom. And accordingly grasped (R.V. 'obtained') is to be explained of the having attained in ideal anticipation, in which the individual is as sure and certain of the future attainment of the prize as if it were already an accomplished fact. What, therefore, S. Paul denies of himself is the same imagination with which he reproaches the Corinthians in 1 Cor. 4. 8"—MEYER. Made perfect—"suggests that the prize S. Paul seeks is to be obtained by personal maturity. Since it is given in the Great Day (comp. 2 Tim. 4. 8)—S. Paul probably means here that it is not yet so secure to him as to be no longer an object of earnest effort"—BEET. I press on, etc.—"to grasp the crown, with the animating thought that Christ, in the hour of conversion, grasped him with the express purpose in view that he, through the path of faith and obedience, might be glorified at last"—MOULE.

13. "I do not account myself to have apprehended this already; to be already possessed of perfect holiness"—WESLEY.

Brethren. He affectionately repeats the foregoing statements. I . . . myself: so placed in the Greek as to mean "whatever others account themselves, I do not account myself," etc. But one thing! So the Greek. The R.V. supplies the words I do; MEYER, I think.

14. Forgetting the things that are behind—"even that part of the race which is already run. And reaching forth unto—lit. 'stretched out over the things that are before'—pursuing with the whole bent and vigour of my soul, perfect holiness and eternal glory. In Christ Jesus—the author and finisher of every good thing"—WESLEY.

S. Paul forgets the things behind, not in the sense of ceasing to be grateful for, or to learn lessons from them, but in the sense of avoiding a complacent resting in past achievements. Things before—all that part of the course which remains to be covered. S. Paul does not shrink from the future—it is so full of opportunity that he is eager for it. Goal—the end of the course. Prize—the victor's crown (comp. Rev. 2. 10 and 2 Tim. 4. 7, 8). High calling of God—"the calling which issued from God above in heaven"—MEYER. In Christ Jesus—may mean that the prize is given through Him; but, more probably, that the pressing forward takes place in Him.

15. Let us, as many as are perfect—"fit for the race, strong in faith; so it means here—be thus minded—apply wholly to this one thing. And if in anything ye—who are not perfect, who are weak in faith—be otherwise minded—pursuing other things—God, if ye desire it, shall reveal even this unto you—will convince you of it"—WESLEY.

Verse 13 implied that there were some in the Church who considered themselves perfect. S. Paul here gently reminds them of the obligations such a profession imposes, viz., that they should be likeminded with himself as regards humility and earnest perseverance. Dr. DIXON used to say that Christian perfection was "perfect humility." And if in anything, etc.—"if in any matter you do not share my self-estimate and earnest effort, even this error, God will dissipate by heavenly light"—BEET.

16. "But let us take care not to lose the ground we have already gained—let us walk by the same rule we have done hitherto"—WESLEY.

"Let us count as nothing our present attainments, and press forward; only in so doing let us pursue the direction in which we have attained our present position. So will all real progress, mental and spiritual, be along the lines of whatever progress we have already made"—BEET.

17. Mark them—"for your imitation"—WESLEY.

Be imitators of me—"not egotism or self-confidence, but absolute confidence in his message and its principles, and the consciousness that his life, by the grace of God, was moulded on those principles. In the present case he begs them to 'join in imitating' him in his renunciation of self-confidence and spiritual pride with their terrible risks"—MOULE.

18. Weeping—"as he wrote. Enemies of the cross of Christ—such are all cowardly, all shamefaced, all delicate Christians"—WESLEY. In the previous verse he has exhorted them to follow godly examples. In this verse he reminds them that evil examples are also set before them, and these they are to shun. These enemies of the cross were evidently professing Christians of an Antinomian type. Far from desiring the "fellowship of Christ's sufferings" (ver. 10), they desired self-indulgence (ver. 19). And as the cross of Christ is the symbol of suffering and unselfishness, they were clearly "enemies" of that cross. Weeping—both at the harm they do, and the ruin that is coming upon them. (Comp. Luke 19. 41–44.)

19. Whose end is destruction—"this is placed in the front, that what follows may be read with the greater horror. Whose god is their belly—whose supreme happiness lies in gratifying their sensual appetites. Who mind—'relish, desire, seek'—earthly things"—WESLEY.

Destruction (R.V. "Perdition")—to be lost, not to be annihilated. Belly. The word implies sensual appetites in general, not gluttony alone. Whose glory is their shame—their proudest boast is the very lawlessness which so degrades them. Who mind, etc. (Comp. Col. 3. 1.)

20. Our conversation. "The Greek word is of a very extensive meaning: our citizenship, our thoughts, our affections, are already in heaven"—WESLEY.

For our citizenship is in heaven; from whence also we wait for a Saviour (R.V.). For our, etc. "Our" is very emphatic, marking the contrast from the "enemies of the cross." "Our home in which we have municipal rights exists in heaven; and we are eagerly waiting for One from heaven who will rescue us from the perils and hardships around"—BEET.

21. Who will transform our vile body—"into the most perfect state, and the most beauteous form. It will then be purer than the unspotted firmament, brighter than the lustre of the stars, and, which exceeds all parallel, which comprehends all perfection, like unto His glorious body—like that wonderfully glorious body which He wears in His heavenly kingdom, and on His triumphant throne"—WESLEY.

Who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of His glory (R.V.). "To the ancient philosopher the body was merely the prison of the spirit; to the apostle it is its counterpart, destined to share with it, in profound harmony, the coming heaven. Not its essential nature, but its distorted condition in the fall, makes it now the clog of the renewed spirit; it shall hereafter be its wings"—MOULE. Body of His glory—"not according to the amount, but according to the kind of His glory, shall we be conformed"—THEODORET. According to, etc., "removes every doubt as to the possibility"—MEYER. God will be able to do these things, because He can do all things! In this verse S. Paul has been led to speak of the coming glory of the saints' bodies, on account of the present shame and abuse of the bodies of the sensualists in vers. 18, 19.

CHAPTER IV.

1. So stand—"as ye have done hitherto"—WESLEY.

Beloved. "His heart overflows as he turns from the sad view of sin and misbelief to these faithful and loving followers of the holy truth. He can hardly say the last word of love"—MOULE. My joy—"understood only by those who have children in the faith"—BEET. My crown—"the honour which accrued to the apostle from the excellent Christian condition of the Church is represented by him under the figure of a crown of victory"—MEYER.

2. I beseech. "He repeats this thrice, as if speaking to each face to face, and that with the utmost tenderness"—WESLEY.

"A special admonition to and for two meritorious women, through whose disagreement, the details of which are unknown to us, but which probably turned on differences of their working in the church, a scandal had occurred, and the standing fast in the Lord might more or less be imperilled"—MEYER.

3. And I entreat thee also, true yokefellow. "S. Paul had many fellow-labourers, but not many yokefellows. In this number was Barnabas first, and then Silas, whom he probably addresses here; for Silas had been his yokefellow at the very place. (Acts 16. 19.) Help those women who laboured together with me—lit. 'who wrestled.' The Greek word doth not imply preaching, or anything of that kind, but danger and toil endured for the sake of the gospel, which was also endured at the same time, probably at Philippi, by Clement and my other fellow-labourers. This is a different word from the former, and does properly imply fellow-preachers. Whose names, although not set down here, are in the book of life—as are those of all believers. An allusion to the wrestlers in the Olympic games, whose names were all enrolled in a book.

Reader, is thy name there? Then walk circumspectly, lest the Lord blot thee out of His book!"—WESLEY.

True yokefellow — "perhaps Epaphroditus"—LIGHTFOOT. But there is great force in the suggestion of MEYER who renders "genuine Syzygus." He thinks that S. Paul is addressing a prominent worker in the Philippian church (who no doubt had special influence with the two women) known by the name "Syzygus," a name meaning "yokefellow." By calling him true or genuine, he means rightly-named. This, of course, is no more than a theory, but it seems more satisfactory than the other explanations that have been proposed, especially as there are proper names given to the other persons mentioned in the passage. Clement. He was evidently a preacher, but we can gather nothing further about him. And the rest, etc., "who, though not named by me, nevertheless have their names in the book of life"—ELLICOTT.

4. Rejoice in the Lord, etc. Like the "leading motive" in some modern music, this theme is heard in the Epistle again and again.

5. Let your gentleness — "yieldingness, sweetness of temper, the result of joy in the Lord—be known—by your whole behaviour—to all men—good and bad, gentle and froward. Those of the roughest tempers are good-natured to some, from natural sympathy and various motives; a Christian, to all. The Lord—the judge, the rewarder, the avenger—is at hand—standeth at the door"—WESLEY.

Moderation is a translation which has proved very misleading, especially in reference to one matter concerning which this passage is often quoted. (R.V. "forbearance"; margin, "gentleness.") "Your gentle character as opposed to undue sternness"—MEYER. The Lord is at hand. (See ch. 1. 6, 10, and the notes.)

6. "Be anxiously careful for nothing. If men are not gentle towards you, yet neither on this, nor any other account, be careful, but pray. Carefulness and prayer cannot stand together. In everything—great and small—let your requests be made known. They who, by a preposterous shame or distrustful modesty, cover, stifle, or keep in their desires, as if they were either too small or too great, must be racked with care; from which they are entirely delivered, who pour them out with a free and filial confidence. To God. It is not always proper to disclose them to men. By supplication—which is the enlarging upon and pressing our petition—with thanksgiving—the surest mark of a soul free from care, and of prayer joined with true resignation. This is always followed by peace. Peace and thanksgiving are both coupled together. (Col. 3. 15)"—WESLEY.

In nothing be anxious (R.V.). S. Paul does not condemn "the forethought which enables us to guard against coming troubles, but the useless and painful care which merely brings the sorrows of to-morrow to spoil the pleasures of to-day"—BEET. (Comp. Matt. 6. 25–34.) In nothing, in everything — comprehensive precepts, as so often from S. Paul. With thanksgiving. "Thanks should be an element in our every approach to God, and be associated with every petition. Thus will memory of benefits and answers to prayer already received aid our prayers by stimulating a confident hope of good things to come"—BEET.

7. And the peace of God — "that calm, heavenly repose, that tranquillity of spirit, which God only can give—which surpasseth all understanding—which none can comprehend, save he that receiveth it—shall keep—shall guard, as a garrison does a city—your hearts—your affections. Your minds—your understandings, and all the various workings of them—through the Spirit and power of Christ Jesus, in the knowledge and love of God. Without a guard set on these likewise, the purity and vigour of our affections cannot long be preserved"—WESLEY.

Shall keep (R.V. "Shall guard"), as with military power. This promise is conditional upon obedience to the precept of the foregoing verse. He whose trust in God is so full that he is "anxious in nothing" alone realises the full meaning of being guarded by God's peace. Our "prayers and supplications" may or may not be answered in the way we wish; but we shall find peace in knowing that they will be answered in the way that is best. Hearts and thoughts. "The heart is the seat of the thoughts"—BENGEL. "In Christ Jesus, who is the one true spiritual region of blessing, the peace of God shall protect the soul against its foes"—MOULE.

8. Finally—"to sum up all—whatsoever things are true. Here are eight particulars placed in two fourfold rows—the former containing their duty; the latter, the commendation of it. The first word in the former row answers the first in the latter; the second word, the second; and so on. True — in speech. Honest — in action. Just — with regard to others. Pure—with regard to yourselves. Lovely—and what more lovely than truth? Of good report—as is honesty, even where it is not practised. If there be any virtue — and all virtues are contained in justice. If there be any praise — in those things which relate rather to ourselves than to our neighbour. Think on these things—that ye may both practise them yourselves, and recommend them to others"—WESLEY.

"So many things as suggests number and variety in each of the following classes. Notice the stately sixfold repetition. True—words, acts, and disposition, corresponding with reality, especially with the eternal realities. It includes, but is much wider than, truthfulness. Honourable — suggests the dignity which pertains to conduct worthy of Christ. Righteous—agreeing with the authoritative standard of human conduct. Pure—unstained by evil of any kind. Lovely—denotes the attractive sweetness of Christian excellence. Of good report—whatever sounds well when spoken of"—BEET. If there be any virtue and . . . praise. "If there be any intrinsic human excellence, and if there be among men any recognition of its worth"—BEET. Think on these things. "Take them to heart, in order (ver. 9) to determine your conduct accordingly"—MEYER. "Thought comes first, then action follows"—CALVIN. Much might profitably be said on the ethics of thinking. One must think worthily to live worthily. No mind can dwell much on the impure and un-Christlike without grave moral peril. There is perhaps no higher state of grace than that in which sins of thought have ceased. The teaching of 2 Cor. 10. 5 often requires emphasising.

9. The things which ye have learned—"as catechumens—and received—by continual instructions—and heard and seen—in my life and conversation. These do, and the God of peace shall be with you—not only the peace of God, but God himself, the fountain of peace"—WESLEY.

"Happy they who can speak thus to their pupils. Such can with authority say, do these things"—BEET. And the God of peace shall be with you—the same promise, resting upon the same condition (though the wording is different) as the promise of Christ in John 14. 23.

10. I rejoiced greatly—"S. Paul was no Stoic: he had strong passions, but all devoted to God. That your care of me hath flourished again—as a tree blossoms after the winter. Ye wanted opportunity—either ye had not plenty yourselves, or you wanted a proper messenger"—WESLEY.

Down to ver. 20 we have "some courteous expressions, as dignified as they are delicate, concerning the aid which he had received"—MEYER. We gather that to the trial of captivity had been added the further trial of poverty. The Philippians, hearing of this, sent help to the apostle, which he here gracefully acknowledges. That now at length—ground of S. Paul's joy. He rejoices far more in the proof of Christian character which the gift affords, than in the relief of his own distress. "At length—suggests delay, but not reproach; for the delay is at once and satisfactorily explained"—BEET. Ye lacked opportunity—until the journey of Epaphroditus to Rome afforded one, which was promptly embraced.

11. I have learned—"from God. He only can teach this. In everything, therewith to be content—joyfully and thankfully patient. Nothing less is Christian content. We may observe a beautiful gradation in the expressions, I have learned; I know; I am instructed; I can"—WESLEY.

Not that I speak in respect of want. "The expression of joy in ver. 10 might seem to be the voice of a starving man whose distress had been unexpectedly relieved. That this is the explanation of his glowing words, S. Paul denies"—BEET. I have learned—and to S. Paul, as to less renowned servants of God, the lesson was no doubt hard to master—in whatsoever state I am. Note again the comprehensiveness of statement so characteristic of S. Paul. Everywhere and always he is content.

12. I know how to be abased—"having scarce what is needful for my body—and to abound—having wherewith to relieve others also. Presently after, the order of the words is inverted, to intimate his frequent transition from scarcity to plenty, and from plenty to scarcity. I am instructed—lit. 'I am initiated' in that mystery, unknown to all but Christians. Both to be full and to be hungry—for one day. Both to abound and to want—for a longer season"—WESLEY.

In this verse S. Paul gives a fuller account of the lesson he has learned (ver. 11). In everything and in all things—characteristic of the thorough-going S. Paul (see note on ver. 11). There are many Christians who can trust and love God when they abound, but lose both love and trust when they are called upon to be abased and hungry. On the other hand, there are many whose spiritual life is strengthened by adversity, but sadly weakened by prosperity. These have not learned how to "abound" and "to be filled." S. Paul, however, was equally content in both situations. For how this came about, see next verse.

13. I can do all things—"even fulfil all the will of God"—WESLEY.

I can do all things in Him that strengtheneth me. By "all things" he means all the things referred to in the previous verse—abundance, want, etc. "In Him," i.e. "in Christ," the dominant thought of this group of Epistles. That strengtheneth me—for whoso shares the life of Christ our Head shares His strength withal. Taken by itself the previous verse might imply that S. Paul had reached the high state there described by the power of his own will, and by long-continued self-discipline; in which case many Christians, having dispositions very different from, and wills much weaker than S. Paul's, might well despair of doing likewise. But the addition of this verse places the matter in its true light, and reminds us that all of us may share S. Paul's experience, because all have access to the sufficient grace of Him that strengtheneth us.

14. Howbeit—or "nevertheless"—ye did well that ye did take a share in my affliction. He means, "Although I have learned to bear afflictions without murmuring, you have done well, and have shown a truly Christian spirit, in seeking to relieve it." Did take a share—for the money they sent doubtless represented self-denial on their part; while to forward it they had also to give up for a time their friend Epaphroditus. These trials gave them fellowship in S. Paul's affliction.

15. In the beginning of the gospel—"when it was first preached at Philippi. In respect of giving—on your part. And receiving—on mine"—WESLEY.

"He suggests with the same delicacy of love that their previous gifts would have sufficed without this gift to witness and seal their hearts' co-operation with him. 'You have done well in such participation; but indeed you had assured its existence before'"—MOULE.

16. In Thessalonica — ninety-two miles away. S. Paul only stayed there a few weeks, and yet his Philippians sent help to him twice during that short time.

17. Not that I desire—"for my own sake, the very gift which I receive of you"—WESLEY.

Not that I seek for the gift: but I seek for the fruit that increaseth to your account (R.V.). "His appreciation of it was prompted not by eagerness for money, but by eagerness for his readers' spiritual profit"—BEET. Increaseth—with each proof of unselfishness they give. To your account—a reference to the day of judgment, characteristic of S. Paul.

18. An odour of a sweet smell—"more pleasing to God than the sweetest perfumes to men"—WESLEY.

"He carries on the correction, begun in ver. 17, of a possible misunderstanding of his warm words. He must not be thought to 'spell' for future gifts, least of all now, so amply supplied as he is"—MOULE. An odour: a sacrifice—for the association of these ideas comp. Eph. 5. 2; also Gen. 8. 21, etc. His readers' kindness to S. Paul was also a sacrifice acceptable to God, in accordance with Matt. 25. 40.

19. All your need—"as ye have mine. According to His riches in glory—in His abundant, eternal glory"—WESLEY.

My God. Lightfoot remarks that this phrase (characteristic of S. Paul) is specially in point here; the apostle is thinking of what God on his behalf shall do for others. Every need of yours (R.V.)—according, etc.—"measure of the promised supply. This will not only come out of the wealth of God, but will correspond with its infinite abundance"—BEET.

20. Most scholars regard the doxology of which this verse consists as prompted by the preceding words. As, however, S. Paul has now reached the end of his task (except for the greetings and benediction of the next three verses), it is, perhaps, better to consider it as concluding and crowning with an outburst of praise this "epistle of joy." The change from "my God" in ver. 19 to our God in this verse favours the latter view.

21. The brethren which are with me—"apparently the apostle's personal companions as distinguished from the Christians resident in Rome, who are described in the following verse"—LIGHTFOOT.

23. Especially—for these saints were in closer personal contact with the prisoner than the other Christians of Rome, and hence had heard more about the gifts and graces of the Philippians, and of the letter which was about to be despatched to them. Cæsar's household—not, of course, Nero's own family, but officials and servants connected with his huge establishment. "S. Paul's words assert that even in the home of Nero, perhaps the most corrupt spot on earth, were Christians"—BEET. (Comp. Gal. 6. 18, where, however, the word "spirit" has a more special significance than here. See the note.)

THE EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS.

"COLOSSÆ was a city of the Greater Phrygia, not far from Laodicea and Hierapolis. Though S. Paul preached in many parts of Phrygia, yet he never had been at this city. It had received the gospel by the preaching of Epaphras, who was with S. Paul when he wrote this Epistle.

"It seems the Colossians were now in danger of being seduced by those who strove to blend Judaism, or heathen superstitions, with Christianity; pretending that God, because of His great majesty, was not to be approached but by the mediation of angels; and that there were certain rites and observances, chiefly borrowed from the Law, whereby these angels might be made our friends.

"In opposition to them, the apostle (1) commends the knowledge of Christ, as more excellent than all other, and so entire and perfect that no other knowledge was necessary for a Christian. He shows (2) that Christ is above all angels, who are only His servants; and that, being reconciled to God through Him, we have free access to Him in all our necessities.

WESLEY.

CHAPTER I.

1. An apostle—omitted in the opening verse of Philippians but inserted here, perhaps because S. Paul is about to speak authoritatively on the Colossian heresies. Through the will of God. (Comp. 1 Cor. 1. 1; 2 Cor. 1. 1; Eph. 1. 1; 2 Tim. 1. 1.) And Timothy, the brother. "Whether 'Timothy,' who is not mentioned in the twin letter to Ephesus, is mentioned here because of some special relation to Colossæ, we do not know, but the scantiness of our information leaves this quite possible. He may or may not have been S. Paul's penman"—BEET.

2. The saints. "This word expresses their union with God—and brethren—this, their union with their fellow-Christians"—WESLEY.

Saints—"the people consecrated to God, the Israel of the new covenant—and faithful brethren: this unusual addition is full of meaning. Some members of the Colossian church were shaken in their allegiance, even if they had not fallen from it. The apostle, therefore, wishes it to be understood that when he speaks of the saints, he means the true and steadfast members of the brotherhood. In this way he obliquely hints at the defection"—LIGHTFOOT. Colossæ—on the Lycus, in Phrygia. The church there was the least important of all the churches to which S. Paul wrote. Grace to you and peace. "Grace is the sum of all blessings that God bestows through Christ. Peace is the sum of all spiritual blessings that man receives and experiences; it is 'grace' in its fruit and realisation. S. Paul's whole gospel is in these two words. 'Grace' is his watchword as 'Love' is that of S. John"—FINDLAY.

3. We give thanks. "There is a near resemblance between this Epistle and those to the Ephesians and Philippians"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Rom. 1. 8; 1 Cor. 1. 4; Eph. 1. 15; Phil. 1. 3, etc.) The sincerity of these thanksgivings is shown by the omission of them in Galatians (a case in which occasion for thanksgiving did not exist). Praying always. The connection of the words in this verse is somewhat uncertain. Perhaps the best rendering is, we always give thanks to God concerning you, whenever we pray.

4. (Comp. Eph. 1. 15 and the note.) But here it is "love" toward the saints.

5. Ye heard before—"I wrote to you—in the word of truth, of the gospel—the true gospel preached to you"—WESLEY.

"Real significance of this faith and love; and therefore the ultimate reason of S. Paul's thanks—because of the hope, etc. All Christian hope is a germ developing into the glory of heaven; it is the dawn of the eternal day. And this is its real worth. In his readers' faith and love S. Paul saw a foretaste of eternal blessedness; and this prompted his thanks on their behalf"—BEET. The truth of the gospel—"the true and genuine gospel, as taught by Epaphras, and not the spurious substitute of these later pretenders"—LIGHTFOOT.

6. It bringeth forth fruit in all the world—"that is, in every place where it is preached. Ye knew the grace of God in truth—truly experienced the gracious power of God"—WESLEY.

"Which gospel is present among you—or, more fully, 'which has reached you, and is now present with you.' This suggests the good fortune of the Colossians in that the gospel had reached them, and the reality of the gospel which, like an overshadowing presence, is now among them. According as also in all the world it is—a larger fact, in harmony with that just stated. S. Paul carries out his readers' thought from the valley of the Lycus, where they had heard the gospel, to the wide world throughout which also the same gospel is, or exists, i.e. is heard and believed and gains victories. All the world—an hyperbole similar to that in Rom. 1. 8"—BEET. "According as also among you—another fact added to and in harmony with the foregoing. That the gospel is preached at Colossæ is part of a larger fact, viz., that it is preached throughout the world. S. Paul now adds that its good effects throughout the world are reproduced also at Colossæ"—BEET. "The comparison is thus doubled back, as it were, upon itself"—LIGHTFOOT.

7. The fellow-servant—"of Paul and Timotheus"—WESLEY.

"Epaphras—a Colossian (ch. 4. 12), who appears from this verse to have been one of the first, if not the first of the preachers of the gospel in Colossæ; he is again mentioned as being in prison with S. Paul at Rome (Philem. 23)"—ELLICOTT. Epaphras must not be confounded with Epaphroditus (Phil. 2. 25). Beloved fellow-servant . . . faithful minister: as the influence of teachers of heresy is increasing among the Colossians, S. Paul here bestows high praise upon Epaphras, a teacher of truth, in order that his influence also may be increased. "By these praises he shows the trustworthiness of the man"—THEODORET.

8. Your love in the Spirit—"your love wrought in you by the Spirit"—WESLEY.

This verse completes the account of the services rendered by Epaphras. In ver. 7 he is said to have declared the gospel to the Colossians on behalf of S. Paul; in this verse he is said to have declared to S. Paul the blessed result of his labours among them, on behalf of the Colossians.

9. We pray for you. "This was mentioned in general (ver. 3); but now more particularly. That ye may be filled with the knowledge of His will—of His revealed will. In all wisdom—with all the wisdom from above. And spiritual understanding—to discern by that light whatever agrees with, or differs from, His will"—WESLEY.

"For this cause—on account of all that has been said from ver. 4 onward"—MEYER. "Knowledge—a favourite word in the later Epistles of S. Paul. In all the four Epistles of the first Roman captivity it is an element in the apostle's opening prayer for his correspondents' wellbeing (Phil. 1. 9; Eph. 1. 17; Philem. 6, and here.) The greater stress which is thus laid on the contemplative aspects of the gospel may be explained partly by S. Paul's personal circumstances, partly by the requirements of the church. His enforced retirement and comparative leisure would lead his own thoughts in this direction, while, at the same time, the fresh dangers threatening the truth from the side of mystic speculation required to be confronted by an exposition of the gospel from a corresponding point of view"—LIGHTFOOT. His will—not only in reference to "what is to be believed," but also, and perhaps more particularly (THEODORET), to "what is to be done."

10. "That, knowing His whole will, ye may walk worthy of the Lord, unto all pleasing—so as actually to please Him in all things; daily increasing in the living, experimental knowledge of God, our Father, Saviour, Sanctifier"—WESLEY.

"The practical aim of the 'being filled' (ver. 9) is, 'that your behaviour may stand in morally appropriate relation to your belonging to Christ.' (Comp. Rom. 16. 2; Eph. 4. 1; Phil. 1. 27)"—MEYER. Bearing fruit, etc. This is "the first of three participial clauses describing further the worthy walk which S. Paul desires for his readers. To those who receive it the gospel communicates its own vitality and fruitfulness and growth. As it bears fruit in them, so they bear fruit in every good work, i.e. in beneficence of every kind. Knowledge of God—as in ver. 9, which it recalls. Just as there S. Paul desired for his readers full and complete knowledge of God in order that they may walk worthy of Christ their Master, so now, while speaking of the growth he desires to accompany this worthy walk, he mentions the full knowledge of God as the means by which this growth is to be wrought. This quick repetition of the same thought, viz. knowledge as a means of something beyond itself, gives to this thought great emphasis"—BEET.

11. Strengthened unto all patience and longsuffering, with joyfulness. "This is the highest point: not only to know, to do, to suffer, the whole will of God; but to suffer it to the end, not barely with 'patience,' but with thankful joy"—WESLEY.

Strengthened with all strength, according to the power of His glory—"the power which is the attribute of the glory of God indicates the measure and degree in which the Colossians will be strengthened. Glory—the Divine power and fulness as manifested to men"—ELLICOTT. Patience "expresses the more general idea of endurance; longsuffering always refers in the New Testament to the relation of patient tolerance towards offenders" —MEYER.

12. "Who, by justifying and sanctifying us, hath made us meet for glory"—WESLEY.

"So rejoicing ye will pour forth your thanksgiving to the universal Father, who prepared and fitted us all—you and us alike—to take possession of the portion which His goodness has allotted to us among the saints in the kingdom of light"—LIGHTFOOT. The Father—not the "universal Father" (LIGHTFOOT), but the Father of Jesus Christ, for the Son of His love is the central figure in the great passage extending from this point to ver. 23.

13. "Power detains reluctant captives; a kingdom cherishes willing subjects. His beloved Son—this is treated of in the fifteenth and following verses"—WESLEY.

"We were slaves in the land of darkness. God rescued us from this thraldom. He transplanted us thence, and settled us as free colonists in the kingdom of His Son, in the realms of light. The transference from darkness to light is here represented as a transference from an arbitrary tyranny (power), to a well-ordered sovereignty (kingdom)"—LIGHTFOOT. Power of darkness. (Comp. Eph. 6. 12.) It is characteristic of S. Paul to compare the present blessedness of his readers with their past degradation. The words "in light" at the close of the previous verse doubtless suggested to him this reference to the time when he and they walked in "darkness." The Son of His love—"who belongs to the love of God as its eternal personal object. The phrase fixes our attention on the relation of the Son to this unique attribute of the Father"—BEET.

14. In whom we have redemption. "This is treated of from the middle of ver. 18. The voluntary passion of our Lord appeased the Father's wrath, obtained pardon and acceptance for us, and, consequently, dissolved the dominion and power which Satan had over us through our sins. So that forgiveness is the beginning of redemption, as the resurrection is the completion of it"—WESLEY.

S. Paul has written the same words in Eph. 1. 7. (See the notes on that passage.) There, however, we find the important addition "through His blood." ELLICOTT speaks of the four degrees of redemption—"(a) payment of ransom for all; (b) admission into the Church; (c) exemption from the tyranny of sin here; (d) exemption from hell and death hereafter."

15. Who is. "By describing the glory of Christ, and His pre-eminence over the highest angels, the apostle here lays a foundation for the reproof of all worshippers of angels. The image of the invisible God—whom none can represent, but His Only-begotten Son; in His Divine nature the invisible image, in His human the visible image, of the Father. The First-begotten of every creature—that is, begotten before every creature; subsisting before all worlds, before all time, from all eternity"—WESLEY.

"There now follows, after a moment's pause, a detailed description of the person of Christ, His dignity, and His exaltation. This forms one of the three important passages in S. Paul's Epistles (Eph. 1. 20–23; Phil. 2. 6–11, and this), in which the doctrine of the person of Christ is specially unfolded"—ELLICOTT. (See the notes on the above-named passages.) But while the great passage, Phil. 2. 6–11, occurs incidentally, being introduced to emphasise a moral precept, the present passage is directly doctrinal and controversial, being designed to meet the false teachings of certain heretics who were troubling the Colossian church. These false teachers were Jewish Christians, like the Galatian heretics, but differing from the latter in one very important particular. "While they likewise adhered to circumcision (ch. 2. 11), and to precepts as to meats and feasts (ch. 2. 16), to the prejudice of Christ's atoning death (ch. 2. 13, etc.), they at the same time put forward a philosophy as to the higher spirit-world, with the fancies and subtleties of which (ch. 2. 18) were combined, as practical errors, a conceited humility, worship of angels, and unsparing bodily asceticism (ch. 2. 20, 23). They came, however, most keenly into conflict with the exalted rank and the redeeming work of Christ, to whom they did not leave His full Divine dignity, but preferred to assign to Him merely a rank in the higher order of spirits, while they ascribed to the angels a certain action in bringing about the messianic salvation" —MEYER. The image (comp. Heb. 1. 3) of the invisible God. "If the words 'image of God' describe an eternal relation of the Son to the Father, the word 'invisible' must refer, as apparently does 1 Tim. 1. 17, to the eternal essence of God. Thus the word 'image' is correlative to visible. The essentially invisible Father has in the Son an eternal organ of self-manifestation, an eternal counterpart and supplement to His own invisible nature"—BEET. (Comp. carefully John 1. 18.) The First-born of all creation. "The main ideas which this word involves are twofold—(1) Priority to all creation; in other words, it declares the absolute pre-existence of the Son. (2) Sovereignty over all creation. God's 'first-born' is the natural ruler, the acknowledged Head of God's household"—LIGHTFOOT. First-born here is equal to "Only-begotten." So the Nicene Creed, "Begotten not made."

16. For—"this explains the latter part of the preceding verse. Through implies something prior to the particles by and for, so denoting the beginning, the progress and the end. Him. This word, frequently repeated, signifies His supreme majesty, and excludes every creature. Were created all things that are in heaven—and heaven itself. But the inhabitants are named, because more noble than the house. Invisible—the several species of which are subjoined. Thrones are superior to dominions; principalities to powers. Perhaps the two latter may express their office with regard to other creatures; the two former may refer to God, who maketh them His chariots, and, as it were, rideth upon their wings"—WESLEY.

On the Eternal Son as Creator, comp. John 1. 3. In Him—not "through Him." "In Him lay, in fact, the potency of life from which God made the work of creation proceed, inasmuch as He was the personal principle of the Divine self-revelation, and therewith the accomplisher of the Divine idea of the world" —MEYER. All things: powers. (See notes on Eph. 1. 21.) Thrones, etc. It is a mistake to find in this passage a revelation concerning the rank, etc., of angels. S. Paul takes up the phraseology current in the churches tainted by Gnosticism without necessarily assenting to its accuracy. "You dispute much about the successive grades of angels; you distinguish each grade by its special title; you can tell how each order was generated from the preceding; you assign to each its proper degree of worship. Meanwhile, you have ignored or you have degraded Christ. I tell you it is not so. He is first and foremost, Lord of heaven and earth, far above all thrones or dominations, all princedoms, or powers, far above every dignity and every potentate—whether earthly or heavenly—whether angel or demon or man —that evokes your reverence and excites your fear"—LIGHTFOOT. Through Him and unto Him. "As all creation passed out from Him, so does it all converge again towards Him. The Eternal Word is the goal of the universe as He was the starting-point. It must end in unity as it proceeded from unity; and the centre of this unity is Christ"—LIGHTFOOT.

17. And He is before all things. "It is not said, He 'was'; He 'is' from everlasting to everlasting. And by Him all things consist. The original expression not only implies that He sustains all things in being, but more directly, 'All things were and are compacted in Him into one system.' He is the cement, as well as support, of the universe. And is He less than the supreme God?"—WESLEY.

He is. In the Greek both these words are very emphatic. "And He Himself, on His part, has an earlier existence than all things, and the collective whole subsists in Him"—MEYER. (Comp. Acts 17. 28.) "He is the principle of cohesion in the universe. He impresses upon creation that unity and solidarity which makes it a cosmos instead of a chaos. Thus (to take one instance) the action of gravitation, which keeps in their places things fixed, and regulates the motions of things moving, is an expression of His mind"—LIGHTFOOT. (See also Heb. 1. 3, "upholding all things by the word of His power.") The emphasis here laid on the creation of all things by Christ is partly a strengthening of what S. Paul is asserting concerning Christ's supremacy; but it is quite possible that he has also in his mind another point in the Gnostic heresy, according to which God committed the creation of the world to certain angels, whose limited capacities account for the imperfections in the work. Against this he uncompromisingly proclaims the Eternal Son as the Creator and Upholder of all things!

18. And—"from the whole he now descends to the most eminent part, the Church. He is the Head of the Church—universal; the supreme and only Head both of influence and of government to the whole body of believers. Who is—the repetition of the expression (see ver. 15) points out the entrance on a new paragraph. The Beginning — absolutely, the Eternal. The First-begotten from the dead —from whose resurrection flows all the life, spiritual and eternal, of all His brethren. That in all things—whether of nature or grace—He might have the pre-eminence. Who can sound this depth?"—WESLEY.

Vers. 15-17 set forth Christ's supremacy over the universe; this verse sets forth His supremacy of the Church. "And not only does He hold the position of absolute priority and sovereignty over the universe—the natural creation—He stands also in the same relation to the Church—the new spiritual creation. He is its Head, and it is His body. This is His prerogative, because He is the source and the beginning of its life, being the First-born from the dead. Thus in all things—in the spiritual order as in the natural—in the Church as in the world—He is found to have the pre-eminence"—LIGHTFOOT. Beginning. The ideas of priority and sovereignty are present in this word, as in the parallel word of the passage preceding (First-born). The Creator of the universe and the Head of the Body are one and the same, viz., Christ. Both the world and the Church begin and continue in Him. From the dead. "His resurrection from the dead is His title to the Headship of the Church; for 'the power of His resurrection' (Phil. 3. 10) is the life of the Church"—LIGHTFOOT. "That this priority may be universal, i.e. that it might extend to the Church, Christ rose from the dead before any of His servants; and He did so by the deliberate purpose of God"—BEET.

19. For it pleased the Father that all fulness—"all the fulness of God—should dwell in Him—constantly, as in a temple; and always ready for our approach to Him"—WESLEY.

For the whole fulness was pleased to dwell in Him (R.V. margin). But the more familiar rendering is to be preferred. "Fulness." The word in the Greek, thus translated, has become the technical (word among theologians for the totality of Divine attributes. In the "Divine-human Person the entire circle of the attributes of God took up its abode. This is in complete harmony with the complementary truth in Phil. 2. 7, 'He emptied Himself.' For even on earth the Word (John 1. 14) was 'full of grace and truth,' and (ver. 16) 'from His fulness we all have received.' All that belongs to the essence of God was present in Jesus. But the Son deliberately and definitely laid aside for a time, in order to become a sharer of our weakness, the actual exercise of the outer and lower circle of His Divine attributes. It was the essential and unchangeable possession of these attributes which made possible, and gave worth to, this temporary surrender of the exercise and enjoyment of them. But nothing was surrendered even for a moment which was needful to the further purpose stated in ver. 20"—BEET.

20. Through the blood of the cross—"the blood shed thereon. Whether things on earth. Here the enmity began; therefore this is mentioned first. Or things in heaven—those who are now in paradise; the saints who died before Christ came"—WESLEY.

A further account of the "good pleasure of the Father"—viz., through Him to reconcile—"meaning possibly to restore a lost friendship"—BEET. All things. "The absolute totality of created things shall be restored into its primal harmony with its Creator"—ELLICOTT. (See note on Eph. 1. 10.) Peace—'the blessed and abiding result of the reconciliation. Through the blood of His cross—graphic exposition of 'through Him.' God resolved to make peace between Himself and man by means of the blood shed on the cross of Christ. Similarly, though less vividly, Eph. 2. 16; Phil. 3. 18; Gal. 6. 14; 1 Cor. 17. 18. The cross—of Christ is used in this theological sense in the New Testament, only by S. Paul"—BEET. In heaven. Some expositors infer from this that there must be "disharmony in heaven." Of course it is possible that such disharmony exists, but it is perhaps a mistake to look for proof of it in this rhetorical phrase, so frequently employed by S. Paul in passages of this kind.

21. And you that were alienated, and enemies—"actual alienation of affection makes habitual enmity. In your mind—both your understanding and your affections. By wicked works—which continually feed and increase inward alienation from, and enmity to, God. He hath now reconciled—from the moment ye believed"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Eph. 2. 12; ch. 4. 18, and the notes. see also note on ver. 13 of this chapter. Alienated—not "from the commonwealth of Israel" as in Eph. 2. 12, but, in accordance with the wide reference of the preceding verse, from God and from the ideal harmony of His universe. Enemies — works — "enemies ye were, and the deeds of enemies ye did"—CHRYSOSTOM.

22. By the body of His flesh—"so distinguished from His body, the Church. The body here denotes His entire manhood. Through death—whereby He purchased the reconciliation which we receive by faith. To present you—the very end of that reconciliation—holy—towards God. Spotless—in yourselves. Unreprovable—as to your neighbour"—WESLEY.

The body of His flesh. "This body, when nailed to the cross, is here thought of as the sacred locality in which the Father reconciled us to Himself. (Comp. 1 Pet. 2. 24.) Through death—the precise means of the reconciliation which took place 'in the body of His flesh'"—BEET. To present. (Comp. Eph. 5. 27.) Holy—entirely consecrated or devoted. Without blemish—not only entirely given up to God, but also entirely free from spot or stain. Unreprovable before Him—on that great day when "He cometh to judge the earth."

23. If ye continue in the faith—"otherwise, ye will lose all the blessings which ye have already begun to enjoy. And be not removed from the hope of the gospel—"the glorious hope of perfect love. Which is preached—is already begun to be preached—to every creature under heaven"—WESLEY.

If so be (R.V.)—"assuming, namely, that ye"—MEYER. The faith: the hope of the gospel which ye heard—the true faith and genuine gospel made known to them by Epaphras. Which was preached in all creation under heaven. (Comp. Mark 16. 15.) "The inspired apostle sees the universal tendency of Christianity already realised"—OLSHAUSEN. I, Paul—through whom, more than any other under God, this widespread preaching of Christ has come to pass.

24. Now I rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up—"that is, whereby I fill up—that which is behind of the sufferings of Christ—that which remains to be suffered by His members. These are termed the sufferings of Christ—(1) Because the suffering of any member is the suffering of the whole; and of the Head especially, which supplies strength, spirits, sense, and motion to all. (2) Because they are for His sake, for the testimony of His truth. And these also are necessary for the Church; not to reconcile it to God, or satisfy for sin (for that Christ did perfectly), but for example to others, perfecting the saints, and increasing the reward"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul tells us in vers. 24–29 his office and work in the universal Church; and in ch. 2. 1–3 his special interest in the churches of Colossæ and Laodicea"—BEET. In my sufferings means not only "over" or "because of my sufferings," but also "in the midst of them." "I rejoice, suffering"—CHRYSOSTOM. The rest of the verse implies that there was something lacking in the afflictions of Christ; and that for the Church's sake (for His body's sake) S. Paul suffered physical hardships (in my flesh) to fill up the lack. "In what sense are these strange words true? In this sense. When Christ breathed His last upon the cross, all the sufferings needful for the complete establishment of the kingdom of God had not yet been endured. For the full realisation of the purposes of God it was needful, not only that Christ should die for the sins of the world, but that the gospel should be preached to all nations. This involved, owing to the wickedness of men, hardship to the preachers. This hardship S. Paul willingly endured in order to save men. Consequently, just as the life on earth of the servants of Christ is in some sense a continuation of His Incarnation (for in them He lives, Gal. 2. 20) so the sufferings of S. Paul were, in a similar sense, a continuation and completion of the sufferings of Christ"—BEET.

25. According to the dispensation of God which is given me—"or the stewardship with which I am entrusted"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Eph. 3. 2–7—a passage closely resembling this—and the notes.) "Dispensation or 'stewardship'—position of one entrusted by God with wealth for distribution to others"—BEET. To you-ward—for the benefit of you Gentiles, to whom my mission especially is. To fulfil the word of God—by so preaching the whole truth everywhere that all men will hear and obey it.

26. The mystery—"namely, Christ both justifying and sanctifying Gentiles, as well as Jews—which hath been comparatively hid from former ages and past generations of men"—WESLEY.

"The heathen mysteries were strictly confined to a narrow circle, the Christian mysteries are freely communicated to all. Thus the idea of secresy or reserve disappears when mystery is adopted into the Christian vocabulary by S. Paul; and the word signifies simply 'a truth which was once hidden but now is revealed; a truth which, without special revelation, would have been unknown.' The one special mystery which absorbs S. Paul's thoughts in Colossians and Ephesians is the free admission of the Gentiles on equal terms to the privileges of the covenant"—LIGHTFOOT. Saints—"the apostles and their converts"—THEODORET (evidently interpreting the passage by Eph. 3. 5); "Christians generally"—MEYER.

27. "Christ dwelling and reigning in you, the hope of glory—the ground of your hope"—WESLEY.

The riches of the glory of this mystery—a magnificent and truly Pauline phrase, implying both the abounding quantity and heavenly quality of the blessings God was pleased to make known. Among the Gentiles. The universality of the gospel is a thought so familiar to us, that we find it hard sometimes to understand the enthusiasm with which S. Paul speaks of the admission of Gentiles to the commonwealth of Israel. By recalling the facts of his early training we shall enter into his feelings more easily. To this "Hebrew of Hebrews" it never ceased to be a marvel that "to the Gentiles also hath God granted repentance unto life" (Acts 11. 18). Christ in you. The "in" cannot be expressed by any one English word. It means "among you," i.e. "among the Gentiles" at large, to whom Christ is now preached; and also "in you," i.e. "in" each Gentile who truly believes on Christ (in the sense of Gal. 2. 20).

28. "We teach the ignorant and admonish them that are already taught"—WESLEY.

Whom we proclaim. The "we" is emphatic, marking a contrast between true and heretical preachers of Christ. Admonishing and teaching—"admonishing" to repent, and "teaching" to believe. (So MEYER.) "Admonition concerning what they should do, teaching concerning what they should believe"—THEOPHYLACT. In all wisdom. (See second note on Eph. 1. 8.) To present every man perfect. (Comp. ver. 22.) What was there described as the purpose of God is here named as the supreme endeavour of S. Paul. God's will and S. Paul's life-work were one. Whereunto—to the end that "I may present every man perfect"—I also toil. "Besides admonition and teaching I also sustain every form of toil in the cause of the gospel"—ELLICOTT. Striving. The Greek is "agonising," but not quite in the modern sense. It means "contending" against the opponents of the gospel without, and, more particularly, an "inward struggle" of ceaseless prayer, watchfulness, and faith for the furtherance of the gospel. According, etc. "S. Paul does not contend, amid the labours of his office, according to the measure of his own strength, but according to the effectual working of Christ which worketh in him"—MEYER.

CHAPTER II.

1. How great a conflict—"of care, desire, prayer. As many as have not seen my face—therefore, in writing to the Colossians, he refrains from those familiar appellations, 'brethren,' 'beloved'"—WESLEY.

How greatly I strive for you (R.V.). In the last verse of the previous chapter he has named his "striving" for the Church as a whole. He now asserts that his readers at Colossæ (which city he had never visited) have not a little to do with this "striving." "That S. Paul should have been so concerned about the Colossians and Laodiceans, as those who did not know him personally is natural enough, seeing that they were not in a position to oppose the living impression of the apostle's ministry, and his direct authority, to the heretical seductions"—MEYER.

2. Unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, unto the acknowledgment of the mystery of God—"that is, unto the fullest and clearest understanding and knowledge of the gospel"—WESLEY.

That their hearts, etc. "Most thoughtfully and lovingly S. Paul designates the concern of his solicitude as 'the comforting of their hearts,' not impeaching them on account of the heretical seductions, but making those temptations to be felt as a misfortune in the presence of which one requires 'comfort'"—MEYER. Knit together in love—"this loving union one with another being the means by which their hearts are to receive encouragement"—BEET. For all riches—"that they may attain to all the unspeakable wealth which comes from the firm conviction of an understanding mind, may be brought to the perfect knowledge of God's mystery, which is nothing else than Christ"—LIGHTFOOT. (See note on ch. 1. 27.)

3. In whom—i.e. in Christ, or "in which," i.e. the mystery (so MEYER). "Wisdom—such acquaintance with the great realities as enables a man to choose the best steps in life. Knowledge—acquaintance with things seen or unseen, great or small"—BEET. Hidden. The genius of the Gnostic system was truly Oriental, and included certain occult lore and esoteric writings, such as have always had a fascination for Eastern minds. S. Paul here says that all wisdom and knowledge is hidden in Christ. But all who seek may find it, so that there is the same difference between the Christian and Gnostic "hidden things" as between the Christian and heathen mysteries. (See note on ch. 1. 28.)

4. "I say all this to you, lest you should be led astray by those false teachers who speak of another knowledge, of other mysteries"—LIGHTFOOT.

5. "While the weak and mortal flesh of S. Paul lingered in prison at Rome, the eye of his spirit was fixed on the Christians at Colossæ"—BEET. Order, steadfastness — military terms. The verse seems to imply that so far the soldiers of Christ at Colossæ had stood firm against the attacks of their false teachers.

6. So walk in Him—"in the same faith, love, holiness"—WESLEY.

As therefore ye received—"from Epaphras and his colleagues the true gospel, and consequently Christ Jesus the Lord; so walk in Him—who is the Way leading to the Father"—CHRYSOSTOM. But bearing in mind the whole usage of the phrase in Him in this group of Epistles, the view of MEYER is better, "Make Christ the element in which your conduct of the outer and inner life moves."

7. Rooted in Him—"as the vine. Built on the sure foundation"—WESLEY. (Comp. Eph. 3. 18; John 15. 1-8; Eph. 2. 20-22.) In Him. Christ is to be conceived as the soil for the roots striking downwards, and as the foundation for the building extending upwards. Being made firm by your faith (R.V. margin, "by"). "Faith is, as it were, the cement of the building"—LIGHTFOOT.

8. Through philosophy and empty deceit—"that is, through the empty deceit of philosophy blended with Christianity. This the apostle condemns—(1) because it was 'empty' and 'deceitful,' promising happiness, but giving none; (2) because it was grounded, not on solid reason, but the traditions of men; and (3) because it was so shallow and superficial, not advancing beyond the knowledge of sensible things, no, not beyond the first rudiments of them"—WESLEY.

Maketh spoil of you—the word means "carry off as spoil." Through his philosophy and vain deceit. Against a true and pure philosophy S. Paul has no grudge, for his own writings abound in it. Never does he disparage wisdom; on the contrary, he is always praying for a fuller measure of it. It is true that he despises the intellectual arrogance which is no more than "man's wisdom"; and this he looks upon as "foolishness with God." Such high-sounding fallacies he has in view here, and describes them, not by the noble word philosophy alone, but by the phrase philosophy and vain deceit. The added words "and vain deceit" mark off the "philosophy" of the Gnostics as false, in distinction from worthier "philosophies" which S. Paul himself appears to have studied. Traditions of men—possibly those of the Pharisees. But the reference is more probably to the Gnostics, who had inherited such traditions from the Essenes. The rudiments of the world. (Comp. Gal. 4. 3.) There were elements of truth in the religions and philosophies which were not after Christ; but they were extremely scanty—mere "rudiments" of truth. "Of the world"—as opposed to the Spirit. "In Christ you have attained the liberty and intelligence of manhood; do not submit yourselves again to a rudimentary discipline fit only for children. In Christ you have been exalted into the sphere of the Spirit; do not plunge yourselves again into the atmosphere of material and sensuous things"—LIGHTFOOT.

9. For in Him dwelleth—"inhabiteth, continually abideth—all the fulness of the Godhead. Believers are 'filled with all the fulness of God' (Eph. 3. 19). But in Christ 'dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead'; the most full Godhead; not only Divine powers but Divine nature. (Col. 1. 19.) Bodily—personally, really, substantially. The very substance of God, if one might so speak, dwells in Christ in the most full sense"—WESLEY.

This verse gives the "reason for the implied exclusion of all other teaching except that 'after Christ.' In Him, and in none other than Him"—ELLICOTT. "In explaining the true doctrine, S. Paul condemns the two false principles which lay at the root of this heretical teaching — (1) the theological error of substituting inferior and created beings, angelic mediators, for the Divine Head Himself (vers. 9, 10); and (2) the practical error of insisting upon ritual and ascetic observances as the foundation of their moral teaching (vers. 11–14). Dwells—has its fixed abode—all the fulness—the totality of the Divine powers and attributes"—LIGHTFOOT. (See note on ch. 1. 19.) "All the exhaustless perfections of the essential being of God"—ELLICOTT. Bodily—or "in bodily fashion." For the Eternal Word, who became incarnate, did not lay human nature aside when the work of redemption was finished, but remains the God-Man for ever. Hence we have here dwells, not "dwelt," and consequently this verse enshrines an even profounder truth concerning the Incarnation than John 1. 14. This great verse is aimed carefully at the heretical teaching. "In Christ dwells the whole pleroma, the entire fulness of the Godhead, whereas they represent it to you as dispersed among several spiritual agencies. Christ is the one fountain-head of all spiritual life, whereas they teach you to seek it in communion with inferior creatures"—LIGHTFOOT.

10. And ye—"who believe—are filled with Him. (John 1. 16.) Christ is filled with God, and ye are filled with Christ. And 'ye' are filled 'by Him.' The fulness of Christ overflows His Church. (Ps. 133. 3.) He is originally full. We 'are filled by Him' with wisdom and holiness. Who is the Head of all principality and power—of angels as well as men. Not from angels, therefore, but from their Head, are we to ask whatever we stand in need of"—WESLEY.

"Made full or 'complete' denotes a filling up of an outline of any kind. The outline here is sketched by the needs and aim of our being. They who are in Christ, and, so far as they are in Him, find in Him their need supplied and their goal attained. In them remain no unfilled chasms. They have therefore no need to seek anything away from Christ"—BEET. "From 'the fulness of the Godhead,' which dwells in the exalted Christ, flows the 'being filled' of the Christian, which has its basis, therefore, in no other than Christ, and in nothing else than just in fellowship with Him"—MEYER. Who is the Head—both the Creator and Sovereign—of all principality and power—"and therefore of those angelic beings whom the false teachers adopted as mediators, thus transferring to the inferior members the allegiance due to the Head"—LIGHTFOOT.

11. By whom also ye have been circumcised—"ye have received the spiritual blessings typified of old by circumcision—with a circumcision not performed with hands—by an inward, spiritual operation—in putting off not a little skin, but the whole body of the sins of the flesh—all the sins of your evil nature—by the circumcision of Christ—by that spiritual circumcision which Christ works in your heart"—WESLEY.

The Colossian heresy included Judaising errors as well as those with reference to angel mediators, alluded to in the previous verse. As in Galatia, attempts were being made to force upon the believers at Colossæ the rite of circumcision. S. Paul's way of opposing this error is to assure the Colossians that they are circumcised already, in the circumcision of Christ. The circumcision of the flesh is therefore superfluous; and as it is lower than "the circumcision of Christ" by as much as the flesh is lower than the spirit (not made with hands = "spiritual," comp. 2 Cor. 5. 1), to submit to it will be a backward and downward step. "You do not need the circumcision of the flesh; for you have received the circumcision of the heart. The distinguishing features of this higher circumcision are threefold—(1) It is not external, but inward, not made with hands, but wrought by the Spirit; (2) It divests not of a part only of the flesh, but of the whole body of carnal affections; (3) It is the circumcision, not of Moses or of the patriarchs, but of Christ. Thus it is distinguished as regards (1) its character, (2) its extent, (3) its author"—LIGHTFOOT.

12. "Which He wrought in you, when ye were, as it were, buried with Him in baptism—the ancient manner of baptizing by immersion is as manifestly alluded to here as the other manner of baptizing by sprinkling or pouring of water is in Heb. 10. 22. But no stress is laid on the age of the baptized, or the manner of performing it, in one or the other way; but only on our being risen with Christ, through the powerful operation of God in the soul, which we cannot but know assuredly, if it really is so; and if we do not experience this, our baptism has not answered the end of its institution. By which ye are also risen with Him—from the death of sin to the life of holiness. It does not appear that in all this

S. Paul speaks of justification at all, but of sanctification altogether"—WESLEY.

Having been buried, etc.—"another description of this inward and spiritual circumcision, specifying also its time and outward instrumentality. Already, in Rom. 6. 3–11 and Gal. 2. 20; 6. 14, we have been taught that, like Christ and in Christ, we are to be dead to sin, i.e. completely separated from it as the dead are from the world in which they once lived, by means of that death upon the cross by which Christ Himself was separated from the penalty and curse and power of sin under which for our sakes He once groaned; and that consequently baptism, the visible gate through which the convert from heathenism entered the company of the professed followers of Christ, is designed to be the funeral service of the old life, announcing publicly that life has ceased, and separating the dead man completely from that land in which he lived. In this sense the Colossian Christians were buried in the grave of Christ; and this burial took place in their baptism"—BEET. "But baptism is not a grave only"—CHRYSOSTOM. Ye were also raised with Him—"evidently supplements buried with Him, recalling forcibly the ancient mode of the rite, and the baptismal water under which the convert sank and from which he rose. Through faith—the constant condition of salvation in all its aspects. (Phil. 3. 9; Eph. 2. 8; 3. 12, 17; Rom. 3. 22, etc.)"—BEET. The working, etc. (See note on Eph. 1. 19.)

13. And you who were dead—"doubly dead to God, not only wallowing in trespasses, outward sins, but also in the uncircumcision of your flesh—a beautiful expression for original sin, the inbred corruption of your nature, your uncircumcised heart and affections—hath He—God the Father—quickened together with Him—making you partakers of the power of His resurrection. It is evident the apostle thus far speaks, not of justification, but of sanctification only"—WESLEY.

(Read the notes on Eph. 2. 1.) Uncircumcision of your flesh—which signalised their alienation from God's covenant people. But LIGHTFOOT says: "The outward uncircumcision of the Gentiles is a type of their unchastened carnal mind. In other words, though the literal meaning is not excluded, the spiritual reference is most prominent, as appears from ver. 11." You together with Him—"a very emphatic mode of asserting that God has so joined us to Christ, that the act by which He gave life to the sacred corpse in the grave gave immortal life also to us"—BEET. Having forgiven us all our trespasses. "This blotting out of our whole debt of sin was necessarily prior to the quickening—by the fact, namely, that He remitted to us all the sins which we had committed, the cause of the being dead was done away"—MEYER.

14. Having blotted out—"in consequence of His gracious decrees, that Christ should come into the world to save sinners, and that whosoever believeth on Him should have everlasting life—the handwriting against us. Where a debt is contracted, it is usually testified by some handwriting; and when the debt is forgiven, the handwriting is destroyed, either by blotting it out, by taking it away, or by tearing it. The apostle expresses in all these three ways God's destroying the handwriting which was contrary to us, or at enmity with us. This was not properly our sins themselves (they were the debt), but their guilt and cry before God"—WESLEY.

"Having blotted out, or 'washed out,' a common word for complete removal of writing. The defective nature of ancient ink made it easy"—BEET. The bond—lit. "the handwriting," but the word is usually employed for a "bond." In ordinances—Greek, "dogmas." "The dogmas must be the various commands, ritual or moral, of the Law of Moses which S. Paul speaks of in 2 Cor. 3. 6 as the 'letter which kills.' And this condemnatory document is the chief feature of the old covenant. The Law was made up of 'dogmas,' i.e. of commands claiming simply obedience. And these decrees gave to the Law its power against us, for we had broken them, and they cried out for punishment"—BEET. But though the primary reference is no doubt to the Law of Moses, the word us seems "to include Gentiles as well as Jews, so that a wider reference must be given to the expression. The dogmas will include all forms of positive decrees in which moral or social principles are embodied or religious duties defined; and the bond is the moral assent of the conscience, which (as it were) signs and seals the obligations. And He hath taken it away. The Greek tense (the perfect) expresses an action the result of which continues up to the present time, "He took it away, and it remains taken away." Nailing it, etc. "'The abrogation was even more emphatic. Not only was the writing erased, but the document itself was torn up and cast aside.' By nailed is meant that the law of ordinances was nailed to the cross, rent with Christ's body, and destroyed with His death. (See Gal. 6. 14.) It has been supposed that in some cities the abrogation of a decree was signified by running a nail through it and hanging it up in public. The image would thus gain force, but there is no distinct evidence of such a custom"—LIGHTFOOT.

15. And having spoiled the principalities and powers—"the evil angels, of their usurped dominion—He—God the Father—exposed them openly—before all the hosts of hell and heaven—triumphing over them in or by Him—by Christ. Thus the paragraph begins with Christ, goes on with Him, and ends with Him"—WESLEY.

"Perhaps the most obscure verse in the New Testament. Its obscurity arises from our ignorance of the precise nature of the error here combated"—BEET. The A.V. rendering having spoiled presents very little difficulty; but it is more easy than correct. The verb certainly means "having stripped off from Himself," and the question then is, In what sense did Christ or God strip off principalities and powers from Himself? ELLICOTT and LIGHTFOOT, following the Greek Fathers, think that the powers of evil or bad angels (comp. Eph. 6. 12) are meant. "Our Lord by His death stripped away from Himself all the opposing hostile powers of evil that sought to win for themselves a victory over Him in the nature which He had condescended to assume. When He died on the cross, when He dissolved that temple into which they both in earlier (Matt. 4. 1 ff.; Luke 4. 2 ff.) and later efforts of temptation (John 14. 30; Luke 22. 53), had vainly endeavoured to make sacrilegious entry, He reft them away for ever, and vindicated His regal power; yea, the loud voice (Matt. 27. 50; Mark 15. 37; Luke 23. 46) was the shout of eternal triumph and victory"—ELLICOTT. "The powers of evil which had clung like a Nessus robe about His humanity, were torn off and cast aside for ever. And the victory of mankind is involved in the victory of Christ. In His cross we too are divested of the poisonous clinging garments of temptation and sin and death"—LIGHTFOOT. But BEET understands principalities and powers of good angels, and hence arrives at a very different interpretation. His note (somewhat compressed) is: "Is there any sense in which, until the death of Christ and no longer, the angels of heaven might be spoken of as a robe of God? There is. (See Gal. 3. 19.) The whole argument of Heb. (ch. 1. 2), especially ch. 2. 2, implies that angels were the medium through which the revelations of the old covenant were given. If so we may speak of these bright messengers as the robe in which God revealed Himself to men during long ages. But in Christ the veil is laid aside. Through the lips of the Incarnate Son, God spake to man face to face, and revealed His unveiled glory. He thus stripped off and laid aside the veil He had previously worn. This is a strong reason why the Colossians should not (ver. 18) 'worship angels.' To do so is to cling to a superseded mode of Divine revelation. In Christ God has (ver. 15) laid aside the visible mediation of angels: consequently, no one (ver. 18) may any longer worship them." Widely as these expositions differ, they both do justice to S. Paul's central thought at this point, viz., the supremacy of Christ over all angelic beings. The remaining clauses of the verse present no great difficulty. Whether it was by triumphing over the attacks of bad angels, or by discarding the mediation of good angels, Christ in it, i.e. in His cross, openly showed His supremacy over them.

16. Therefore—"seeing these things are so—let none judge you—that is, regard none who judge you—in meat or drink—for not observing the Ceremonial Law in these or any other particulars—or in respect of a yearly feast, the new moon, or the weekly Jewish Sabbaths"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Rom. 14. 3, 10 on "judging" in such matters.) Meat or drink—lit. "eating or drinking." For the prohibitions on these subjects formed part of the "decrees," or "dogmas" ("ordinances," ver. 14), which Christ has taken away, and a man who judges us by such standards is a mere beater of the air, striving to administer an abrogated Law. In this passage something more than ordinary Judaism seems to be meant. The false teachers in Colossæ were advocating a rigorous asceticism, partly Nazarite (hence the allusion to drinking, perhaps) and partly Gnostic. The history of religion teems with illustrations of long-continued fasting, leading to visions of angels and demons; and probably the visions in which the Gnostics of S. Paul's day firmly believed may, in the light of this verse, admit of a similar explanation.

17. Which are but a lifeless shadow; but the body, the substance, is of Christ"—WESLEY.

"Two ideas are prominent in this image—(1) The contrast between the ordinances of the Law, and the teaching of the gospel, as the shadow and substance respectively. (2) The conception of the shadow as thrown before the substance, so that the Law was a type and presage of the gospel. Thus it implies both the unsubstantiality and the supersession of the Mosaic ritual. But the body, etc. As the shadow belonged to Moses, so the substance belongs to Christ, i.e. the reality, the antitype, in each case is found in the Christian dispensation. Thus the Passover typifies the atoning sacrifice, etc."—LIGHTFOOT.

18. "Out of pretended humility, they worshipped angels, as not daring to apply immediately to God. Yet this really sprang from their being puffed up (the constant forerunner of a fall, Prov. 16. 18), so far was it from being an instance of true humility"—WESLEY.

Voluntary humility (A.V. and R.V.) is not a good rendering. Better is, "Let no man rob you of your prize," which, so far, you are entitled to, for you have run well, desiring (to rob you of it) by humility and worshipping of angels. With "the pride that apes humility," the false teacher pretended that he could not presume to directly approach the Eternal Father or the Eternal Son, and that he was only worthy to worship through the medium of those angelic beings, who, according to his creed, formed the connecting links in a long chain from earth to heaven. But really "all this was prompted, not by humility as was pretended, but by an inflated self-estimate which was in reality a form of self-indulgence" —BEET. And should the Colossians fall away into a similar error it will rob them of their prize. Dwelling in the things which he hath seen—such visions as are alluded to under ver. 16. (A.V. "Intruding into those things which he hath not seen"—but the best MSS. omit "not." But though the A.V. reading is wrong, and must be set aside, its lesson is much needed, and must never be neglected.

19. And not holding the Head. "He does not hold Christ, who does not trust in Him alone. All the members are nourished by faith, and knit together by love and mutual sympathy"—WESLEY.

Not holding fast the Head. Because of the time and attention they gave to the angels, His inferiors, their hold upon Christ, the Head, became ever more and more feeble. For from the angels they could derive none of the increase of God, it being entirely from Christ that all the body, the Church, Christ's mystical body being supplied, etc. (Comp. Eph. 4. 16.) So long as the members are united to one another and to the Head they will "increase" in peace, strength, holiness, faith, joy, usefulness, with "the increase" which "God" will give.

20. Therefore. "The inference begun, ver. 16, is continued. A new inference follows. (Col. 3. 1.) If ye are dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world—that is, 'If ye are dead with Christ,' and so freed from them, why receive ye ordinances—which Christ hath not joined, from which He hath made you free"—WESLEY.

If ye died (R.V.). That the Colossians "died with Christ" was asserted in ver. 12. (See note on that verse.) LIGHTFOOT thus paraphrases vers. 20–23: "You died with Christ to your old life. All mundane relations have ceased for you. Why then do you—you who have attained your spiritual manhood—submit still to the rudimentary discipline of children? Why do you—you who are citizens of heaven—bow your necks afresh to the tyranny of material ordinances, as though you were still living in the world? It is the same old story again; the same round of hard, meaningless, vexatious prohibitions. Handle not, Taste not, Touch not. What folly! When all these things—these meats and drinks and the like—are earthly, perishable, wholly trivial and unimportant! They are used, and there is an end of them. What is this but to draw down upon yourselves the denunciations uttered by the prophet of old? What is this but to abandon God's word for precepts which are issued by human authority and inculcated by human teachers? All such things have a show of wisdom, I grant. There is an officious parade of religious devotion, an eager affectation of humility; there is a stern, ascetic rigour which ill-treats the body, but there is nothing of any real value to check indulgence of the flesh."

21. Touch not—"an unclean thing. Taste not—any forbidden meat. Handle not—any consecrated vessel"—WESLEY.

Handle not, nor taste, nor touch (R.V.). Among the Essenes (who should be studied in connection with this Colossian heresy) there were prohibitions against oil, flesh, wine, etc. "It will be noted that all these commands are negative, not positive. They are marked by the ordinary ascetic preference of spiritual restraint to spiritual energy"—BARRY.

22. Perish in the using—"have no further use, no influence on the mind"—WESLEY.

"Only consider what is the real import of this scrupulous avoidance. Why, you are attributing an inherent value to things that are fleeting; you yourselves are citizens of eternity, and yet your thoughts are absorbed in the perishable"—LIGHTFOOT. Precepts and doctrines of men—"recalls a similar rebuke of empty forms of religion in Isa. 29. 13, which in the LXX. reads, 'teaching commands of men and teachings.' It was quoted by Christ in Matt. 15. 9. This similar use of Old Testament words suggests whether S. Paul had heard of the discourse of Christ there recorded"—BEET.

23. Not sparing the body—"denying it many gratifications, and putting it to many inconveniences. Yet they are not of any real value before God, nor do they, upon the whole, mortify, but satisfy, the flesh. They indulge our corrupt nature, our self-will, pride, and desire of being distinguished from others"—WESLEY.

Which things have indeed a show of wisdom, or "reputation of wisdom." (Comp. ver. 8 and the note.) In will-worship—better rendered "self-imposed worship" (so BEET, ELLICOTT, MEYER). The reference is to the worship of angels, which was not commanded by God, but a gratuitous invention of those who had a show of wisdom, imposing it upon themselves with the sham "humility" of ver. 18 (where see note) and "severity to the body," ver. 16 (see note). But are not of any value against the indulgence of the flesh (R.V.). "That there is a satisfaction of the fleshly temper in the attempt over-much to curb the flesh, the whole history of asceticism bears witness"—BARRY. Compare ver. 18, where S. Paul also accuses those who profess to treat the flesh with such rigour with being "vainly puffed up by their fleshly mind." The R.V. margin has honour, in which case the meaning will be they have a show of wisdom in self-imposed worship, etc., but on the other hand they have no real honour against the indulgence of the flesh.

CHAPTER III.

1. If ye are risen, seek the things above—"as Christ being risen, immediately went to heaven"—WESLEY.

If then ye were raised—as asserted in ver.

12 of the previous chapter, seek the things that are above: seek so to live by the power of His resurrection, as at the end to find the bliss above, where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God. (Comp. Heb. 1. 3, 13, and see note on Eph. 1. 20.) With S. Paul the resurrection is often so conceived as to include a reference to the ascension. And so here. Note that believers have "died" with Christ to sin, "risen" with Christ to newness of life, and "ascended" with Christ to the heavenly places, so that they enjoy "heaven on earth." (See last note on Eph. 1. 3.) Of course, in a literal sense, they still await death, resurrection, and ascension, but the mystical sense above alluded to is none the less real and important.

2. "The same expression repeated for emphasis, 'You must not only seek heaven, you must also think heaven"—LIGHTFOOT. (Comp. Matt. 6. 19–21.) Not the things on the earth as did both the Gnostics of Colossæ and the sensualists of Philippi. (See Phil. 3. 18, 19.)

3. For ye are dead—"to the things on earth—and your real, spiritual life is hid from the world, and laid up in God, with Christ—who hath merited, promised, prepared it for us, and gives us the earnest and foretaste of it in our hearts"—WESLEY.

Ye are dead. (Read the note on ch. 2. 12.) This statement justifies the preceding exhortation not to mind things on the earth. For if they are dead to the world they should have no further interest in it. And your life. This clause justifies the exhortation "to mind the things above." Is hid—"beyond human sight, and beyond reach of accident and death—with Christ—for they are dead, buried, and risen with Him. Whatever Christ has and is they share"—BEET. Hidden—"shrouded in the depths of inward experiences and the mystery of its union with the life of Christ"—ELLICOTT. This profound saying intimates that the believer even shares the life of the Eternal Son in "the bosom of the Father." Had the Colossian heretics any hidden treasures (see notes on ch. 2. 3) worthy to be named with this?

4. When Christ—"the abruptness of the sentence surrounds us with sudden light—our life—the fountain of holiness and glory—shall appear—in the clouds of heaven"—WESLEY.

"This life, indeed, is hidden now; it has no outward splendour as men count splendour; for it is a life with Christ, a life in God. But the veil will not always shroud it. Christ our life shall be manifested hereafter; then ye also shall be manifested with Him, and the world shall see your glory"—LIGHTFOOT. (Comp. 1 John 3. 2.) "At present the real dignity of the sons of God is hidden from the eyes of men, and, indeed, from their own eyes, as Christ is hidden from mortal sight. In that day Christ in His essential grandeur will appear, and with Him will appear also the grandeur with which He will adorn His servants. (Comp. Phil. 3. 21; Rom. 8. 19–21)"—BEET.

5. Mortify therefore—"put to death, slay with a continued stroke—your members—which together make up the body of sin—which are upon the earth—where they find their nourishment. Uncleanness—in act, word, or thought. Inordinate affection—every passion which does not flow from and lead to the love of God. Evil desire—the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eye, and the pride of life. Covetousness—according to the derivation of the word, means the desire of having more, or of anything independent on God. Which is idolatry—properly and directly; for it is giving the heart to a creature"—WESLEY.

"'Since, according to vers. 3, 4, ye are dead, but have your life hidden with Christ in God and are destined to be glorified with Christ, it would be in contradiction of all this, according to which ye belong no longer to the earth but to the heavenly state of life, to permit your earthly members still to live; no, ye are to put them to death, make them die.' Members—hand, foot, eye, etc. They were not to be put to death in the physical sense but in an ethical respect, as the seat and organ of sinful lusts"—MEYER. Which are upon the earth—for though "our life is hid with Christ in God" our bodies still remain upon the earth. Covetousness. The Greek word means "the desire to have more." Which is idolatry. "Covetousness is worship of material good"—BEET. Many wish to live "by bread alone," and sooner or later become worshippers of the god named in Phil. 3. 19—idolaters of food, drink, lands, gold, pleasure.

6. For which—"though the heathens lightly regarded them"—WESLEY.

Almost word for word as in Eph. 5. 6, where compare the notes. Sons of disobedience. "In each sinner the abstract principle of unbelief has given birth to a child"—BEET.

7. "Living denotes the inward principle; walking, the outward acts"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Eph. 2. 3.) To stimulate his readers in the direction of practical holiness by reminding them of the misery and darkness of their lives when they walked in unholiness is characteristic of S. Paul.

8. Wrath—"is lasting anger. Filthy discourse. And was there need to warn even these saints of God against so gross and palpable a sin as this? Oh what is man, till perfect love casts out both fear and sin!"—WESLEY.

Put ye away all, etc. "'Not only those vices which have been specially named before (ver. 5), but "all" of whatever kind.' The apostle accordingly goes on to specify sins of a wholly different type from those already mentioned, sins of uncharitableness, such as anger, detraction, malice, and the like"—LIGHTFOOT. Anger denotes more or less settled hatred, wrath the furious outbursts of passion to which it often gives rise. Malice or "badness," not merely the absence of goodness, but the positive desire to harm others. Railing against man or God (in which case it equals the word "blasphemy").

9. (Comp. Eph. 4. 22, 25.) Put off—"as one takes off and lays aside clothing—the old man. So complete is the change that the man himself as he formerly was is spoken of as an old garment laid aside, as though personality itself were changed"—BEET. (Comp. Rom. 6. 6; 2 Cor. 5. 17.)

10. In knowledge — "the knowledge of God, His will, His word"—WESLEY.

New man—"in contrast to the 'old man' of ver. 9. Which is being renewed. The tense suggests the continual progress of the Christian life. The word 'renewed' does not necessarily mean restoration to a former state. For the new covenant is by no means a restoration of the old covenant to its original form: and the new earth and heaven will differ greatly from the present ones. But it involves the removal of all defects. The renewal will not be complete till every trace of the damage done by sin is erased. Knowledge. This mention of knowledge as an aim of renewal is in close harmony with ch. 1. 9, 28; 2. 2, and with the general scope of this Epistle"—BEET. Image, etc. (Comp. Gen. 1. 26.)

11. Where—"in which case, it matters not what a man is externally, whether Jew or Gentile, circumcised, or uncircumcised, barbarian, void of all the advantages of education, —yea, Scythian, of all barbarians most barbarous. But Christ is in all that are thus renewed, and is all things in them and to them"—WESLEY.

(See the note on Gal. 3. 28.) Where—in that new creation (2 Cor. 5. 17, R.V. margin) alluded to in the previous verse. Greek and Jew, circumcision and uncircumcision. By thus denying the existence, in Christ, of the distinction between the circumcised Jew and the uncircumcised Gentile, S. Paul strikes a blow at the Judaising errors of the Colossian heretics. By admitting barbarians and Scythians (thought to be the lowest type of "barbarians") on equal terms with "Greek" and "Jew," their Gnostic errors are met. For the tendency of Gnosticism was to reserve religion exclusively for the cultured and intellectual. Bond and free. These words have probably no reference to the Colossian heretics, but are added naturally by the apostle, in accordance with his characteristic instinct for the greatest possible comprehensiveness. LIGHTFOOT, however, thinks that the words are inserted with special reference to the case of Onesimus and Philemon. But Christ is all and in all. Judaism and Gnosticism were from their very nature opposed to S. Paul's grand doctrine of the universality of the gospel. This sentence is a sublime restatement of that doctrine. It presents the teachings of Galatians in the language of Ephesians.

12. "All who are thus renewed are elected of God, holy, and therefore the more beloved of Him. Holiness is the consequence of their election, and God's superior love, of their holiness"—WESLEY.

"As you have put on the new man, put on all its characteristic qualities. As chosen ones of God—as being men who enjoy and value so great and singular a blessing as to have been called out of heathen darkness to the knowledge of Christ"—ELLICOTT. Holy and beloved—given up to His service and inspired to perform it by His love. Bowels of mercies, or a "heart of compassion" (R.V.). Note that the "service of God" implied in the word holy above is now defined in terms of love and service to our fellow-men. Towards others we are to have a "heart of compassion," which will prompt us to help the poor and needy; kindness, gentleness and sweet reasonableness in our intercourse with all; humility, best understood by pondering Phil. 2. 3–5; meekness, to be studied in Gal. 6. 1–4; long-suffering, of which God Himself is our example. It is a fruit of love (1 Cor. 13. 4), and we find in it God, for "God is Love."

13. Forbearing one another — "if anything is now wrong — and forgiving one another—what is past"—WESLEY.

Read the notes on Gal. 6. 1–4 and Eph. 4. 32, where precepts very similar to these are found.

14. "The love of God contains the whole of Christian perfection, and connects all the parts of it together"—WESLEY.

Ver. 12 began with the words "put on," and the virtues named are conceived as garments in which God's saints robe themselves. Upon all these, or "over them," they are to put on love "as an outer garment over all the underclothing"—BEET. Like a girdle, love will hold all other virtues in their places. And as to have all the virtues, each in its right proportion and place, is "perfectness," love, which secures this state of things, is rightly called the bond of perfectness. On love as the source of all virtues, see 1 Cor. 13.

15. And then the peace of God shall rule in your hearts—"shall sway every temper, affection, thought, as the reward (so the Greek word implies) of your preceding love and obedience"—WESLEY.

And let the peace of Christ, etc. (R.V.). "The virtues named from ver. 12 onward have reference to our outward life, our dealings with others; but they will only be possible when there is health and strength of inward life, of our inmost selves. Hence all these virtues, along with the love which binds them together, must have their deep living foundation in 'the peace of Christ,' which reigns in the heart, and their abiding incitement in gratitude towards God for the salvation received in Christ"—MEYER. To the which—i.e. Christ's peace and the life in which that peace is ruler—ye were called—in your conversion—in one body—the Church. It is characteristic of S. Paul to insist on union with the members, as well as with the Head, in such connections as the present. And be thankful. On the promise of peace to those who display a spirit of "thanksgiving," see Phil. 4. 6, 7. To give thanks we must needs recall God's faithfulness and love in the past; and, as we do so, we feel so sure He will "go on to be gracious" that peace steals into our hearts and calms all fears respecting the future.

16. Let the word of Christ—"so the apostle calls the whole Scripture, and thereby asserts the divinity of his Master—dwell—not make a short stay, or an occasional visit, but take up its stated residence—richly—in the largest measure, and with the greatest efficacy; so as to fill and govern the whole soul"—WESLEY. The word of Christ—"the gospel of which the subject-matter is CHRIST'S life, teachings, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension. Dwell in you—'in' each believer, and among the whole company of them. Richly—suggests abundance and enrichment. S. Paul desires the spoken word of Christ to have a permanent and abundant place in the church at Colossæ, and in the lips and thoughts of its members, thus making them truly rich"—BEET. In all wisdom, teaching, etc.—for so the words should be joined and not as A.V. and R.V. On teaching and admonishing, see ch. 1. 28. Psalms and hymns, etc. "Psalms" of David and similar compositions. "Hymns" of which some had already come into use among Christian congregations. They were probably doxologies, like those afterwards included in the Apocalypse. Spiritual songs—a wider word than the two preceding; any sort of poetical composition, provided it be spiritual.

17. In the name—"in the power and Spirit—of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks unto God—the Holy Ghost—and the Father through Him—Christ"—WESLEY. And whatsoever ye do, in word or in deed—another instance of the Pauline comprehensiveness often remarked in these notes. Do all in the name, etc.—not "for the sake of the name of Jesus," but the far stronger "in the name" of Phil. 2. 10—in that holy sphere which His name represents. LIGHTFOOT points out the reiteration of LORD in vers. 18, 20, 22, 23, 24, regarding it as intentional, and as "the great practical lesson which flows from the theological teaching of the Epistle." To God the Father (R.V.)—"of Christ as of us"—BEET.

18. Wives, submit—"or be subject to. It is properly a military term, alluding to that entire submission that soldiers pay to their general"—WESLEY.

From this point to the first verse of the next chapter, we have a series of precepts very similar to those in Eph. 5. 22–6. 9. (Read the notes there.) As is fitting in the Lord. Eph. 5. 22–33 contains S. Paul's profound philosophy of the subordination (but not in any sense the degradation) of woman in Christian marriage.

19. Be not bitter—"(which may be without any appearance of anger) either in word or spirit"—WESLEY. Bitter—"denotes acute unpleasantness of word, demeanour, or thought. The stronger party having nothing to fear from the weaker, is frequently in danger of acting or speaking harshly. To refrain from such harshness, even towards those we love, is sometimes, amid the irritations of life, no easy task. But it is binding upon the Christian"—BEET.

20. On this and the following verse, see Eph. 6. 1–4 and the notes.

21. Lest they be discouraged—"which may occasion their turning either desperate or stupid"—WESLEY.

This verse betrays once more the apostle's fine insight into the facts of human nature. By constant fault-finding and scolding, and by seeming unreasonably hard to please, parents are not to discourage their children, who are often trying to do well more than they get credit for. Uncalled-for rebukes, irritably and hastily administered, have permanently soured innumerable lives which would else have been full of sweetness.

22. Eyeservice—"being more diligent under their eye than at other times. Singleness of heart—a simple intention of 'doing right,' without looking any further. Fearing God—that is, acting from this principle"—WESLEY. (See the closely parallel passage in Eph. 6. 5–8, and the notes there.)

23. Heartily—"cheerfully, diligently. 'Menpleasers' are soon dejected and made angry: the 'single-hearted' are never displeased or disappointed; because they have another aim, which the good or evil treatment of those they serve cannot disappoint"—WESLEY. (See notes on Eph. 6. 5–8 and the full exposition there.) S. Paul considered this advice important enough to find a place in two of his Epistles, and the time is unhappily far distant when it will be superfluous.

24, 25. Expounded under Eph. 6. 8, 9, where see the notes.

CHAPTER IV.

1. Just—"according to your contract. Equitable—even beyond the letter of your contract"—WESLEY. Render, or "furnish on your part." "The idea is 'reciprocation,' the master's duty as corresponding to the slave's"—LIGHTFOOT. (See notes on Eph. 6. 9.)

2. Continue steadfastly in prayer. (Comp. Rom. 12. 12; Acts 1. 14.) Watching. The word suggests "the opposite of sleep. In our persistent prayers our spiritual faculties must be in active exercise. We must, while we pray, be keenly alive to our own needs and dangers, and to the promise of God. With thanksgiving. Ceaseless prayer, with ceaseless praise, was the atmosphere of S. Paul's spiritual life" —BEET.

3. That God would open to us a door of utterance—"that is, give us utterance, that we 'may open our mouth boldly' (Eph. 6. 19), and give us an opportunity of speaking, so that none may be able to hinder"—WESLEY.

(Comp. notes on Eph. 6. 19, 20.) Withal. S. Paul, in ver. 2, has exhorted the Colossians to prayer in general, and he now mentions one thing in particular for which they ought to pray. A door for the word—an opportunity of preaching it where so far the door has been shut against it. Mystery. (Comp. ch. 1. 26, 27; 2. 2; and Eph. 3. 4.)

4. As I ought to speak, or "as I must speak"—the sentiment of 1 Cor. 9. 16.

5. Them that are without—without the Church. On the rest of the verse see notes on Eph. 5. 15, a passage closely resembling this.

6. "Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with the grace of God, as flesh is with salt"—WESLEY.

Your speech—especially to unbelievers (see previous verse). With grace. (See Eph. 4. 29, where the positive precept of this verse is negatively expressed by the words, "let no corrupt communication," etc.) With salt in this is the exact opposite of "corrupt" in that passage. Each one—for the varying temperaments and circumstances of "each one" we talk with will call for great wisdom in the adaptation of our manner and matter so as to do the greatest possible amount of good. (Comp. 1 Cor. 9. 22.)

7. Tychicus was probably a native of Ephesus. He travelled with S. Paul during part of the apostle's third missionary tour. (See Acts 20. 4.) At the time this Epistle was written he was with S. Paul at Rome, where the sorely-tried prisoner found him to be indeed a beloved brother, and a faithful minister. S. Paul seems to have sent him to Proconsular Asia with the circular letter, known as Ephesians (see note on Eph. 1. 1), and at the same time he was made the bearer of the Colossian Epistle. A few years later Tychicus was with S. Paul again. (2 Tim. 4. 12; Tit. 3. 12.) To such men as Tychicus, whose very memory would have perished but for a few stray references in the Epistles, the debt of the Church will not be known until the day of Christ.

8. Whom I have sent unto you—have instructed him to visit Colossæ after leaving Laodicea (where there was a much larger church, to which, with other churches, the circular letter was sent). Laodicea was only a few miles from Colossæ, but the extra travelling Tychicus would have to undertake justifies S. Paul's language here. That ye may know your estate (R.V.). The A.V. has "that he might know your estate." But the R.V. reading is better. (See note on Phil. 1. 12.) S. Paul believes that when the Colossians "know his estate," and understand that his imprisonment is furthering rather than hindering the gospel, this will comfort their hearts. But THEOPHYLACT thinks the afflictions of the Colossians themselves and not of the apostle are meant.

9. Onesimus. (See the notes on Philemon.) The faithful and beloved brother. He had run away from Colossæ a dishonest and worthless slave, but so genuine had been his repentance, and so real his faith, that S. Paul is now able to apply to him the words "faithful and beloved."

10. Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner—"such was Epaphras likewise for a time (Philem. 23). Ye have received directions—namely, by Tychicus, bringing this letter. The ancients adapted their language to the time of reading the letter; not, as we do, to the time when it was written. It is not improbable, they might have scrupled to receive him, without this fresh direction, after he had left S. Paul, and 'departed from the work'"—WESLEY.

Aristarchus. (Comp. Acts 19. 29; 20. 4; 27. 2.) He was a Thessalonian. My fellow-prisoner. Aristarchus and Epaphras (see Philem. 23) were both S. Paul's "fellow-prisoners." Whether they were actual prisoners, or only such in the sense of voluntarily sharing S. Paul's captivity, we do not know. Mark, the cousin of Barnabas. Probably "John surnamed Mark" (Acts 12. 12, 25; 15. 27). Ye received commandments—either by an earlier messenger, or in a letter which has not been preserved. If the missionary work of Mark should bring him to Colossæ, he is to be well received.

11. These—"three, Aristarchus, Marcus, and Justus—of all the circumcision—that is, of all my Jewish fellow-labourers—are the only fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God—that is, in preaching the gospel—who have been a comfort to me. What, then, can we expect that all our fellow-workers should be a comfort to us?"—WESLEY.

Jesus—the Greek form of the Hebrew "Joshua." "Its use here as a designation of an obscure Jewish Christian proves that the Eternal Son bore on earth not merely a human name but a name given to ordinary men"—BEET. Justus—a Latin surname meaning "righteous." This is the only place where Jesus Justus is named. Who are of the circumcision—circumcised Jews. These only, etc., so R.V. and A.V. But it is far better so to punctuate as to render, of those who are of the circumcision these only, etc. For the other Jews were adding to his trials. (Phil. 1. 17.)

12. Perfect—"endued with every Christian grace. Filled—as no longer being babes, but grown up to the measure of the stature of Christ; being full of His light, grace, wisdom, holiness"—WESLEY.

Epaphras. Must not be confounded with "Epaphroditus" (Phil. 2. 25). He was probably a native of Colossæ and the founder of the church there. His great services to the gospel account for his receiving the title servant of Jesus Christ, only used by S. Paul of himself, Timothy, and Epaphras. Always wrestling in his prayers, that ye may stand perfect and fully assured in all the will of God. The presence of Gnostic influences at Colossæ, those so insidious perils to perfection and full assurance, had reached the ears of Epaphras in Rome, and called forth these strivings in prayer for his fellow-townsmen.

13. Colossæ, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, all lay near together in the valley of the Lycus, and Epaphras had no doubt done good work in all three cities.

14. Luke, the physician—"such he had been, at least, if he was not then"—WESLEY.

Luke, the beloved physician — a Gentile and the writer of the Third Gospel, with its continuation the Acts. Demas — nothing is here said in praise of Demas. Perhaps (but we can only hazard a guess) the love of the world named in 2 Tim. 4. 10 had already begun to impair his usefulness.

15. Nymphas — "probably an eminent Christian at Laodicea"—WESLEY.

Salute the brethren in Laodicea — with whom some at least of the Colossians would often meet, the two cities being only twelve miles apart. Among these brethren was Nymphas, whose house had been thrown open for Christian worship.

16. The Epistle from Laodicea — "not to Laodicea. Perhaps some letter had been written to S. Paul from thence"—WESLEY.

And when this Epistle has been read among you—which would probably be done by reading it aloud next time the Colossian believers met for worship—cause . . . Laodiceans, among whom also Gnostic influences were at work. The Epistle from Laodicea—the circular letter now known as the Epistle to the Ephesians. (See note on Eph. 1. 1.)

17. And say to Archippus—"one of the pastors of that church—take heed. It is the duty of the flock to try them that say they are apostles; to reject the false, and to warn, as well as to receive, the real. The ministry—not a lordship, but a service; a laborious and painful work; an obligation to do and suffer all things; to be the least, and the servant, of all. In the Lord—Christ; by whom, and for whose sake, we receive the various gifts of the Holy Spirit"—WESLEY.

"The ministry which Archippus had received was in the Lord, a ministry, or service, referring to the gospel, and to be fulfilled with a view to the welfare of the Church. It comprised, as is probable, all that is included in the ministerial and pastoral office; the preaching of the word, and the maintenance of discipline"—Dr. BUNTING. Ignorant as we are of the local circumstances, we cannot explain why S. Paul does not address himself directly to Archippus, as he does to Euodias and Syntche in Phil. 4. 2. Many think that Archippus had been left in charge during the absence of Epaphras. Say ye to Archippus—"perhaps S. Paul thought thus to inspire in him a sense of responsibility to the whole Church"—BEET.

18. The salutation of me Paul. After conveying the greetings of those with him, S. Paul concludes with his own. With mine own hand. (Comp. 2 Thess. 3. 17; 1 Cor. 15. 21.) S. Paul generally added a few closing words in his own handwriting to guard against forgeries. Remember my bonds. (See note on Eph. 6. 20.) As the captive apostle takes the pen from his amanuensis, he feels the chains dragging at his wrist. And that his readers may be moved to earnest prayer on his behalf, he adds with deep and unaffected pathos, Remember my bonds. In answer to such prayers grace will be given him. That same gift he desires for them; and closes this profound Epistle with the simple and dignified benediction, Grace be with you.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

"THIS is the first of all the Epistles which S. Paul wrote. Thessalonica was one of the chief cities of Macedonia. Hither S. Paul went after the persecution at Philippi; but he had not preached here long before the unbelieving Jews raised a tumult against him and Silvanus and Timotheus. On this the brethren sent them away to Berea. Thence S. Paul went by sea to Athens, and sent for Silvanus and Timotheus to come speedily to him. But being in fear lest the Thessalonian converts should be moved from their steadfastness, after a short time he sends Timotheus to them to know the state of their church. Timotheus returning found the apostle at Corinth; from whence he sent them this Epistle, about a year after he had been at Thessalonica.

—WESLEY.

To the Thessalonians I.

So the title runs in the oldest copies. S. Paul's Epistles were at first gathered into a single volume by themselves, entitled "The Apostle." Within this volume the Epistles were distinguished simply by the names of those to whom they were addressed. The order of this earliest collection was the same as appears in our English Bibles (except that the position of the Epistle to the Hebrews varied—now fourth, now tenth, and then last of the fourteenth). The Thessalonian letters came last in the second group, which consisted of five smaller Epistles addressed to the churches—Ephesians to 2 Thessalonians. This was not the order of time, but of magnitude and supposed importance.

THE ADDRESS AND SALUTATION.

This being the earliest of S. Paul's extant letters, let us note with care the form of his address and introduction, for it is that from which he never departed. But his greetings were enlarged as time went on, and varied with every variation in the circumstances of his readers and in his relations to them.

CHAPTER I.

1. Paul. "In this Epistle S. Paul neither uses the title of an apostle, nor any other, as writing to pious and simple-hearted men, with the utmost familiarity. There is a peculiar sweetness in this Epistle, unmixed with any sharpness or reproof: those evils which the apostles afterward reproved having not yet crept into the church"—WESLEY.

"There is no apostolic title given in this salutation, which would certainly have been assumed by a forger. The omission may be studiously in consonance with the character of this Epistle, which has little of the tonic severity of some others, and presents a picture drawn with the softest pencil of Christian love"—S. C. "In God the Father, etc. All things in their highest aspect — churches, individuals, the actions, feelings, and moods of men—are in Christ. They pass out of themselves into union with the Divine nature"—JOWETT. Paul — here and in the Second Epistle S. Paul introduces himself without the title "Apostle," or any personal designation. Similarly in his much later Epistle to the Philippians, and to his friend Philemon. For in these cases he has no need to stand on his dignity. He is "gentle among them, as a nurse with her children" (ch. 2. 6–8); and prefers, as in writing to Philemon (ver. 9), to merge the apostle in the friend Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus. "Silvanus and Timotheus" had been S. Paul's companions at Thessalonica. The apostle was accustomed to associate with himself in writing to the churches any of his helpers present with him and known to his readers. This was courteous, and promoted mutual sympathy.

SECTION I.—Vers. 2–10. THE THANKSGIVING AND THE REASONS FOR IT.—In every Epistle, except Galatians, the apostle's first words are of thanks and praise to God for the fruits of God's grace found in his readers, according to his own maxim (ch. 5. 18), "In everything give thanks." And his thanksgiving is expressed here in the fullest and warmest terms. This long sentence is a good example of S. Paul's manner as a writer. His thought flows on in a single rapid stream, turning now hither, now thither, but always advancing towards its goal. His sentences are not built up in regular and distinct periods, but grow and extend themselves like living things under our eyes, "gaining force in each successive clause by the repetition and expansion of the preceding"—JOWETT.

2. We give thanks to God always for you all. "We," i.e. the three above-named. Here, as in Phil. 1. 4, he has thankfulness and joy over them "all"; no other churches seem to have been so much to the apostle's mind as these two. And everything dear to him or useful to others in his friends moves him to gratitude toward God on their account. This S. Paul felt that he "owed to God" (2 Thess. 1. 3), the Source of all goodness in men; and it was the best and safest way of commending them. Making mention of you in our prayers—i.e. "when engaged in prayer." As often as the apostle and his companions prayed, the Thessalonian church came to their mind; and, with supplication, praise on their behalf constantly mingled.

3. Remembering in the sight of God—"that is, praising Him for it—your work of faith—your active, ever-working faith—and labour of love—love continually labouring for the bodies or souls of men. They who do not thus labour, do not love. Faith works, love labours, hope patiently suffers all things"—WESLEY.

Remembering, i.e. "how active and faithful your faith has shown itself to be, how devoted and unwearied your love, and what fortitude your hope in the Lord Jesus has inspired." Faith, love, and hope are the essence of practical Christianity. There was a remarkable vigour, a moral courage and activity, in the life of this church, over which the apostle rejoiced even more than he did in the eloquence and knowledge of the church of Corinth. (1 Cor. 1. 5.) "Warmth of heart and practical energy were the distinguishing features of Thessalonian Christianity"—C. B. The Thessalonians' work of faith was manifest especially in the two forms of toil of love, and endurance of hope. Similarly in 2 Thess. 1. 3, 4, 'faith' is joined with 'love' (the 'charity' of 1. Cor. 13) on the one side, and with patience on the other. These are the two chief branches of Christian work—loving service to the brethren and our fellow-men (comp. ch. 4. 10; 5. 13), and fearless testimony for Christ before the world, with endurance of the loss and suffering this may entail (vers. 6, 7; 2. 13, 14; 3. 2–4)—'the good fight of faith' (1 Tim. 6. 12). So we see the Christian life in its simplest elements—'a faith that had its outward effect on your lives; a love that spent itself in the service of others; a hope that was no transient feeling, but was content to wait for the things unseen, when it should be revealed'"—JOWETT. "If joy is the key-note of the Epistle to the Philippians, hope is that of the present epistle"—ELLICOTT.

4. Knowing your election—"which is through faith, by these plain proofs"—WESLEY.

"The apostle thinks of his readers as brethren, for he has just been carrying them in his thoughts in prayer 'before our God and Father.' The knowledge that God their Father loves them and has chosen them for His own gives confidence to the apostle's prayers for them and inexpressible joy to his thanksgivings. (Comp. 2 Thess. 2. 13.) 'We are bound to give thanks always for you, brethren beloved by the Lord, because God from the beginning chose you,' etc.; and Eph. 1. 3–5, 'Blessed be God . . . who blessed us in every spiritual blessing . . . according as He chose us in Christ,' etc. The word election, here occurring for the first time in S. Paul's Epistles, and expressing one of his most important doctrines, needs to be carefully studied. The New Testament use of the word originates in the Old Testament idea of Israel as God's 'peculiar possession,' 'the people whom He chose for His inheritance' (see Ps. 33. 12; 35. 4; Deut. 14. 2; Isa. 43. 1-7, etc.). Such 'election' implies two things—(1) selection out of others, nations or men, who are not thus chosen—'the rest' ch. 4. 13; 5. 6); and (2) appropriation by God for His own love and service. Since Israel as a people now rejected Christ, S. Paul was compelled to distinguish between national Israel and the true 'election,' the spiritual kernel of the chosen people, who were the real objects of God's favour: 'the election obtained what Israel seeks after, but the rest were hardened' (Rom. 11. 7). With this true election, through Christ, all believing Gentiles are identified—'wild olive-shoots, grafted into the good olive tree' (Rom. 11. 17-24). So the nation gives place to a spiritual election—the 'Israel of God' (Gal. 6. 16); and the Apostle Paul applies the term, as in this place, to Jewish and Gentile members of the Church indiscriminately. God's choice of men for His purposes must, of course, precede their choice of Him and of His salvation; but it in no way precludes human choice and freedom of will—nay, rather anticipates and prepares for our free volition (comp. Rom. 8. 28–30), and invites us to be 'workers together' with it for our salvation: 'work out your own salvation . . . for it is God that worketh in you' (Phil. 2. 12, 13)"—C. B.

5. With power—"piercing the very heart with a sense of sin; and deeply convincing you of your want of a Saviour from guilt, misery, and eternal ruin. With the Holy Ghost—bearing an outward testimony, by miracles, to the truth of what we preached, and you felt: also by His descent through laying on of hands. With much assurance—lit. with 'full assurance,' and 'much' of it: the Spirit bearing witness by shedding the love of God abroad in your hearts, which is the highest testimony that can be given. And these signs, if not the miraculous gifts, always attend the preaching of the gospel, unless it be in vain: neither are the extraordinary operations of the Holy Ghost ever wholly withheld, where the gospel is preached with power, and men are alive to God. For your sake—seeking your advantage, not our own"—WESLEY.

The R.V. reads, how that our gospel, etc.; better perhaps "in that"; the difference is slight: in any case, the conversion of the Thessalonians, described in vers. 5, 6, was not that wherein their election consisted, but wherein it was evidenced. Paul and Silas were conscious in declaring their message of a power beyond all words attending it, which made them sure at the time that it would not be in vain. It was evident to them that God "had much people in this city." Our gospel is God's good news about Jesus Christ, proclaimed by His servants. (See Rom. 1. 1–5.) ELLICOTT says (In word only), "It did not consist merely of so much eloquent instruction, but also we found we were speaking with a conscious power,—indeed, with all the force of the Holy Ghost—and with an overmastering conviction that we were right and should prevail." That by the power, assurance, etc., are meant the preacher's own, and not the people's, is proved by the next clause, as ye know.

6. "Though in much affliction, yet with much joy"—WESLEY.

And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord (R.V. "imitators of us," etc.). (Comp. ch. 2. 14; 2 Thess. 3. 9, where the same correction is made.) An "imitator" not only accepts the teaching of another, but copies his example. This imitation consisted (1) in the joyful endurance of suffering for the gospel's sake, as the following words show (comp. ch. 2. 2, 14, 15, etc.); but (2) also in the vigour which marked the life of this church, corresponding to that of the apostle's ministry amongst them (ver. 4). Observe two things here—(1) How inspiring to the Thessalonians to be told they were walking in the very steps "of the Lord"; this makes toil welcome, and shame glorious. (2) How bold in the apostle, and what a good conscience he kept, that he could identify following himself with following Christ. (Comp. 1 Cor. 11. 1, "Be imitators of me, even as I also of Christ.")

7. So that ye were ensamples—"the sense really is, that there were in that church as many examples as individuals. They became so many moulds of form for the Christian life"—S. C. S. Paul imitated Christ, the Thessalonians him (ver. 6), and all neighbouring Christians took pattern by them. So good example spreads.

8. For from you the word sounded forth—"Thessalonica being a city of great commerce. Being echoed, as it were, from you. And your conversion was divulged far beyond Macedonia and Achaia. So that we need not speak anything—concerning it"—WESLEY.

"For from you sounded out the word of the Lord—better 'hath sounded out, or resounded.' The Greek word suggests a clear ringing note, 'as of a trumpet' (Chrysostom); and the tense (perfect) implies no transient sound, but a continuing effect. 'The word of the Lord,' is the standing Old Testament designation for God's revealed will—all that, as the Lord, He says to men. But 'the Lord' is now Christ in His Divine authority and glory; and this title of Christ is notably frequent in our two Epistles. Only in them is this expression applied by S. Paul to the gospel. (Comp. ch. 4. 15; 2 Thess. 3. 1.) Afterwards he calls it 'the word of God,' or 'of Christ'—'not men's word, but as it is in truth, God's word' (ch. 2. 13). The fullest declaration of the authorship and purport of this 'word' is from the lips of S. Peter, in Acts 10. 36, 'The word which God sent,—in good tidings of peace through Jesus Christ: He is Lord of all'"—C. B. Read this in close connection with the next verse. It is as much as to say, "No need for us to tell the story. We hear of it from all sides; everywhere people are talking about your conversion and your brave testimony for Christ."

9. For they themselves — "the people wherever we come"—WESLEY.

For they themselves show of us (R.V.)—rather, "report concerning us." "They" points to "those in Macedonia and Achaia" and "in every place,"—any whom the apostle visited, or to whom he had thought of sending the news. "Instead of waiting to be told by us, we find them spreading the joyful news already!" And this self-diffusing report concerned not the Thessalonians alone, but S. Paul and his colleagues. It published their success at this great city, and helped their further progress: they report . . . what kind of an entrance we had unto you. The "faith toward God" defined in this verse, is the faith of the whole Bible, in which from the first to the last God asserts Himself as "the Living and True," against the ten thousand forms of human idolatry. In the next verse he advances to that which was distinctively Christian in their new creed.

10. Whom He hath raised from the dead —"in proof of His future coming to judgment. Who delivereth us—He redeemed us once; He delivers us continually; and will deliver all that believe from the wrath, the eternal vengeance, which will then come upon the ungodly"—WESLEY.

"It has been said to be remarkable that S. Paul should here make 'the essence of the gospel consist, not in belief in Christ, nor in taking up His cross, but in the hope of His coming again.' But S. Paul does not give us the slightest ground for thinking that he is here defining 'the essence of the gospel.' With S. Paul, as with all great Christian thinkers, different aspects of the gospel will acquire especial importance at different times. The seasons of the year are represented variously in S. Paul's writings. The breath of Advent-tide blows about the First Epistle to the Thessalonians"—S. C. And to wait for His Son from heaven . . . even Jesus — lit. "from the heavens"; comp. 2 Cor. 12. 2, "the third heaven"; and Heb. 4. 14, "Jesus . . . who (in ascending) hath passed through the heavens." "Heaven" is a plural word in Hebrew, and its conception was manifold, implying the existence of successive regions and stages, like the courts and chambers of the tabernacle, leading up to the innermost immediate presence-chamber of the Most High. "Whom He raised from the dead. Raised from the dead, Jesus was exalted as God's Son, and man's Saviour, and Lord of all things, to the highest heaven (Eph. 1. 20-22); and in this character He will return, as He said, 'with His Father's glory and with the holy angels,' to 'render to every man according to his deeds' (Matt. 16. 27; Mark 8. 38). The resurrection was the first step in Christ's glorification, the pledge of all the rest. How Jesus 'delivers us' from the wrath impending over sinful men, S. Paul does not tell us here; he had certainly taught the Thessalonians. In ch. 5. 8-10 he opposes to God's 'wrath' 'salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us'; and this shows that he had proclaimed at Thessalonica the same doctrine of reconciliation through the cross which he expounds in the next group of his Epistles, and which was the core of his gospel from the beginning"—C. B.

CHAPTER II.

SECTION II.—Vers. 1-12. THE APOSTLE'S CONDUCT AT THESSALONICA.—1. "What was proposed (1 Thess. 1. 5, 6) is now largely treated of: concerning S. Paul and his fellow-labourers, vers. 1-12; concerning the Thessalonians, vers. 13-16"—WESLEY.

"This verse might be rendered somewhat more freely in English idiom, For you know of yourselves, brethren, that our coming amongst you has not proved vain. The appeal made to the recollections and experience of the readers is characteristic of these letters (see vers. 2, 5, 10, 11; ch. 1. 5). Concerning the 'entrance' of the missionaries amongst them the Thessalonians know better than any-one else, 'that it hath not been found vain' (R.V.). And not merely did the coming of Christ's servants produce a striking impression at the time; their work has proved thoroughly successful. Its fruit is permanent"—FINDLAY.

2. We had suffered—"in several places. We are bold—notwithstanding. With much contention—notwithstanding both inward and outward conflicts of all kinds"—WESLEY.

Shamefully treated—implies insult and injury combined, such as constituted a legal crime. This accords with the protest of Paul and Silas against the Philippian magistrates (Acts 16. 37), "They have beaten us, publicly, uncondemned, being Romans!" Such indignities the apostle felt keenly; they add a distinct element to his sufferings. As to the circumstances of the missionaries' visit to Philippi and their experience there, read carefully Acts 16. Instead of being daunted by the violence they suffered, Paul and Silas at Philippi "sang praises to God at midnight, with their feet fast in the stocks." And God there signally vindicated His servants and turned their shame to honour. So we are not surprised to read of the holy confidence with which they declared their message at Thessalonica: we waxed bold (R.V.)—or, "took courage in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God amid much conflict." The last words of the clause explain the first, on which the emphasis rests. The "conflict" that broke out at Philippi continued under another form at Thessalonica, and the apostles needed all their courage and faith in God to sustain them in entering on their ministry in this new city. Throughout the first European mission it required a hard struggle to win for the gospel a footing anywhere. There was much conflict.

3. For our exhortation—"that is, our preaching. A part is put for the whole. Is not, at any time, of deceit—we preach not a lie, but the truth of God. Nor of uncleanness—with any unholy or selfish view. This expression is not always appropriated to lust, although it is sometimes emphatically applied thereto. Nor in guile—but with great plainness of speech"—WESLEY.

Exhortation hardly conveys his full meaning—"our appeal" is perhaps better; it is the practical "appeal," or "address," which "the gospel of God," as the missionaries of Christ preach it everywhere, makes to its hearers. "The whole gospel preaching and message is so-called, as permeated by and living in an atmosphere of gentle, soothing affection. Religion has been defined as morality tinctured by emotion. Much more truly is the whole gospel a system tinctured by emotion. As addressed to the careless, slothful, tempted, fallen, it is an exhortation; as addressed to the sad and seeking, it is solace and comfort. It is the gospel exhortation, which is never without a certain soothing, sympathetic sweetness"—S. C. Professor JOWETT says: "Many passages of the New Testament lead us to suppose that there existed in the age of the apostles a connection between the form of spirituality and licentiousness. Of this S. Paul declares his innocence, and with it he elsewhere upbraids the false teachers."

4. As we have been approved by God to be entrusted. "The apostle had been tested for his work, and tested by it; God had made proof of him as a minister of Christ, and he was shown to be worthy of his trust; tried, then trusted. (Comp. 1 Tim. 1. 12.) 'To be put in trust with the gospel' is the highest conceivable responsibility; the sense of it is enough to exclude every base motive and deceitful practice (ver. 3). On S. Paul's 'trust' read 1 Tim. 1. 12–17 and Acts 9. 15, 16: 'He is a chosen vessel unto Me.' S. Paul tells us elsewhere, and by way of example, that he 'pleased all in all things for their good, unto edification.' (1 Cor. 10. 33; Rom. 15. 2.) To please men in that which displeases God, is to injure them: 'If (in such circumstances) I pleased men, I should not be Christ's slave' (Gal. 1. 10). That is, to be the slave of public opinion—often an ignorant, sometimes an unprincipled master"—FINDLAY.

5. Flattering words—"this ye know. Nor a cloke of covetousness—of this God is witness. He calls men to witness an open fact—God, the secret intentions of the heart. In a point of a mixed nature (ver. 10), he appeals both to God and man"—WESLEY.

"We did not use words such as flattery uses, or pretexts such as avarice uses"—JOWETT. "We did not allow ourselves to be drawn into an atmosphere of perpetual flattery in speech, nor into a long deception arising from self-seeking"—S. C. A cloke of covetousness. "No man will profess himself covetous; but he will for very shame cast as handsome a cloke over it as he can (frugality, some cloke or other), to hide the filthiness of it from the sight of others"—Bishop SANDERSON.

In repudiating the cloke of covetousness he appeals to God as witness (comp. Rom. 1. 9, "God is my witness, whom I serve in my spirit in the gospel of His Son"; also Rom. 2. 15; 9. 1), "God, who proveth our hearts" (ver. 4). The "cloke" signifies the pretext of an affected self-devotion, such as might be used to conceal the "covetousness" of a selfish heart. "God is witness," he says, "that no secret avarice was hidden behind our zeal for your salvation." "The Greek word for covetousness denotes 'greed' of any kind—oftenest, but not always or necessarily, for money; it is the spirit of self-aggrandisement, selfishness as a ruling passion. Such a motive in the servant of God would constitute the 'uncleanness' denied in ver. 3. This verse gives double evidence of the pure zeal for God professed in vers. 3 and 4—the one outward and of the lips, the other inward and known only to God in the heart. Contrast the opposite description of Ps. 12. 2, 'A flattering lip, and a double heart'"—C. B.

6. Nor from others—"who would have honoured us more, if we had been burdensome—that is, taken state upon ourselves"—WESLEY.

The motive of ambition—"that last infirmity of noble minds"—rises above the selfishness just disclaimed; but it is just as warmly repudiated, for it is equally inconsistent with the single-mindedness of men devoted to the glory of God. Our Lord finds in superiority to human praise the mark of a sincere faith: "How can ye believe," He asks, "who receive honour one of another, and the glory which cometh from the only God ye seek not?" (John 5. 44.)

7. But we were gentle—"mild, tender—in the midst of you—like a hen surrounded with her young. Even as a nurse cherisheth her own children—the offspring of her own womb"—WESLEY.

Among you—"rather, 'in the midst of you,' making the gentleness still more marked. Her—in the Greek emphatically 'her own.' The contrast is drawn between the charlatan—licentious, sophistical, fawning, greedy, vainglorious teachers, to whom Greeks were well accustomed, and the apostles, sitting familiarly like mothers amidst a group of their own children, fondling them for warmth to their bosoms. 'Keep a mother's heart for men,' was the advice which made Henri Perreyve's life so winning"—ELLICOTT.

8. To impart our own souls—"to lay down our lives for your sake"—WESLEY.

The apostles were not merely willing (A.V.) to bestow themselves on the Thessalonians, they actually did so, and with the glad consent of a mother nourishing the babe from her own life. The same verb is rendered "thought-good" in ch. 3. 1; and the corresponding noun is "good-pleasure" in 2 Thess. 1. 11.

9. S. Paul's motives in continuing to work were three—(1) independence, the being able to take what has been ingeniously called 'a lay position'; (2) example (2 Thess. 3. 8, 9);

(3) charity, having something to give in alms (Acts 20. 34)"—S. C. S. Paul was a "tent-maker by trade." (Acts 18. 3.) "Jewish fathers, even if wealthy, had their sons taught some mechanical craft as a remedy against poverty or idleness; and S. Paul had learnt in his youth at Tarsus the business of cutting out and stitching the coarse goats' hair cloth used in Cilicia for making tents. He found this skill in his wandering apostleship a great resource"—FINDLAY.

10. Holily—"in the things of God. Justly—with regard to men. Unblamable—in respect of ourselves. Among you that believe—who were the constant observers of our behaviour"—WESLEY.

Ye are witnesses. Abruptly, without conjunction, the writers add a summary description of their conduct at Thessalonica; before, they had dwelt on details, now on the broad characteristics. As in ver. 5, God is appealed to, because the readers could only judge of the outward propriety of their teachers conduct; and it is a moral law that (as ARISTOTLE says), "the righteous man is not he that does acts which in themselves are righteous, but he that does those acts in such a mind as befits righteous men."

11. "By exhorting, we are moved to do a thing willingly; by comforting, to do it joyfully; by charging, to do it carefully"—WESLEY.

The apostle compared himself to a "nurse-mother" (ver. 7) in his tender, gentle affection; now he is a father in the fidelity and manly strength of his counsels. (Comp. 1 Cor. 4. 14–21, where he gives a different turn to the figure.) Exhorting is the general term for animating address. (Comp. notes on ver. 3, and ch. 3. 2.) "Encouraging" (as in ch. 5. 14, John 11. 19, 31; rendered uniformly in A.V. "comforting") is the calming and consoling side of exhortation, as addressed to the afflicted or the weak. "Testifying" (same word as in Gal. 5. 3; Eph. 4. 17; Acts 26. 22) supplies its solemn, warning element. The Thessalonian church was both suffering and tempted, and the apostle's ministry to them had been at once consolatory and admonitory. So are his two Epistles.

12. "To His kingdom here, and glory hereafter"—WESLEY.

"It was God's message the apostles of Christ had brought to the Thessalonians (vers. 2, 9); 'unto God, the living and true,' they had 'turned from their idols to serve' Him (ch. 1. 9). They must, therefore, now live a life worthy of God—worthy of those who have such a God and are His servants and sons. Nowhere, perhaps, does S. Paul lay such continued emphasis on the relation of the Christian believer to God as in these Epistles. To 'walk worthy of God' is the noblest possible ideal of life; so high that it would appear visionary and impracticable, if it were not for what follows:—(Worthy of God) who hath called you unto His kingdom and glory. According to the truer reading, 'who calleth'—for it is a call that continues till its purpose is accomplished. (Comp. ch. 4. 8, 'God who giveth His Holy Spirit,' R.V.); and 'into His own kingdom,' etc."—FINDLAY.

SECTION III.—Vers. 13–16. JEWISH PERSECUTORS OF THE CHURCH.—This short paragraph is of peculiar interest. The apostle was at the time exposed in his Gentile mission to the bitterest persecution from the unbelieving Jews, as we gather from the contemporary narrative of Acts (ch. 16–18). And he employs against them in vers. 15, 16, language more severe than is found in any other of his writings. Evidently he regarded the Jews as being now, in the counsels of God, a doomed nation (ver. 16). Accordingly we find him in Rom. (ch. 9–11.) a few years later, arguing upon the reprobation of "Israel after the flesh" as a settled thing. We observe, too, his desire (ver. 14) to draw the Jewish and Gentile sections of the Church nearer to each other in sympathy under the stress of persecution.

13. Literally the clause reads, you accepted not men's word, but as it is truly, God's word. "Men's word"—the mere word of "Paul and Silas and Timothy." The Thessalonians accepted God's word as God's, with reverence and faith. They recognised in what they heard from Paul and Silas a higher Voice, the message of the living and true God, calling them to life eternal. The success of religious teaching lies in its power to make God's voice audible through human speech. If the preacher cannot do this, he does nothing. S. Paul considers the receiving the word of God, not as an independent act of his readers, but as an operation of God's grace in them. To Him therefore, alone, are thanks for it also due.

14. Ye suffered the same things—"the same fruit, the same afflictions, and the same experience, at all times and in all places, are an excellent criterion of evangelical truth. As they from the Jews—their countrymen"—WESLEY.

"More strictly, which are in Judea in Christ Jesus (R.V.). 'In Judea' is the local, 'in Christ Jesus' the spiritual, habitat of these churches. This latter phrase—an expression characteristic of St. Paul, and frequent in subsequent Epistles—signifies 'in union and communion with Him, incorporated with Him who is the Head' of His body the Church"—ELLICOTT.

15. Us—"apostles and preachers of the gospel. They please not God—nor are they even careful to please Him, notwithstanding their fair professions. And are contrary to all men—are common enemies of mankind; not only by their continual seditions and insurrections, and by their utter contempt of all other nations; but, in particluar, by their endeavouring to hinder their hearing or receiving the gospel"—WESLEY.

Killed the Lord Jesus. "The title the Lord here is not simply one of usual reverence. There is an undertone of horror, indignation, and realisation of their guilt in it. 'They killed the Lord Jesus'—Him, who as their Master, they were bound to serve. The title is an addition to their guilt. (Comp. 1 Cor. 2. 8)"—S. C. "A tremendous invective against the Jews, the purpose of which is—(1) to show the deep sympathy of S. Paul with the persecuted Thessalonians, and his indignation against the persecutors; (2) to make them see still more deeply the value of their faith by the efforts made to keep it from them. Objection is often made to S. John's Gospel, on the ground that no born Jew could have written of 'the Jews' in the bitter way so common in that book, or viewed them so completely as a separate body from himself. This passage, in an indubitable Epistle of 'a Hebrew of the Hebrews,' seems a satisfactory answer. The memories of S. Stephen's speech (Acts 7. 52) seem to be waking in the mind of him who was once a persecuting Jew himself"—ELLICOTT.

16. To fill up—"the measure of their sins always, as they have ever done. But the vengeance of God is come upon them—hath overtaken them unawares, whilst they were seeking to destroy others, and will speedily complete their destruction"—WESLEY.

May be saved (R.V.). As much as to say "These Jews, if they had their way, would prevent us speaking a single word to you about the gospel; they would willingly see all the Gentiles perish!" This stamped them as enemies of the human race. They were furious to think that unclean Gentiles claimed a share in their Messiah. Their murderous hatred against S. Paul was due to the fact that he preached Christ to the heathen and declared God to be the God of Jews and Gentiles equally, saving both alike through faith in Christ.

To fill up their sins alway. "After the death of Christ a space for repentance was allowed them, the 'forty years' alluded to in Heb. 3. 9, 17. Had they accepted Christ's message of reconciliation through the apostles, and become His witnesses to the Gentiles, the judgment would have been averted. (Acts 3. 19.) The measure allowed to the nation's sins was not yet full; but this last refusal made their cup overflow—slowly filling, as it had been, for many ages. 'Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers,' Jesus had said to them (Matt. 23. 32); and this they had done, beyond all question. The phrase 'fill up their sins,' signifying ripeness for judgment, is used in Gen. 15. 16 of the Amorites in Abraham's time—an ominous parallel"—FINDLAY. "The Jews for stoning the prophet—but most of all for crucifying the Son of God—brought blood-guiltiness, not only upon themselves. (Matt. 27. 25.) The 'wrath of God,' therefore, coming upon them to the uttermost, and abiding upon their posterity even to this day, wherever they still remain, scattered almost everywhere"—Bishop SANDERSON.

SECTION IV.—Ver. 17-3. 13. S. PAUL'S PRESENT RELATIONS TO THE THESSALONIANS.—The apostle had been drawn aside in the last paragraph, by a sudden and characteristic burst of feeling, from the main purpose of his letter.

17. "In this verse we have a remarkable instance, not so much of the transient affections of holy grief, desire, or joy, as of that abiding tenderness, that loving temper, which is so apparent in all S. Paul's writings, towards those he styles his children in the faith. This is the more carefully to be observed, because the passions occasionally exercising themselves, and flowing like a torrent, in the apostle, are observable to every reader; whereas it requires a nicer attention to discern those calm standing tempers, that fixed posture of his soul, from whence the others only flow out, and which more particularly distinguish his character"—WESLEY.

Now comes a change of subject: no longer the memories of the time when S. Paul was among them, but his hopes and fears about them since he left. ELLICOTT paraphrases the verse: "But while you were being persecuted by these reprobate Jews, we, who were driven away from you, were longing to come back to see whether your faith was such an effectual working faith as to support you through it all."

18. Satan—"by those persecuting Jews (Acts 17. 13)"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul had not come at all; but it was not for want of will. And the apostle had made up his mind to this more than once—both once and twice. Silas had, no doubt, shared in the wish and endeavour to return from Berœa; the second attempt, likewise frustrated, was made by the apostle alone, from Athens (ch. 3. 1). The expression recurs in Phil. 4. 16. (Comp. with the whole statement Rom. 1. 13, 'Many times I purposed to come to you, and have been hindered hitherto.') The apostle's prophetic gift did not save him from the discipline of disappointment. We may paraphrase the sentence thus: We strove eagerly to find means of coming to see you; indeed, for my part, I had made up my mind to do it more than once; and our way was blocked, by Satan! What form the hindrance took we can only guess. Jewish malice doubtless had much to do with it. But behind this baffling and unforeseen combination of circumstances the apostle discerned the craft of the arch-enemy. Satan, i.e. 'the Adversary,' is the Old Testament name of the leader of evil spirits, the great enemy of God and man—called also 'the devil' (slanderer), 'the evil one' (2 Thess. 3. 3), and 'the tempter' (ch. 3. 5). Satan is, throughout the New Testament, a real personality, and no figure of speech"—C. B.

19. Ye also—"as well as our other children"—WESLEY.

Crown of rejoicing — or "of boasting"; "crowns that we are proud to wear," like victors in the games.

20. For ye are our glory and joy—or, "Yea, verily, you are our glory and joy." Emphasis rests both on "ye" and "are." This delight was not matter of hope alone (ver. 19), but of present fact. See ch. 1. 2–4 and 3. 9, "The joy wherewith we rejoice on your account before our God"; and 2 Thess. 1. 4, "We glory in you in the churches of God." Glory is praise and honour from others; joy is one's own delight.

CHAPTER III.

1. We—"Paul and Silvanus—could bear no longer—our desire and fear for you"—WESLEY.

Bear is the same word as in 1 Cor. 13. 7, "Love beareth all things"—bears up under, holds out against. "This protracted separation and repeated disappointment was more than we could endure."

2. "This ungrudging praise is heaped upon Timothy, both to promote confidence in his messenger, and with a tender reference to the sacrifice which he was making in giving up the society of such a friend and helper"—S. C.

3. We are appointed hereto — "are in every respect laid in a fit posture for it, by the very design and contrivance of God Himself; for the trial and increase of our faith and all other graces. He gives riches to the world; but stores up His treasure of wholesome afflictions for His children"—WESLEY.

That no man be moved (R.V.). "Objective sentence, explaining and specifying the subject-matter of the exhortations"—ELLICOTT. Moved by these afflictions—which gave force to every temptation. It was Timothy's business to show that such trials ought not to disturb, but rather to confirm their faith.

4. For verily, when, etc.—"to appreciate the nature of the argument, see the passages referred to in the margin of the New Testament"—WESLEY.

All this is recalled to the minds of the readers and dwelt on with iteration, not to justify the apostle's foresight—for it needed no gift of prophecy to anticipate persecution at Thessalonica—but to make them realise how well they had been prepared for what they are now experiencing, and so far to reconcile them to it. (Comp. John 14. 29; 1 Pet. 4. 12, "Beloved, count it not strange.")

5. For this cause—"because I knew that temptation was sure to overtake you, I sent to see whether our work still lived, and was likely to live, in spite of it. To know your faith—to ascertain whether you still believed. Our labour be in vain—it is a sad thing to lose spiritual labour"—WESLEY.

6. But now when Timotheus was come to us from you—"immediately after his return, S. Paul wrote; while his joy was fresh, and his tenderness at the height"—WESLEY.

Timothy had already returned from his mission to Thessalonica, as related in Acts 18. 5, and the occasion of this present letter will be S. Paul's relief at the news brought by him. His return had been anxiously awaited; and no sooner has he arrived and told his story, than S. Paul sits down and writes out of a full heart this affectionate and grateful letter. For Timothy brought us glad tidings of your faith and love (R.V.). These comprise the whole Christian life, and imply the "hope in our Lord Jesus Christ" added to them in ch. 1. 3. (Comp. 2 Thess. 1. 3; Eph. 1. 15; Philem. 5–7; 1 John 3. 23.) "That we should believe in the name of His Son Jesus Christ, and love one another." This is the sum of our religion.

7. Were comforted—"their loyalty brought joy to him. So in 2 Cor. 7. 6, 7"—WESLEY.

8. Now we live—"indeed; we enjoy life: so great is our affection for you"—WESLEY.

We live—"expresses the highest joy. (Contrast 'I die daily,' 1 Cor. 15. 31. Oh what a tender heart he had, who yearned over his children with such affection that he could say, 'We live, if ye stand fast in the Lord'"—S. ANSELM. His heaviest burden, weighing down body and mind alike, was "the care of the churches" (2 Cor. 11. 28, 29). This passage, like the Epistle to the Galatians and the Second to Corinth, show S. Paul as a man of high-strung and ardent nature, sensitive in his affections to an extreme degree. His whole soul was bound up with the churches he had founded. (Comp. ch. 2. 8.) They were his "children," his "loved and longed for," his "joy and glory and crown of boasting." He lived for nothing else. Read in illustration of this, 2 Cor. 7. 2–16.

9. "The condition of alarm and depression which S. Paul had previously experienced made this rebound of joy the more vivid. Only those who have suffered much know joy in its full capacity, 'as dying, and behold we live! as sorrowing, but ever rejoicing' (2 Cor. 6. 9, 10)"—FINDLAY.

10. And perfect that which is wanting in your faith. "So S. Paul did not know that 'they who are once upon the rock no longer need to be taught by man'"—WESLEY.

"Bishop Wordsworth points out the unflattering faithfulness of S. Paul's dealing with his converts. What the deficiencies were is unknown, but they certainly include want of knowledge of the state of the dead, and concerning the advent. Timothy's return from Thessalonica and the news he brought while removing S. Paul's great anxiety, made him still more sensible of the need this young and most promising church had for the continued instruction which he alone could supply. This increased his eagerness to revisit the Thessalonians. For a similar wish — less warmly expressed, inasmuch as it concerned strangers — see Rom. 1. 9–15; 15. 23"—FINDLAY.

11. Direct our way — "this prayer is addressed to Christ, as well as to the Father" —WESLEY.

"It is beautiful to note through these Epistles in how many chapters the strain of exhortation is gently stirred by the sigh of prayer. (Comp. ch. 3. 11; 5. 23; 2 Thess. 1. 2; 2. 16; 3. 5–16)"—S. C.

"Literally the verse begins, But may our God, etc. There is a transition, by way of contrast, from the thought of S. Paul's own (human) wish and longing, that has been so fervently uttered, to the thought of God, who alone can fulfil His servant's desire. The prayers of ch. 5. 23 and 2 Thess. 2. 16 begin in the same style"—C. B.

12, 13. With all His, Christ's, saints— "both angels and men"—WESLEY.

Increase and abound—"multiply you in love until you have enough and to spare of it —and the same progress is expressed by the objects of the swelling charity. So that you may not only love one another abundantly, but all mankind—missionary efforts being the supreme work of Christian love—'such loving missionary work' as ours among you" — ELLICOTT. "The word you stands emphatically at the beginning of the sentence. 'I pray that He may smooth the way which we desire to take to you. But you—whatever comes of us, whether our way be made straight to you, or not — may He make you increase and abound.' 'The apostle, full of the Spirit, here piles together much which was suggested by his affection, and is not solicitous about words, but leaves some to be understood or passes over them in silence'"—S. C.

CHAPTER IV.

SECTION V. — Vers. 1–12. A LESSON IN CHRISTIAN MORALS. — "We now pass from the first to the second of the two main divisions of the Epistle, from narrative to exhortation. Chaps. 1–3 are complete in themselves, and the letter might fitly have terminated with the prayer just concluded (ch. 3. 11–13). For the apostle has accomplished the chief objects with which he began to write, viz. to assure his readers of the intense interest he takes in their welfare, to express his sympathy with them under their persecutions, and to explain how it was that he had not himself returned to them. But he cannot let the occasion pass without adding counsel and exhortation on certain subjects in which the Thessalonian church was specially in need of guidance. Chief amongst these were the misunderstandings that had arisen touching the second advent of Christ (ch. 4. 13–5. 11). But before he deals with this topic, there are a few things he wishes to say to them about morals and matters of conduct towards each other, which we have before us in this section. It is significant that the apostle puts these things first in his exhortation, although the question of the Parousia was of such absorbing interest. The topics embraced in this section are (1) and chiefly, that of chastity and the sanctification of the body (vers. 3–8); (2) brotherly love (vers. 9, 10); (3) diligence in secular work (vers. 11, 12)" — FINDLAY. This is the practical portion of the Epistle. The first point on which the Thessalonians need instruction is in the matter of social purity (vers. 1–8).

1. More and more. "It is not enough to have faith, even so as to please God, unless we 'abound more and more therein'" — WESLEY.

Beseech—"better 'request,' the word being one of calm and friendly asking, implying that the person so addressed will recognise the propriety of complying. By the Lord—rather, 'in the Lord.' It is not an adjuration, as in Rom. 12. 1, but states the authoritative ground of his request. 'We encourage you, on the strength of our union in the Lord Jesus.' (Comp. ch. 1. 1)"—ELLICOTT. "The apostle entreats and exhorts his readers to progress with the greatest earnestness in the Christian life, which they had begun, according to the instructions and commandments which they had received"—LUNEMANN.

2, 3. Sanctification — "entire holiness of heart and life: particular branches of it are subjoined—that ye abstain from fornication —a beautiful transition from sanctification to a single branch of the contrary; and this shows that nothing is so seemingly distant, or below our thoughts, but we have need to guard against it"—WESLEY.

S. Paul insists, with great solemnity, upon a truth which at various times, even in the Church, has been, if not denied yet half forgotten, that moral evils are always spiritual evils of the first magnitude. It is certainly remarkable that here, and elsewhere repeatedly, the apostle does not speak of this offence as of an evil scarcely known among, and little to be feared by, true believers, but rather as of an evil not only widely-spread but certain to assault them. Professor JOWETT says: "What he seems to penetrate is the inward nature of sin, not in its outward effects. Even its consequences in another state of being are but slightly touched upon in comparison with that living death which itself is. It is not merely a vice or a crime, or even an offence against the law of God, to be punished here or hereafter. It is more than this. It is what men feel within; not what shall be, but what is—a terrible consciousness, a communion with unseen powers of evil." FINDLAY adds;

"The foul and heathenish vice of fornication was so prevalent in Greek cities and so little condemned by public opinion—it was even fostered by some forms of pagan religion—that abstinence from it on the part of the Thessalonians was a sign of devotion to a holy God. But their purity was imperilled from the condition of society around them, and in many cases from former unchaste habits. The temptations to licentiousness assailing the first generation of Christians were fearfully strong; and all the Epistles contain urgent warnings upon this subject. The sense of purity had to be re-created in men gathered out of the midst of pagan corruption."

4. That everyone know—"for this requires knowledge, as well as chastity—to possess his vessel—his wife—in sanctification and honour—so as neither to dishonour God or himself, not to obstruct, but further, holiness; remembering, marriage is not designed to inflame, but to conquer, natural desires"—WESLEY.

Should know. The clause is simply parallel to the last, and, with it, explains the word "sanctification." He indicates that chastity is a matter that requires self-discipline and study. (Comp. Eph. 5. 17.) ELLICOTT says: "The body, which is chiefly meant here, is not dissociated from the man's personality, but also identified with it; the Incarnation has taught us the true dignity of the body. Thus it becomes easy to understand what is meant by 'knowing how to gain possession of' such an instrument as the body with its many faculties, rescuing it from its vile prostitution, and wielding it wisely for its proper uses."

5. Not in passionate desire—"which had no place in man when in a state of innocence. Who know not God—and so may naturally seek happiness in a creature. What seemingly accidental words slide in; and yet how fine, and how vastly important!"—WESLEY.

"This language would seem strange now, in any pastoral letter to a Christian church; but the state of morals among the Gentiles that knew not God, rendered it necessary"—SUTCLIFFE. "The word 'passion' signifies not so much a violent feeling, as an overpowering feeling, one to which the man so yields himself that he is borne along by evil as if he were its passive instrument; he has lost the dignity of self-rule, and is the slave of his lower appetites. (Comp. Rom. 7. 5, 'the passions of sin which wrought in our members'; and ver. 20, 'It is no longer I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.') In such shameful bondage lived 'the Gentiles which knew not God,' an Old Testament expression (Ps. 79. 6; Isa. 45. 4, 5; recurring in 2 Thess. 1. 8, see note). For impurity, often in the most abandoned and revolting forms, was a prevailing feature of pagan life at this time. In Rom. 1. 24, etc., S. Paul speaks of this as a punishment of the heathen world for its wilful ignorance of God. 'He gave them up unto passions of dishonour.' Man first denies his Maker; then degrades himself"—FINDLAY. Which know not God. Ignorance of God is the fountain of impurity. (Comp. Rom. 1. 24.) "Look at the purity of the sky, and let a loathing for impurity take hold upon thee," cries BENGEL.

6. In this matter—"by violating his bed. The things forbidden here are three: fornication (ver. 3); the passion of desire, or inordinate affection in the married state (ver. 5); and the breach of the marriage-contract"—WESLEY.

Another aspect of impurity is here given—the wrong done to one's brother. The force is well expressed, "that no man should craftily compass and circumvent his brother to obtain his fleshly lusts."

7. Observe that God's call is the starting-point of a Christian's life. All the motives and aims by which that life is governed are virtually contained in this. "Walk worthily of the calling wherewith you were called" is with S. Paul an exhortation that includes all others. (Eph. 4. 1.) So he comes to his last word on the matter (see ver. 8).

8. He that despiseth—"the commandments we gave—despiseth God—Himself—who hath also given you His Holy Spirit—to convince you of the truth, and enable you to be holy. What naked majesty of words! How oratorical, and yet with what great simplicity!—a simplicity that does not impair, but improve, the understanding to the utmost; that, like the rays of heat through a glass, collects all the powers of reason into one orderly point, from being scattered abroad in utter confusion"—WESLEY.

"He who will not receive these teachings, and is led either to undervalue or despise them, despises not us but God, from whom we have received our commission, and by whose Spirit we give these directions. Given unto us His Holy Spirit. God has taught 'us' that we may teach 'you'; and He has also given 'you' His Holy Spirit that ye might understand and be enabled to practise these things. It is one thing to receive a revelation from the Spirit of God; it is another thing to receive that Spirit to enable a man to live according to that revelation. In the first sense the apostles alone received this Holy Spirit; in the latter sense all true Christians, as well as the Thessalonians, receive it"—CLARKE. "Who hath also—in addition to His calling us in holiness. His Holy Spirit. The apostle thinks and speaks, not so much of the continual giving of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, as of that gift which is the Holy Ghost Himself. The gift of Him who is not only the Sanctifier of men, but the very living sanctity of God, enhances the guilt of those who repudiate the apostle's teaching upon purity"—C. B.

9. We need not write—"largely. For ye are taught of God—by His Spirit"—WESLEY.

Touching brotherly love. They were remarkable for this; it was a doctrine which they fully understood and practised, and doubtless it largely contributed to the prosperity of the church. The same gracious spirit will still strengthen the weak, and establish the strong churches of to-day. Are taught of God—refers not only to a partial and fragmentary lesson, but to a permanent relation established between the human mind and the Divine Teacher. We are pupils all our life through in the school of God.

11. That ye study—lit. 'that ye be ambitious'; an ambition worthy of a Christian. To work with your hands—not a needless caution; for temporal concerns are often a cross to them that are newly filled with the love of God"—WESLEY.

"Be ambitious to keep quiet. There is a true and false ambition; political ambition excludes keeping quiet. The expression contains a remarkable emphasis, or a grave acumen, for whereas ambition commonly doth prompt men to be restlessly busy in the concernments proper to others, he biddeth them to be ambitious the contrary way, in affecting quiet, and abstinence from other affairs beside their own"—BARROW. The apostle exhorts his readers to give no offence by their conduct to those who were not Christians, not as the fulfilment of the commandment of love to man in general, but as a matter of prudence and discretion, in order in such a manner to counteract the prejudices against Christianity, and so to pave the way for its diffusion in wider circles"—MEYER.

12. Decently—"that they may have no pretence to say (but they will say it still), 'This religion makes men idle, and brings them to beggary.' And may want nothing—needful for life and godliness. What Christian desires more?"—WESLEY.

"Walk honestly toward them that are without. The heathen were certain to be watching the conduct of the members of the new religion, and it would bring down political suspicion if they were seen to be acting more like agitators for a secret society than honest citizens who worked at their handicraft and calling"—ELLICOTT. "To have need of nothing, inasmuch as labour leads to the possession of all that is necessary for life, whereas idleness has as its inevitable consequence, want and need"—MEYER.

SECTION VI.—Ver. 13-5. 11. THE COMING OF THE LORD JESUS.—13. Now—"herein the efficacy of Christianity greatly appears—that is, neither takes away nor embitters, but sweetly tempers, that most refined of all affections, our desire of or love to the dead"—WESLEY.

13-18. A Removal of an Objection.—"The painful uneasiness, which had seized on the Thessalonians concerning the fate of their deceased Christian friends, consisted not in anxiety lest the deceased should only be raised at the general resurrection of the dead, and would thus forfeit the blessedness of communion with the Lord in the interval between the advent and this general resurrection ('the so-called reign of a thousand years,' Olshausen),—there is no trace in our section of a distinction between a first and a second resurrection: and the idea of a long interval of time between the resurrection of believers and the resurrection of the rest of mankind (Rev. 20) is, moreover, entirely strange to the Apostle Paul, as is evident from 1 Cor. 15. 22 ff., correctly understood that the resurrection of unbelievers takes place in immediate connection with the resurrection of Christians,—rather it was feared that those already dead, as they would no more be found alive at the advent of Christ, would receive no share in the blessedness of the advent, and accordingly would be placed in irreparable disadvantage to those who are then alive"—LUNEMANN.

14. So—"as God raised Him. With Him—with their living Head"—WESLEY.

"The Thessalonians were not to mourn, for Christ has risen from the dead; but if this fact be certain, then it follows that they also who are fallen asleep, about whom the Thessalonians were so troubled, will be raised. There lies at the foundation of this proof, which S. Paul uses as a supposition, the idea that Christ and believers form together an organism of indissoluble unity, of which Christ is the Head and Christians are the members; consequently, what happens to the Head must likewise happen to the members; where that is, there these must also be"—MEYER.

15. By the word of the Lord—"by a particular revelation—we who are left. This intimates the fewness of those who will be then alive, compared to the multitude of the dead. Believers of all ages and nations made up, as it were, one body; in consideration of which, the believers of that age might put themselves in the place, and speak in the person, of them who were to live till the coming of the Lord. Not that S. Paul hereby asserted (though some seem to have imagined so) that the day of the Lord was at hand"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul now announces more explicitly to his readers the progress of the occurrences as certain revealed truth. Here he expresses only negatively, the living will not come before the dead, i.e. they will not go into the kingdom of God alone, nay, not even earlier than the latter; then in vers. 16, 17, he gives the positive heads in the sequence of occurrences"—OLSHAUSEN. "We which are alive and remain. There is not the least necessity for supposing from these words that S. Paul confidently expected the advent before his death. Very likely he did, but it cannot be proved from this passage. Had the 'we' stood alone, without the explanatory participles, it might have amounted to a proof, but not so now. His converts are strongly under the impression that they will be alive at the coming, and that it will be the worse for the departed; therefore, S. Paul (becoming all things to all men) identifies himself with them—assumes that it will be as they expected—and proves the more vividly the fallacy of the Thessalonians' fears. It would have been impossible, on the contrary, for S. Paul to have said 'we which are dead' without definitely abandoning the hope of seeing the return. Besides which, S. Paul is only picturing to imagination the scene of the advent; and for any man it is far easier to imagine himself among the quick than among the dead at that moment"—ELLICOTT.

16. With a shout—"properly, a proclamation made to a great multitude. Above this is, the voice of the archangel; above both, the trumpet of God; the voice of God, somewhat analogous to the sound of a trumpet"—WESLEY.

For the Lord Himself—"in His personal august presence." (Comp. 2 Thess. 2. 16; 3. 16, for this kind of emphasis; also ch. 3. 11; 5. 23, "God Himself.") In each case we feel the majesty with which God (or "the Lord") rises above all human doings and desires. With a shout. Strictly, "word of command," or signal—the shout with which the general gives the order to his troops, or the captain to his crew. Such "command" might be given either by voice—his own or another's; or through a trumpet; both are added here, to complete the impressive picture—with the voice of an archangel and with the trumpet of God. We must not look for literal exactness where things are depicted beyond the reach of sense. These three may form but one idea, that of "the voice of the Son of God," by which the dead will be called forth (John 5. 28), Christ's "command" being expressed by an "archangel's voice," and that again constituting the "trumpet of God." In 1 Cor. 15. 52 the whole is described in one word, "The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised up." This is a military trumpet, like "word of command" above, by which the Lord of hosts musters and marshals His array. (Comp. ch. 5. 8, with its "breastplate" and "helmet.") "As a commander rouses his sleeping soldiers, so the Lord calls up His dead, and bids them shake off the fetters of the grave and rise anew to waking life"—HOFMANN.

17. Together—in the same moment—in the air. "The wicked will remain beneath, while the righteous, being absolved, shall be assessors with their Lord in the judgment. With the Lord—in heaven"—WESLEY.

"There is something wonderful and mystical about the clouds, half of heaven and half of earth, that fits them to be the medium of such events. They lend their ethereal drapery to form the curtain and canopy of this glorious meeting. Such a raising of the living bodies of the saints, along with the risen dead, implies the physical transformation of the former to which the apostle afterwards alludes in 1 Cor. 15. 51, 'We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed' (comp. 2 Cor. 5. 1-4; Phil. 3. 21). Some change had taken place in the sacred body of Jesus after His resurrection, for it was emancipated from the ordinary laws of matter. And this transformation the apostle conceived to be possible without dissolution. To meet the Lord in the air—lit. 'into (raised into) the air.' 'The air,' like 'the clouds,' belongs to the interspace between the heaven from which Christ comes and the earth to which He returns. Here He will meet His Church. So shall we ever be with the Lord—where the apostle does not say; whether still on earth for some longer space, or in heaven. The one and all-sufficing comfort is in the thought of being 'always with the Lord.' This, too, was the promise of Christ. 'Where I am, there shall also My servant be' (John 12. 26; 14. 3). Those living in the flesh cannot be so in any complete sense; 'home in the body,' we are 'absent from the Lord' (2 Cor. 5. 6)"—C. B.

18. Comfort one another. Here is the balm for the "sorrow" of ver. 13—rather "in these words" than "with." "Repeat these very words to one another, and you will find the comfort." What bereaved Christian has not found this true? The apostle was most wishful that his flock should minister to each other. (Comp. ch. 5. 12, 14.)

CHAPTER V.

"THE first part of this chapter stands in close connection with the last six verses of ch. 4. Together they form the most distinctive and the weightiest section of the Epistle. The two paragraphs of the section touch upon two different aspects of our Lord's coming, viewed first as it concerns departed Christians, and then in its relation to men living on the earth. The former passage supplies comfort respecting the dead in Christ, the latter enjoins watchfulness and preparedness upon the living"—FINDLAY.

1. "But of the precise times when this shall be"—WESLEY.

The next verse shows that this paragraph is not so much intended for an answer to a false theory about the time of the advent, as practically to cure the restlessness common at Thessalonica.

2. "For this in general ye do know; and ye can and need no more"—WESLEY.

Know perfectly—"you know—not the hour of Christ's coming, but—the utter uncertainty respecting it." Any other knowledge as to this "day of the Lord" would be hurtful and unprofitable to mankind. The fact here disclosed should prompt men to a constant watchfulness. It is an absolute certainty that "the day" will come.

3. When they—"the men of the world—say"—WESLEY.

Peace and safety—taking their repose in security; unconscious of the probability of any interruption to their slumbers. Then sudden destruction cometh—a terrible awakening to sorrow and woe. All illustration of this awful experience must fail to convey to us the full meaning of this verse.

4. Ye are not in darkness — "sleeping secure in sin"—WESLEY.

But ye—members of the Church, living in the light, expecting the coming of your Lord (Matt. 25. 10), cannot be surprised. Your knowledge and faith lead you to be always ready.

5. Ye are all. "S. Paul recognises no exceptions, no inner distinctions, among the members of the church; all stand alike so far as grace, privileges, and duties are concerned. The following exhortation shows that it was a matter of each man's free will whether he would sustain his character as a 'child of light' or not"—ELLICOTT.

6. Awake, and keep awake — "being awakened, let us have all our spiritual senses about us"—WESLEY.

Let us not sleep. Let us not be careless in spiritual and moral things. Let us not be indifferent about Christ's coming. S. Paul (as always) indicates that it was possible for "children of light" to be converted back into "children of darkness." Watch and be sober. The comparison of night now suggests to the writer another thought besides that of sloth, namely, that of dissipation. Christians are not to turn day into night by debauchery any more than by sleep.

7. "They usually sleep and are drunken in the night—these things do not love the light"—WESLEY.

"The 'sons of day' must be wakeful and sober, for the opposite conditions belong to night and are proper to its children. To be drunken by day was a monstrous and almost unheard-of thing. (Comp. Acts 2. 15.) Negligence and wantonness have no place in those who belong to 'the day.' These words look beyond their literal sense, as 'sober' in ver. 6. Drunkenness signifies the condition of a soul besotted and enslaved by evil. We catch here another echo of our Lord's warnings, 'Lest haply your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and cares of this life; and that day come upon you suddenly as a snare.' (Luke 21. 34; comp. ver. 3 above; also Luke 12. 45, 46; and Rom. 13. 13.) Thus dawn surprises guilty revellers"—FINDLAY.

8. "The apostle passes over to a new image, whilst he, as the proper preparation for watchfulness and sobriety, requires the putting on of the Christian's spiritual armour, with the help of which they are in a condition victoriously to repel all the assaults of internal and external enemies. He delights to represent the Christian under the image of a warrior. (Comp. 2 Cor. 10. 4 ff.; Rom. 6. 12; 13. 12; and especially Eph. 6. 11 ff.)"—LUNEMANN.

9. God hath not appointed us to wrath—"as He hath the obstinately impenitent"—WESLEY.

"We may well be confident then, for we ourselves are the only persons that can defeat God's predestination"—ELLICOTT. Appointed—"reminds us of 'election' (ch. 1. 4); it implies the authority with which God called the Thessalonians to salvation (comp. ch. 2. 12), as well as the fact of His gracious intention respecting them"—C. B.

10. Whether we wake or sleep—"be alive or dead at His coming"—WESLEY.

Wake or sleep — i.e. "living or dead," with allusion to the use of the same terms to denote spiritual wakefulness or slumber in vers. 6, 7. "Let us arm ourselves with a brave hope of our salvation, for it will be against God's will if we should perish: He means us to save ourselves by union with Him who put an end to death for us by dying, and made all who wait for His coming to live, whether they be, in the world's sense, dead or alive." There can be no evil to those who "live together with Him." This is the life "that is life indeed" (1 Tim. 6. 19); it is superior to the accidents of time, since in its spring and essence "hid with Christ in God" (Col 3. 1-4). Such is S. Paul's conception of the nature of the Christian's life. No wonder he adds, Wherefore comfort yourselves together.

SECTION VII.—RULES FOR THE SANCTIFIED LIFE. Vers. 12-24.—12. Know them that (1) labour among you; (2) Are over you in the Lord; (3) Admonish you. "'Know'—see, mark, take knowledge of them and their work. Sometimes the same person may both 'labour,' that is, preach; 'be over,' or govern; and 'admonish' the flock by particular application to each: sometimes two or more different persons, according as God variously dispenses His gifts. But oh, what a misery it is when a man undertakes this whole work without either gifts or graces for any part of it! Why, then, will he undertake it? for pay? What! will he sell both his own soul and all the souls of the flock? What words can describe such a wretch as this? And yet even this may be 'an honourable man'!"—WESLEY.

"The apostle resumes the line of exhortation which he there commenced, and which was interrupted by the consolations and warnings he had to give on the subject of the second coming. The 'But' with which this entreaty begins, points back to ver. 11. The apostle has been directing his readers generally to 'encourage and edify each other': but at the same time they must not ignore the services of their official ministry, or deem their oversight or teaching needless. To know them which labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you. A clear testimony, from this earliest writing of the New Testament, to the existence in the Church at the beginning of a ministerial order—a clergy (to use the language of a later age) as distinguished from the laity—charged with specific duties and authority. But there is nothing in the grammar of the sentence, nor in the nature of the duties specified, which would warrant us in distributing these functions amongst distinct orders of Church office. 'Labouring,' 'presiding,' and 'admonishing,' form the threefold calling of the local Christian ministry. Doubtless S. Paul had organised this church before leaving it, as he and S. Barnabas did the churches of Lycaonia at an earlier time, 'ordaining elders in every city' (Acts 14. 33). It is not likely that it had advanced beyond the incipient stage of Church government. The Epistle to the Philippians, in which 'bishops and deacons' are addressed (Phil. 1. 1), was written nearly ten years later"—FINDLAY.

13. Esteem them very highly — "lit. 'more than abundantly, in love'—the inexpressible sympathy that is between true pastors and their flock is intimated, not only here, but also in divers other places of this Epistle. (See ch. 2. 7, 8.) For their work's sake—the principal ground of their vast regard for them. But how are we to esteem them who do not work at all?"—WESLEY.

"Exceeding highly (R.V.)—the same Greek adverb as in ch. 3. 10, the strongest intensive possible to the language. So deep and warm should be the affection uniting pastors and their flocks. Their appreciation is not to be a cold esteem; it has mutual 'love' for its pervading element, a grace in which the Thessalonians were already 'taught of God' (ch. 4. 9). Their 'work,' described in ver. 12, is the reason for this devoted esteem. In work this church excelled (ch. 1. 3); and this it knew how to appreciate"—C. B. ELLICOTT says: "The bond which binds the Christian community to their directors is not to be one of 'recognition' and obedience only (ver. 12), but of holy affection above all. For their work's sake. Our love is to be paid them not for any social or intellectual qualities they may have in themselves, it is the work which they have to do that should attract our sympathy. The original seems to mean that we are to love them, not only because they do such work, but also 'for the sake of their work,' i.e. to help it forward."

14. Warn the disorderly — "them that stand, as it were, out of their rank in the spiritual warfare. Some such were even in that church. The feeble-minded—lit. 'them of little soul,' such as have no spiritual courage"—WESLEY.

The weak and fainthearted stand in contrast with the disorderly. The latter are overbold, and need to be checked; the former are despondent, and need stimulus and help. Fainthearted men think themselves weak, but perhaps are not so; and encouragement may make them bold. The mourners whom S. Paul consoled in ch. 4. 13–18 would be amongst the "fainthearted" at Thessalonica.

15. See that none. "Watch over both yourselves and each other. Follow that which is good—do it resolutely and perseveringly"—WESLEY.

"This is a prohibition of revenge. S. Paul speaks thus, because man is only too ready to gratify his natural inclination to revenge. Watchfulness, struggle, and self-conquest are necessary to offer resistance to it"—MEYER.

16, 17. Rejoice evermore — "in uninterrupted happiness in God. Pray without ceasing—which is the fruit of 'always rejoicing' in the Lord. In everything give thanks—which is the fruit of both the former. This is Christian perfection. Further than this we cannot go, and we need not stop short of it. Our Lord has purchased joy, as well as righteousness, for us. It is the very design of the gospel that, being saved from guilt, we should be happy in the love of Christ. Prayer may be said to be the breath of our spiritual life. He that lives cannot possibly cease breathing. So much as we really enjoy of the presence of God, so much prayer and praise do we offer up 'without ceasing'; else our rejoicing is but delusion. Thanksgiving is inseparable from true prayer: it is almost essentially connected with it. He that always prays is ever giving praise, whether in ease or pain, both for prosperity and for the greatest adversity. He blesses God for all things, looks on them as coming from Him, and receives them only for His sake; not choosing nor refusing, liking nor disliking, anything, but only as it is agreeable or disagreeable to His perfect will"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Phil. 4. 4.) "This exhortation is closely connected with the preceding one. The readers are to be always joyfully inclined, even when the case indicated in ver. 15 occurs—that sufferings are prepared for them. The Christian can always feel inspired and elevated with internal joy, as he has the assured confidence that all things promote the good of the children of God. (Comp. Rom. 8. 28; 2 Cor. 6. 10; Rom. 5. 3)"—LUNEMANN. Rejoice evermore. The remaining commands are more spiritual, and hardly form part of the same paragraph as vers. 12–15, which related to discipline. The Christian who remains in sadness and depression really breaks a commandment; in some direction or other he mistrusts God — His power, providence, forgiveness. The command is specially good for a persecuted church like that of Thessalonica (Matt. 5. 10–12). Pray without ceasing. THEOPHYLACT says: "This shows the way to 'rejoice always'—to wit, incessant prayer and Eucharist, for he that has accustomed himself to hold converse with God, and to give thanks to Him over everything that happens as happening well, will evidently have unbroken joy. "Though a man cannot always be incessantly praying in words, the mind may be held continuously in an attitude of prayer."

18. For this—"that you should thus rejoice, pray, give thanks—is the will of God—always good, always pointing at our salvation"—WESLEY.

In everything give thanks. This again the apostle taught by example as well as precept. (See ch. 1. 2; 3. 9, 10; and comp. Phil. 4. 6; Col. 4. 2.) "In everything," even in persecution and shame, suffered for Christ's sake. (Comp. Phil. 1. 29; 2 Cor. 12. 9, 10.) Prayer and thanksgiving are the two wings of the soul by which it rises upward to God. AUGUSTINE said: "If God give prosperity, praise Him, and it shall be increased. If adversity, praise Him, and it shall be removed, or at least sanctified." And TRAPP adds: "Job blessed God as well for taking as giving (Job 1). He knew that God afflicted him to refine him, not to ruin him."

19. Quench not the Spirit. "Wherever it is, it burns; it flames in holy love, in joy, prayer, thanksgiving. Oh quench it not, damp it not in yourself or others, either by neglecting to do good, or by doing evil!"—WESLEY.

"The command, Quench not the Spirit, is universal. Whatever obstructs or disparages His work in the souls of men—whether in others or in ourselves—is thus forbidden. It is a strange and awful, but very real power, that we have to 'resist the Holy Spirit' (Acts 7. 51). Since He may be 'quenched,' He is ■ fire, as appeared on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2. 3.) This emblem sets forth the sudden and vehement activities of the Holy Spirit, with His gifts of warmth for the heart and light for the mind, and His power to kindle the human spirit. Prophecy exhibited His presence under this aspect, in its intensity and ardour. On the other hand, He appears in gentler form under the emblem of the dove, in whose guise the Spirit descended on Jesus at His baptism"—C. B.

20. Despise not prophesyings—"that is, preaching; for the apostle is not here speaking of extraordinary gifts. It seems, one means of grace is put for all; and whoever despises any of these, under whatever pretence, will surely (though perhaps gradually and almost insensibly) quench the Spirit"—WESLEY.

The despondency of the Thessalonians led them, not only to quench the fervour of the Holy Ghost in their own bosoms, but to turn a cold and disparaging ear to the sanguine "prophets" who preached to them, the effect of which insensibility was to quench the Spirit by degrees in the prophets also. It was because of this double effect of gloominess, inward upon themselves and outward upon others, that the command, "Quench not," occurs between the exhortation to thanksgiving and the warning not to despise prophecy. This seems to be the most natural way of accounting for the present warning.

21. "Meantime, prove all things—which any preacher recommends. (He speaks of practice, not of doctrines.) Try every advice by the touchstone of Scripture, and hold fast that which is good—zealously, resolutely, diligently practise it, in spite of all opposition"—WESLEY.

Prove all things; hold fast that which is good. Some of the best ancient authorities read, "But prove all things." In any case, this exhortation, while capable of the widest application, arises out of the subject of the last. "Instead of accepting or rejecting wholesale what is addressed to you as prophecy, use your judgment; learn to discriminate; sift the wheat from the chaff." So needful was it to distinguish between true and false revelations, that a special endowment was bestowed on some persons for this end—the "discernment of spirits" (1 Cor. 12. 10). And S. Paul gives a criterion for the purpose in 1 Cor. 12. 3. (Comp. 1 John 4. 1–3, "Beloved, believe not every spirit; but try the spirits, whether they are of God.") "Our religion is one that dares to be understood; that offers itself to the search of the inquisitive, to the inspection of the severest and most awakened reason; for, being secure of her substantial truth and purity, she knows that for her to be seen and looked into is to be embraced and admired; as there needs no greater argument for men to love the light than to see it"—SOUTH.

22. "And be equally zealous and careful to abstain from all appearance of evil. Observe, those who 'heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears,' under pretence of proving all things, have no countenance or excuse from this scripture"—WESLEY.

"Abstain from every form of evil (R.V.). The apostle does not advise the Thessalonians to avoid what looks like evil; the command thus understood encourages the studying of appearances, and tends to the 'doing of our works to be seen of men' which our Lord condemns. (Matt. 23. 5.) But in completing on the negative side the previous command, 'hold fast the good (in prophesyings),' he gives to it the widest possible extension, 'Keep yourselves not only from this, but from every sort of evil'"—C. B.

23. And may the God of peace sanctify you—"by the peace He works in you, which is a great means of sanctification. Wholly—the word signifies 'wholly and perfectly'; every part and all that concerns you; all that is of or about you. And may the whole of you, the spirit and the soul and the body—just before he said 'you,' now he denominates them from their spiritual state. 'The spirit' (Gal. 6. 8); wishing that it may be preserved 'whole and entire'; then from their natural state 'the soul and the body,' for these two make up the whole nature of man (Matt. 10. 28), wishing it may be preserved blameless till the coming of Christ. To explain this a little further: of the three here mentioned, only the two last are the natural constituent parts of man. The first is adventitious, and the supernatural gift of God, to be found in Christians only. That man cannot possibly consist of three parts, appears hence: the soul is either matter or no matter; there is no medium. But if it is matter, it is part of the body; if not matter, it coincides with the spirit"—WESLEY.

"This is a prayer for the entire sanctification of the soul and spirit, as well as of the flesh or body, from all sin, by which can only be meant our complete deliverance from all spiritual pollution, all inward depravation of the heart, as well as that which, expressing itself outwardly by the indulgence of the senses, is called 'filthiness of the flesh'"—WATSON. "The connection between sanctity and safety (be preserved) lies in the fact that what is sanctified is given over to God. 'No one is able to pluck them out of My Father's hand,' said Jesus (John 10. 29). (See the next verse, and comp. 2 Tim. 1. 12; also Ps. 121; Isa. 27. 3.) The word 'preserved' stands with emphasis at the end of the sentence. In the intercession of John (ch. 17) our Lord prays first, 'Holy Father, keep them' (vers. 11, 15), then 'sanctify them' (ver. 17). But He is thinking there of the situation of His disciples, in the midst of the world; the apostle leads up to their future manifestation, at His coming. The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ is the end of the apostle's thoughts in this letter, the goal of his readers' hopes. It will supply the final test of the worth of character, and of the completeness of the sanctification effected in believers. Then the whole work of Christ's servants will be brought to its issue and determination. 'The day will declare it' (1 Cor. 3. 13)"—C. B.

24. Who also will do it—"unless you quench the Spirit"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul knows that he does not implore God in vain. For God is faithful; He keeps what He promises; if He has called the Thessalonians to a participation in His kingdom, He will preserve them pure and faultless even to its commencement. (Comp. 2 Thess. 3. 3; 1 Cor. 1. 9; 10. 13)"—LUNEMANN.

SECTION VIII.—Vers. 25–28. THE CONCLUSION.—The conclusion of the Epistle is very brief. It contains no reference to the autograph signature, which S. Paul in 2 Thess. 3. 17, and in subsequent letters, is careful to notify. The urgent request that the Epistle be read to all the brethren is its notable feature.

25. "Brethren, pray for us. S. Paul has just prayed for his readers (ver. 23; comp. ch. 1. 2; 3. 10–13); he desires that they in turn should pray for him. 'Some ancient authorities,' very suitably, 'read also' (R.V. margin), 'pray also for us'—i.e. as we do for you. In 2 Thess. 3. 1, 2, he repeats this request in more definite form. (Comp. Eph. 6. 19; Col. 4. 3, 4; Phil. 1. 19; Rom. 15. 30), 'that you strive together with me in your prayers to God for me.' S. Paul, in all the strength of his gifts and his office, yet felt his dependence on the prayers of the Church, and realised through this means his fellowship with brethren in Christ, however distant"—FINDLAY.

27. I charge you by the Lord—"Christ, to whom proper Divine worship is here paid—that this Epistle—the first he wrote—be read to all the brethren—that is, in all the churches. They might have concealed it out of modesty, had not this been so solemnly enjoined; but what S. Paul commands under so strong an adjuration, Rome forbids under pain of excommunication"—WESLEY.

I adjure you (R.V.). The charge to read this Epistle is given in the strongest and most solemn language. ELLICOTT says: "That although the reason for such awful solemnity has never been very satisfactorily given, it certainly seems as if the contempt of discipline and partial alienation of the clergy and laity implied in vers. 12, 13, might suggest to S. Paul a doubt whether his Epistle would reach all the Thessalonian Christians. At anyrate, the adjuration marks his sense of the extreme importance of the letter, and perhaps the fact that this was his first pastoral letter may have made him more anxious to ensure its reception and success. It amounts to a claim to inspiration." (Comp. ch. 4. 15.) Wordsworth points out that this constant recitation of such adjuration constitutes a splendid guarantee for the genuineness and integrity of the Epistles. (Comp. Col. 4. 16; 2 Pet. 3. 15, 16.)

28. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. "This is S. Paul's usual form of final benediction. He expands it later into the full Trinitarian blessing of 2 Cor. 13. 14, or shortens it into the brief 'Grace be with you' of Col. 4. 18. It contains all spiritual good that one Christian can wish another. Such grace is 'with' us, when it constantly attends us, when it forms the atmosphere we breathe, the light by which we see, the guiding and sustaining influence of our whole lives. (Comp. note on ch. 1. 1; and on grace, 2 Thess. 1. 12.) The liturgical Amen is added by the apostle in some of his letters, and was very naturally supplied by devout copyists in others. Here it is not authentic"—C. B.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

"THIS Epistle seems to have been written soon after the former, chiefly on occasion of some things therein which had been misunderstood. Herein he (1) congratulates their constancy in the faith, and exhorts them to advance daily in grace and wisdom; (2) reforms their mistake concerning the coming of our Lord; and (3) recommends several Christian duties.

—WESLEY.

CHAPTER I.

SECTION I.—Vers. 1–4. SALUTATION AND THANKSGIVING.—1, 2. Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus. The company which despatched the First Epistle is not yet broken up. This proves that the Second Epistle was written before the end of the second missionary journey, for after that time we do not read of Silvanus being in the company of S. Paul.

3. "It is highly observable that the apostle wraps up his praise of men in praise to God; giving Him the glory. Your faith groweth—probably he had heard from them since his sending the former letter. Abundeth—like water that overflows its banks, and yet increaseth still"—WESLEY.

God's grace had wrought so great a change in the Thessalonians that the apostle feels himself under a debt of gratitude to Him for His mercy to them. Where faith groweth, charity will abound, and the increase of faith and love brings the heavenliness of praise and joy into the Church on earth.

4. Which ye endure—"that ye may be accounted worthy of the kingdom"—WESLEY.

Glory in you in the churches. He not only had personal joy over the faith and devotion of his converts, but he delighted to tell the glad tidings to others. He "boasted" to the Thessalonians about the Corinthians. (2 Cor. 9. 2.) Your patience—i.e. your "brave endurance," rather than your "submissiveness," as some have supposed.

SECTION II.—Vers. 5–12. THE APPROACHING RETRIBUTION.—5. A manifest token. "This is treated of in the sixth and following verses"—WESLEY.

"The heroic faith of the Thessalonians showed that God was on their side. By the courage He inspired in them the righteous Judge already showed what His judgment was in their case, and gave token of His final recompense. (Comp. 1 Thess. 1. 6; Phil. 1. 27, 28.) 'Stand fast—in nothing terrified by your adversaries, which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that from God.' So the joy of S. Stephen, when before the Council his face shone 'as it had been the face of an angel' (Acts 6. 15); so the triumph of S. Paul and Silas singing Psalms in prison; so the rapture of Christian martyrs at the stake, were signs of God's presence with them and omens of retribution to their enemies"—C. B. "They suffer for the kingdom, not merely for the sake of winning it, but on its behalf, in defence of it, in consequence of being its citizens, to extend its dominion"—ELLICOTT.

6. It is a righteous thing with God. "However men may judge, to transfer the pressure from you to them. And it is remarkable that about this time, at the Passover, the Jews raising a tumult, a great number (some say thirty thousand) of them were slain. S. Paul seems to allude to this beginning of sorrows (1 Thess. 2. 16), which did not end but with their destruction"—WESLEY.

The apostle has just spoken (ver. 5) of "God's righteous judgment" as manifest in the unshaken faith and courage of His servants. That visible token points to their future and unrevealed reward—on the admitted assumption, on which he now dilates, that the retribution awaiting the persecutors and the persecuted from His hand is in truth a righteous thing. Now the justice of the award is self-evident; since it is "affliction to them that afflict you, and to you the afflicted ease." Once besides S. Paul speaks of the future suffering of the wicked as "affliction," in Rom. 2. 9—"affliction and distress upon every soul of man that doeth evil." The term represents this suffering as of the nature of a personal infliction. It indicates the reversal that will take place in the other world between the position of the sufferers and inflicters of wrong. (Comp. our Lord's picture of Dives and Lazarus in Hades. "Now he (Lazarus) is comforted, and thou (Dives) art tormented," Luke 16. 25.) In Rev. 13. 10; Matt. 16. 52, the same principle of retribution in kind is illustrated. This is "just with God"; He must count it so; for it is a common rule of justice, and of all true justice He is the fountain. If this law demands that the inflicters of wrongful suffering shall suffer and smart for it, so it requires that faithful endurance shall win "relief."

7. And to you that are afflicted rest with us, at the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ (R.V.). Mighty angels—they will attend their LORD to execute His purposes. (See Matt. 13. 41, 49; 24. 31.)

8. Taking vengeance. "Does God barely permit this, or (as 'the Lord' once 'rained brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven' Gen. 19. 24) does a fiery stream go forth from Him for ever? Who know not God—(the root of all wickedness and misery) who remain in heathen ignorance. And who obey not—this refers chiefly to the Jews, who had heard the gospel"—WESLEY.

"Fire is a symbol of Divine anger and majesty, in Scripture; and flame is fire in motion, leaping and blazing out. According to 2 Pet. 3. 7, 10, fire will be the means of destruction for the visible world at the day of the Lord; while in Heb. 1. 7, quoted from Ps. 104, this element is represented as a form of angelic manifestation. (See last note.) In 1 Cor. 3. 13, 'fire' is itself made the means of judgment. The flaming fire is the element in which the Lord Jesus is revealed, not the means by which He takes vengeance on the wicked. It is His awful robe of glory. The words which follow show why He must appear in majesty so dreadful: taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ — better, 'rendering vengeance to them' (R.V.). We must dissociate from 'vengeance' all notions of vindictiveness and passion; it is the inflicting of full justice on the criminal — nothing more, nothing less. In this sense it is written, 'Vengeance belongeth unto Me; I will repay, saith the Lord' (Deut. 32. 35; Rom. 12. 19; Heb. 10. 30). The wronged are forbidden to avenge themselves, just because this is God's prerogative. Now 'the Father hath committed all judgment to the Son' (John 5. 22)—this, therefore, with the rest"—C. B.

9. From the glory of His power. "Tremble, ye stout-hearted. Everlasting destruction—as there can be no end of their sins (the same enmity against God continuing), so neither of their punishment; sin and its punishment running parallel throughout eternity itself. They must of necessity, therefore, be cut off from all good, and all possibility of it. From the presence of the Lord—wherein chiefly consists the salvation of the righteous. What unspeakable punishment is implied even in falling short of this, supposing that nothing more were implied in His taking vengeance!"—WESLEY.

"This is the only passage in S. Paul's Epistles in which everlasting damnation is openly declared. For the supposition that S. Paul did indeed, in this earliest of his Epistles, still teach everlasting damnation, but gave it up in later times, there exists no sufficient foundation. This alone admits of being maintained, that among the writers of the New Testament S. Paul is the one that lets this doctrine retire to the background most"—OLSHAUSEN. M. HENRY says: "Though sinners may be long reprieved, yet they will be punished at last. Their misery will be a proper punishment for their crimes. They did sin's work, and must receive sin's wages. Their punishment will be no less than destruction, not of their being but of their bliss, not that of the body alone but both as to body and soul. This destruction will be everlasting. They shall be always dying, and yet never die. The chains of darkness are everlasting chains, and the fire everlasting fire. Who knows the power of His anger? He is able to cast into hell."

10. To be glorified in His saints — "for the wonderful glory of Christ shall shine in them"—WESLEY.

"It will be a joyful day to some, and in that day of His triumph His saints shall have complete victory and happiness. His grace and power will then be manifested and magnified, when it shall appear what He hath purchased for, and wrought in, and bestowed upon, all those that believe in Him. As His wrath and power will be made known in and by the destruction of His enemies, so His grace and power will be magnified in the salvation of His saints"—M. HENRY.

11. All the good pleasure of His goodness—"which is no less than perfect holiness"—WESLEY.

That our God may count you worthy of your calling, and fulfil every desire of goodness and every work of faith with power (R.V.). This prayer answered in all the people of God would quickly bring a transformed and renewed world. We are called with a high and holy calling, called to the inheritance of the saints. Our concern should be to be worthy of it, and prepared for it. Col. 1. 12, Every desire of goodness. Eph. 3. 20, "Every work of faith with power." (Mark 9. 23; John 11. 25; 14. 12.) "In us the work of faith fulfil."

12. That the name—"the love and power of our Lord may be glorified—gloriously displayed in you"—WESLEY.

This is the highest and holiest aim of life, and all other things should be subordinate to it. Even our good works are to so shine before men that they may glorify God (Matt. 5. 16). The duty is abiding (1 Cor. 10. 31).

CHAPTER II.

SECTION III.—Vers. 1–12. THE REVELATION OF THE LAWLESS ONE.—1. Our gathering together to Him—"in the clouds"—WESLEY.

Touching the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ (R.V.). The coming of Christ and the meeting with the beloved dead would not be so bright, so perfect, perhaps so soon, if the Thessalonians allowed themselves to be misled with regard to it.

2. Be not shaken in mind—"in judgment —or terrified—as those easily are who are immoderately fond of knowing future things. Neither by any pretended revelation from the Spirit, nor by pretence of any word spoken by me"—WESLEY.

To the end that ye be not quickly shaken from your mind (R.V.). "Quickly points, as probably in Gal. 1. 6, to the speedy effect of the disturbing cause. Startling declarations were made about the second advent; the Thessalonians must take care that they are not carried away by them. Let them resist the first impression of these sensational announcements, and put them to the test of cool judgment and inquiry, as men who 'prove all things' (1 Thess. 5. 21); they will find out how baseless they really are. Nor yet, he continues, be kept in alarm. The former clause describes the overthrow of one's mental equilibrium; this deprecates a continued agitation, a nervous, fluttered condition of mind. The word occurs in the like connection in Matt. 24. 6; Mark 13. 7, 'When ye shall hear of wars, etc., be not troubled'—i.e. 'alarmed, discomposed.' From the words that follow it is evident that various attempts were made to disturb the Church upon this subject; and while some would be startled at once out of their self-possession, others, less excitable, would still by the recurrence of the rumours be kept in perturbation"—C. B.

3. Unless the falling away—"from the pure faith of the gospel come first. This began even in the apostolic age. But the man of sin, the son of perdition—eminently so called, is not come yet. However, in many respects, the pope has an indisputable claim to those titles. He is, in an emphatical sense, 'the man of sin,' as he increases all manner of sin above measure. And he is, too, properly styled, 'the son of perdition,' as he has caused the death of numberless multitudes, both of his opposers and followers, destroyed innumerable souls, and will himself perish everlastingly. He it is that opposeth himself to the emperor, once his rightful sovereign; and that exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped — commanding angels, and putting kings under his feet, both of whom are 'called gods' in Scripture; claiming the highest power, the highest honour; suffering himself, not once only, to be styled God or Vice-God. Indeed no less is employed in his ordinary title, 'Most Holy Lord,' or, 'Most Holy Father.' So that he sitteth—enthroned —in the temple of God—mentioned Rev. 11. 1. Declaring himself that he is God—claiming the prerogatives which belong to God alone" —WESLEY.

Let no man beguile you (R.V.). "Beguile you, as the Revisers commonly render this Greek verb, and the A.V. in 2 Cor. 11. 3; 1 Tim. 2. 14; and Rom. 7. 11 (comp. Gen. 3. 13, 'the serpent beguiled Eve'). It implies a thorough, commonly a wicked, deception. (Comp. also Rom. 16. 18.) The kindred noun ('deceit') appears in ver. 10. In any wise (R.V.) points to the variety of ways ('by spirit, word,' etc., ver. 2) in which the readers were being plied with this delusion. For that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first. The R.V. supplies the ellipsis more simply, 'For it will not be.' The apostle's mind becomes absorbed in his description of 'the Man of Lawlessness' (ver. 4), and he forgets to complete the sentence; but his meaning is clear enough. For a similar dropped, or broken sentence, comp. 1 Thess. 2. 11. His manner is that of a speaker rather than a studied writer, and such lapses are natural in the freedom of conversation. 'A falling away' is a mistranslation. The apostle uses the definite article; he refers to 'the apostasy' of which he had spoken distinctly to his readers (ver. 5). This word in common Greek denotes a military or political revolt, a 'defection.' Here this ominous expression appears for the first time within the Christian Church, as signifying 'revolt from Christ,' the faithless defection of men 'denying the Lord that bought them' (2 Pet. 2. 1). It is sad to find such a prediction in the earliest writings of the New Testament. It originated, doubtless, in the words of Christ (Matt. 24. 10–13), 'Then shall many stumble. Many false prophets shall arise, and shall lead many astray. And because iniquity shall abound, the love of the many shall wax cold.' (Comp. the mournful prophecy of Moses concerning the future of his people, Deut. 31. 28, 29, etc.) This presentiment of S. Paul grew in distinctness and was expressed with increasing emphasis, as time went on. (Comp. Rom. 16. 17–20; Acts 20. 29, 30; Eph. 4. 14; 1 Tim. 4. 1, etc.) Such words as those of 1 Cor. 16. 22, 'If any man love not the Lord, let him be anathema,' and

Col. 2. 19, 'Not holding fast the Head,' show that in his view personal loyalty to Christ was the safeguard of Christianity"—FINDLAY.

6. And now ye know—"by what I told you when I was with you—that which restraineth—the power of the Roman emperors. When this is taken away the wicked one will be revealed. In his time—his appointed season, and not before"—WESLEY.

And now ye know that which restraineth to the end that he may be revealed in his own season (R.V.). "The meaning is, And now—to pass on to another point—ye know what hindereth, viz. wherein it consists, and why the appearance of Antichrist is still prevented, that it should be revealed in its appointed time, marked out by God. The Thessalonians knew this point from the apostle's oral instructions, so that they required only to be reminded of it"—MEYER.

7. "He will surely be revealed. For the mystery—the deep, secret power—of iniquity, just opposite to the power of godliness, already worketh. It began with the love of honour, and the desire of power; and is completed in the entire subversion of the gospel of Christ. This 'mystery of iniquity' is not wholly confined to the Romish Church, but extends itself to others also. It seems to consist of (1) human inventions added to the written word; (2) mere outside performances put in the room of faith and love; (3) other mediators besides the Man Christ Jesus. The two last branches, together with idolatry and bloodshed, are the direct consequences of the former, viz., the adding to the word of God. Already worketh—in the Church. Only he that restraineth—that is, the potentate who successively has Rome in his power. The emperors, heathen or Christian; the kings, Goths or Lombards; the Carlovingian or German emperors"—WESLEY.

For the mystery of lawlessness doth already work: only there is one that restraineth now, until he be taken out of the way (R.V.). "Lawlessness hath indeed been at work ever since man fell from God by sin. But this mystery of lawlessness is surely some embodiment of the universal principle of sin which it has assumed in times recent to S. Paul (doth already work), and which contained, in his belief, the germ and potency of the supreme revelation of evil reserved for the eve of Christ's advent. A 'mystery' is not some secret knowledge or practice reserved to a select few, like the mysteries of Greek paganism; it is, in S. Paul's dialect, the counterpart of 'revelation,' and the word here takes up again the 'revealed,' of ver. 6, 'until he be "revealed," I say; for the "mystery" (the thing to be revealed) doth already work.' It denotes something by its nature above man's knowledge, which can only be understood when and so far as God reveals it. (Comp. note on 'revelation,' ch. 1. 7; also the various 'mysteries' of Col. 2. 2, 3; Eph. 3. 4–6; Rom. 11. 25, etc.) So monstrous and enormous are the possibilities of sin in humanity, that with all we know of its present and its past effects, the character of the man of lawlessness must remain beyond comprehension, — till he be 'revealed in his season'"—FINDLAY.

8. And then—"when every prince and power that restrains is taken away—will that wicked one—emphatically so called, be revealed—whom the Lord will soon consume with the spirit of His mouth—His immediate power. And destroy—with the very first appearance of His glory"—WESLEY.

And then shall be revealed the lawless one, whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the breath of His mouth, and bring to naught by the manifestation of His coming. And then. "Then at length, when the obstructor is gone, two things shall happen—(1) the lawless one shall be revealed, and (2) then the Lord will come and destroy him. The purpose with which S. Paul began this chapter was to show relatively the date of our Lord's advent; but he is now so engrossed in describing the events which must precede it, that when he does mention the advent again he does so in a parenthetical relative clause. That wicked — or, 'the lawless one.' The English version has again obscured the passage by not keeping the same word as in ver. 7. The general tendency to 'lawlessness' or 'rebellion' will be brought to a head in the person of 'the lawless one' or 'the rebel,' just as the 'obstruction' is impersonated in 'the obstructor.' The publication of the 'secret of rebelliousness' will be effected by the manifesto of the rebel-in-chief. Of course, this rebel is the same person with the man of sin, the change of title being due to the particularising of his sin by the word 'lawlessness' in ver. 7; the specification of the time is the only additional intelligence, all the emphasis of the sentence, therefore, rests on 'And then'"—ELLICOTT.

9. Whose coming is after the working of Satan — "the operation of God's spirit sends His messengers: the operation of Satan's spirit sends his emissaries. The one comes according to the energy or inward powerful working of God; the other comes according to the energy or inward working of Satan. Lying wonders—like the so-called miracles of the Egyptian magicians. They were lying signs; only 'appearances' of what was real, and done to give credit to presumption and imposture"—CLARKE.

10. Because they received not the love of the truth—"therefore God suffered them to fall into that 'strong delusion'"—WESLEY.

Deceivableness (R.V. "Deceit"). In them that perish (R.V. "For them that are perishing"). And with all deceivableness. "Deceivableness" does not mean "readiness to be deceived," but, according to old English usage, has an active meaning; the words include and expand the list just given: "in all sham power and signs and wonders, and, in fact, in every iniquitous fraud." In them that perish—rather "for them." These are not the persons who exercise the fraud, but the objects of it.

11. Therefore God shall send them—"that is, judicially permit to come upon them—strong delusion"—WESLEY.

God sendeth them a working of error (R.V.). "God punishes sin by means of sin, therefore it is He sends to the lost ones, who through their fault did not allow the love of truth to be stirred up in their hearts, a strong delusion, that they may believe a lie"—OLSHAUSEN.

12. That they all may be condemned—"that is, the consequence of which will be, that they all will be condemned who believe not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness—that is, who believed not the truth, because they loved sin"—WESLEY.

That they might all be judged (R.V.). "That they may be judged is what the apostle says. Here is the further, judicial purpose of the great imposture. God intends that men who are so disposed should 'believe the lie,' so that their false belief may be a touchstone and demonstration of their falseness. Men without love of truth naturally believe the lie when it comes; there is nothing else for them. And this is a terrible judgment upon them. As Christ came at first 'for judgment into this world' (John 9. 39, etc.), by His presence discriminating the lovers of truth and falsehood, so it will be with Antichrist at his coming. He will attract his like; and this attraction will be the exposure of their hatred of the truth. (Comp. Rom. 2. 8.) 'To those who obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, wrath and indignation.' This is not yet the last judgment, and it is possible that some under this retribution may yet repent, seeing how shameful is the delusion into which they have fallen by rejecting Christ"—FINDLAY.

13. God hath from the beginning—"of your hearing the gospel—chosen you to salvation—taken you out of the world, and placed you in the way to glory"—WESLEY.

"And this choice is unto salvation, in the utmost sense of the word, extended in ver. 14 to 'the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.' (Comp. 1 Thess. 2. 12; 3. 13; 5. 9.) This salvation rests on God's election; at the same time it has its human conditions: salvation (experienced) in sanctification of spirit and faith in the truth. God chooses none to salvation apart from these qualifications; the end implies the way. It is believing and sanctified men who wear 'for a helmet the hope of salvation' (1 Thess. 5. 8). (Comp. 1 Pet. 1. 2, 'Elect . . . in sanctification of spirit,' or the Spirit.) Chosen unto salvation stands in contrast with 'son of perdition' and 'the perishing,' vers. 3, 10; sanctification of spirit and belief in truth on the part of God's elect, with the 'pleasure in unrighteousness' and 'belief in the lie' that marks the dupes of Antichrist. These are the moral pre-conditions of final salvation and perdition respectively"—C. B.

14. To which—"faith and holiness—He hath called you by our gospel—that which we preach, accompanied with the power of His Spirit"—WESLEY.

By our gospel—"i.e. of course, 'by our bringing you the happy message'—the historical delivery of the message is dwelt on rather than its contents. To the obtaining of the glory of our Lord. Almost all the ancient commentators render it, 'for obtaining of glory to our Lord'; and S. Chrysostom says beautifully: 'No small thing this either, if Christ esteems our salvation His glory. It is, indeed, a glory to the lover of men that the number of those who are being saved should be large.' But this version is not so easy grammatically as our own, nor does it suit so well with the context. S. Paul is encouraging his readers with the same thought of their destiny which he has put forward in ch. 1. 11, 12—the identity of the joy of the Redeemer and the redeemed (Matt. 25. 23). It is well to be observed that God did not call them straight 'to the glory of our Lord,' but 'to the obtaining' of the same. This 'obtaining' does not mean an otiose receiving of glory in the last day, but a laborious course of 'earning' or 'purchasing' it during this life. The word is the same as that used in 1 Thess. 5. 9"—ELLICOTT.

15. Hold—"without adding to, or diminishing from, the traditions which ye have been taught—the truths which I have delivered to you—whether by word or by our Epistle; he preached before he wrote. And he had written concerning this in his former Epistle"—WESLEY.

S. Paul now calls upon his readers, for the attainment of this end, not to let themselves be led astray (with reference to ch. 2. 2), and to hold fast the doctrines which had been delivered to them. If the gospel is changed (Gal. 1. 6, 7) it must lose its efficacy.

16. Now our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, and God, even our Father. "This remarkable invocation corresponds both in form and place in the Epistle to that of 1 Thess. 3. 11. But here Christ's name comes first, a circumstance indicating the Divinity with which the writer invests it. 'Where now are those who would lower the Son of God?' (Chrysostom). (Comp. 2 Cor. 13. 14.) God our Father, who loved us and gave, etc. There is the tenderest connection of thought in these words. God's fatherly love prompts His great gifts. (See the words of Christ in Matt. 7. 11; Luke 12. 32.) 'Your Father who is in heaven shall give (you) good things,' etc. (Comp. John 3. 16; 1 John 3. 1; also Rom. 5. 8.) While the Thessalonians are 'beloved of God' (1 Thess. 1. 4), they are also 'beloved by the Lord' (ver. 13); and this clause, though singular, may include Christ in its reference, He and the Father being one in love as in comfort (ver. 17). In His love the Father had already given the readers gladness of heart in trouble (ch. 1. 4; 1 Thess. 1. 6), such as the apostle often acknowledges in his own case (e.g. in 2 Cor. 1. 4–6)—an 'eternal comfort,' which the sorrows of time will never waste. To know that God loves us is in itself a comfort infinitely rich"—C. B.

17. Comfort your hearts. "(Comp. ch. 3. 5; 1 Thess. 3. 13; and the similar expression in Col. 2. 2.) The 'heart' is the inward man, the seat of our thoughts and emotions (see note, 1 Thess. 2. 4); there doubt and fear arise, which can be allayed only by Divine comforting"—C. B.

CHAPTER III.

THE practical portion is introduced in the same manner as in the First Epistle (ch. 4. 1).

1. May run—"go on swiftly, without any interruption — and be glorified — acknowledged as Divine, and bring forth much fruit" —WESLEY.

Pray for us. S. CHRYSOSTOM remarks, "Himself had prayed for them; now he asks them to pray for him"; and ELLICOTT asks, "How much of a Christian teacher's power, increasing as time goes on, comes from the accumulation of intercession from his spiritual children?" S. Paul leaves people praying for him everywhere. (Rom. 15. 30; 2 Cor. 1. 11; Eph. 6. 18, 19; Col. 4. 3; 1 Thess. 5. 25; comp. Heb. 13. 18.) In all these cases the request is for active help in his work of evangelising. And be glorified. The word does not mean merely "obtain applause," as a successful runner; it always implies the recognition or acknowledgment of inherent admirable qualities.

2. All men have not faith—"and all men who have not are more or less unreasonable and wicked men"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Rom. 15. 31.) S. Paul gives thanks for such deliverances in 2 Cor. 1. 10; 2 Tim. 3. 11; 4. 17. Unreasonable and wicked men. Probably the unbelieving Jews of Corinth. (See Acts 18. 6, 9, 12.) From these Jews he was, though narrowly, delivered. It was, perhaps, in direct answer to the prayers for which S. Paul here asks that he received the vision and assurances of our Lord, and that Gallio was moved to quash so abruptly the proceedings of the Jews.

3. Who will stablish you—"that cleave to Him by faith—and guard you from the evil one—and all his instruments"—WESLEY.

Evil (R.V. "Evil One"). But the Lord is faithful—"but whether men have faith or not, the Lord is faithful. This characteristic of God is named because God stands pledged to all who believe in Him. Who shall stablish you—How soon S. Paul reverts from his own needs to theirs! He does not continue as we should expect, with 'who will preserve us'"—ELLICOTT.

4. We trust in the Lord concerning you —"thus only should we trust in any man"— WESLEY.

"The Lord is not, as the English phrase may suggest, the object of this confidence,—ver. 3 declared the apostle's trust in Him,—but the ground on which rests his confidence in the Thessalonian church. His relations with them and feelings towards them have the common relationship of both to Christ for their foundation and background, their vital underlying bond. (Comp. 1 Thess. 3. 2; 4. 1, 16; 5. 12; and ver. 12 below.) No idiom is more frequent or characteristic of S. Paul than this—in the Lord, in Christ. But it is 'to you' that his confidence is now directed: the construction of the Greek is identical with that of 2 Cor. 2. 3, 'having confidence in you all.' Let us accordingly read here, In the Lord we have confidence in you. Such is the trust that all true Christians should give to each other"—C. B.

5. Now the Lord — "the Spirit, whose proper work this is—direct—lead you straight forward—into the patience of Christ—of which He set you a pattern"—WESLEY.

And into the patience of Christ (R.V.) "May He direct (or guide') you as Lord of His people, Shepherd of the sheep. (John 10.) The apostle expects his Thessalonian flock to follow his directions (ver. 4); but above both himself and them is the supreme director of hearts, whose guidance he invokes. Patience of Christ. 'Patience' (or 'endurance') is what the Greek noun signifies in ch. 1. 4; 1 Thess. 1. 3 (see note); and in other numerous examples of its use in the New Testament. For the way in which 'Christ's endurance' is made a model for our own, see 1 Pet. 2. 19–24; 3. 17, 18; 4. 1, 2; and Heb. 12. 2, 3. Elsewhere S. Paul speaks of His 'sufferings' as shared by His people (2 Cor. 1. 5; Phil. 3. 10, etc.); and if the sufferings, surely 'the patience.' The Thessalonians were eagerly awaiting His return (1 Thess. 1. 10; 2 Thess. 2. 1, 2); let them wait for it in His patient spirit. Had the apostle wished to speak of 'waiting for' the glorified Christ, he would surely have called Him, as so often in these Epistles, 'the Lord Jesus.' Christ is in this place the patient Christ, who 'endured the cross' and the 'contradiction of sinners,' fulfilling the prophetic ideal of Jehovah's suffering Servant. (Isa. 53.; comp. 1 Pet. 2. 21–25; Matt. 11"—C. B.

6. That walketh disorderly—"particularly by not working. Not according to the tradition he received of us—the admonition we gave, both by word of mouth, and in our former Epistle"—WESLEY.

"Here S. Paul delivers a command, and that, too, in his apostolical authority, in the name of Christ Himself. We perceive what moral injury the errors of the Thessalonians had brought on the church. What in 1 Thess. 5. was but briefly hinted at required now an open and very severe denunciation. On account of the supposed proximity of the kingdom of God, working had been given up by many, who now wandered about in fanatical idleness. However, there was yet a number of quiet persons also in Thessalonica who had not permitted themselves to be carried away. It is to be presumed these were the elders. For that reason, too, S. Paul turns to them first, and calls upon them to give up communion with the brethren that walked in a disorderly manner"—OLSHAUSEN.

7. For yourselves know how ye ought to imitate us (R.V.). You know of yourselves—"'without our needing to tell it all again.' Such references are frequent in these Epistles. How you ought to imitate us—points beyond the mere duty to the spirit and manner of the imitation desired, 'with what diligence and devotion.' To be disorderly is a word applied to 'soldiers out of rank.' Officers in the army are as much subject to its discipline as the rank and file; and the Apostle Paul felt it to be due to the churches over which he presided, that he should set an example of a strictly ordered and self-denying life"—C. B.

8. Might not burden any of you (R.V.). Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought—"this clause follows up and makes application of the last, showing by contrast in what lay the chief complaint against the 'brethren walking disorderly.' They would not work for their bread, and seemingly expected the church to support them. The church officers very properly resisted this demand, telling them to return to their occupations; so the apostle himself had directed in 1 Thess. 4. 11, 12. He tries to make these ill-conducted men feel by his own example the disgrace of living, without an effort, at the cost of others; neither did we eat bread for nought at any man's hand (R.V.). There was a manly pride about S. Paul in this matter. (Comp. 2 Cor. 11. 9, 10, and 1 Cor. 9. 15, 'No man shall stop me of my glorying'"—C. B.

9. Not because we have not the right—an example—lit. "a model." Whatever reasons these Thessalonians might have for giving up work, S. Paul had the same, and more.

10. Neither let him eat—"do not maintain him in idleness. If any would not work. The word 'would' stands for 'is not willing'"—WESLEY.

Refuses. To any weakness or incapacity for work, except in himself, S. Paul would be very tender; the vice consists in the defective will. Let him not be fed. The Thessalonians are not to be misled into a false charity, giving food in Christ's name to persons who are capable of working and able to get work, and are too indolent to do so"—ELLICOTT.

11. Doing nothing, but being busybodies—"to which idleness naturally disposes"—WESLEY.

"This disorder was not merely negative, consisting in refusal to work; mischief and idleness are proverbially companions; and we are not surprised to find the apostle adding the further condemnation, that work not at all, but are busybodies (R.V.). There is a play of words in the Greek, which gives to this reproach a keener edge, 'whose one business is to be busybodies'; or rendered still more freely, 'minding everybody's business but their own'—idly busy with the concerns of others. These mischief-makers the apostle had already bidden to 'study to be quiet and to do their own work' (1 Thess. 4. 11). For the same disposition S. Paul in 1 Tim. 5. 13 reproves certain 'younger widows'—'not only idlers, but tattlers also and busybodies'"—FINDLAY.

12. Work quietly—"letting the concerns of other people alone"—WESLEY.

These idle meddlers, a burden and scandal to the church, the apostle "charges, and appeals" to them, on the ground of their relationship to Christ, and with all the weight of Christ's authority committed to him, that working with quietness, they eat their own bread—not the bread of their honest and laborious brethren.

13. But ye, brethren, be not weary in well doing. "From this do-nothing or ill-doing faction of the church the apostle turns to the rest, who were busy in 'well doing,' and bids them persevere. (Comp. ch. 2. 17, and note; also 1 Thess. 1. 3; 4. 1, 10, for the diligent and honourable character which in the main this church bore)"—C. B.

"Religion is no ignominious, disgraceful thing. Wise men measure things by the end, and the end of a religious life is a kingdom, eternal and glorious"—WATSON.

14. Have no company with him—"no intimacy, no familiarity, no needless correspondence"—WESLEY.

And if any man—"an appeal to the right-minded, not only to preserve themselves, but to join with the overseers of their church in enforcing discipline, as in 1 Thess. 5. 12–15. Note that man—'agree to set a mark upon him, to make a marked man of him.' The notion is that of making him easily recognisable, so that no Christian should 'have company' with him unawares. (Comp. Gen. 4. 15.) The word and thought in Rom. 16. 17 are slightly different. The best text goes on abruptly, without conjunction, Note that man; have no company with him. This social extrusion from good men's conversation, not to speak of the sacraments, would to a Christian in a heathen city be indeed a delivering to Satan, a thrusting into outer darkness" —ELLICOTT.

15. Admonish him as a brother—"tell him lovingly of the reason why you shun him"—WESLEY.

"Such admonitions were used among the rabbis to one not formerly excommunicated, nor excluded from the fold. The circumstances are different from the complete estrangement spoken of in Matt. 18. 17. It has been well said that 'excommunication is not like poison given to an enemy for destruction, but like medicine administered to a brother for restoration'; and that 'the fact of a man's having been a brother should work in our hearts a memory of the old fraternity'"—GROTIUS.

16. The Lord of peace—"Christ—give you peace by all means — in every way and manner"—WESLEY.

Or, Now He, the Lord of the peace, give you His peace—a reference to the peace which Christ promised. (John 14. 27.) Again, a prayer to Christ. Peace always by all means—at every time, and in every kind of it; internally, peace in their own souls, peace from schism and dissension among themselves; externally, peace from persecution and the strife of tongues. The Lord be with you all—the old liturgical form, Latin and Greek, which took the place of Num. 6. 24 in the old rite. It most probably refers to the great promise, "I am with you alway" (Matt. 28. 20), and implies, "May that promise be fulfilled."

17. "To avoid fraud, which had large facilities in the epistolography of his day, S. Paul was used to send round a specimen of his handwriting, which was easily recognised (1 Cor. 16. 21; Col. 4. 18); probably the writing was so peculiar as to be a safeguard against forgery. (See Renan, S. Paul, p. 233.) In every Epistle. It is a precarious inference that S. Paul had then written many Epistles. He may at least be giving a rule for the future" —S. C.

18. With some slight variations in form the grace closes all the Pauline Epistles (and that to the Hebrews), and is peculiar to them. "Such a preacher of Divine grace was S. Paul" —ESTIUS.

The history of the world is one; the first century lives over again in the nineteenth. All the factors of evil co-operate, as do those of good. There are, in truth, but two kingdoms—of Satan and of Christ; though to our eyes their forces lie scattered and confused, and we distinguish ill between them. But the course of time quickens its pace, as if nearing some great issue. Science has given an immense impetus to human progress in all directions, and moral influences propagate themselves with greater speed than heretofore. There is going on a rapid interchange and interfusion of thought, a unifying of the world's life, and a gathering together of the forces on either side to "the valley of decision," that seem to portend some world-wide spiritual crisis, in which the glorious promises, or dark forebodings of revelation, or both at once, will be anew fulfilled. But still Christ's words stand, as S. Augustine said, to "put down the fingers of all the calculators." It is not for us to know times or seasons. What backward currents may arise in our secular progress, what new seals are to be opened in the book of human fate, and through what cycles the evolution of God's purpose for mankind has yet to run, we cannot guess.

The first disciples deemed themselves to live already in the dawn of the world's closing day. We in its later hours keep watch for the Lord, who said, "Behold, I come quickly," yet seems to tarry. Be it ours, none the less, with unwearied love and faith, to repeat the cry which has never ceased from the lips of the Church, the Bride of Christ:

COME, LORD JESUS!

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

"THE mother of Timothy was a Jewess, but his father was a Gentile. He was converted to Christianity very early; and while he was yet but a youth was taken by S. Paul to assist him in the work of the gospel, chiefly in watering the churches which he had planted.

"He was therefore properly, as was Titus, an itinerant evangelist, a kind of secondary apostle, whose office was to regulate all things in the churches to which he was sent; and to inspect and reform whatsoever was amiss either in the bishops, deacons, or people.

"S. Paul had doubtless largely instructed him in private conversation for the due execution of so weighty an office. Yet to fix things more upon his mind, and to give him an opportunity of having recourse to them afterward, and of communicating them to others, as there might be occasion, as also to leave Divine directions in writing, for the use of the Church and its ministers in all ages, he sent him this excellent pastoral letter, which contains a great variety of important sentiments for their regulation.

"Though S. Paul styles him his 'own son in the faith,' yet he does not appear to have been converted by the apostle; but only to have been exceeding dear to him, who had established him therein; and whom he had diligently and faithfully served, like a son with his father in the gospel. (Phil. 2. 22.)

"THE EPISTLE CONTAINS THREE PARTS—

I. The Inscription, ... Chap. i. 1-2.

II. The instruction of Timothy how to behave at Ephesus, wherein—

1. In general, he gives him an injunction to deliver to them that taught the Law in a wrong manner, and confirms at the same time the sum of the gospel as exemplified in himself, ... ,, ii. 20.

2. In particular—

(1) He prescribes to men, a method of prayer, . . ,, ,, 1-8.
To women, good works, and modesty, . . ,, ,, 9-15.

(2) He recounts the requisites of a Bishop, . . ,, iii. 1-7.
The duties of Deacons, . . . ,, ,, 8-10.
,, of Women, ... ,, ,, 11-13.

(3) He shows what Timothy should teach, Chaps. iii. 14—iv. 1-6.
,, what he should avoid, . . . Chap. iv. 7-11.
,, what follow after, . . . ,, ,, 12-16.
How he should treat men and women (ch. v. 1, 2), widows (3-16), elders (17-19), offenders (20, 21), himself (22, 23), those he doubts of (24, 25), servants (vi. 1, 2).

(4) False teachers are reproved (3-10), Timothy is admonished and quickened (11, 12), and also charged (13-16), precepts are prescribed to be enforced on the rich (17-19).

III. The Conclusion, ... ,, vi. 20, 21."
—WESLEY.

CHAPTER I.

1. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION.—Paul an apostle. "Familiarity is to be set aside where the things of God are concerned—according to the commandment of God—the authoritative appointment of God the Father—our Saviour—so styled in many other places likewise, as being the grand orderer of the whole scheme of our salvation. And Christ our hope—that is, the author, object, and ground of all our hope"—WESLEY.

An apostle by the commandment of God—"'not of man, neither by man' (Gal. 1. 1). The designation God our Saviour, not in the sense of Preserver, but of Redeemer in Jesus Christ, is almost peculiar to the Pastoral Epistles. (1 Tim. 2. 3; 4. 10; Tit. 1. 3; 2. 10; 3. 4.) It occurs, however, in Jude 25, and in the hymn of the Virgin Mary in Luke 1. 47. The idea is found in S. Paul's other Epistles, e.g. 2 Cor. 5. 19. Our hope. The object, foundation, and substance of our hope. So Col. 1. 27, 'Christ in you, the hope of glory.' In Eph. 2. 14, Christ is called 'our Peace'"—S. C. "It was by the express command of God that S. Paul went to the Gentiles, preaching the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ Jesus. Jesus Christ—our hope. Without Jesus the world was hopeless; the expectation of being saved can only come to mankind by His gospel. He is called our hope, as He is called our 'life,' our 'peace,' our 'righteousness,' etc., because from Him these and all other blessings proceed"—CLARKE.

2. Grace, mercy, peace. "S. Paul wishes 'grace' and 'peace' in his Epistles to the churches. To Timotheus he adds 'mercy,' the most tender grace towards those who stand in need of it. The experience of this prepares a man to be a minister of the gospel"—WESLEY.

"My own son in the faith. In the relation of S. Paul to Timothy we have one of those beautiful friendships between an older and a younger man which are commonly so helpful to both. In this respect the friendship between S. Paul and Timothy reminds us of that between S. Peter and S. John. In each case the friend who took the lead was much older than the other; and (what is less in harmony with ordinary experience) in each case it was the older friend who had the impulse and the enthusiasm, the younger who had the reflectiveness and the reserve. These latter qualities are perhaps less marked in Timothy than in S. John, but nevertheless they are there, and they are among the leading traits of his character. Of the affection with which S. Paul regarded him we have evidence in the whole tone of the two letters to him. Of all whom he ever converted to the faith Timothy seems to have been to S. Paul the disciple who was most beloved and most trusted"—PLUMMER.

3. Charge some to teach no other doctrine—"than I have taught. Let them put nothing in the place of it, add nothing to it"—WESLEY.

Other doctrine—i.e. "other than the truth." When the apostle and his disciple Timothy revisited Ephesus, after the Roman imprisonment, they found the church there distracted with questions raised by Jewish teachers. The "doctrine" these men were teaching, and which S. Paul so bitterly condemns, seems to have been no settled form of heresy, but rather dangerous traditions from Jewish sources.

4. Neither give heed—"so as either to teach or regard them—to fables—fabulous Jewish traditions—and endless genealogies—not those delivered in Scripture, but the long intricate pedigrees whereby they strove to prove their descent from such or such a person—which afford questions—which lead only to useless and endless controversies"—WESLEY.

"Many, no doubt, employed their time in inquiring who were their ancestors, which they should have spent in obtaining that grace by which, being born from above, they might have become the sons and daughters of God Almighty"—CLARKE. "This is a strong caution against the rabbinical mode of teaching, as is intimated to Titus in ch. 1. 14, where they are called Jewish fables"—SUTCLIFFE. "It is a great sign of knowledge not to be curious about everything, nor to wish to know all things"—CHRYSOSTOM. "The way to make us mere fools is to affect to know more than God would have us. Adam's tree of knowledge made him and his posterity fools. Curiosity was the bait whereby the devil caught our first parents and undid us all"—BROOKS.

5. Whereas the end of the commandment—"of the whole Christian institution—is love—and this was particularly the end of the commandment which Timotheus was to enforce at Ephesus (vers. 3, 18). The foundation is faith; the end, love. But this can only subsist in an heart purified by faith, and is always attended with a good conscience"—WESLEY.

"The aim of the commandment, or precept, not of the Law only, nor of the gospel merely, but of all practical teaching, as opposed to fables, etc., is love out of a pure heart and out of a good conscience—a conscience which trusts that its guilt is removed and that it is reconciled to God (Heb. 9. 9, 14), and which is being trained to be void of offence towards God and towards men (Acts 24. 16); and out of faith unfeigned, which is the root of love (Gal. 5. 16), and which purifies the conscience (Acts 15. 9). Unless faith is real, the guilt is not removed and the training of the conscience is not attempted"—S. C.

6. From which—"love and a good conscience—some are turned aside. An affectation of high and extensive knowledge sets a man at the greatest distance from faith, and all sense of Divine things. To vain jangling—and of all vanities, none are more vain than dry, empty disputes on the things of God"—WESLEY.

This sentence is rendered more accurately: From which some, having gone wide in aim, have turned themselves aside. These words seem to tell us that these teachers had once been in the right direction, but had not kept in it; indeed, from the whole tenor of S. Paul's directions to Timothy it is clear that these persons not only had been, but were still, reckoned among the Christian congregations of the Ephesian church. The presiding presbyter appointed by S. Paul could have exercised no possible authority over any not reckoned in the church's pale. CLARKE says, of the term vain jangling, "that the meaning is 'empty' or 'vain talking'; discourses that turn to no profit; many words and little sense; and that sense not worth the pains of hearing."

7. "Understanding neither the very things they speak, nor the subject they speak of"—WESLEY.

A wise teacher must understand what he teaches, and must, at the same time, be clear in his own mind that what he teaches is true; then he may, as HOFMANN says on this verse, "express himself with confidence regarding anything."

8. "We grant the whole Mosaic Law is good, answers excellent purposes, if a man use it in a proper manner. Even the Ceremonial is good, as it points to Christ; and the Moral Law 'is holy, just, and good,' in its own nature; and of admirable use both to convince unbelievers, and to guide believers in all holiness"—WESLEY.

But we know—better, "Now we know"—a strong expression of his knowledge, learned in the school of the Holy Ghost. He spoke with the conscious authority of an apostle, confident of the truth of what he preached and taught. That the Law is good, if a man use it lawfully. "The Law is good," S. Paul declared with apostolic authoritative knowledge, "should a man—i.e. a teacher of the Law—make use of it lawfully"; if he should use it so as to make men conscious of their sins, conscious of themselves they deserve no mercy, only punishment. To press this sorrowful knowledge was the Law's true work upon men. It was never intended to supply materials for casuistry and idle, profitless arguments. It was never meant as a system out of which man might draw material for self-deception. It was never meant as a system through which a man might imagine that by a compliance, more or less rigid, with its outer ritual he was satisfying all the higher requirements of justice and truth. It was given to lead men to Christ, and Christ is the end of that Law for justification to everyone that believes. Those who did not use the Law in reference to this end did not use it "lawfully," they did not construe it according to its original design.

9. The Law doth not rise against a righteous man—"doth not strike or condemn him—but against the lawless and disobedient. They who despise the authority of the Lawgiver violate the first commandment, which is the foundation of the Law, and the ground of all obedience. Against the ungodly and sinners—who break the second commandment, worshipping idols, or not worshipping the true God. The unholy and profane—who break the third commandment by taking His name in vain"—WESLEY.

"The Law—better 'law'—Law in general, including of course the Mosaic Law. A righteous man, i.e. for a just and virtuous man, the opposite of the character which follows: not here a justified man, true though it is that justice and virtue and all Christian graces follow after justification and are the fruits of faith. If all were righteous, there would be no need of Law. Lawless and disobedient—who break the Law. Ungodly and sinners—who rebel against God; unholy and profane—in their own impure lives"—S. C. "A virtuous and honest man does not need to know what the laws are. The greatest proportion of men live and die without hearing once in all their life a tenth or a hundredth part of the laws that pertain to good conduct. They do right of their own accord, and therefore the Law has no force on them. So it is in respect to true manly living. As far as a real, upright man goes, he goes voluntarily. He does from spontaneity and from choice what men lower down do from necessity, or from fear of punishment. The consequence is, that men live toward freedom in proportion as they live towards fidelity"—BEECHER.

10. Menstealers—"the worst of all thieves, in comparison of whom, highwaymen and housebreakers are innocent. What then are most traders in negroes, procurers of servants for America, and all who list soldiers by lies, tricks, or enticements?"—WESLEY.

CLARKE says: "Liars are they who speak for truth what they know to be false; and even they who tell the truth in such a way as to lead others to draw a contrary meaning from it." And if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine. In this broad and general summary, with which S. Paul concludes his dreadful catalogue, the prohibition of the tenth commandment against "covetousness" is doubtless included. In the words "sound doctrine"—an expression peculiar to this group of Epistles—a sharp contrast is suggested to the "sickly and unhealthy" teaching of the false teachers, with their foolish legends and allegories—a teaching which suggested controversy and useless disputes, and had no practical influence at all upon life.

11. According to the glorious gospel—"which, far from 'making void,' does effectually 'establish the Law'"—WESLEY.

"All that S. Paul had been saying concerning the Law—its true work and its only work—was no mere arbitrary conception of his own; it was simply a repetition of the teaching of the gospel which his Master had entrusted to him, the gospel which taught so clearly that the Law was for the condemnation of sinners—that it was for those alone who do not accept the easy yoke and the light burden of the Lord Jesus. Of the blessed God. The whole sentence is more accurately translated, 'according to the gospel of the glory of the blessed God.' (Comp. 2 Cor. 4. 4.) 'The glory of the blessed God,' whether as shown in the sufferings of Christ or in the riches of His great mercy, is that which is contained in and revealed by the gospel; in other words, the 'contents' of the gospel is the glory and majesty of God. God is called here 'blessed,' not only on account of His eternal and changeless perfection, but also on account of His blessed gift of forgiveness, offered to all sinners who accept His gospel of love"—ELLICOTT.

12. "I thank Christ, who hath enabled me, in that He accounted me faithful, having put me into the ministry. The meaning is, I thank Him for putting me into the ministry, and enabling me to be faithful therein"—WESLEY.

"The mention of the great trust committed to him awakens a train of grateful memories in the apostle's mind, which he pours out in one of his characteristic digressions; a digression, however, which has indirectly an important bearing on his subject, showing how in his own case the gospel did what the Law could not do—transformed a blasphemer into a saint. I thank Christ Jesus who put power into me. The object of his thanksgiving was—'He accounted me faithful'—faithfulness being the Divinely-required qualification for the work—appointing me to the ministry. (Comp. 1 Thess. 2. 4.) As we were allowed—rather 'approved'—of God to be put in trust with the gospel"—S. C.

13. A blasphemer—"of Christ. A persecutor—of His Church. A reviler—of His doctrine and people. But I obtained mercy. He does not say, because I was unconditionally elected; but because I did it in ignorance. Not that his ignorance took away his sin; but it left him capable of mercy; which he would hardly have been, had he acted thus contrary to his own conviction"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul had been a blasphemer, for he had thought that he 'ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth'; and he had been a persecutor, for he had punished believers 'oftentimes in all the synagogues,' and 'strove to make them blaspheme.' That is ever the persecutor's aim;—to make those who differ from him speak evil of what they reverence but he abhors; to say they renounce what in their heart of hearts they believe. There is, therefore, thus far an ascending scale in the iniquity which the apostle confesses. He not only blasphemed the Divine name himself, but he endeavoured to compel others to do the same. The third word, although the English version obscures the fact, continues the ascending scale of self-condemnation. Injurious does scant justice to the force of the Greek word used by the apostle, although it is not easy to suggest a better rendering. The word is very common in classical authors, but in the New Testament occurs only here and in Rom. 1. 20, where the A.V. translates it 'despiteful' and the R.V. 'insolent.' It indicates one who takes an insolent and wanton delight in violence, one whose pleasures lie in outraging the feelings of others. S. Paul, in his misguided zeal, had punished innocent people, and he had inflicted punishment, not with pitying reluctance, but with arrogant delight. Here surely is a proof that no sinner need despair"—PLUMMER.

14. And the grace—"whereby I obtained mercy—was exceeding abundant with faith—opposite to my preceding unbelief. And love—opposite to my blasphemy, persecution and oppression"—WESLEY.

Grace—i.e. "free mercy." With faith—i.e. "bringing with it faith and love to God and man," which have their root in Christ Jesus; faith and love being, as Calvin says, signs and testimonies of the grace of God. The generous compassion shown to S. Paul is not exceptional; it is typical. And it is a type, not to the few, but to many; nay, to all. MEYER says: "The last words (ver. 13) might be so explained as to weaken seemingly the Divine grace; and therefore the apostle feels bound to set forth its abundant riches. His mind was penetrated by the unbounded greatness of the grace he had experienced." OOSTERZEE adds: "It is as though he wrestles with speech in order to find some sufficient expression for the feeling which quite overpowers him."

15. This is a faithful saying—"a most solemn preface—and worthy of all acceptation—well-deserving to be accepted, received, embraced, with all the faculties of our whole soul—that Christ—promised—Jesus—exhibited—came into the world to save sinners—all sinners without exception"—WESLEY.

"This is a faithful saying. This expression is found only in the Pastoral Epistles, in which it occurs in 1 Tim. 3. 1; 4. 9; 2 Tim. 2. 2; Titus 3. 8. A comparison of these passages will hardly bear out the opinion that these 'faithful sayings' are always quotations from hymns or liturgical formularies, although the present passage, with ch. 4. 9, and 2 Tim. 2. 2, may be Christian maxims or sayings in use in the churches. Their occurrence, therefore, may be another indication that these three Epistles were written late in the apostle's ministry; and it certainly leads towards the conclusion that they were all written about the same time. That Christ Jesus, etc. With a definite allusion to the pre-existence before 'the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.' Of whom I am chief—lit. 'first'; not, however, in time, but in excess. 'Not because he sinned first, but because he sinned most,' says AUGUSTINE. The tense is instructive: of whom I am chief, not I was. A pardoned sinner is a sinner still"—S. C. The man who would keep his soul awake must never lose the sense of his own need.

16. "For this cause God showed me mercy, that all His longsuffering might be shown, and that none might hereafter despair"—WESLEY.

Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy. "In spite of this deep consciousness of his guilt, faith and confidence in his own salvation seem never to have wavered. He speaks of this with all certainty, and proceeds to tell us with great clearness why Christ saved him, the chief of sinners. That in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all longsuffering. If Christ could show mercy to him, surely in after times the greatest of sinners need never doubt the Redeemer's power and will to save. S. Paul's conversion foretold many a patient waiting on the part of the Lord, much longsuffering, which would never hurry to punish His enemies, but which would tarry long, in the hope of the sinner repenting while it was yet time. For a pattern. Men were to learn that such conversions as his were to be looked forward to as no uncommon occurrences—conversion of blasphemers, of persecutors, whom the Lord would tarry long for, till they, too, coming to the knowledge of the truth, should acknowledge Him. Thus to all sinners was S. Paul a pattern—an example of the Lord's longsuffering, of His patient waiting. His gracious Master had dealt with him like a king, who, when judging the case of a rebel city, pardons the chief rebel. If God would redeem Saul the persecutor, none need despair of finding mercy'—ELLICOTT.

17. The King of Eternity—"a phrase frequent with the Hebrews. How unspeakably sweet is the thought of eternity to believers!"—WESLEY.

The apostle breaks forth in a doxology, as in Rom. 16. 25–27; 1 Tim. 6. 16. Now unto the King. The wonderful chain of thought (vers. 12–16) which so well illustrates the great assertion of ver. 15—"that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners"—S. Paul closes with a noble ascription of praise and thankfulness to the great God. This doxology is addressed to no one Person of the ever-blessed Trinity, but is—as has been said with great truth—"a grand testimony to the monotheism of S. Paul: the Godhead, the Trinity of His worship, is a sublime Unity. To this Eternal, Incorruptible One be glory and honour unto the ages of the ages. Amen."

18. This charge I commit to thee—"that thou mayest deliver it to the church. According to the prophecies concerning thee—uttered when thou wast received as an evangelist (1 Tim. 4. 14); probably by many persons (1 Tim. 6. 12); that, being encouraged by them, thou mightest war the good warfare"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul again addresses himself to Timothy direct. According to the prophecies. This may refer to some predictions by inspired men, relative to what Timothy should be; and he wishes him to act in all things conformably to those predictions. It was predicted that he should have this high and noble calling; but his behaviour in that calling was a matter of contingency, as it respected the use he might make of the grace of his calling. He is therefore urged to war a good warfare. He was now called to that estate to which the prophecies referred; and now he is to act worthily or unworthily of that calling, according as he fought or did not fight the good warfare, and according as he held or did not hold faith and a good conscience"—CLARKE.

19. Holding fast faith—"which is as a most precious liquor. And a good conscience—which is as a clean glass. Which—namely, a good conscience—some having thrust away. It goes away unwillingly: it always says, 'Do not hurt me.' And they who retain this do not make shipwreck of their faith. Indeed, none can make shipwreck of faith who never had it. These, therefore, were once true believers: yet they fell not only foully, but finally; for ships once wrecked cannot be afterwards saved"—WESLEY.

Faith and a good conscience are ever closely bound together. A bad conscience is a source of unbelief, and faith purifies the conscience. Having put away—rather, "having thrust from them," wilfully and deliberately, "as a troublesome monitor"—BENGEL. In this manner Timothy is to discharge his office. S. Paul had just spoken of the Christian's warfare. So he here refers to the Christian armour. Faith and a good conscience constitute a grand defence, and he who can put away such protection may well be said to have brought upon himself all the perils of shipwreck. We cannot afford to "put away" any shield which God has made possible to us. A ship without helm or compass is not more helpless in a storm than a man who is without "faith" and a good conscience amid the perils of spiritual warfare.

20. Whom—"though absent—I have delivered to Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme—that by what they suffer they may be in some measure restrained, if they will not repent"—WESLEY.

It is scarcely doubtful that S. Paul delivered Hymenæus and Alexander to Satan, in order that Satan might have power to afflict their bodies (just as he was allowed power over the body of Job), with a view to their spiritual amelioration. This personal suffering following close upon their sin, and declared by the apostle to be a punishment for it, would teach them to abandon it. Satan is always ready to inflict suffering. It hardens and exasperates some men, while it humbles and purifies others. In the case of these two blasphemers he would hope to induce them to blaspheme all the more. The true end and purpose of this, as of all Divine punishments, was not revenge for the sin, but the ultimate recovery of the sinner.

CHAPTER II.

CHURCH REGULATIONS.—1. Public worship. 1. I exhort therefore—"seeing God is so gracious. In this chapter he gives directions (1) With regard to public prayers; (2) With regard to doctrine. Supplication is here the imploring help in time of need: prayer is any kind of offering up our desires to God. But true prayer is the vehemency of holy zeal, the ardour of Divine love, arising from a calm, undisturbed soul, moved upon by the Spirit of God. Intercession is prayer for others. We may likewise give thanks for all men, in the full sense of the word, for that God 'willeth all men to be saved,' and Christ is the Mediator of all"—WESLEY.

First of all—first in order of direction, and perhaps of importance—not in regard to the time when prayer was to be used, as Chrysostom, who refers the passage to the daily morning prayer; but whenever common prayer is used I exhort, etc. Supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be given for all men—"not merely for ourselves or for the Church. It is difficult to establish a clear distinction between the three words used by the apostle for prayer. Perhaps, as suggested by Ellicott, the idea most prominent in 'supplications' is that of want; in 'prayers,' that of solemn devotion; in 'intercessions,' that of individual earnest pleading with God. In this passage they all imply intercessions, in the ordinary sense of the word, as they are all, as well as thanksgiving, to be made for all men"—S. C. "It is not merely the natural influence of public worship on those who offer it of which we ought to think. We believe that in the mystery of the relations which God has established between Himself and us, He has given us the power to widen and deepen the channels of His own bounty, and that this power is greatest when we pray together. God has made men dependent on the acts to which our sympathy prompts us, and we need not be surprised that He has made them dependent on our prayers too"—Dr. DALE. "Let us never forget that not only prayers but thanksgivings are to be offered for all men, and that the truest gratitude is shown, not in words or feelings, but in conduct. We should send good deeds after good words to heaven"—PLUMMER.

2. For all that are in authority—"seeing even the lowest country magistrates frequently do much good or much harm. God supports the power of magistracy for the sake of His own people, when, in the present state of men, it could not otherwise be kept up in any nation whetever. Godliness—inward religion; the true worship of God. Honesty—a comprehensive word, taking in the whole duty we owe to our neighbour"—WESLEY.

Without any special reference to the Roman emperors, the expression simply directs that prayer should be offered in all Christian congregations for the supreme authorities of the Roman empire. "That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life. What now is the special object of this prayer for those in high authority and power? First, that through their wise rule the Christians might enjoy peace; and, second, that the temper of the people who prayed thus for the ruling powers might be so affected by the constant repetition of such prayers, that all thoughts of revolt and resistance would be gradually stamped out. S. Paul knew whom he was addressing. The Christian congregations of his age were largely made up of Jews. An intense longing to throw off the yoke of Rome pervaded the whole nation. The terrible events of the year 70 (only four or five years at most from the time of writing this Epistle) show how deep seated was their hatred of the stranger. In all godliness and honesty. The word rendered 'honesty' is better translated gravity, or decorum. These words are only used by S. Paul in his Pastoral Epistles, where 'godliness' occurs nine times, and 'gravity' three times. The sphere, so to speak, in which S. Paul's ideal Christian must walk during his quiet, unobtrusive pilgrimage, was reverence and decorum"—ELLICOTT.

3. For this—"that we pray for all men. Do you ask, 'Why are not more converted?' We do not pray enough. Is acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour—who has actually saved us that believe, and willeth all men to be saved. It is strange that any whom He has actually saved should doubt the universality of His grace!"—WESLEY.

"The connection is, For the practice which I enjoin of praying for all men, including kings and magistrates, although heathen and possibly persecutors, is both good in itself and acceptable in the sight of our Saviour, God, whose will it is that all men should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth. Our prayers should be as comprehensive as God's will. The knowledge—i.e. 'the full knowledge.' Salvation is in virtue and aim universal. Christ died for all, and His blood cleanseth from all sin. God's will, thus revealed, is for 'all men to be saved.' But He does not will to save all men irrespective of their own acceptance of the terms of salvation. He wills them to be saved on certain conditions; to come to the full knowledge of the gospel; knowledge—i.e. not merely intellectual but moral, influencing the affections and life. This full knowledge, then, will include penitence, faith, love, and obedience"—S. C.

4. "Who willeth seriously all men—not a part only, much less the smallest part—to be saved—eternally. This is treated of, vers. 5, 6. And, in order thereto, to come—they are not compelled—to the knowledge of the truth—which brings salvation. This is treated of, vers. 6, 7"—WESLEY.

"In other words, through the sacrifice and the death of Christ all are rendered capable of salvation (salvabiles); that some are indisputably not saved, is not due to any outward circumscription or inefficacy of the Divine will, but to man's rejection of the special means of salvation which God has been pleased to appoint, and to which it is His Divine will that man's salvation should be limited. Redemption is universal, yet conditional—all may be saved, yet all will not be saved, because all will not conform to God's appointed condition"—ELLICOTT. God's purpose of salvation extends to all, and therefore the prayer of Christians must include all. WIESINGER says: "The apostle does not mean specially to give a reason for prayer for the conversion of all men, but for prayer generally as a duty of universal love to men."

5. "For—the fourth verse is proved by the fifth; the first by the fourth. There is one God—and they who have not Him, through the one Mediator, have no God. One Mediator also. We could not rejoice that there is a God, were there not a Mediator also: One who stands between God and men, to reconcile man to God, and to transact the whole affair of our salvation. This excludes all other mediators, as saints and angels, whom the papists set up and idolatrously worship as such: just as the heathens of old set up many mediators, to pacify their superior gods. The Man—therefore all men are to apply to this Mediator, 'who gave Himself for all'"—WESLEY.

"Confirmatory of the position that God's will is that all should be saved. The universality of the dispensation is proved by the unity of the Dispenser"—ELLICOTT. "The apostle wishes to confirm the idea of the universality of the Divine purpose of salvation as true and necessary: he does this first by pointing to the unity of God. There is a quite similar connection of ideas in Rom. 3. 30; emphasis is laid on God's unity in another connection in 1 Cor. 8. 6, and, in a third connection, in Eph. 4. 6. From the unity of God it necessarily follows that there is only one purpose regarding all; for if there were various purposes for various individuals, the Godhead would be divided in its nature. As there is one God, however, so also there is one Mediator"—HUTHER. For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus. "For." This gives the reason why it is good and well-pleasing in the sight of God that Christians should pray for all—for there is one Saviour, God the Father, who wills that all should be saved, and there is one Mediator, Christ Jesus, who has given Himself as ransom for all. Surely, then, to us who call ourselves by the name of Christ, the fate of the heathen who as yet know not Christ cannot be a matter of indifference. We must in our praise and prayer include these strangers whom the Father wills should come to Him, for whose sake the Son has given His life. The Man Christ Jesus. S. Paul, with special emphasis, speaks of the "one Mediator between God and men" as "the Man Christ Jesus," no doubt wishing to bring into prominence the true humanity of the Lord.

6. Who gave Himself a ransom for all. "Such a ransom, the word signifies, wherein a like or equal is given; as an eye for an eye, or life for life: and this ransom, from the dignity of the person redeeming, was more than equivalent to all mankind. To be testified of in due season—lit. 'in His own seasons'; those chosen by His own wisdom"—WESLEY.

We have here, in a few words, the inspired description of the manner in which the Mediator performed His office and work; He yielded up Himself to death as the price of the redemption of all mankind—His life in exchange for their forfeited lives. The teaching is very definite. It asserts, that without pleading the death of Christ, we may, if we please, approach and find access to the Father, and such teaching, as this passage shows, is irreconcilable with gospel truth. To be testified in due time. Letter rendered, "witness of which was to be borne in its own times." The meaning of the words is, "Jesus Christ in the eternal counsels, gave Himself to death as the price of the redemption of fallen man; at the appointed and fitting season He endured this death—this death was the witness to the truth of the tremendous offering made in the counsels of the eternal and ever-blessed Trinity." So S. Chrysostom, who asserts that "the witness to be borne" was given in the death and suffering of the Lord.

8. I will—"a word strongly expressing his apostolical authority—therefore—this particle connects the eighth with the first verse—that men pray in every place—public and private. Wherever men are, there prayer should be. Lifting up holy hands—pure from all known sin. Without wrath—in any kind, against any creature. And every temper or motion of our soul that is not according to love is 'wrath.' And doubting—which is contrary to faith. And wrath, or unholy actions, or want of faith in Him we call upon, are the three grand hindrances of God's hearing our petitions. Christianity consists of faith and love, embracing truth and grace: therefore, the sum of our wishes should be, to pray, and live, and die, without any wrath or doubt"—WESLEY.

Men, said S. Paul, in every place where a congregation in the name of Christ was gathered together, were to be the offerers of prayer. The word "everywhere" seems a memory of the Lord's words to the woman of Samaria, "Believe Me, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father." Lifting up holy hands. It was the Jewish practice, not only in taking a solemn oath—or in blessing—but also in prayer, to lift up the hands. (Comp. Ps. 28. 2; 63. 4.) This seems to have been generally adopted by the early Christians as the attitude in prayer. See CLEM. ROM., To the Corinthians, ch. 29. "Holy hands"; see Ps. 24. 4; 26. 6; "holy"—that is, unstained with wanton sins. Without wrath and doubting. "Here allusion is doubtless made to religious disputes and contentions among the believers themselves—'doubting' is better translated by 'disputing.' These angry feelings can have no place in the heart of one who really prays, whether in public or in private"—ELLICOTT. Without wrath and disputing—"that is, in the spirit of Christian peace and trust. Ill-will and misgiving respecting one another are incompatible with united prayer to our common Father. The atmosphere of controversy is not congenial to devotion. Christ Himself has told us to be reconciled to our brother before presuming to offer our gift on the altar. In a similar spirit S. Paul directs that those who are to conduct public service in the sanctuary must do so without angry feelings or mutual distrust. To keep one's tongue and one's temper in due order is to all of us one of the most constant and necessary duties of the Christian life; and the neglect cannot fail to be disastrous to the reality and efficacy of our devotions"—PLUMMER. "In the Pastoral Epistles, special stress is laid on peaceableness as a Christian virtue. (Ch. 3. 3; Tit. 3. 2; 2 Tim. 2. 24)"—HUTHER.

9. With sobriety—"which, in S. Paul's sense, is the virtue which governs our whole life according to true wisdom. Not with curled hair, not with gold—worn by way of ornament. Not with pearls—jewels of any kind: a part is put for the whole. Not with costly raiment. These four are expressly forbidden by name to all women (here is no exception) professing godliness; and no art of man can reconcile with the Christian profession the wilful violation of an express command"—WESLEY.

"The apostle is continuing directions for public worship. Women, who as well as the men will be present; adorn themselves in modest apparel. The meaning may perhaps reach somewhat beyond dress and ornament, to demeanour and deportment. Shamefacedness—a shrinking from all that is indelicate and unbecoming. Sobriety—sobermindedness, the well-balanced state of mind which results from habitual self-restraint. Broided hair. (Comp. 1 Pet. 3. 3.) Gold or pearls. There would seem to have been in the Ephesian church women of property who could afford such ornaments"—S. C.

10. With good works. The apostle, still speaking of woman's true part in public divine service—argues that their "works" should be in accord with their "words" of prayer—tells them that a woman's truest and most beautiful ornament consisted in those tender works of mercy and pity—her peculiar province—in other words, that they, like Dorcas of Joppa, whose praise is in the Book of Life, "should be full of good works and almsdeeds." (Acts 9. 36.)

11. The thought of public ministration is still in the apostle's mind when he gives this injunction. The very questioning on difficult points is forbidden them at the public assembly (1 Cor. 14. 35), so averse was S. Paul to anything which might mar the quiet solemnity of these meetings for prayer and praise and authoritative instruction.

12. To usurp authority over the man—"by public teaching"—WESLEY.

S. Paul caught well the spirit of his Master here. He raised once and for ever the women of Christ out of the position of degradation and intellectual inferiority they had occupied in the various pagan systems of the East and West, and taught with all the weight of an apostle — of an accredited teacher of Divine wisdom—that woman was a fellow-heir with man of the glories of the kingdom, where sex would exist no longer; but, while teaching this great and elevating truth, S. Paul shows what is the only proper sphere in which woman should work, and in which she should exercise her influence and power; while man's work and duties lay in the busy world without, woman's work was exclusively confined to the quiet stillness of home.

13. First—"so that woman was originally the inferior"—WESLEY.

This teaching of S. Paul's respecting the public position of woman as regards man, in which he shows that she is to hold a subordinate place — is based upon no arbitrary human speculation, but upon God's original order in creation—that Divine order which first created man, and, after man's creation, formed woman as his helpmeet.

14. And Adam was not deceived — "the serpent deceived Eve: Eve did not deceive Adam, but persuaded him. 'Thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife' (Gen. 3. 17). The preceding verse showed why a woman should not 'usurp authority over the man'; this shows why she ought not 'to teach.' She is more easily deceived, and more easily deceives. The woman being deceived transgressed — 'the serpent deceived' her (Gen. 3. 13), and she transgressed"—WESLEY.

And Adam was not deceived. Priority in creation was the ground alleged by S. Paul as the reason why the woman was never to exercise authority over man, the eldest born of God. "Adam was not deceived"; the apostle now refers to the general basis of his direction respecting the exclusion of women from all public praying and teaching contained in vers. 9–12. The argument here is a singular one—Adam and Eve both sinned, but Adam was not deceived. He sinned, quite aware all the while of the magnitude of the sin he was voluntarily committing. As the apostle remembers the Old Testament story of the Fall, there comes into his thoughts the cunning serpent by which Eve, not Adam, let himself be ensnared. HUTHER says: "As to the thought itself, expositors find the force of this second reason to be in the fact that in the Fall the weakness of the woman, her proneness to temptation, was manifested, and that consequently it is not seemly for the woman to have mastery over the man. But did the man resist the temptation more stoutly than the woman? S. Paul nowhere gives any hint of that. The significant part of the Mosaic narrative to him is rather this, that the judgment of God was passed upon the woman because she had let herself be betrayed by the serpent, and it is in accordance with this judgment, that the husband is made lord over the wife."

15. Yet she—"that is, women in general, who were all involved with Eve in the sentence pronounced (Gen. 3. 16)—shall be saved in childbearing—carried safe through the pain and danger which that sentence entails upon them for the transgression; yea, and finally saved, if they continue in loving faith and holy wisdom"—WESLEY.

"The key to this difficult passage must be found in Gen. 3. 16. The sentence on the woman was twofold. She was to be in subjection to the man: 'Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee'; and she was to bring forth children in sorrow. But this latter part of her doom contained in two ways the conditions of her salvation. In the first place, in bearing its sorrows and fulfilling its resulting duties patiently and faithfully, she would be discharging the functions which God had specially allotted to her. As labour, which was the man's sentence, has become man's duty, in doing which aright he is to serve God, so the mother's duties and sufferings are the woman's special function and probation, through which, as a condition, she will be saved. But, secondly, the woman's sentence of childbearing involved the appointed means of her own and of the world's salvation. Her seed was to bruise the serpent's head. And thus in a deeper sense, but consistent with the former, she will be saved through childbearing, as the instrument of the incarnation of Him who, 'when the fulness of time was come,' was 'born of a woman.' But her salvation was conditional, if they (i.e. 'the sex') continue in faith and charity (i.e. love) and holiness with sobriety, the sobermindedness recommended in ver. 9 as woman's true ornament"—S. C.

CHAPTER III.

CHURCH REGULATIONS.—Qualifications of bishops and deacons.—1. He desireth a good work—"an excellent, but laborious, employment"—WESLEY.

"The office of a presbyter of the church in the days of S. Paul was a difficult and dangerous post. It involved much labour; it was full of risk; it meant a hard and severe life; yet, from the Christian's standpoint, it was a work, if faithfully performed, of all toils the most beautiful, the most honourable, the most noble"—ELLICOTT.

2. Therefore—"that he may be capable of it—a bishop—or pastor of a congregation—must be blameless—without fault or just suspicion—the husband of one wife—this neither means that a bishop 'must' be married, nor that he 'may not' marry a second wife; which it is just as lawful for him to do as to marry a first, and may in some cases be his bounden duty. But whereas polygamy and divorce on slight occasions were common both among the Jews and heathens, it teaches us that ministers, of all others, ought to stand clear of those sins. Vigilant, prudent—lively and zealous, yet calm and wise. Of good behaviour—naturally flowing from that vigilance and prudence"—WESLEY.

Vigilant. The Greek word here is more accurately rendered "sober." The presbyter or elder should be sober-minded, self-restrained, temperate (not merely in wine, but in all things). Sober—better rendered "discreet." Of good behaviour—rather "orderly." This word refers to outward conduct, to behaviour in public. The Christian office-bearer must not only be wise and self-restrained in himself, but his outward bearing must in all respects correspond to his inner life. Given to hospitality. In the early days of Christianity, when Christians travelling from one place to another were in the habit, when it was possible, of resorting to the houses of their brethren in the faith, to avoid consorting with idolaters in the public inns, it was of no slight importance that the presiding elders in a congregation should be men who loved to entertain strangers and others, from whom nothing could be expected in return. Apt to teach. The elder should possess something more than a willingness, or glad readiness, to teach the less instructed the mysteries of the faith. He ought also to have the far rarer qualification of a power to impart knowledge to others. Zeal is not by any means the only, or even the principal, qualification to be sought for in a minister of the word.

3. Not given to wine—"rather 'violent over wine,' and hence violent in a manner from any other cause. To object to these prohibitions as obvious in themselves and unnecessary in a Christian community is to forget the low tone of morality in Grecian society, in which such habits carried little or no reproach"—S. C. Drunkenness is scarcely alluded to here. It is rather a warning against choosing for the sacred office one given to frequenting noisy banquets, where wild and imprudent words are often spoken. No striker. Probably something more than merely brawling and fighting may be here included. Not only must the pattern minister of the Lord never smite his brother believer, but he must also never wound his soul with cutting, unkind words.

4, 5. Having his children in subjection with all seriousness—"for levity undermines all domestic authority; and this direction, by a parity of reason, belongs to all parents"—WESLEY.

"Beside the moral qualities which have respect to himself personally, regard is also to be had, as in Tit. 1. 6, to his character relatively to those belonging to him,—his qualities as the head of a family. The Christian influence which he is able to exercise in his own house will show to what extent a successful influence on the house of God may be expected from him. His own is therefore to be understood in opposition to the house of God. (Comp. ch. 5. 15.) That which qualifies for ruling one's own house qualifies also for an efficient discharge of official duties. Hence the inference from the one to the other. The office only gives a wider sphere of active duty, but it is the same energy of a Christianly moral character that must be brought into exercise here, as in the narrower sphere of the family"—OLSHAUSEN.

6. Lest being puffed up—"with this new honour, or with the applause which frequently follows it—he fall into the condemnation of the devil—the same into which the devil fell"—WESLEY.

Not a novice—"i.e. 'a recent convert.' For the ordination of such there was no necessity, if, as is probable, the gospel had been preached at Ephesus for at least twelve or thirteen years. Lifted up with pride—perhaps, 'obscured, blinded by pride'; some render, 'swollen, puffed up.' The word is of somewhat doubtful meaning In our version it is translated 'proud' in 1 Tim. 6. 4, and 'high-minded' in 2 Tim. 3. 4"—S. C.

7. He ought also to have a good report—"to have had a fair character in time past—from them that are without—that are not Christians. Lest he fall into reproach—by their rehearsing his former life, which might discourage and prove a snare to him"—WESLEY.

"Another special qualification, mentioned only here, is the good reputation among those without the Church. To have a good report. The apostle ascertained this with respect to Timothy himself ere he connected himself with him. (Acts 16. 2.) This passage represents the devil as the immediate author of that which is done by others"—WIESINGER.

8. Likewise the deacons must be serious—"men of a grave, decent, venerable behaviour. But where are presbyters? Were this order essentially distinct from that of bishops, could the apostle have passed it over in silence? Not desirous of filthy gain—with what abhorrence does he everywhere speak of this! All that is gained (above food and raiment) by ministering in holy things is 'filthy gain' indeed; far more filthy than what is honestly gained by raking kennels, or emptying common sewers"—WESLEY.

"We have here the character of deacons. These had the care of the temporal concerns of the Church—that is, the maintenance of the ministers and provision for the poor. They served tables, while the ministers or bishops gave themselves only to the ministry of the word and prayer. (Acts 6. 2, 4.) Of the institution of this office, with that which gave occasion to it, we have an account in Acts 6. 1–6"—M. HENRY. The name deacon occurs again in the New Testament only at Phil. 1. 1 and Rom. 16. 1, in the latter passages as an appellation of Phebe—hence, deaconess. Among the qualifications here enumerated, that of moral propriety of conduct in general, stands first. (Tit. 2. 2.) He then mentions certain prevailing vices from which a deacon must be free. Doubletongued—"saying one thing to one man, another to another"—THEODORET. Not greedy of filthy lucre. The administration of the alms of the Church, for which the order of deacon was originally instituted, was still one of its principal duties—hence the especial necessity of freedom from covetousness and of honesty in money matters, as a qualification.

9. Holding fast the faith in a pure conscience—"steadfast in faith, holy in heart and life"—WESLEY.

Holding the mystery, etc. "Their faith's mystery"—having their belief in the revealed gospel contained, as it were, in a "pure conscience," a heart of integrity and purity. "A mystery is that which, unknown or incomprehensible previously, has now been revealed; and, when revealed, it has become the object of faith"—S. C. "A low and normal action of fear leads to forecast; its morbid action is a positive hindrance to effort"—BEECHER.

10. Let these be proved first—"let a trial be made how they behave. Then let them minister—"let them be fixed in that office"—WESLEY.

The professed servant of the Lord must show a high example in self-control, and the deacons must first be proved blameless. The trial to which the future deacon was to be subjected consisted not in a period of probation, but in a previous inquiry as to whether the requisite qualifications, laid down by the apostle, were found in him, as is evident from the expression, being blameless, which denotes the result of the inquiry.

11. Faithful in all things—"both to God, their husbands, and the poor"—WESLEY.

Faithful in all things. These deaconesses, from their position, would become the depositaries of many a household secret; to those confiding in them in moments of trouble they must be true; scrupulously honest also in their distribution of alms; faithful, too, in the holy instruction they would be often called on to give in the course of their ministrations.

13. They purchase a good degree—"or step, towards some higher office—and much boldness—from the testimony of a good conscience"—WESLEY.

"The good degree they are now purchasing by earnest, patient work may refer to advancement to the higher ministries of the Church, but, more probably, has reference to their future position in the blessed life to come. This is one of the passages not unfrequent in S. Paul's Epistles, where degrees of glory among the redeemed are clearly spoken of. The plain words of S. Paul and his Master teach the people of God, that although the great act of redemption alone belongs to Christ, that through His merits only men obtain salvation, still His own will in a great measure determine, by their works and days on earth, the position they will occupy in His kingdom. Faith was the foundation of the great boldness, and the faith rested on Jesus Christ"—ELLICOTT.

14, 15. That thou mayest know how to behave. "This is the scope of the Epistle—in the house of God—who is the Master of the family—which is—as if he had said, By the house of God, I mean the Church"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul here makes a pause in the Epistle. He has brought to a close some of the principal directions which he has to give respecting the preservation of pure doctrine, the conduct of public worship, and the qualifications for the ministry; and, before proceeding to other topics, he halts in order to insist upon the importance of these things, by pointing out what is really involved in them. Their importance is one main reason for his writing at all. It may be a long time before the two friends meet again face to face. The way in which Christians ought to behave themselves in the house of God is not a matter which can wait indefinitely. God's house must have regulations to preserve it from unseemly disorder. The congregation which belongs to the living God must have a constitution to preserve it from faction and anarchy. God's household is not only a community, which in a solemn and special way belongs to the living God: it is also the pillar and ground of truth. These considerations show how vital is the question, In what way ought one to behave oneself in this community"—PLUMMER.

16. The mystery of godliness—"afterwards specified in six articles, which sum up the whole economy of Christ upon earth. Is the pillar and ground — the foundation and support of all the truth taught in His Church. God was manifest in the flesh—in the form of a servant, the fashion of a man, for three and thirty years. Justified by the Spirit—publicly 'declared to be the Son of God,' by His resurrection from the dead. Seen—chiefly after His resurrection. By angels—both good and bad. Preached among the Gentiles—this elegantly follows. The angels were the least, the Gentiles the farthest, removed from Him; and the foundation both of this preaching and of their faith was laid before His assumption. Was believed on in the world—opposed to heaven, into which He was taken up. The first point is, 'He was manifested in the flesh'; the last, 'He was taken up into glory'"—WESLEY.

"It is not a mere enumeration of successive incidents which we have here, by a representation of the great mystery of faith. And what can be said against the order which is followed in this representation, which begins with the revelation of the Saviour, and advances to His being made known, and thence to His being glorified? It is not the apostle's design to represent merely the cardinal doctrine from which the seducers would deviate, but rather the great mystery of all piety, of which the Church is the bearer"—FULTON. "Christianity is a mystery, not of philosophy or speculation, but of godliness, designed to promote godliness. The mystery of godliness is Christ, and here are six things concerning Christ which make up the mystery of godliness. Godliness is a mystery in all its parts and branches, from the beginning to the end, from Christ's incarnation to His ascension. Being a mystery, we should rather humbly adore it, and piously believe it, than curiously pry into it, or be too positive in our explications of it, and determinations about it, further than the Holy Scriptures have revealed it to us"—M. HENRY. "We are far from suppressing our conviction that this is a great mystery. We rejoice, on the contrary, in its incomprehensibility. It is the greatness which forms the mystery of the fact; the matchless love and condescension constitute the very nucleus of the difficulty. It could only be brought within the sphere of our comprehension by a contraction of its vast dimensions, by a depression of its natural grandeur. A prostration of it to the level of our feeble capacities would only render it incapable of being the magnet of souls, the attraction of hearts, the wonder of the universe"—ROBERT HALL.

CHAPTER IV.

1. But the Spirit saith—"by S. Paul himself to the Thessalonians, and probably by other contemporary prophets — expressly — as concerning a thing of great moment, and soon to be fulfilled. That in the latter times—these extend from our Lord's ascension till His coming to judgment. Some—yea, many, and by degrees the far greater part—will depart from the faith—the doctrine once delivered to the saints—giving heed to seducing spirits—who inspire false prophets"—WESLEY.

"The words of the Spirit here allude to a mysterious power, to a Divine gift, traces of which occur again and again in the New Testament pages. Among the supernatural signs which were vouchsafed to the first generation of believers, and, with very rare exceptions, only to the first generation — to men and women, many, if not most of whom, had seen Jesus, and had personal contact with Him—must be reckoned those mysterious intimations of the will of the Holy Spirit which guided and encouraged the Church of the first days. That intimation came in varied forms: to the Twelve in the form of fiery tongues (Acts 2. 1–12); to a more numerous company (Acts 4. 31); to S. Peter on the occasion of the conversion of Cornelius (Acts 10. 10–16, 19, 20); to S. Paul on three occasions in the course of his second missionary journey (Acts 16. 6, 7, 9, 10); through the medium of the prophet Agabus (Acts 21. 11). S. Paul alludes to many such voices of the Spirit and heavenly intimations, when speaking to the elders of Miletus. (Acts 20. 23.) One of these special revelations, made to himself, he here quotes"—SPENCE.

2. These will depart from the faith, by the hypocrisy of them that speak lies, having their own consciences as senseless and unfeeling as flesh that is seared with an hot iron"—WESLEY.

"Having their conscience seared — i.e. 'the liars.' The translation may be, 'men branded on their own consciences,' as slaves were with their master's brand—the self-convicted slaves of sin. Our English Version has taken the idea of the loss of sensibility produced by the burning. Perhaps the 'branding' might convey both associations to a reader accustomed to see the effects of the practice"—S. C.

3. "Forbidding priests, monks, and nuns to marry, and commanding all men to abstain from such and such meats at such and such times. Which God hath created to be received by them that know the truth—that all meats are now clean—with thanksgiving—which supposes a pure conscience"—WESLEY.
